This passage reports about heroic acts of David's strong men. Each one defeated a Philistine giant in a single combat. These incidents took place at various times during David's reign. This chapter ends with a catalog of wars against the Philistines, with whom David had long-standing hostilities. It also includes a list of giants, the sons of another famous giant, who were killed by David or his associates. The Hebrew indicates that Elhanan killed Goliath, while a parallel passage indicates it was a brother of Goliath (1 Chr. 20:5). For this reason, most translations say "brother of Goliath" in this passage. The short report of David's officers and their heroic deeds lays a foundation for the psalm of praise found in the next chapter. The psalm was composed by David and emphasizes the military successes of Israel. King David's rule functioned as "the lamp of Israel," which was kindled by the Lord and as such should not be quenched but should remain as the symbol of hope in God (1 Kin. 11:36).

22:1–51

David's Song of Praise

One of the best ways to celebrate victories and make such experiences memorable is to compose songs. In biblical times, it was common to compose and sing a song in response to God's help in overcoming the enemy. This is what Hannah, Samuel's mother, did after she had experienced God's saving power (1 Sam. 1–2). Seventy-two songs in the book of Psalms (about half) are credited to David.

22:1–6. God's Presence. This song is also found in the book of Psalms (Ps. 18) with minor differences. It was a thanksgiving song offered to God for David's deliverance, especially from King Saul. When facing a difficulty, David would cry out to the Lord to deliver him from mortal dangers. The narrative form of David's troubles is presented in 1 Samuel 18–2 Samuel 20. The word "Deliverer" is the key title given to God in this song. The Lord's intervention is described here in the language of the theophany at Mount Sinai (Ex. 19). The Lord came down from His dwelling place in heaven (from His heavenly temple; cf. 2 Sam. 22:7; Ps. 11:4) to rescue His faithful servant. He is a faithful God who keeps His covenant. The Lord's coming is accompanied by terrifying signs and wonders, such as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and thunderstorms.

The song abounds in metaphors that describe God's unlimited strength. The Lord is the psalmist's Lamp, Rock, Horn, and Shield of Salvation. Light is the metaphor of salvation and deliverance (Ps. 27:1). God gives victory over the enemy and delivers His children by leading them from darkness into light. Thunder and lightning accompany Him when He goes into battle. Some Gentile nations pictured their gods going into battles in similar ways, yet David's psalm says that none can compare to the supreme Lord of the nations. An appropriate doxology (2 Sam. 22:47–51) concludes this song.

Standing in contrast to the rock metaphor representing safety and refuge that can be found only in God is the metaphor of waves of death. Those deadly waves threaten to snatch people from the divine arms. Swirling waters in the Bible can be chaotic and destructive. Large bodies of water symbolize hostile powers that threaten to destroy God's creation. Similarly, the metaphor of the cords of the grave represents the realm of death called in Hebrew Sheol.

22:7–51. David's Safety. When the psalm is applied to David, one can see that much of his life and career was filled with struggles coming from various enemies. Yet in the end, God made His servant triumph and gave him peace. The Lord opened the way and set His child free in a broad place—a place of salvation (v. 20). David used metaphor to describe the details of the Lord's intervention in his life. Thus, David describes the Lord rushing to his aid riding on a swift angel, called a cherub. In material terms, David was delivered by a Philistine raid (1 Sam. 23) or by the wildness of the terrain (1 Sam. 24). But above these apparently material explanations, David saw the greater reality of the Lord of Sinai acting with power on his behalf.

The meaning of all this poetic imagery is that God supernaturally works through life's circumstances. Behind dark veils, the Lord works from His throne in the interest of His child. Although in the shadow, He is still in control. The psalm forms a fine commentary on David's daily walk with his Lord. As an outstanding piece of poetry, it looks forward with the eyes of faith to God's future faithfulness toward David's many descendants. The Lord promises to reward those who earnestly seek Him.

23:1-39*The King's Farewell and His Mighty Men

David's lasting legacy in Israel consisted of a firm commitment to the service of the Lord and a peaceful, prosperous dwelling in the promised land. The chapter includes David's last words in the form of a poem and lists several heroic acts of his bravest men.

23:1-7. Righteous Ruler. This short psalm was also composed by David. Other biblical personalities who uttered praises to God at the end of their lives included Jacob (Gen. 49) and Moses (Deut. 33). In this poem David compares a righteous ruler to a gentle rain, while the wicked oppressor is like thorns. The opening words of the chapter state that David was moved by the Holy Spirit to utter an oracle (ne'um, "an announcement"). This term, sometimes translated as "oracle," commonly introduces a prophetic speech (Num. 23:7; 24:3; Is. 14:28; Mal. 1:1) It can also introduce wise sayings (Prov. 30:1; 31:1). As far as the evidence goes, this is the only explicit reference in the OT to David's prophetic gift. In the NT he is plainly called a "prophet" (Acts 2:30). The passage looks back to the time when God acted as David's shield and protection. God protected him in the same way that He guarded Jacob in all his ways and delivered him from harm (Gen. 48:15, 16). The song also looks forward to the future Son of David, the promised Messiah, who will establish justice on earth.

The psalm is David's last formal reflection on life and his covenant with the Lord. The topic of God's relationship with His people is far more prominent in this song than the topic of Israel's enemies (cf. chap. 22). God has promised to cast aside those who oppose His plans as harmful thorns are cast into the fire. Fire is used in the Bible as a symbol of both God's presence and His judgment. The wicked will come to an end, while God's covenant with His anointed servant will never cease (7:16). The just ruler is compared to light. David was called by God to rule over Israel in righteousness and respect for the Lord ("fear of God").

23:8-39. Courageous Soldiers. This catalog of David's heroes is another tribute to God's goodness. The two songs that precede it ascribe all of David's victories to the Lord. The mention of mighty men testifies to the human help the king received from his outstanding soldiers. The list is ordered hierarchically and begins with the top three heroes. The first part of the catalog presents short stories about heroic acts, most of which were performed in the early period of David's reign. Many of the heroes came from Judah, particularly from David's hometown of Bethlehem. Others came from Benjamin and Ephraim, while at least two were of foreign origin.

David had two elite groups of champions who served as his bodyguards, along with a special fighting force. The first three accomplished significant exploits against the Philistines. The second group included thirty brave warriors whose names were listed in the royal annals of distinction. Some of the heroes died while performing their extraordinary duties. Two names that stand out in that regard are Asahel and Uriah (chap. 11). Surprisingly, Joab is not mentioned, although his name previously headed the list of David's officials (2 Sam. 8:15-18). Most commentators agree that he was counted in the total of thirty-seven mighty men.

Acts of bravery were performed during hot summers and cold winters. During one hot summer, three soldiers broke through the enemy camp to bring David some water from a well in his hometown of Bethlehem. But when they brought the water, David refused to drink and instead poured it on the ground. Drinking this water would have been like drinking the blood of the soldiers who risked their lives. On a snowy day, one of David's soldiers killed a lion in the midst of a pit. Hunting lions was a favorite sport of kings and heroes in the ANE and testified to their courage. The common technique used was a pit. The lion was pursued into a pit where a net was used to entangle it. The hunter would use a spear to finish the kill. To catch a lion in winter was more difficult because wild beasts had trouble finding food and became more dangerous.

24:1-25*David's Pride and Repentance

The closing chapter of the book deals with three dominant topics, namely the census, the plague, and the altar. Figuratively they stand for pride, punishment, and forgiveness. Thus, the book closes with a message of forgiveness in the context of worship.

24:1-9. David's Census of Israel and Judah.

The parallel passage from 1 Chronicles 21:1 is helpful in understanding this story because it mentions the involvement of "an enemy" (Heb. satan). Although modern translations have the word "Satan" (the devil) in this parallel text, the original Hebrew has no definite article in front of the noun “enemy.” There are other OT passages, such as Job 1–2 and Zechariah 3, that speak of Satan or “the enemy” (the Hebrew hassatan). But this is not the case in 1 Chronicles (see “Satan and David,” p. 536). Nevertheless, the absence of the article does not automatically mean that the reference is not to Satan. In this case we are dealing with Satan.

The author of Samuel puts emphasis on God’s control of history. The plague and its cessation resulted from David’s actions, yet both were also determined by God. Since the Hebrew narrative style is such that the summary (or conclusion) is given first, we should read the statement from 24:1 as saying that the anger of the Lord burned against Israel because “someone” incited David to act against his subjects. According to 1 Chronicles, this someone was “Satan.” The authors of 2 Samuel and 1 Chronicles seem to say that the king decided to number his fighting men in response to the threat of a military confrontation.

David usually consulted the Lord or His prophet in a time of crisis. Sadly, this time he failed to do so (1 Sam. 22:5). The Lord’s prophet, Gad, appeared only later in the narrative (2 Sam. 24:11). David’s decision to take the census of all men in Israel from north to south for a military purpose betrayed his pride and a growing tendency toward self-reliance. Joab’s warning to the king did no good. It is true David was conscience-stricken later (v. 10), but by then it was too late to change the decision.

24:10–17. Judgment on David’s Sin. God gave David a choice of three types of punishment: famine, plague, or war. All three are described as curses, which are caused by breaking the covenant (Deut. 28). David decided that the plague was the least of the three possible evils. The famous covenant chapter from Deuteronomy speaks of the three types of curses (Deut. 28:15–25). David publicly confessed that he was guilty of the deaths of many people in Israel. The nation’s shepherd caused harm to his poor sheep (1 Chr. 21:17). History demonstrates that the mistakes of leaders cause suffering for ordinary people. This is a lesson that leaders often forget.

24:18–25. Altar on the Threshing Floor. The prophet came to instruct the king to build an altar on the very site where he saw the destroying angel (cf. Ex. 9:3; 12:23). Yet, the author made it clear that this angel was under the Lord’s absolute control. The threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite was located on Mount Moriah. The site where God’s presence was revealed to Israel’s king was to become the site of the future temple (1 Chr. 22:1; 2 Chr. 3:1). It is possible that the word Araunah in the language of the Jebusites was not a personal name but a title meaning “governor.” Threshing floors were usually located outside of the city and near the gate. There, on the flat ground, the grain was separated from the chaff. This large, flat, open area was a popular gathering place for the townspeople, especially during ceremonies and festivals.

David was offered the piece of land as a gift by a local landowner who lived in the area even before David’s conquest of Jerusalem. In purchasing the site, David did not neglect to pay a price. In this way the future temple site became the property of David’s house. There he built an altar, offered sacrifices, and prayed on behalf of the people.

Thus, 2 Samuel ends on a hopeful note. David was always ready to confess his transgressions before God and devote himself to the proper worship of the Lord. In spite of his sin, David remained the Lord’s vassal. The piece of the land promised long ago to the ancestors was now dedicated to the Lord. This represented a rededication of the whole country and nation to the holy calling that originated with God. The book closes by looking forward in expectation of what would soon happen—the building of Solomon’s temple to the Lord. It also closes with the people living in a land free from plagues. This local and temporal freedom from evil anticipated one at a cosmic level and filled the heart of God’s people with hope.

1 KINGS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. In the Hebrew Bible the books of Kings are simply labelled “Kings 1 and 2.” They conclude the section of the Hebrew Bible known as the “Former Prophets” that also includes Joshua, Judges, and the two books of Samuel. Greek tradition saw Samuel and Kings as unified and labelled the books of Samuel as “Of the Kingdoms 1 and 2” and Kings as “Of the Kingdoms 3 and 4.” It is possible that the early Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint, was the first to divide the book of Kings into two. Christian tradition considered Kings a single book until scholars divided them in the sixteenth century.

The unified style of writing points to one primary author rather than many—one who used various records available to him, including written accounts of Solomon (1 Kin. 11:41), kings of Israel (14:19), and kings of Judah (14:29). Hebrew tradition suggests that the author may have been Jeremiah, but another prophet is just as likely since prophets play such a prominent role in the book.

Date. The events described in the books of Kings cover about 400 years and date from approximately 971 B.C., the start of Solomon’s reign, to 562 B.C., when Jehoiachin was released from prison and was invited to eat at the king’s table (2 Kin. 25:27–30). It is generally understood that most of the material for the book was in existence before the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

Backgrounds. The book opens with the dying days of King David and ends with the death of Ahab. Solomon succeeded his father, David, but because of his multiplied idolatry (to cater to his foreign brides), the kingdom was subsequently divided into two (in 931 B.C.). The capital of the Northern Kingdom of Israel was Tirzah for the first fifty years, but Omri moved it to Samaria (about 12 miles [20 km] to the west). The capital of the Southern Kingdom of Judah was Jerusalem. The first northern king, Jeroboam I, afraid that his people’s loyalty would remain with the temple at Jerusalem, introduced a golden calf in both Bethel and Dan and introduced a priesthood that anyone could join in order to staff the shrines. This blatant disregard of God’s command regarding worship led to the downfall of the Northern Kingdom.

Each successive Israelite king maintained and embellished idolatrous worship, and all are noted for doing evil according to the Lord’s evaluation. There were twenty northern kings altogether (eight in 1 Kings) from nine different dynasties: nine died by assassination, one in battle, one by injury, and nine by natural causes. During the same time there were twelve kings of Judah, all from the Davidic line except for Queen Athaliah, who was a granddaughter of the Israelite king Omri. By the time Judah went into its Babylonian Exile, they too had twenty monarchs, eleven of whom are noted for doing evil according to the Lord’s evaluation.

Theology and Purpose. The books of Kings contain a unified description and evaluation of events that led to the Exile of God’s people. They uncover the reasons for the loss of the land, its kings, and the temple. Its carefully constructed narrative communicates a vital message: although earthly dynasties may fail, God has bound Himself to His people through His word with covenantal promises that will not fail. He will fulfill His word within history, shaping it with His blessings or condemnation. As 2 Kings ends with the loss of land, temple, and king, readers receive a faint glimmer of hope: God, in fulfillment of His promises, would one day bring about restoration. As the books unfold, so too do a number of key theological themes: the land, the temple, the prophetic voice, sin and judgment, and hope. It is significant that each of these themes have their roots in the Pentateuch, particularly in the account of the Exodus.

1. Land. God promised His people a land to dwell in (Deut. 1:8), asked them to build Him a sanctuary to dwell among them (Ex. 25:8), and spoke through the prophetic voice of Moses (Deut. 34:10). God's action gave hope for a human-divine harmony that would benefit not only His people and their land but all peoples (Deut. 32:43). These themes are developed in the stories of the kings of Judah and Israel.

2. Temple. Solomon inherited a large domain from his warrior-father; but as a result of the idolatry he introduced for the sake of his wives, large segments of the kingdom were lost in subsequent years to increasingly emboldened enemies. Eventually this led to the destruction of the Northern Kingdom in 722 B.C., with its people scattered across foreign lands. One hundred and thirty-six years later, Jerusalem and its temple were destroyed, and the people of Judah were exiled in Babylon.

It seems that most of the Judean kings added various features to the temple to honor foreign deities (e.g., a shrine, altar, or idol), or they neglected the temple altogether to focus on a multitude of high places and attractively ornamented glades. Instead of the temple being a focal point of God's presence with His people and a constant reminder of His work of forgiveness and restoration, it was turned into a contrived monument to religious compromise and self-determination (see "The Temple in Chronicles," p. 541).

3. Prophets. In this context, the text introduces the prophets—spokespeople for God who thundered against the injustice and apostasy of idolatry. Prophets featured throughout the books of Kings include Nathan (1 Kin. 1:8–45), Ahijah the Shilonite (11:29–39; 14:1–18), an unnamed man of God (chap. 13), Jehu (not to be confused with the king who reigned about eighty years later; 16:1–7), Elijah (17:1–19:19; 21:17–29), one or more unnamed prophets (20:13–14, 22–28; 35–41), Micaiah (22:8–9, 13–28), Elisha (2 Kin. 2:1–7:2; 8:7–13; 9:1–3; 13:14–21), and Isaiah (2 Kin. 19:6–7, 20–36; 20:1–19). Other prophets also living at this time included Jeremiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel. The presence of such a large number of prophets clearly demonstrates the important role that they played throughout the books and during this period.

These prophets proclaimed the word of the Lord to the people. It is through the fulfillment of this prophetic word that the Lord controlled and guided history. Prophecy and fulfillment play an important role in the message of the books. The Lord shapes history through the word of judgment and salvation. Unfortunately, the kings and their people largely ignored the prophets, choosing instead to follow the lifestyle and cultic practices of the gods of Canaan. The word of judgment came against them and was fulfilled in the destruction of the city and the temple. But there was also the word of hope that would shape the future.

4. Hope. Destruction and exile are not the end of the story. Usually the assurance of hope, restoration, and renewal follows a prophetic word of judgment, and that is how the books of Kings end. After a description of the thorough dismantling of the realm and the complete destruction of the temple and monarchy, the story declares the release of an imprisoned king in exile (from the line of David) from his dungeon and recounts his being allowed to dine at another king's table. This indicates that the process of restoration had begun and that what had been a faint hope now ignited the assurance that by the grace of God, one day all things would be made new (cf. Rev. 21:5).

Literary Features. The books of 1 and 2 Kings probably should never have been divided—they are essentially one book. There is a definite sense of hindsight, rather than a mechanical fragmentation where the writer attempts to describe events as they happen. The style of writing is historical narrative—stories artistically crafted and told by a narrator who develops the plot and characters of each story, who repeats key words, phrases, and sounds, and who sometimes uses dialogue and the perspectives of others to communicate a lesson.

COMMENTARY

1:1—11:43

THE UNITED MONARCHY

The glorious days of David's reign were over, and a harsh reality dawned. The book opens with an aged and enervated King David who had not yet appointed his successor. Not only did this threaten the peace of the realm, but it also meant there was no new king to build the temple, complete the process of uniting the nation, build up its infrastructure, and secure its borders. David's successor would set the course, either for the success and long-term viability of the nation or for its eventual downfall. Therein lies the drama that unfolds in the book: Would the people of promise, residing in the land of promise, be guided by the conditions of the covenant, or would they instead adopt the gods, the hopes, the inspiration, the lifestyle, and the fate of their neighbors?

1:1—2:11

David's Last Days

The narrative of Kings opens by introducing a number of key characters. Abishag played a key role in the final stages of David's reign. Adonijah, sensing the impotence of his father, seized the opportunity to declare himself king before his brother Solomon could. Bathsheba, urged by Nathan the prophet, ensured that David kept his promise to make Solomon the next king. Bathsheba's plea rekindled some of David's old fire, and he called for his trusted advisors to inaugurate Solomon as his successor.

1:1–10. Abishag and Adonijah. The short story of Abishag placed at the beginning of the book alerts the reader to the fact that a new king should be immediately appointed to succeed David. David had reached a point where he had to totally rely on others, thus risking the security of the kingdom through potential palace intrigues and disputes for power. Abishag was from the town of Sunnem, and since she had a very specific task with respect to the aged king, she was not considered to be part of the king's harem.

Realizing that his father was weakened with age, Prince Adonijah (whose name means "the Lord is my God") feared that his brother Solomon would soon take the throne. He concluded that he had to move fast in order to take over the kingdom. He was David's fourth and probably his oldest surviving son (2 Sam. 3:2–4; 13:28; 18:14–15). Possibly he considered himself rightful heir apparent on that basis. He exalted himself and let those in the right places know that he would be the next king. He acquired a chariot and appointed fifty men to run before him (1 Kin. 1:5). His tactics reflect those of Absalom (2 Sam. 15:1) and suggest a similar demise.

The text describes Adonijah as handsome (1 Kin. 1:6), as in the case of Absalom (2 Sam. 14:25) and David (1 Sam. 16:12). He managed to attract some significant supporters, especially Joab and Abiathar. Joab, Adonijah's cousin, played a key role during David's reign (e.g., 2 Sam. 14; 18:14; 1 Chr. 11:6). However, a rift developed between David and Joab from the time Joab murdered Abner (2 Sam. 3:12–39). Abiathar, the priest who had joined the fugitive David after escaping the slaughter of the priests by King Saul (1 Sam. 22:17–23), may also have fallen from the king's favor. Abiathar was being eclipsed by Zadok and Joab by Benaiah (the captain of the king's guard), so the prospect of supporting a new king may have been a very attractive option for the two old campaigners.

1:11–31. Succession Crisis. The venue for Adonijah's coronation celebration was near a well-known spring, easily visible across the Kidron Valley from Jerusalem and David's citadel valleys (v. 9). While David, in his apparent feeble condition, was unaware of what was happening, others would have understood the significance and the threat of the events unfolding. Nathan the prophet became aware of what was taking place and decided to alter the course of history initiated by Adonijah since it was not according to God's will. So immediately, together with Bathsheba, he set up a plan to approach King David, the center of power, to ensure the king's legal and proper succession. Otherwise the people of Jerusalem might assume Adonijah's rise to the throne as official (v. 20). Nathan and Bathsheba focused their coordinated speeches on the reliability of the king's word (vv. 17, 24). He had promised that Solomon would succeed him, and now the fulfillment of his word was to shape history. But the king knew that it is really the Lord who was shaping history (vv. 29–30).

This short vignette underlines the significance of the prophets of God in several of the dramas in the book. They appear suddenly on the scene at critical moments. If Nathan had done nothing, Bathsheba would not have acted; and without her impassioned plea, David would have failed to secure the throne for the divinely approved successor, and the temple might not have been built. This is an example of the crucial role of the prophets throughout the books of Kings in regard to safeguarding the future of the kingdom.

1:32–40. David's Transfer of Power to Solomon. David's vigorous and positive reaction to Bathsheba and Nathan's petition contrasts sharply with his feeble demeanor portrayed in the opening lines of the book. David ordered three trusted friends to accompany Solomon in a big procession to the Gihon Spring. The fact that Solomon sat on a mule in his inauguration demonstrates the ancient conception of mules as honored animals worthy of royalty. These animals were highly priced in that period because they had to be imported. Hebrew law did not allow the breeding of hybrid animals (Lev. 19:19).

It will be noticed that the rival ceremonies were staged at springs, doubtless because these were public places frequented by people who were constantly in need of water to carry home. Events taking place in such locations would be quickly known throughout the city. En-Rogel, on the opposite side of the valley from the city, was a well-known spring and public landmark. Gihon, down the slope from the main city, was the main water supply for Jerusalem, and while perhaps it was not as directly visible to the majority of the population in the city, it was of more immediate significance to their daily lives. A coronation procession down through the city from the palace to the Gihon Spring at the bottom of the hill would have been easily visible to Adonijah's party on the other side of the valley. Additionally, the symbolism of the place, as a counterpoint to Adonijah's location, would have been easily recognized by the people. The joyous procession, which included music, was so loud that it is described metaphorically in terms of an earthquake (1 Kin. 1:38–40).

It is significant that the security of this operation was entrusted to the Cherethites (Kerethites) and Pelethites who comprised the royal bodyguard (v. 31). They were most likely from Philistine tribes who had pledged loyalty to David in his early years. Soldiers from the Philistine city of Gath—Goliath's hometown—also formed part of David's loyal troops (2 Sam. 15:18–23). Possibly the Cherethites originated (a century or two earlier) from Crete, and the Pelethites were trusted royal couriers who also doubled as guards. While Israelite heroes like Joab supported the pretender to the throne, former enemies and worshipers of pagan deities celebrated, protected, and supported the legitimate king. God has His instruments everywhere.

2:1–11. Solomon Enthroned. Despite the repeated and more intense reminder of the nearness of David's end, the revitalized king continued his cogent instruction. He charged his son to be strong, be a man (v. 2), walk in God's ways, and abide by His instructions (v. 3). These words are similar to those used by Moses when passing on his "mantle" to Joshua (Josh. 1:7–9). David also drew on the language of Nathan the prophet when establishing a covenant between God and David (2 Sam. 12–16). In that covenant, God promised David an everlasting dynasty, the success of which would be due (in part) to the faithfulness of his descendants (1 Kin. 2:4). David wanted to ensure Solomon's personalization of this requirement of God's covenant with him. The promises of God to David, His word, would be fulfilled as long as Solomon, the new king, was loyal to Him.

The speech concluded and the aged warrior-king subsequently died. The phrase "rested with his fathers/ancestors" (v. 10) refers to the practice of burying family members in the same tomb that was used for family members who had died previously, with the bones of various generations "resting" together. The summary of David's reign informs us that it lasted forty years—placing it from 1011 to 971 B.C.

2:12—4:34

Solomon Established

After caring for his father's unfinished business (2:13–46), Solomon married an Egyptian princess (3:1–3). In a dream the Lord promised him wisdom (3:4–15), and this was fulfilled (3:16–28). He then set out to establish his civic infrastructure (4:1–19). The biblical text highlights Solomon's prosperity (4:20–28) and includes a final statement about his wisdom (4:29–34).

2:12–46. Completing David's Unfinished Business. The reason for commencing this section at v. 12 rather than at v. 13 (as some commentaries do) is the use of a Hebrew literary device called an inclusio, where a repeated statement frames a literary passage. Such is the case between v. 12 and v. 46, which repeat the statement that Solomon's kingdom was "firmly established." Solomon's rival, Adonijah, unwittingly sealed his own fate and confirmed Solomon's place on the throne when he asked Bathsheba to negotiate in order to have Abishag as his wife. Solomon interpreted Adonijah's request as an attempt to legitimize his ambitions to take over the realm (vv. 15–17) and found here a way to solve a problem once and for all. He used the widely accepted practice that a new king would take over the harem of the previous king (cf. Absalom in 2 Sam. 16:21–22) to condemn Adonijah for still seeking to take over the rest of David's harem and kingdom. Solomon ordered Adonijah's execution and then followed through with the other requests of his father (1 Kin. 2:5–9). Abiathar was effectively banned from the king's court and from the sanctuary, thus fulfilling the word of the prophet that the influence of Eli's line would come to an end (v. 27; 1 Sam. 2:31–35).

This action probably signaled to Joab that his time had come too. Although Joab was David's nephew, his kinship to the king had not stopped David from demoting him for killing Absalom (2 Sam. 19:13). Joab had also murdered Abner and Amasa, and their blood still stained his belt and sandals (1 Kin. 2:5). He fled to the sanctuary and clasped the horns of the altar in an attempt to receive asylum and amnesty. Joab thought that since Adonijah had received mercy by clinging to the horns of the altar (1:50–53), he too could receive mercy. But this Mosaic law applied to only accidental killing, not premeditated murder (Ex. 21:12–14). Joab's defiant refusal to leave the altar brought about his execution there (1 Kin. 2:28–34). Despite his shameful end, he was given an honorable burial on his home estate near Bethlehem (v. 34; cf. 2 Sam. 2:18, 32).

Shimei had cursed David during his escape from Jerusalem, but David had showed him mercy (2 Sam. 16:5–13). The time had come to set matters straight. Solomon confined Shimei to Jerusalem and forbade him to cross the Kidron Brook or to go anywhere else (1 Kin. 2:36–38). The Kidron Valley formed the boundary between Judah and Benjamin, so this restriction prevented Shimei from either working his own land at Bahurim (on the eastern slopes of Mt. Scopus) or inciting a revolt against the king among his kinsmen. The way Solomon dealt with Shimei when he disobeyed demonstrates Solomon's wisdom as a ruler, successfully walking a very fine line between just and fair leadership and alienating the key tribe of Benjamin.

3:1–15. Making the Nation Great. Now that the immediate threats to the throne had been resolved, Solomon turned to wider matters of state. Before taking the throne, he had already been married to at least one wife, Naamah (the Ammonitess; 1 Kin. 14:21), perhaps for at least two years. Naamah's son Rehoboam was forty-one when he became king (14:21), and Solomon reigned for forty years (11:42), which indicates that Rehoboam was born while Solomon was still a prince. As the new king, Solomon's next action meant to bring lasting peace by taking more wives, and his first marriage constituted a remarkable political achievement. Solomon did something that few other kings of any nation had done before: he married an Egyptian princess, becoming the son-in-law of the Egyptian pharaoh. At this time, the king of Egypt was probably Siamun of the Twenty-First Dynasty, who came to the throne a few generations into the Third Intermediate Period (eleventh through eighth century B.C.; a time when multiple people claimed to be king simultaneously). Siamun would have seen this marriage as a way to strengthen his position as king in Egypt by aligning himself with a strong ruler. The city of Gezer served as dowry for the wedding (9:16), evidence that even by this time not all cities in the land were controlled by Israel. It also demonstrates the mutual benefits enjoyed by the two kings and of the long-standing interdependence that lasted right up to the time of the Babylonian Exile. From the outset Solomon showed his diplomatic skills. Political alliances were one way to make the nation great by protecting against invasion from the south.

At the end of 3:1 is a quick sketch of some of the civil projects that Solomon initiated: a palace for himself, the temple, and the completion of a city wall around Jerusalem. Meanwhile, the hint of future disaster is revealed—the people sacrificed at the high places (v. 2), as did Solomon. This becomes a major issue for the nation in the years ahead.

After Solomon's politically expedient marriage (which was followed by many more), the second step for making the nation great was to reinforce the importance of religious ritual (he was about to build a temple for God as He and David his father had stipulated). Solomon went to the most significant high place at Gibeon,

High Place—Bamah

A bamah or “high place” was a shrine or worship site and not strictly speaking a “high” place. The term comes from Jerome's Bible (fourth century A.D.), which translates the Hebrew word bamah as excelsus (“high” or “eminent”). The bamah was typically a flat platform carved in bedrock, found not just on hills and mountains (e.g., Num. 22:41; 1 Sam. 9:14) but also in towns (2 Kin. 17:29; 23:5) and in valleys (Jer. 7:31; 32:35). Although they were initially considered legitimate places of worship (e.g., 1 Chr. 21:29), they were banned after the temple's completion to prevent the Israelites from copying the ritual practices of the surrounding nations, whose “high places” included an altar for sacrifice and various stands or alcoves to display an idol or other cultic objects.

about 6 miles (9.7 km) northwest of Jerusalem, where the remnants of Moses's wilderness sanctuary resided (2 Chr. 1:3)—the ark of the covenant was in a tent at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:12, 15, 17). Gibeon, the largest and most important place for worship in the land prior to the construction of the temple, was in the heartland of Saul's support base. Solomon's visit to Gibeon not only sought God's blessing on his reign but also may have been an attempt to reconcile with Saul's loyal followers.

While he was still at Gibeon, God appeared to Solomon in a dream (1 Kin. 3:5–15). Not only did this unique experience (no other Israelite king received this privilege) demonstrate divine willingness to bless the new king, but it also reinforced the covenant that God had made with David (see 2 Sam. 7). On that occasion God had promised David that He would establish the kingdom of his son (2 Sam. 7:12–13), that this son would build the temple, and that God would be his Father and chastise him if he committed iniquity. God concluded His covenant speech with David by assuring him of His khesed ("covenant faithfulness") to bind Him and Solomon together—in contrast to the divine rejection experienced by King Saul.

When God asked Solomon to choose a gift, Solomon's four-part answer was couched in covenant language, including khesed (1 Kin. 3:6). Solomon recalled God's past faithfulness, pled for His continued help, demonstrated his humility, and prayed for an understanding heart in order to be a wise ruler. This became the third step for Solomon to make his kingdom great. If he truly chose wisdom over riches and fame, then every blessing would become available to him. Usually a king received wealth and honor as a result of a wise reign, but God gave Solomon all three from the beginning, and he quickly became internationally recognized as a leader of note. God assured Solomon that there would be no king like him before or after (v. 12) and that he would be preeminent among reigning contemporary monarchs as well. Unfortunately, the promise of long life was not fulfilled due to Solomon's later unfaithfulness, and he probably did not live beyond the age of sixty (11:42).

3:16–28. Solomon's Wisdom Revealed. The reality of God's promise of wisdom was publicly demonstrated by the visit of two prostitutes. This remarkable drama spotlighted some very promising features for the kingdom. First, it showed that the king was approachable by all his subjects; justice was accessible to all. The struggle between the two disputing women was an impossible dialogue of "my son"—"your son," "your son"—"my son." There were no witnesses, so it was one woman's word against the other's. There was no human way through this legal impasse.

Second, it also showed that the Lord had fulfilled His promise by giving Solomon great wisdom. His immediate solution was both unexpected and seemingly brutal. Instead of analyzing the words or asking for more details, his solution revealed a deep understanding of human nature and cut through to the deepest feelings of the true mother. This story could have ended very differently if the biological mother had been as coldhearted as her companion or if she had as bad a reputation as her "profession" would suggest. Not only did Solomon expose the false claims of the false accuser, but he gave the true mother confirmation and legitimacy, encouraging her to give this child the hope of a successful and productive life in the community, despite his dubious origins.

The outcome was electric. The news traveled very quickly, and all Israel soon heard about the brilliance of their new king. They had a new respect for him and recognized God at work in their midst (v. 28).

4:1–19. Social Order. While Saul's government structure had been fairly rudimentary (mainly military), David's was a little more ordered. David had organized the basic utilities of army, public records, priesthood, secretariat, and royal bodyguards (2 Sam. 18:16–18), and later he established a department of labor or revenue (2 Sam. 20:23–25). Solomon established a more sophisticated system. He appointed chief officials with specific government functions and governors of designated districts. Solomon kept the first four basic organizational units of his father but added offices to oversee the district governors, a royal advisor (1 Kin. 4:5), an officer to manage the royal estate, and a manager to oversee the labor force necessary to accomplish the king's projects (v. 6).

Next, the governors of the districts were named (vv. 7–19). Solomon assigned twelve districts to feed the royal household—one per month. Their boundaries were not entirely consistent with the territories of the twelve tribes, which perhaps demonstrates that Solomon became more concerned with overall national unity than the preservation of tribal units. This may have caused a backlash, contributing to the unravelling of the kingdom after Solomon's death. It is interesting that no governor for Judah appears in the list of governors. It is also obvious that this system took a while to establish, since one of the governors married Solomon's daughter (v. 15), and Solomon did not seem to have had a daughter of marriageable age when he ascended the throne.

4:20–28. Extent of Palace and Realm. The description of the extent of the realm indicates fulfillment of the promise made to Abraham—from the Great River (Euphrates) to the River of Egypt (not the Nile but a wadi at the northeastern extremity of Egypt; Gen. 15:18; see 2 Kin. 24:7). The Lord was shaping history according to His word. Solomon did not have to resort to military campaigns to maintain control over the nations subdued by his father. Because God gave him “rest on every side,” there were no adversaries or crises (ra’, “evil,” “disastrous occurrence”). This gift of peace is referenced by the well-known description of each person dwelling safely under a vine and fig tree (1 Kin. 4:25)—a status that became the benchmark for peace and security that later generations longed for (2 Kin. 18:31; Mic. 4:4; Zech. 3:10).

Further evidence of the economically stable times can be found in the size of Solomon's household—estimates vary between 10,000 and 60,000. This required a carefully orchestrated administrative structure to manage it and provide enough food for it. Daily food provisions included both stall-fattened and pasture-fed animals, birds, wild game, fine flour, and meal (1 Kin. 4:22–23, 27).

In addition to the daily provision of food was the supply of fodder for the king's stables (v. 28), but it is not clear how many horses there actually were. The account in v. 26 speaks of 40,000 stalls for chariot horses, and 12,000 horsemen, but the parallel passage in Chronicles (2 Chr. 9:25) specifies 4,000 horses for the 12,000 horsemen. Considering the 1,400 chariots mentioned later in Kings (1 Kin. 10:26), 4,000 stalls seems more likely if each chariot had two horses plus a spare. The number specified in Kings is probably a scribal error. The impressive nature of the stables could be a further indication of how much Solomon relied on Egypt—if this was where he obtained his horses (10:28).

4:29–34. Solomon's Wisdom. The narrative of Kings returns again to the theme of God-given wisdom to reinforce the notion that this is the best option for the future of the nation. A large harem and many foreign alliances, huge religious ceremonies, a civil service patterned on the best political system around—none of these could compete with the effectiveness of a people guided by God's gift of wisdom. The superlatives describing Solomon's wisdom and breadth of understanding are contrasted with natural phenomena (like the “sand on the seashore”; v. 29) and with the sayings of other known wise men of the day. Neither the wise men of the East (presumably Mesopotamia; cf. the wise men in the birth story of Jesus) nor the sages in Pharaoh's court could match this (v. 30). The names mentioned in v. 31 are neither Hebrew nor Canaanite, so their identity is uncertain. Were Heman and Ethan the same people who each wrote a psalm (Pss. 88, 89)? The expression “sons of Mahol” does not tell us the name of their father—makhol literally means “dance” or “dancer,” so they could have been from a class of musicians known for their exceptional skill. This would be in harmony with the Hebrew idea of wisdom being practical giftedness that results from being filled with the Spirit of God (see Ex. 31:2–5).

Evidently Solomon was an astute observer of nature, and he drew profound and practical lessons from it to assist especially the young to live well (1 Kin. 4:33; cf. Job 12:7–8). His many proverbs and songs were widely known, and he became so accomplished that his reputation became legendary in his own time, and foreign rulers sought him out (1 Kin. 10).

5:1—8:66

Solomon Builds and Dedicates the Temple

Solomon revealed his wisdom in the construction of the temple and the palace. He began by making preparation for the construction (5:1–18), and then he built the temple (6:1–38) and his palace (7:1–12). He also prepared everything needed for the proper function of the temple (7:13–51). Solomon brought the ark to the temple and dedicated the temple to the Lord (8:1–66). Apparently both temple and palace were considered part of the same complex, and its construction took about 200,000 workers (5:14–16) and twenty years to complete (19:10). The two buildings were structurally joined, which made it easy for the king to access the temple through his own private entrance. Solomon largely depended on Hiram, king of Tyre (c. 969–936 B.C.), for the technical details of the project, which potentially gave a Phoenician architectural touch to the buildings.

5:1–18. Workers and Supplies. Hiram was one of the first foreign kings to seek out Solomon. David's defeat of the Philistines had greatly enhanced the economic status of the Phoenicians, and a friendship had developed between the Tyrian king and David. Hiram had assisted David in building his palace (2 Sam. 5:11) and had already provided abundant materials for the temple (1 Chr. 22:4). The visit of Hiram's emissaries both affirmed Solomon as the new king and assured the continuing goodwill between the two nations.

In response to this visit, Solomon sent a diplomatic letter to Hiram (1 Kin. 5:2–6) in which he reiterated the Davidic covenant and affirmed that he would soon build a temple (2 Sam. 7:12–13). He requested not only cedar but also tradesmen to direct the local workforce. Solomon negotiated for the payment of workers and supplies, and Hiram set the rate at 20,000 kors (donkey loads) of wheat and 20 kors of first-grade olive oil per year (implying that Hiram would pay his men from this after keeping a portion for himself). This list was evidently not complete, as the Chronicles account includes an extra 120,000 gallons (440,000 L) of wine and the same amount of regular olive oil—the latter presumably in addition to the smaller quantity of first-grade oil (2 Chr. 2:10). This was almost double the quota that Solomon received for his own household, and it may be that the national production capacity struggled to keep up, which led to a national debt to Hiram. This was repaid in part by Solomon giving him twenty cities in the region of Galilee (1 Kin. 9:11). This may have also caused dissatisfaction among the populace for the increased tax burden—something alluded to by the delegation that approached Rehoboam after Solomon's death (12:4).

The narrative of 5:13–18 describes the labor force (4:6). Solomon conscripted 30,000 Israelites and rostered them in three shifts lasting a month each, so that at any one time there were 10,000 of them in Lebanon and 20,000 working at the temple site in Jerusalem. From resident foreigners he raised 70,000 to transport construction materials and 80,000 to rough cut blocks from the quarries, and he appointed 3,300 supervisors to oversee them. All stone blocks (including the foundation stones that would be hidden underground) were dressed at the quarry to a high standard (v. 17; cf. 6:7) by Solomon's and Hiram's skilled workers (v. 18).

6:1–38. Building the Temple. It is significant that the date for the construction of the temple is linked to the Exodus (v. 1). The author of the biblical text was very careful to precisely record the time—the fourth year of Solomon and the second month (Ziv/Ziph was its old Phoenician/Canaanite name), which was the spring of 967 B.C. More importantly, the prominence given to the Exodus in the context of the temple suggests the ideological linkage of the two. The temple was the permanent dwelling of God manifested among His people in Canaan. They had both found a place of rest.

The temple dimensions are impressive: sixty cubits long (90 ft. or 27.4 m), twenty cubits wide (30 ft. or 9 m), and thirty cubits high (45 ft. or 13.7 m)—double the size of the wilderness tabernacle in some regards and three times higher

Phoenicia

Tyre was a major city in the Phoenician nation of seafaring people who were descended from the displaced Canaanites with colonies throughout the Mediterranean. Although we may refer to Hiram's "domain" as Phoenicia, the cities in that geographical area were not forged into one political entity in Solomon's time but were a collection of loosely aligned city-states—perhaps Hiram was recognized as the leading monarch among them. Their main cities in the northern Levant were Tyre, Sidon, Gebal (Byblos), and Arvad, and they occupied the narrow coastal strip of land (in modern Lebanon) between the Lebanon Mountains and the Mediterranean Sea. Because of lack of arable land, they were renowned merchants and seamen, specializing in cedar and also popularizing an expensive purple dye (extracted from the murex snail). They were also experts in masonry, metalwork, fine pottery, and glassware.

Cedar from the Lebanon Mountains grew to 100 feet (30 m), and the Phoenicians were famous for their skills in working with it. The Egyptians and Mesopotamians favored cedar for the roof beams of their large civic buildings. It was a long-lasting hardwood that resisted both insects and dry rot.

in others (Ex. 26:16, 18), but only half the height of the second temple (Ezra 6:3). The early cubit (probably used here) is about 17.5 inches (about 44.5 cm; see 2 Kin. 20:20) compared with the cubit adopted by later kings that is a handbreadth longer, or about 20 inches (about 6 m; see 2 Chr. 3:13).

At the entrance of the temple building was a platform across its width and extending out ten cubits (15 ft. or 4.6 m) in front. Surrounding the building on three sides were three floors of small rooms built against the perimeter wall (1 Kin. 6:5–10). These were used for storage and possibly for the priests to stay in when rostered for duty. The description in v. 9 of the completion sounds a bit premature, but the same phrase is repeated in v. 14. This indicates that this passage is a literary unit—a parenthesis—that breaks the flow of the narrative in order to bring an important announcement (vv. 11–13). Here, the word of the Lord came to Solomon, and this drew the focus away from the impressive architecture and engineering marvels to the covenant God made with his father (2 Sam. 7:8–16). The word of promise God had given to David takes center stage, announcing that its fulfillment was directly related to a firm commitment to Him. This brief divine speech was the key to the divine presence: it was not extensive religious exercises or a magnificent building that guaranteed the continuing presence of God among His chosen people; rather, it was the covenant God had made with His people and their willingness to maintain it. While a magnificent building was under construction, God said He would dwell among the children of Israel rather than in a building (see 2 Kin. 25:1–21).

The magnificence of the temple's internal features is described in 1 Kings 6:15–36. The walls and the ceiling were lined with cedar while the floor was covered with cypress pine (v. 15). Ornamental buds, open flowers, cherubim, and palm trees were carved into the wall panels (vv. 18, 29). All of the wood, including the floor, was overlaid with gold (vv. 22, 30). This ornamentation was reminiscent of both past and future—the flora and cherubim of the Garden of Eden, and the gold-covered “floor” of the streets of gold in the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:21).

Partitioning the main building with a cedar wall from floor to ceiling created the holy of holies (1 Kin. 6:16). Its internal height was twenty cubits (30 ft. or 9.1 m; v. 20)—compared with the main building, whose ceiling height was thirty cubits (45 ft. or 13.7 m; v. 2)—and its walls were also carved and covered with gold.

As well as housing the ark of the covenant, the inner sanctum was also graced with two free-standing cherubim, each ten cubits tall (15 ft. or 4.6 m), carved from olive wood (v. 23) and covered with gold. They stood with wings outstretched, wing tip touching wing tip, stretching out to the opposite walls (v. 27) and overshadowing the ark (8:7). The two cherubim on the back wall together with the two on the top of the ark more closely reflected descriptions of the throne room of heaven, which was depicted with four cherubim surrounding the throne of God (see Ezek. 1; 10).

The final temple element in the description was the doors. The language is not clear, but it seems that the doorposts for the doors into the holy of holies may have been five-sided and both doors were made of olive wood (6:31–32). The doorposts into the Holy Place may have been four-sided and also of olive wood, with the outer doors of cypress (vv. 33–34). All were intricately carved and covered with gold (vv. 32, 35). In the account in Chronicles there is no mention of a curtain dividing the rooms (cf. 2 Chr. 3:14), although there is a reference to a gold chain at the entrance into the holy of holies that may have been used for a curtain suspended in front of the door (1 Kin. 6:21).

At the conclusion of chapter 6 the time reference given in v. 1 is repeated, adding just as precisely the date of the temple's completion (v. 38). In addition to forming a literary unit (an inclusio), the repetition underscores the importance of the dates involved and the connection between the temple and the Exodus.

7:1–51. Palace and Temple Furnished. One of the harbingers of Solomon's later apostasy was the fact that he took nearly twice as long to build the palace complex as it took to build the temple. The first one was described as the Palace (lit. “house”) of the Forest of Lebanon (vv. 2–5), which was presumably named for its many internal cedar pillars that looked like a forest. At one hundred cubits long (150 ft. or 45.7 m), fifty cubits wide (75 ft. or 23 m), and thirty cubits high (45 ft. or 13.7 m), it covered more than four times the floor space as the temple building. Apparently, this building served as the royal armory (10:17; Is. 22:8), so it would have had storage rooms around its perimeter as the temple complex did. Other buildings in the complex included the Hall of Pillars or colonnade (1 Kin. 7:6) at fifty by thirty cubits (75 by 45 ft. or 23 by 13.7 m)—it, too, was larger than the temple—and the throne room or Hall of Judgment or Justice (Heb. mishpat; v. 7), as well as a residence for the king and another for his Egyptian wife. Each of these buildings followed the same architectural style with three rows of large, costly stones and a row of cedar beams (vv. 8–12).

The work of Hiram (Huram in some Bible versions), a bronze worker from Tyre, is featured in vv. 14–47. The name Hiram was obviously a common name (spelled the same in Hebrew as King Hiram), and this particular man was the son of a woman of Naphtali and a man of Tyre. He cast all the bronze items in the fine-grained clay of the Jordan Valley (v. 46), the combined weight of his handiwork being undetermined. The two pillars for the front of the temple, Jachin (Jakin) and Boaz (v. 21), were eighteen cubits high (27 ft. or 8.2 m), twelve cubits around (18 ft. or 5.5 m), and a span or handbreadth thick (cf. Jer. 52:21). On top of each pillar was a separate lily-shaped feature (1 Kin. 7:22) embellished with two rows of pomegranates and a chain lattice (vv. 17–18, 20, 41–42). The function of the pillars is uncertain, but their names (Jachin, “he is strong,” and Boaz, “in strength”) suggest that they served as visual reminders that the strength and stability of the king and the people were possible only with God’s presence among them.

The laver, or sea, was a hemisphere ten cubits across (15 ft. or 4.6 ft), five cubits high (7.5 ft. or 2.3 m), and a handbreadth thick (v. 26). It was surrounded by two rows of ornamental buds on the outside of its brim (v. 24), and it was placed upon twelve bronze oxen, with groups of three oxen standing together and facing each of the four compass points (v. 25). Its capacity was between 11,500 to 12,000 gallons (43,500–45,500 L), about the capacity of a swimming pool that is 12 feet (3.6 m) by 25 feet (7.6 m) and has an average depth of 5 feet (1.5 m). However, it served as a reservoir for water, not for bathing or washing (cf. Ex. 30:19). For these functions, Solomon made ten smaller lavers, each holding about 230 gallons (870 L) and each resting on a bronze cart (1 Kin. 7:27–38). Half of these stood along the northern side of the temple court and half along the southern side. The side panels on the carts were embossed with cherubim, lions, and palm trees (v. 36).

The text in vv. 40–46 summarizes the bronze creations of Hiram: the pillars, their capitals, and all their special features; ten carts and the lavers to go on them; the sea and the twelve oxen to support it; and the pots, basins, and bowls. It is significant to note that each of the large items displayed numerous reminders of the Garden of Eden: cherubim, lilies, buds, pomegranates, palm trees, oxen, and lions, reflecting similar portrayals within the sacred golden precincts of the inner rooms. These constant visual reminders pointed to the purpose of the temple: not only for God to live in their midst (Ex. 25:8) but also for the eventual restoration of the face-to-face communion with God that Adam and Eve enjoyed in Eden. Worshiping there was in a sense a return to the original harmony between God and humans.

The chapter ends with a description of the items of gold, including ten seven-branched lamp stands (five along the north wall and five along the south side), wick trimmers, basins, bowls, ladles, censers, and hinges (1 Kin. 7:49–50). Since gold is not strong enough to hold a heavy wooden door, presumably this was some sort of embellishment or covering for the hinges to ensure that every surface within the inner rooms was covered with gold.

8:1–66. Dedicating the Temple. After the temple was complete, Solomon gathered all the key people—the elders and the tribal chiefs—to bring the ark and all other sacred items to their new resting place. The temple was completed in the eighth month of Solomon’s eleventh year (6:38), and the furnishing and dedication happened in the seventh month—presumably eleven months later. Perhaps the delay was to coincide with the Festival of Tabernacles, so that while the people celebrated the Exodus by camping out in temporary shelters (Lev. 23:42–43), their attention also turned to God’s promise through Moses to “camp” with His people if they built Him a temporary dwelling (Ex. 25:8).

Huge numbers of sheep and oxen were sacrificed outside as the priests put the ark in its place (1 Kin. 8:4–5) under the outstretched wings of the large cherubim. The ark contained only the two stone tablets of the Law—there is no mention of Aaron’s rod or the golden pot of manna (Ex. 16:33–34; Num. 17:10; Heb. 9:4). It could be that these latter items had at some point been removed from the ark before the time of Solomon. Then the inner rooms were filled with smoke, making it impossible for the priests to stay there, as if God was claiming that domain for Himself (1 Kin. 8:11). Solomon responded by saying that God dwells in thick darkness (the Most Holy Place) but that he built Him a house/temple (vv. 12–13). Even though no temple could contain the omnipresent God (v. 27), He manifested His presence there as a God near to His people.

Solomon then turned to face the assembled crowd for a prayer of dedication (vv. 14–53). He began by honoring his father and quickly sketching the outlines of the Davidic covenant, and then he explained that his part in the covenant was to build the temple (vv. 15–20) and to properly house the ark. This signifies an interrelationship between the Davidic and Mosaic covenants (v. 21): the ark of the covenant spotlighting the Exodus and the temple having been initiated in God's covenant with David. As Solomon spread out his hands toward heaven (an act signifying “clean” motives and actions; Ps. 24:4), he again mentioned the importance of the word of God. God fulfilled the word He had spoken to David to place his son on the throne and for his son to build Him a house (1 Kin. 8:18–26).

There are a number of significant themes included in Solomon's prayer: sin, salvation, covenant, worship, loyalty, the sanctuary in heaven, the character of God, and the nature of humans. When Solomon made a general plea for God to “hear,” he suggested seven situations in which people may find themselves and asked God specifically at those times to hear, act, forgive, or maintain their cause (vv. 32, 34, 36, 39, 43, 45, 49). Here was clear recognition that although the temple was a poignant symbol of God's presence among His people, it is from His heavenly temple that God actually administers justice and vindicates those calling on Him (vv. 30, 39, 43, 49).

Another dominant theme in the prayer is the way Solomon described sin and how God deals with it. The word that he used for sin signifies missing a target, failing in one's duty, failing to live up to expectations, or falling short of spiritual wholeness (vv. 16, 31, 34–36, 46–47, 50). Solomon suggested that if the people were taught the good way (v. 36), they would be more inclined to follow God. But he explained that the problem of sin resides like a plague within every human heart (v. 46). Only God really knows a heart's condition, and it is only the forbearance and forgiveness of God that can meet the challenge. The verb “forgive” appears in five verses (vv. 30, 34, 36, 39, 50) and leads to the conclusion of the prayer by connecting forgiveness and the covenant with the deliverance from Egypt.

Although Solomon commenced his prayer standing before the altar (v. 22), at its end he was kneeling (v. 54). The occasion must have been awe-inspiring—the numbers of sacrifices were so unthinkable large that the altar of sacrifice could not cope, so special provision was made to sacrifice on the ground in the middle of the court. These sacrifices were peace or fellowship ones, so it was only the fat that was burned and the rest of the animal was food to be shared between worshipers and priests (Lev. 7:11–15, 30–36). The atmosphere was so charged that the people did not want the occasion to end, so festivities were extended for a further week (1 Kin. 8:65–66) and the temple celebrations were combined with the communal joy of the Festival of Tabernacles.

9:1—11:43

The Remainder of Solomon's Reign

After twenty years, the great building projects were complete and the temple-palace complex had become the envy of surrounding nations. God appeared to Solomon a second time in response to the temple's dedicatory prayer and reminded the king of the importance of the covenant that David had entered into with God and the covenant loyalty expected from Solomon (9:1–9). The word of the Lord was also about judgment for rebellion against Him. This word was as certainly to be fulfilled as the word of blessing and salvation. The rumblings of disaster and judgment continued with the souring of relations between Solomon and King Hiram of Tyre over an unappreciated gift (9:10–14), the building costs, and other activities of Solomon (vv. 15–28). The narrative shifts back to the positive when describing the Queen of Sheba's visit and the gathering wealth coming into Solomon's coffers (10:1–29). Although times were good, subtle warnings of future crisis were in the background (11:1–43).

9:1–9. Challenge to Covenant Faithfulness. In response to Solomon's prayer, God appeared to him a second time. The context places this at the completion of Solomon's building program that had lasted twenty years. Does this mean that the completed temple stood unused for thirteen years, waiting for the completion of the palace complex, after which the temple was dedicated (see 6:38; 7:1)? The data is ambiguous, but the fact that temples were dedicated to be immediately used for the service of God rules out the idea that it was inactive for thirteen years. It is also unlikely that there would have been a large time gap between the dedicatory prayer and God's response assuring Solomon that the prayer had been heard. The answer must have come soon after the prayer (cf. PK 45).

God responded to Solomon (vv. 3–9) and assured him that his prayer of dedication had been heard and the temple had been consecrated. Furthermore, not only would God's name reside there, but also His "eyes" and "heart" (v. 3). This is an interesting response to Solomon's insistence throughout his dedicatory prayer that God resides in heaven. Rather than staying on the temple/abode of God theme, God challenged Solomon to remain faithful to the Davidic covenant in integrity of heart and uprightness by upholding the terms of the covenant like his father David, which would ensure the long-term viability of the dynasty (vv. 4–5).

Then God warned Solomon: if he or his successor sons worshiped other gods, the result would be loss of land, destruction of the temple, and ridicule by other nations. They would question why such disaster had befallen a people who had previously been so blessed by their God (vv. 6–8). The answer would be that since they abandoned their God, the word of judgment reached them. This was an ominous signal and hinted at coming disaster for both the monarchy and the nation, in shocking contrast to the spiritual high of the recent celebrations. It also served as a reality check affirming that magnificent architecture and fervent religious celebration do not necessarily define a life of faith. Without being true to the covenant-keeping God, these things mean nothing.

9:10–14. An Unappreciated Gift. The repetition of the statement announcing the completion of the temple closes the previous literary unit (9:1–9) and opens another. At the completion of the twenty-year building projects, Solomon still felt obligated and in debt to the king of Tyre for all the cedar, cypress, and gold he had supplied. Either Israel could not keep up with the original payment schedule (5:11) or what Hiram supplied far surpassed what Solomon had originally asked for. To settle the apparent debt, Solomon gave Hiram twenty cities around their common border (9:11), perhaps as collateral. Hiram was not happy with this and gave the region an insulting name—kabul. This word is related to a verb meaning "bound" or "restricted," but it could also be related to the Hebrew phrase "like nothing"—which would thus show his disdain for the cities (v. 13). This may have been the catalyst to sour relations between Tyre and Israel to the point of Tyre joining Israel's enemies a number of generations later (Amos 1:9–10; cf. Is. 23:1–18; Ezek. 28:1–23). Despite this inadequate gesture from Solomon, Hiram gave him a further twenty talents of gold, possibly to remove any sense of obligation that may have been imposed on Tyre for the "gift" of all those unappreciated cities. (See commentary on 2 Chr. 8:1–11 for further clarification of the narrative.)

9:15–24. Summary of Completed Projects.

This section summarizes the labor force required for not only the temple and palace building projects but also the city walls and the Millo—a heavily-fortified citadel on Mt. Zion—and other cities built at that time (vv. 15, 17–19). The forced labor providing all the heavy work came from the subjugated peoples that Israel had displaced (v. 21; cf. Judg. 1:19, 21, 27–35). Solomon appointed his compatriots to be their overseers (1 Kin. 9:22–23). The repetition of these details suggests the end of a literary unit (cf. 5:13–16) with new information inserted: after pharaoh's daughter took up residence in her new home, work began on the construction of the Millo.

9:25–28. Life after the Big Projects. For a fifth time the statement is made that the temple was finished (see also 3:1; 6:38; 7:51; 9:1). This time all the main aspects seem to have been dealt with, and it appears that this really was the end of the process. However, there was a subtext present: What would happen from that time forward? The implication is that the completion of something major (the temple, palace, or even creation itself) marks not the end but the beginning. How the main players would act from this point on was crucial.

Life for Solomon now assumed a routine, and the text provides an example of the sacrifices he offered three times a year—presumably during the Passover (Festival of Unleavened Bread), Festival of Weeks, and Festival of Tabernacles, the festivals that every Hebrew male was expected to attend at the temple (Deut. 16:16).

A further development was the fleet of trading boats that Solomon built (with Hiram's help), based at the southern port of Elath on the Red Sea. It is unclear what later happened to this fleet—Uzziah is said to have restored Elath to Judah (2 Kin. 14:22) and the Arameans retook it a decade or two later (2 Kin. 16:6). Solomon's maritime adventures did not seem to be very long lasting.

10:1–13. The Queen of Sheba. Sheba's location is uncertain. Most likely it was in southwestern Arabia. Another possibility is the Horn of Africa (modern Somalia), or it may have been an empire that included both of those places. The narrative connects the Queen of Sheba's visit and the gifts she brought with ships of Hiram, who brought gifts from Ophir as well. Some commentators suggest that the timber mentioned here is from the Horn of Africa, others suggest it is juniper from Lebanon. The queen had heard so many unbelievable reports she just had to see for herself, and she became overwhelmed with what she saw (vv. 6–9). After proclaiming the blessed state of Solomon's kingdom and praising his God, she presented Solomon with generous gifts. The narrative suggests that further gifts came by ship (v. 11), and this apparently was matched by gifts that Solomon gave her in return.

10:14–29. Solomon's Wealth. The exchange of gifts led into a description of the wealth Solomon accumulated each year through trade, taxes, possibly tribute from other dependent nations, and other royal visits. The total was enormous—about 50,000 pounds (22,679 kg) of gold, not to mention silver, ivory, and other luxury goods (v. 22). The text mentions that Solomon was involved in one type of trade, military equipment (vv. 28–29), but that he also generated an income from answering the questions that many from all over the world brought to him (vv. 24–25).

With his wealth, Solomon embellished the temple, supplied instruments to the temple musicians, provided golden shields for ceremonial occasions (vv. 16–17), built an ivory throne and lions to stand by the throne (vv. 18–20), and made golden drinking vessels (v. 21). The net effect of all this was that Solomon surpassed all the kings of the earth in both wealth and wisdom (v. 23), and he made items that were once considered valuable as nothing compared to all the gold and luxury items he accumulated (v. 27). In all this one is left wondering about his spiritual integrity—had Solomon retained his faith, or was his amassing wealth beginning to corrupt him? God is mentioned only once in passing in all this display—people flocked to hear Solomon's wisdom, but it was God who had put the wisdom in his heart (v. 24).

11:1–43. The Beginning of the End. As well as accumulating great wealth, Solomon married many women. Astonishingly, these practices were the very things Moses had warned future kings of Israel to avoid (Deut. 17:14–20), but Solomon proceeded anyway and multiplied for himself horses from Egypt, wives, and silver and gold. Additionally, his wives were from the nations that God had warned the Israelites not to associate with because of their ingrained idolatry and the nations that the Israelites were specifically told to displace (Ex. 34:12–16; Deut.

12:30–31; 20:17–18). Moreover, the 700 wives were specifically called princesses, so Solomon appeared to be more interested in human alliances than in his covenant with God. Additionally, Solomon had 300 concubines, who were perhaps women of lower rank who may have doubled as household servants.

The Hebrew word asserting Solomon's devotion to his wives is the same word used in Genesis 2:24 for the closeness that marriage was intended to bring. However tender the relationships may have been, the women turned his heart to their own gods (1 Kin. 11:4). The verb used here is the same used to describe the action of Balaam's donkey turning aside from the angel of the Lord (Num. 22:23, 33). The text says this happened when he was old. The contrast between when Solomon was a young man who loved God (1 Kin. 3:3) and when he was an elder statesman who loved women (11:1) is stark, and it is perceptively summed up in the expression of Solomon's heart not being at peace with God (v. 4).

The result was that Solomon followed after the gods of his wives, which was evil in the Lord's estimation (v. 6). The text implies that Solomon participated in their degrading, idolatrous rites. The first foreign god mentioned is Ashtoreth, the Phoenician goddess of sexuality and war that King Hiram worshiped (v. 5). There seems to be a play on words here—in Canaanite literature she is known as Ashtart (Ishtar in Mesopotamian tradition), but by inserting the vowels from the word boshet ("shame"), the name Ash-toreth appears. Similarly, for the Ammonite god Milcom, transposing the vowels from boshet produces the derogatory name Molek (Molech)—which, translated literally, could mean "king of shame" or "shameful king." This was the god that demanded the sacrifice of human babies by fire. It appears that Chemosh, god of the Moabites (v. 7), demanded the same (2 Kin. 3:27). So to honor these gods and to keep his wives happy, Solomon constructed shrines for them on the Mount of Olives (1 Kin. 11:7). The construction of shrines where the foreign wives could worship their gods was required in politically motivated marriages.

By doing these things, Solomon was essentially nullifying the covenant with the Lord. Legally speaking, God had every right to walk away from this covenant. Instead, God became angry—an indication of the passion He has for His people—and acted with a combination of justice and mercy. He informed Solomon that the kingdom would be torn from him and given to a lesser man (v. 11). That was the justice part. In mercy, God assured Solomon it would not happen in his lifetime (which was drawing to a close anyway) and that for the sake of the Davidic covenant, one tribe would remain loyal to the throne in Jerusalem (vv. 12–13). The divine word of judgment had been pronounced, and it would be fulfilled in history.

A further consequence would be adversaries that would rise against Solomon. Hadad, an Edomite who had escaped a vicious battle in David's time (vv. 14–17) and had been given refuge in the palace of the pharaoh, returned after David's death to cause Solomon much trouble. Similarly, Rezon, a Syrian who also had passed through tragedy at the hands of David, caused continual conflict with Israel (vv. 23–25).

The main adversary for Solomon, and even for his successors (v. 39), however, was Jeroboam. He initially impressed Solomon so much that the king promoted him to be chief officer over the labor force of the tribe of Ephraim, tasked with reconstructing the Millo and refurbishing various civic structures in the city. It is not clear whether there was some deeply felt grudge against Solomon for some reason or whether it was the encounter with the prophet Ahijah that turned Jeroboam on a course against the king (v. 26).

That encounter followed the pattern we see in other prophetic interventions: a sudden but calculated appearance to deliver a short but very specific, and even shocking, message (1 Kin. 17:1; 21:17; 2 Sam. 12:1–14). Through an acted-out parable the prophet tore his cloak and explained its meaning. It represented God's adjustment of His covenant with Israel and Jeroboam's role in the new plan. The kingdom would be divided. The reason given for the dramatic change was that the people of God preferred to worship the gods of the surrounding nations. Despite that fact, the prophetic assurance was that God would maintain a remnant to keep His part of the covenant He had made with David (1 Kin. 11:34).

Remarkably, God offered to Jeroboam the same covenant as He had offered to David and Solomon (v. 38). In other words, in a sense there are not many covenants but one—offered repeatedly to successive generations—a showcase of God's persistence in redeeming the human race. Jeroboam became the start of a new line, just as David had been. As David was hunted by the reigning king (Saul), so was Jeroboam (by Solomon; v. 40). Just as David sought refuge with a foreign king—Achish of Gath (1 Sam. 21:10–15; 27:2–4)—so did Jeroboam, seeking asylum with Shishak (Shoshenq I), king of Egypt (1 Kin. 11:40). Shishak, a Libyan and former commander of the Egyptian army, had just commenced a new dynasty in Egypt, so the political alliance that Solomon had previously forged with Egypt no longer held. In fact, the narrative records that Shishak, allied with Jeroboam of Israel, would later invade Judah (14:25).

The era of King Solomon was over. The narrative says that further information about his reign may be found in another record—one that no longer exists. His reign of forty years—the same length as his father's—came to an end, he was buried with his fathers, and his son Rehoboam ascended the throne (11:43).

12:1–16:34

EARLY DIVIDED MONARCHY

After Solomon's death Israel split into two kingdoms: the Northern Kingdom of Israel and the Southern Kingdom of Judah. In order to secure his new kingdom, Jeroboam, the first northern king, built a new place of worship, made two golden calves (idols), replaced the Levitical priesthood with volunteers, and instituted new festival days. From there, the nation spiraled down into an idolatry worse than that of the surrounding nations.

At first Israel and Judah fought each other, but they came together for a time through intermarriage. For three generations, kings of Judah married daughters of the Israelite kings, which opened the floodgates of idolatry into Judah. The tragedy was that a good king started this trend—Jehoshaphat.

12:1–14:31

The Kingdoms Split: Jeroboam and Rehoboam

Rehoboam (931–913 B.C.), successor to Solomon, tried to impress the leaders of his new kingdom, but his attempts backfired, and Jeroboam (931–910 B.C.) led a revolt that divided the kingdom. He took ten of the tribes with him. Rehoboam tried from then on to regain his lost realms, and the result was great losses on both sides.

12:1–24. Rehoboam Splits the Kingdom. Rehoboam's decision to hold his coronation celebrations at Shechem (which lies about halfway between Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim) was significant. It was here that God promised to give the land to Abraham's descendants (Gen. 12:6–7); Jacob purchased the first parcel of land here (Gen. 33:18–19); it was here that the tribes gave their commitment to follow God when they established themselves in their new land (Deut. 11:29–32; 27:2–26); it was one of the cities of refuge (Josh. 20:1–8); it was here that Joshua gained the commitment of the nation to forsake idolatry and serve only God (Josh. 24:1, 13–18); and it was the location where Joseph's remains were buried (Josh. 24:32). If there was a best place to seek a commitment for national solidarity, this was it.

Jeroboam's arrival at Shechem may have introduced a cloud to the festivities of welcoming the new king. The apparent humility of the negotiators, which doubtlessly included Jeroboam either directly or behind the scenes, also carried a threat. Rather than simply asking that Rehoboam lighten their load, as humble servants might do, they said that if he did, they would serve him. Thus, they obviously implied that if he didn't, they wouldn't. Rehoboam certainly understood the ultimatum.

It is not surprising that Rehoboam wanted time to consider the matter. There was much at risk. He would have to either grant their request in order to keep them loyal, and thereby accept a loss of revenue and diminished kingly glory, or deny their request and see them walk away at even greater loss to his dominion.

The account of the different advice given by the two groups may be emphasizing the difference not so much between youth and age as between foolishness and wisdom. Rehoboam was forty-one years old when he became king, so while his contemporaries were obviously younger than Solomon's counselors, they were definitely into middle age. The point may be that they were foolish not so much because they were young as because, as the text says, they had grown up with Rehoboam and were the pampered offspring of the privileged class who had no knowledge of the life of the common people. As many Bible examples demonstrate (Joseph, David, Solomon, and Daniel), wisdom is determined not necessarily by age but by character. Rehoboam and his friends had been raised in a dissolute and degenerate court. Their suggested reply was arrogant and cynical, and it may contain a ribald euphemism for the private parts (v. 10), which Rehoboam wisely chose not to repeat. But he did warn the delegation that he would be using "scorpions" rather than the usual whips (1 Kin. 12:14). This may refer to a type of scourging whip with a piece of metal or bone in the end, which would feel like a scorpion's sting.

The exclamation of the people (v. 16) reveals a long-standing, bitter rivalry between Judah and the northern tribes dating back to the time of David, when the rebel Sheba uttered the same words (2 Sam. 20:1). This dramatic exit is explained in the text: added to the fact that Rehoboam ignored advice, God had His hand in this. The word of the Lord through Ahijah was being fulfilled, changing the course of the history of the kingdom (1 Kin. 12:15).

12:25—14:20. The Sin of Jeroboam. With the threat of war over for the moment, Jeroboam devoted his energies to building projects in Shechem and Penuel (v. 25). Although the verb in Hebrew is banah ("to build"), these cities already existed, so his activity refers to fortifying and refurbishing them (as some translations indicate). Shechem's importance was outlined above. Penuel was where Jacob had wrestled with the angel one night before meeting his estranged brother Esau (Gen. 32:30). Why did Jeroboam choose to put his fingerprints on these important places? Was it to confirm divine legitimacy for his rulership? He already had prophetic assurance of God's role for him (1 Kin. 11:31–39), and yet he was not satisfied.

Jeroboam was concerned that if the people continued traveling to Jerusalem for the three compulsory annual festivals (Deut. 16:16), it would result in them renewing their allegiance to the house of David (1 Kin. 12:26–27). This was despite being told the opposite by the prophet Ahijah (11:31) and despite the covenant God made with him: He had promised to bless his reign and give him a lasting dynasty.

Jeroboam decided to develop a new, substitute religion that would appeal to the majority. Perverting the Israelite faith, he had golden calves made and proclaimed them as the God who delivered Israel from Egypt (using exactly the same words in Hebrew as the rebellious people had used in Ex. 32:4). Perhaps the fact that the ark of the covenant, a symbol of God's presence, remained in Jerusalem led Jeroboam to construct the two images as a visual representation of the God of Israel—a clear violation of the law. The possible connection between what he did and the incident of the golden calf in Exodus is not clear, but perhaps the biblical writer, by quoting the words of Jeroboam, was indicating that what he did was as evil as what Aaron had done. The coming judgment against the Northern Kingdom is being justified on the basis of this act of idolatry. One has to wonder to what extent the priests and Levites had failed in instructing the common people about the law of Moses. Jeroboam placed one golden calf at Bethel (in the heart of the tribal land of Ephraim) and the other at Dan (vv. 28–29). The city of Dan was an enclave of Danites (Judg. 18:1, 2, 7–11, 27–29), about 12 miles (19.3 km) north of the Sea of Galilee. From there flows a powerful spring whose copious waters replenish the Sea of Galilee and in turn empty into the Jordan River to this day. As far back as human history records, Dan had always been the place where the gods and goddesses of fertility were worshiped and the God of creation ignored.

Jeroboam advanced his idea by arguing that this was for the benefit of the people, saying that it was too much for them to go to Jerusalem (1 Kin. 12:28). The lush surroundings lent themselves to pagan notions of fertility. In the symbolic list of tribes present in the new Jerusalem (Rev. 7:5–8), Ephraim and Dan are missing—the idolatry introduced by Jeroboam has eternal consequences.

Jeroboam was persistent and methodical in building a new order. He established a replacement priesthood and replacement shrines. More significantly, he introduced a new festival for the eighth month—presumably to rival the Festival of Tabernacles in the seventh month, Israel's long-standing highlight of the religious year since Sinai. That he placed it in the eighth month might have signaled that he did not want to be seen as directly competing. He could claim that his people were free to attend both festivals. But it gave his people an easy excuse not to attend the festival ordained by God. Such is often the devil's technique: create an attractive and convenient illegal substitute.

The unfaithfulness of Jeroboam became proverbial. Later in the book, when the reign of each king of Israel is evaluated, they are compared to him (e.g., 1 Kin. 15:30, 34; 16:2–3, 7; 22:52; 2 Kin. 3:3; 10:29; 13:2; 15:9, 18, 24). In the case of Omri (1 Kin. 16:25) and Ahab (16:33), their sins are declared to be even worse than Jeroboam's.

Jeroboam dedicated the religious facilities (12:32–33), which completed the rebellion and set the stage for the consequences. However, God sent him three warnings, giving him opportunity to turn around (13:1–6, 11–34; 14:7–16). The first warning was the prophecy of the man of God, in which he specifically mentioned king Josiah by name (over three hundred years in advance) as the one who would destroy the idolatrous altar at Bethel at which Jeroboam was burning incense.

The second warning was the disturbing account of the disobedience of the man of God who accepted the lie of the old prophet at the cost of his life (vv. 8–18). The text does not say what motivated the old man to lie and thus be instrumental in the temptation and ultimately the death of the man of God (vv. 26–32).

When the man of God who brought the first warning later disobeyed and died, the message should have been clear: ignore the word of the Lord at your peril. But this did not deter Jeroboam from continuing in his course of covenant violation. He appointed and consecrated anyone who desired to become a priest (13:33).

The third warning was a response to Jeroboam's misguided attempt to deceive the prophet Ahijah to try to help his sick son Abijah (14:1–6). God revealed the deception and prophesied that Abijah would die and that He would completely wipe out Jeroboam's posterity and eventually the whole kingdom of Israel (vv. 7–16).

God offered Jeroboam a measure of mercy in this prophecy against Israel (14:15–16). The destruction would be some time in the future; but for now, so God informed Jeroboam, a new king would replace him (v. 14), which would give the nation time to rethink their direction and would allow them to repent and recommit to God. Unfortunately, Israel never did.

The account of Jeroboam's reign of twenty-two years (931–910 B.C.) ended with the observation that he rested with his ancestors (or fathers) and was replaced by his son Nadab. Yet the sinful legacy of Jeroboam lived on in the lives of successive kings and became part of the life of Israel for almost 200 more years.

14:21–31. Judah Is Weakened. The impact of Rehoboam's reign in Judah was not that different from Jeroboam's in Israel, as evaluated by Ahijah (11:29–39; cf. 14:7–11). The summary statement notes that Judah's evil had become worse than that of their ancestors (14:22). The specifics include the construction of shrines and the incorporation of sacred stones or pillars and wooden Asherah poles placed in the hills under trees (v. 23).

Even more blatant was the presence of perverted persons (the Hebrew cryptically calls them “holy ones”) at the shrines (v. 24). It is commonly thought that these were cultic male and female prostitutes (some translations limit the term to “male shrine prostitutes”), who engaged in fertility rites and were involved in the confusion of genuine and false worship. The fact that these were everywhere despite being specifically forbidden (Deut. 23:17) demonstrates that the nation copied the religion of the very peoples whom God in judgment had dispossessed from the land (Deut. 20:17–18).

As a consequence of the nation's interest in idolatry, Pharaoh Shoshenq (945–924 B.C.; the Hebrews call him Shishak) invaded Judah in Rehoboam's fifth year (about 926/925 B.C.). The record of this invasion is inscribed on the walls of the temple of Amon at Karnak (Egypt), which listed 150 cities that Shoshenq conquered. The Kings narrative describes him emptying the treasuries of palace and temple, including the golden ceremonial shields that Solomon had made, and taking all the booty back to Egypt (1 Kin. 14:26). This impoverished the once proud and wealthy nation of Judah overnight. In an attempt to regain some measure of dignity, Rehoboam made bronze shields to replace the gold ones (v. 27), but instead of storing them in the House of the Forest of Lebanon (10:16–17), he placed them into the care of captains of the royal bodyguard (14:27), which demonstrated their much-reduced value—a reflection of the state of the nation under Rehoboam's rulership.

Just as Jeroboam's reign ended in an anticlimax, so too did Rehoboam's. The readers are again referred to the chronicles of the kings (court records) if they want to know more (v. 29). One further piece of information is offered:

Judah's Idolatry

The sacred pillars (matsebot) were stone objects, sometimes occurring in clusters, that were either abstract representations of deities or phallic symbols—in harmony with the focus on fertility by the religions of the surrounding nations. The wooden images or poles ('asherim) were wooden representations of the goddess Asherah (or Athirat)—either in the form of a carving or of a stylized sacred tree—that may have depicted the tree of life.

At the center of the issue of worship is the question of loyalty and allegiance. Who is the Ultimate and Supreme Being? Who is the Provider and Protector of life? By choosing to follow the idolatrous practices of surrounding nations, God's people were rejecting the God of Creation and Redemption. Instead they substituted the most degrading practices in their attempts to activate the nature gods into sending rain, thus ensuring good crops, herds, and wealth.

Rehoboam and Jeroboam fought all their days (v. 30). Rehoboam was finally replaced by his son (v. 31). The repetition of his Ammonite mother's name indicates that she may have been the influence that turned the nation against their covenant relationship with God.

15:1—16:34

Judah and Israel at War

Bloodshed and intrigue characterize the four or so decades covered in this section. North and South were continually at war, and the instability of the Northern Kingdom occasioned the assassination of four kings in palace plots. The kings of Israel (not included in the Chronicles account) are either described as walking in the ways of Jeroboam or sinning more than all those before them. With the introduction of the dynasty of Omri, the level of idolatry in both kingdoms increased to their highest level yet.

15:1–8. Abijah of Judah (913–911 B.C.).

Abijah replaced Rehoboam. Though some translations use the name “Abijam” for him, “Abijah” is more likely to be his actual name and means “the Lord is my Father.” Abijam means “Yam is my father”—Yam was the Canaanite sea god—and was possibly a derogatory name given to the king by those opposed to his idolatry. His mother was the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah (2 Chr. 13:2) and Absalom's only daughter, Tamar (2 Sam. 14:27). Evidence of her later idolatry (1 Kin. 15:13) suggests that her influence over her young son was a negative one. Meanwhile, Rehoboam groomed Abijah as his successor and prepared some of his twenty-eight sons for civil service and gave them experience over various responsibilities of state (2 Chr. 11:21–23).

It is no surprise then that Abijah walked in all the sins of his father (1 Kin. 15:3); but despite this, God kept him in order to preserve “a lamp in Jerusalem” for the sake of the covenant made with David (v. 4). This meant special protection for him. As a boy he grew up when his father and Jeroboam were at war, and this continued during his own reign. The Kings narrative is quite minimalistic compared to Chronicles, which describes a battle between Israel and Judah in which 500,000 Israelites were killed (2 Chr. 13:17), effectively ending Jeroboam's ability to wage war. The Kings narrative cuts Abijah's account short and continues with the ascension of his son Asa to the throne.

15:9–24. Asa of Judah (911–870 B.C.). In contrast to the brief, negative reign of his father, Asa reigned for as long as David and Solomon. He did what was right by getting rid of the male and female cultic prostitutes, removing the idols his father had made, and deposing his grandmother Maachah from her privileged position as Queen Mother (vv. 12–13). She had carved a detestable image of Asherah into a stylized sacred tree at a high place (v. 13). Asa cut it down and burned it by the Kidron Brook. Yet he did not destroy the high places (v. 14). This is one aspect of the slavish following of heathen practices that seems to have been too ingrained to eradicate.

Then he placed silver and gold items that both he and his father had dedicated into the temple treasury (v. 15). But war with the Northern Kingdom loomed again—almost like a refrain—for the fifth time (14:30; 15:6, 7, 16, 32). Details of war are glossed over, with more attention given to either increasing idolatry or dependence on other nations for military security. So Asa followed previous kings in emptying the palace and temple treasuries (with treasure he had just placed there) as payment for Syria ('aram in Hebrew) to attack the Northern Kingdom (15:18–21). It appears that Asa attempted to prevent the completion of a northern garrison city that the northern King Baasha was constructing at Ramah, only 6 miles (9.7 km) north of Jerusalem. The Chronicles narrative suggests the city was built to prevent the flow of northerners to the annual festivals in Jerusalem (cf. 2 Chr. 16:1). Asa conscripted every able-bodied person to strip the building site of all stonework and timber, and used the materials to build rival cities—Mizpah, about a mile (about 1.6 km) north of the Ramah site, and Geba, about a mile to the east.

The end of Asa's reign is a sad question mark. The Kings narrative simply states that in his old age he was diseased in the feet (1 Kin. 15:23). Although some commentators think this is gout, in some places in the Bible the feet are a euphemism for the private parts. For example, when Saul relieved himself in a cave, he literally, in Hebrew, "covers his feet" (1 Sam. 24:3). Isaiah speaks of a coming time of humiliation when all hair, including the hair of the feet (pubic hair), would be shaved (Is. 7:20). So there is a strong possibility Asa died of a sexually transmitted disease. Here the narrative comes to an abrupt halt, and a new king ascends the throne.

15:25—16:7. Nadab (910–909 B.C.) and Baasha of Israel (909–886 B.C.). The Kings narrative spends very little time with Nadab—just enough to say that he did evil in the Lord's estimation and that he acted similarly to his father (v. 26). This seems to be the pattern of the Northern Kingdom. Baasha ended the dynasty of Jeroboam by killing Nadab while the latter was involved in a siege of the Philistine city of Gibbethon, which was in the tribal land of Dan, west of Jerusalem (v. 27).

After Baasha installed himself as king, he then killed the entire household of Jeroboam (v. 29). This happened in fulfillment of the prophetic word of Ahijah, the old prophet from Shiloh (14:10–11, 14). Once more the dynamic word of the Lord proved to be invincible in shaping the history of God's people.

For the remainder of his twenty-four-year reign, Baasha warred against Judah (15:32) and continued the deep involvement of the kings before him in the fertility cult of the Canaanites. In later years, both his and Jeroboam's reigns would be the benchmark of Israel's apostasy (1 Kin. 21:22; 2 Kin. 9:9). As expected, the word of the Lord came to Baasha through a prophet to warn him of his course of action (1 Kin. 16:1–4, 7). Jehu, son of Hanani (not to be confused with King Jehu who appears forty or fifty years later), gave him a message similar to that received by Solomon (11:11–13) and Jeroboam (14:7–11): God raised Baasha up to be king, but he made God's people Israel sin; therefore Baasha's household would come to an end. Not one of them would receive a decent burial (16:4), as with Jeroboam's family. Almost as an afterthought, one of the reasons given for Baasha's judgment is the slaughter of Jeroboam's family (v. 7). Although a prophet foretold the fulfillment of the divine purpose of judgment in the destruction of Jeroboam's line, that did not excuse the one who later carried out that action.

16:8–20. Elah (886–885 B.C.) and Zimri of Israel (885 B.C.). Baasha's son, Elah, ascended the throne, but his reign was short-lived, marked by its promotion of the fertility cult, just as his father's reign had been (v. 13). One of his senior military officers took over the throne after assassinating the drunken Elah at a party in Tirzah (vv. 9–10), the early capital city of the Northern Kingdom. The death of Elah marked the end of Baasha's dynasty, which lasted only two generations—the same as Jeroboam's.

Zimri did to Elah (and Baasha's line) what Baasha had done to Nadab (and Jeroboam's line), with the added atrocity of killing all of Baasha's friends as well (vv. 11–12). Seeing that he reigned for only seven days, the coup he led must of necessity have been savage and violent. In reaction to his atrocities the people appointed Omri, the senior military figure for the nation, as king instead (v. 16). When Zimri saw Omri's military prowess and his successful siege against Gibbethon—which a previous Israelite king, Nadab, had been unable to take about twenty-five years previously (15:25-27)—Zimri gave up the struggle, went into the palace in Tirzah, set it ablaze, and died in the flames (v. 18). Even in his short reign he encouraged idolatrous worship (v. 19). It is significant that the Kings narrative highlights this as the main feature for each reign.

16:21-28. Omri of Israel (885-874 B.C.). With Zimri dead there was a power struggle as two factions tried to get their champion on the throne. This was a somewhat protracted saga: Zimri ascended the throne in the twenty-seventh year of Judah's king Asa (16:10), but it was not until Asa's thirty-first year that Omri prevailed over his rival, Tibni, to ascend the throne. This means that the throne was uncertain for about five years.

With the palace destroyed by fire, Omri set out to build a new one but decided to relocate it on a hill that he bought from Shemer, renaming it Samaria after its original owner (vv. 23-24). This process took up about half of his reign of twelve years, but meanwhile, Omri proved himself to be far more devoted to the fertility cult than any of his predecessors (v. 25). The Kings account concludes by saying about him that the rest of his acts were being recorded in the chronicles of the kings of Israel—not the biblical books of the same name but the royal court records of the time.

16:29-34. Ahab of Israel (874-853 B.C.). Ahab was the son of Omri and reigned over Israel for twenty-two years. He married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians (v. 31). He joined her in worshiping Baal and built a temple to him in Samaria (v. 32). Ahab's rebellion against the Lord was more intense than that of all the kings of Israel who were before him (vv. 30, 33). This level of rebellion will become evident in the narratives that follow. The brief but penetrating evaluation of Ahab's reign concludes with a reference to Hiel, who built Jericho and fulfilled the word of the Lord spoken through Joshua (Josh. 6:26). According to it, whoever would rebuild Jericho would do it at the cost of the life of his firstborn and youngest sons. This was the experience of Hiel, whose two sons died in the construction project. The word of the Lord is so potent that it finds fulfillment long after its utterance by the prophet. It never fails. Jericho was the place where the last king of Judah, Zedekiah, would be captured by the Babylonian armies (2 Kin. 25:1-7).

17:1-22:53

ELIJAH AND THE KINGS

At about the midpoint of the two books of Kings, attention turns away from the kings and focuses on two prophetic giants: Elijah and Elisha. The various accounts of their activities reveal how involved God really was, not only in the lives of the monarchy and of the nation but also in the events in the surrounding nations as well. Interwoven among the stories of Elijah and Elisha, the reigns of the various kings of Israel and Judah unfold. With the prominence of the ministry of these two key prophets, relations between the Northern and Southern Kingdoms enjoyed a time of peace. A widespread drought in Israel became the backdrop for a major showdown between God and Baal on Mount Carmel.

17:1-7. Elijah's Prophecy. Elijah grew up in the mountains of Gilead in the village of Tishbe on the eastern side of the Jordan River. The expression Tishbite may describe a quality (some suggest "stranger") as well as the village he was from. His powerful persona challenged the nation to choose either God or Baal.

Elijah's appearance before King Ahab to announce that there would not be rain for three years shows His trust in the word of the Lord revealed to him (17:1). Apparently fearless in

Baal Worship

The word "baal" simply means "lord." The name serves as a generic term for the fertility gods of Canaan, the main one being Hadad, the god of dew, rain, and storm. Hadad is responsible for the wealth that comes from verdant crops and fields and abundant herds. If "Baal" and his consorts were fertile, then the farmers would be wealthy, therefore his followers practiced fertility rites to encourage the gods in their fertility. The worship of the fertility cult promoted gross immorality and greed, and the vulnerable in society were exploited to satisfy the financial and sexual lust of the privileged classes. The net effect was that money and sex were the key social values, and human-rights abuses were the norm.

his willingness to confront leadership for its failings, Elijah suddenly appeared before the king. Ahab's marriage to Jezebel, a Phoenician princess (16:31), had ensured the proliferation of the fertility cult in Israel. Hence the confrontation between prophet and king was inevitable. Having delivered God's message to the patron of Baal worship, Elijah retreated to a mountain ravine in his home area—the Brook Cherith (Kerith), or according to some, the Kerith Ravine (the Heb. nakhal can mean either a ravine or a brook). This was an area with a small stream in rugged yet lush surroundings about 30 miles (48 km) east of Samaria, identified today as Wadi al-Yabis. There he was kept alive by the waters of the brook and with food brought to him morning and evening by ravens (v. 6).

17:8–24. The Widow of Zarephath. When the brook dried up, God instructed Elijah to go to Zarephath, a village about 80 or 90 miles (129 or 145 km) away, just south of Sidon. It is ironic that while a Phoenician woman (Jezebel) was greatly influencing the demise of the nation, another Phoenician woman (the widow) was the means of preserving the life of the prophet whom God appointed to counter Ahab and Jezebel in order to preserve the life of the nation.

When Elijah first asked the woman for a little water and some bread, she informed him of her precarious social status (vv. 12–13). That the prophetic word could help in a household like that clearly demonstrates that the whole nation of Israel would be far better off if they would heed the words of the prophet as well. Further, this humble home saw the first resurrection of a person from the dead that is recorded in Scripture (v. 22).

18:1–15. Elijah and Obadiah. The story of Obadiah and Elijah's interactions with him demonstrates several important things. First, it helps us understand the severity of the famine and the magnitude of the national crisis. The fact that the king had to involve himself personally in such a menial task as finding grass for horses indicates the desperate nature of the situation. All other kingly responsibilities or preoccupations were preempted by this most basic need. This shows how far God was willing to push his point to bring about repentance.

Second, the story shows God's willingness to affirm and encourage a faithful believer during a genuine time of trouble. God sent Elijah out of his way to meet Obadiah. This certainly must have given the faithful man an assurance that God was still in control through Elijah's ministry.

Third, the story establishes a basis for God's later rebuke of Elijah's self-pity (19:18). In some respects, Obadiah's faithfulness to God had put him under more stress than Elijah had to endure. While Elijah had been hidden away in remote places, Obadiah remained at court, at the very heart of this great controversy. Despite all the pressures to the contrary, Obadiah (whose name means "servant/worshiper of Yahweh") had the special skill of maintaining his connection and influence with the royal family. While doing so, he had done God's work by directly undermining the machinations of Jezebel. Albeit on a smaller scale, he was playing a role very similar to that of Daniel and his companions in the court of Babylon.

Fourth, the story demonstrates, in almost a humorous way, God's willingness to accept our questionings of His commands and our emotional frustrations and outbursts based on our human experience. Obadiah openly challenged the wisdom of doing what Elijah asked, and no divine rebuke came from the prophet. Obadiah was in fact concerned about unnecessarily risking his life. He had been risking it by hiding and providing food to God's servants, but this time he wanted to be certain that things would go as the prophet said. He was reassured that the prophet would do as he had said, with the implicit understanding that all would be well for Obadiah. His heartfelt, honest questions and disputations, accepted by God, remind us of those of similar Bible characters like Moses, Gideon, and Thomas.

18:16–46. Elijah, Ahab, and Mount Carmel.

Ahab's initial reaction upon meeting Elijah demonstrates his seemingly willful blindness to reality. The crisis had begun with Elijah's dramatic prophecy of the drought. But Elijah had made it clear that the prophecy was made on God's authority, not his own. Thus, Ahab certainly had every opportunity to consider that the crisis was instigated by God rather than Elijah. Yet Ahab, obtuse in the extreme, decided to ignore the obvious and identify Elijah as the "troubler of Israel" (v. 17). This expression was first used in reference to Simeon and Levi, who caused their father Jacob trouble after they killed the men of Shechem in revenge for their prince raping their sister (Gen. 34). It was also used to refer to Achan (whose name is based on the word for "trouble") and the curse that his actions brought upon the people of the Exodus (Josh. 7:24–26; 1 Chr. 2:7). However, Ahab had also brought a curse on the land—as demonstrated by the three years of drought that was still in effect. So Elijah was quite justified in throwing the accusation back at the king—Ahab and his father's family were the troublemakers of Israel (1 Kin. 18:18). It was the action of forsaking God and following Baal that had resulted in this trouble.

Elijah's question in v. 21 expresses the idea of being halfhearted. The expression also applies in the Psalms to "double-minded" people (Ps. 119:113). The picture is of someone limping between two options but not being convinced of either. The idea is that of a "double-minded" person who is tossed about like a wave in the wind (James 1:8) or who is neither cold nor hot (Rev. 3:15–16).

Given the challenge to call upon their god, the prophets of Baal pled for hours, slashing themselves with weapons to show their devotion. It was a common belief among the followers of Baal that during times of drought, Baal was held prisoner by death in the underworld. Therefore, Elijah's comments about Baal going on a trip or taking a vacation (1 Kin. 18:27) were a bit too close for comfort for the highly offended, and increasingly bloodied, prophets (v. 28).

It is ironic that the word describing the action of the prophets, sometimes translated as "leaped" or "danced" in v. 26, is the same Hebrew verb (pasakh) translated as "limping" in Elijah's challenge in v. 21. This suggests that no matter the extremes of their actions, nothing was going to work. The narrative contrasts Baal, the totally powerless storm god, with Yahweh, the Creator and Redeemer and alone the Provider of rain in its season (Lev. 26:4). It is reasonable to suppose that all this time, Elijah kept diligent watch on any attempt to smuggle in some fire from elsewhere. The impotence of Baal was patently obvious.

The text does not mention where Elijah found the water he used, but a perpetual spring is located today not too far from the traditional site of this event. Elijah used the water to drench his altar, making it nearly impossible for anyone but God to be able to ignite the soggy offering. The prophet then prayed, and in obvious contrast to the prophets' frenzied activity his words were calm and reasoned. He stressed that God could be known. The dramatic burst of fire at the prayer's conclusion consumed not only the sacrifice and water but the altar of twelve large stones as well. After the people's spontaneous and awed reaction of affirming the Lord as God (1 Kin. 18:39), Elijah commanded them to seize all the fertility cult prophets and have them executed down in the valley at the base of the mountain (v. 40). This was about the same place Deborah and Barak won victory against a vastly superior force of Canaanites—devotees of Baal—about 300 years earlier (Judg. 5:19).

After the emotional highs of the day, Elijah suggested to the king that he should quickly eat and drink because a storm was on its way (1 Kin. 18:41). This was really an invitation to partake in a covenant meal with the Lord and echoes the experience of Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and the seventy elders of Israel as they ate and drank in God's presence at Mount Sinai (Ex. 24:9–11).

It is not only God's power as Lord over nature that is recognized in this chapter, but the authority of the prophet as well. All those to whom Elijah spoke in this narrative listened and followed his instructions: the king (1 Kin. 18:20, 42, 44), the prophets of Baal (vv. 26, 28), the crowd (vv. 30, 34, 40), and his assistant (vv. 43–44). This fact highlights the significant role that prophets played among God's people and the security that attended them if they listened. This narrative forms a significant contrast with events in the rest of the book, in which the prophets were ignored and vilified.

19:1–21. Running from Jezebel. Paradoxically, the iron-willed prophet lost his nerve when Queen Jezebel found out about the execution of her prophets and threatened Elijah with the same fate. But the Lord did not condemn Elijah for running away or for his wish to die. He knew that what Elijah needed was food and rest, and He provided both for him. With renewed strength Elijah went to Mount Horeb, taking "forty days and forty nights" to travel a distance of at least 100 miles (161 km) and possibly double that, depending on the route he took.

When he arrived at Horeb, the mountain of God, he spent the night in a cave to shelter from the frigid night temperatures there. It was at this same place Moses first met God in the burning bush (at the base of the mountain; Ex. 3:1–5), where he struck a rock and water flowed (Ex. 17:6), and where he received the Ten Commandments. The next day God asked Elijah what he was doing there (1 Kin. 19:9). Elijah's answer revealed how depressed he was. He reaffirmed his commitment to the Lord and argued that everyone else had deserted God, destroyed His altars, and murdered His prophets, and that now they wanted to kill him as well (v. 10).

The Lord asked Elijah to go outside and observe what was going to happen (as He did Moses; Ex. 33:22; 34:6). First there was a strong wind that tore rocks out of the mountainside, then an earthquake that shook the place violently, then a fire that burned vigorously in a place where there was little or nothing to burn. The narrative states that the Lord was not in any of these phenomena (1 Kin. 19:11–12). Then there was silence—the text describes it in Hebrew as “the voice of thin silence.” In contrast to the just-witnessed spectacular events, God’s presence was in something small and insignificant—which must have been how Elijah felt at this moment. God does not normally express Himself with fire flashing from heaven (as on Carmel), or in violent storms, earthquakes or fire (also seen during the Exodus on the same mountain; Ex. 24:11), but He makes Himself known in times of silence when nothing seems to be happening.

God told Elijah that there were still 7,000 people in the apostate Northern Kingdom—a remnant who had kept their faith in God and had not been seduced by Baal (1 Kin. 19:18; the reference to kissing Baal refers either to actually kissing his image in the shrines as an act of worship and devotion or blowing kisses if the image was too tall). Just because Elijah was deeply discouraged did not mean that God was inactive or that Elijah was the only person still faithful in a culture of apparent total apostasy. God always preserves for Himself a faithful remnant through whom He realizes His purpose.

No details are given of Elijah’s return journey, but he found Elisha ploughing a field on his family land at Abel-Meholah (v. 16). This may have been near what is now the village of Mehola on the West Bank close to the Jordan River; if so, it is only about 12 miles (19.3 km) due east of Elijah’s hometown. The fact that there were twelve teams of oxen (v. 19) suggests that Elisha’s family was prosperous and that the ploughing of the large field must have been a community event. Consequently, everyone in the village knew that Elijah was there and probably witnessed and understood the prophet’s symbolic gesture of throwing his cloak over Elisha’s shoulders. Elisha also knew the significance of this action and asked to first go home and say farewell to his parents. Elijah’s response indicated he was not convinced that the young man really wanted to devote his career to the prophetic ministry (see Luke 9:61–62).

Instead of kissing his parents goodbye, the narrative speaks of Elisha slaughtering a pair of oxen, offering parts of them up as a sacrifice, and sharing a sacrificial meal with the entire village as an act of commitment. He offered peace or communion sacrifices in which selected portions were burned, while the meat was cooked and shared between the one sacrificing and his family or community (Lev. 3:3–5; 22:29–30). This special event demonstrated Elisha’s commitment to the prophetic call and also gave an opportunity for Elisha to bid farewell to his family and friends.

20:1–43. Ben-Hadad of Syria. The name Ben-Hadad literally means “the son of (the god) Hadad,” and it may have been a popular name applied to the kings of Aram (Syria). Hadad was the popular god also referred to as Baal and was depicted holding a bolt of lightning to illustrate his role as the storm god bringing rain and thus fertility. Ben-Hadad threatened to destroy Samaria so thoroughly that there would not be enough dust for his soldiers to have a handful each (v. 10). Jezebel had used the same oath that Ben-Hadad used in swearing this action (cf. 19:2). Old priest Eli (1 Sam. 3:17), King David (2 Sam. 3:35; 19:13), Solomon (1 Kin. 2:23), and later also Ahab (2 Kin. 6:31) used this oath formula. It seems to be the strongest possible way of committing oneself to a desired outcome.

Ben-Hadad and his confederacy convinced themselves that the God of Israel was powerful only in the hills and weak on the plains, echoing the widespread notion in ANE texts of local deities (1 Kin. 20:23). They had not yet understood that Yahweh was the Creator of heaven and earth—almighty, all-knowing, all-powerful, and inviting all to come to Him and find salvation.

21:1–29. Naboth’s Vineyard. Next to Ahab’s second palace at Jezreel, there was a vineyard owned by Naboth (whose name means “prophecies”). Moses had specified that land was not to change hands from one tribe to another but that the inheritance of the fathers must be kept (Num. 36:7). Naboth’s refusal to the king’s offer for his vineyard simply involved his being true to this command of God. Ahab’s guilt in destroying Naboth and confiscating his property may have a metaphorical relationship to the very reason Naboth had refused to yield. Naboth was determined to keep the land for the purpose God intended it. Here we see that Ahab had given the land over to other gods. He maintained the idolatry of the Amorites, whom God had ejected from the land for their horrendous practices. Thus, God’s judgments on the Amorites would, in effect, fall upon those who, without repentance, embraced the same sins (Gen. 15:16; Deut. 7:1–10; 20:17–18).

In another example of a prophet of God suddenly showing up and creating a dramatic scene, Elijah confronted Ahab on the very ground he had stolen. The purpose of the confrontation was to pronounce judgment. But as in the case of Jonah at Nineveh (Jon. 3) announcing judgment, however severe, almost always includes an implicit appeal for repentance. Ahab realized the gravity of his situation and had a remarkable change of heart (1 Kin. 21:27). God accepted Ahab's contrition, informed Elijah of this, and postponed a portion of the judgment for two generations. Ahab's dynasty would end with his grandson (2 Kin. 10:1–2, 6–7) rather than him. But the prophecy of the indignity of Ahab's own death remained and was fulfilled.

22:1–40. The Death of Ahab. The visit by Jehoshaphat to Ahab may have been for family reasons. Jehoshaphat had married one of Ahab's relatives to form an alliance (2 Chr. 18:1), and that alliance was apparently strengthened in the next generation when Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram married Ahab's daughter Athaliah (2 Kin. 8:16–18). Ahab shared with Jehoshaphat his concern over Ramoth Gilead (1 Kin. 22:3) and asserted that the promise of Ben-Hadad to return all Israelite cities under Syrian control (20:34) had not been fulfilled (22:3). Ahab then asked Jehoshaphat for military assistance to reclaim Ramoth Gilead. But Jehoshaphat's pledge of loyalty (v. 4), although an echo of the pledge that Ruth gave Naomi (Ruth 1:16–17), sounded a little hollow. Perhaps it revealed an uneasy peace between the Northern and Southern Kingdoms, which lasted for only another fifteen years or so.

A further indication of the tenuous relationship between the two kings occurred when Jehoshaphat asked for Ahab's prophets to reveal the word of the Lord to them (22:5–6). Perhaps Jehoshaphat was feeling uncomfortable about prophets of Baal speaking on behalf of God, so he asked if there was a prophet of the Lord anywhere. This begged the question of where Ahab's prophets came from. We know that 450 prophets of Baal were executed after the Carmel theophany (18:19, 40). Were the 400 prophets of the Asherim spared? Or was this group of 400 prophets (22:6) a group of new individuals whom Jezebel had recruited? It is disturbing that Baal would have had so many prophets in Israel.

Micaiah was identified as a prophet of God, but he was hated by Ahab because of his negative messages (v. 8). This suggests that the 400 prophets would say only what would please the king, whether true or not.

The interchange between Ahab and Micaiah, the report of Micaiah's vision, and the record of Ahab's death—all recorded in fascinating narrative detail—provide some theological insight into how God accomplishes His purposes in the realm of human free will. The two kings were enthroned in an outdoor pavilion and dressed in their finery. As expected, the false prophets

Divine Judgment

The harshness of the sentence on Ahab and his family answers the questions that most probably were in the mind of Naboth's wife and children and countless others since then: "Why did this happen?" "If God is good, why did He allow this?" These are questions for which we do not yet have satisfactory answers, but the sentence announced by Elijah gives an indication of how God views gross injustice: those who oppress the innocent will get what they deserve, and those on the receiving end of oppression will receive complete restoration and generous compensation (see Matt. 5:5). Justice will finally prevail. In other words, God does not step in immediately to prevent evil in a society even when that is what the vast majority wants—as was the case in the Northern Kingdom. In those circumstances, there will be innocent victims killed in the crossfire of a raging battle between the powers of darkness and the Kingdom of God. Nothing in the immediate situation will answer the crimes against humanity that the powers of evil perpetrate, but that situation will not continue indefinitely. God has appointed a day on which He will judge the world (Acts 17:31)—a day when the oppressors of God's people will lose their power (Dan. 7:11, 21, 22, 26) and the people of God will inherit the kingdom (Dan. 7:18, 22, 27). This is part of the Christian hope.

spoke what the king wanted to hear, providing for him a false hope and security. Surprisingly Micaiah initially supported the false message, but the king was able to detect the sarcasm in the voice of the prophet and insisted on hearing the true message. And the message was clear: there was no hope for Ahab. Micaiah's prophecy of judgment was fulfilled. The narrative highlights the apparent random chance of Ahab's death, but we are to understand that there was nothing random about it. It is obvious from this story that there was no coincidence at play but rather that the battle, and that "random" arrow, was a part of a bigger plan that God had outlined in the heavenly council. The divine verdict against the king, as indicated in Micaiah's vision, was revealed to the people in the course of time. God used a lying spirit, which always is associated with Satan and his forces, to accomplish this. That God allowed Satan's minions to deceive, within boundaries, shows how far Ahab had fallen. God in His mercy granted Ahab the freedom of will, allowing him to deliberately and knowingly choose to be deceived. God does the same for all humanity. Those who wish to be deceived will have their wish granted.

22:41–50. Jehoshaphat of Judah (872–848 B.C.). Compared to the four chapters devoted to Jehoshaphat in 1 Chronicles 17–20, Kings provides only ten verses. His reign almost overlapped with Ahab's (874–853 B.C.). He came to the throne in Ahab's fourth year at the age of thirty-five, and reigned for twenty-five years. His reign was characterized by a positive relationship with God. He brought about a measure of religious reform, removing the cult of male and female prostitutes that Asa, his father, had not eradicated. But he failed to remove the high places (1 Kin. 22:43). No doubt his wife—a near relative of the idolatrous Ahab—had some influence in this, just as Solomon's wives had influenced him.

Another action that seems to be spiritually negative was Jehoshaphat's alliance with the Northern Kingdom (again, due to the influence of both his wife and Ahab). This alliance, although initiated as a marriage between royal families, also involved their close cooperation in battles against common enemies and in a shipping venture that came to nothing when all their ships sank (v. 48). The Chronicles account adds that a prophet chided Jehoshaphat for his political alliance with Ahab as well as for the shipping venture because Judah cooperated too closely with the wicked Northern Kingdom (2 Chr. 20:35–37). Although Kings says nothing about this, it does say that when he was invited to include some of the Northern Kingdom's sailors in the fleet, Jehoshaphat refused (1 Kin. 22:49).

22:51–53. Ahaziah of Israel (853–852 B.C.). Ahab's son Ahaziah became king in Jehoshaphat's seventeenth year and reigned only two years. He did as his father had done before him, serving Baal and provoking God to anger. The fact that he followed the pattern set by Jeroboam, as all his predecessors had done before him, shows the deep-seated nature of public sympathy for the fertility cult. The narrative of 1 Kings ends on that sad note.

2 KINGS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The earlier manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible simply have two books named Samuel and Kings. When this was translated into Greek to be part of the Library of Alexandria, it was recognized that these two books were really one narrative, so the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible) retitled these two books “Of the Kingdoms” and separated it into four sections. What we call today 2 Kings was called “Of the Kingdoms 4,” because it was the last of these four sections. The Latin translation in the fourth century (called the Vulgate) retained the same four sections (although it called all four sections Kings rather than Kingdoms). In 1517, Bibles used by both Protestants and Catholics began to use the Hebrew names while keeping the same four sections, thus giving us the 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings that we use today.

We do not know who wrote the books of Kings. The Jewish Talmud has a statement that claims Jeremiah as the author. A comparison of the last chapter of both books (2 Kin. 25 and Jer. 52) shows that there are similarities. However, there are statements in Kings that indicate that at least some of it was written before Jeremiah was alive and some was written after he was dead). Throughout both books (1 and 2 Kin.), the authors reveal their sources as the books of the written accounts of Solomon, the kings of Israel, and the kings of Judah. These statements (e.g., 1 Kin. 11:41; 14:19, 29; 2 Kin. 1:18; 8:23) also make plain that there was much more written about these kings than is recorded here, indicating that the selections that survive in 1 and 2 Kings were compiled to teach particular spiritual lessons (see section on Theology and Purpose in 1 Kings: Introduction).

Date. A statement in 1 Kings 12:19 indicates that the tribes that formed the Northern Kingdom of Israel after the split from Judah in the south were still in rebellion against the house of David when that part of the book was written. Since the Northern Kingdom was dissolved in 722 B.C. when Assyria conquered them, at least that part of the book was written before 722 B.C. It is likely that all of 2 Kings was written after 1 Kings, and since 2 Kings begins just after the death of Ahab, it must have been written at a time later than 853 B.C. The book of 2 Kings ends with Nebuchadnezzar’s son and heir, Evil-Merodach (known in Babylonian accounts as Amel-Marduk or Awel-Marduk), releasing Jehoiachin from prison in the year Evil-Merodach became king. As a result, this part had to have been written after 560 B.C., when Jehoiachin was released from prison (see “Old Testament Timeline,” p. 94). That passage (2 Kin. 25:27–30) indicates that Jehoiachin ate with the king for the rest of his life, which pushes the date even later. It is likely, however, that most of 2 Kings was written before the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and that this last section of chapter 25 was appended later.

Backgrounds. By the opening chapter of 2 Kings, the kingdom had already been split for seventy-eight years and was thus generationally established. Eight kings had ruled the Northern Kingdom of Israel and four kings had ruled the Southern Kingdom of Judah. There would still be twelve kings in Israel before its end in 722 B.C. and sixteen rulers (mostly all kings) in Judah before its end in 586 B.C.

In 853 B.C. (where 1 Kin. ends and 2 Kin. begins) both kingdoms had a new king ascend to the throne, making the split in the book at this point reasonable. Following Ahab’s death (1 Kin. 22:29–40), his son Ahaziah took the throne. He ruled for only two years because of a fatal accident (2 Kin. 1:1–18), and his brother Jehoram took over. In Judah, the good king Jehoshaphat was near the end of his reign and brought his son to the throne to co-rule with him in the same year Ahab died (853 B.C.). Jehoshaphat lived for about five more years after this.

Politically, to their north, Shalmaneser III was ruling in Assyria. About six years earlier, he had attacked Syria and Israel, and just prior to Israel and Judah's battle with Syria (which resulted in the death of Ahab), they had fought with Syria against Assyria. So while Assyria was the major threat, Syria was the more immediate threat.

To the south, Egypt was in disarray. The Libyans had been living in Egypt as mercenaries for some time but had finally wrested control from the Egyptians beginning in the Third Intermediate Period. However, in 853 B.C. more than one man claimed to be king. As a result, Egypt was weak and does not figure much into the narrative at the beginning of 2 Kings, but it will appear in the latter portions of the book during the Late Period, when Egypt was once again unified.

Theology and Purpose. The role of the prophet is prominent in both books of Kings. Elijah's ministry is the focus of the latter parts of 1 Kings, and Elisha's ministry is the focus in the initial parts of 2 Kings. The narrative in 1 Kings spends five chapters on all of the kings before Ahab (1 Kin. 12–16) and six chapters on Ahab (1 Kin. 17–22), so it is clear that God was trying to reach this major northern king who had married a Sidonian princess/high-priestess of Baal (1 Kin. 16:31–33). The narrative in 2 Kings focuses on God trying to reach the people of Israel (as well as a few foreigners and a couple of kings) through the ministry and miracles of Elisha (2 Kin. 2–13), which covers half of the book of 2 Kings. Two chapters after the death of Elisha, the narrative describes the fall of the Northern Kingdom. The focus of the last half of the book is entirely on the Southern Kingdom of Judah as God tried to reach them through a few good kings in spite of a few very bad kings. (For more, see 1 Kings: Introduction.)

COMMENTARY

1:1—17:41

THE DIVIDED MONARCHY

The second book of Kings continues the narrative of the experience of God's people during the divided monarchy, which was introduced in 1 Kings 17:1. It concludes with the collapse of the Northern (2 Kin. 15:8—17:41) and Southern Kingdoms (18:1—25:30). The book commences with a parenthetical note about Moab's rebellion against Israel after Ahab's death (2 Kin. 1:1; see 1 Kings: Introduction) and then continues describing the reign of Ahaziah of Israel. Nothing more is said of Moab until chapter 3. Some commentators have suggested that the purpose of 2 Kings 1:1 is to form a bridge that joins the two books together.

1:1—2:11

Elijah and the Kings

This section concludes the interaction between Elijah and the kings that was initiated in 1 Kings 17:1. God's ideal for the monarchy was that the kings would always listen to His prophets in order to make clear that He was the true king of Israel. But with a few exceptions, most of the kings did not listen to God's messengers.

1:1–18. Elijah and Ahaziah. Ahaziah's choice to send messengers to Ekron says much about God's place on the list of Israel's priorities. Ahaziah did not choose to go to Jerusalem even though there was peace between the two kingdoms. He did not even choose to go to Bethel or Dan, the two Israelite places of Baal worship. Instead, a Philistine city was the most attractive to him as the place with the most healing spiritual power. Elijah's question to the officers sent by Ahaziah carried an obvious tone of sarcasm, or at least irony. Ekron was about fifty-five miles (88.5 km) southwest of Samaria, compared to Jerusalem, which was only forty miles (64.4 km) due south. Thus, the implication that they were simply out to consult the most convenient god could not be serious. To make it worse, Ekron was just inside the northern border of the territory of Judah on another highway, west of the one to Jerusalem. It was obvious that the temple and God were being avoided.

The narrative highlights in an unusual way the conflict between the prophets of the Lord and the kings of Israel. It was a conflict between the will of God and the will of the king, and between the word of God and the word of the king. There was a deep clash between the authority of the king and that of Elijah. Ahaziah obviously disliked the message of death and was willing to do whatever was necessary to avert it. The reason behind sending for Elijah is not explicitly stated, but the fact that the king sent the army to get the prophet clearly suggests that his intentions were not good. Perhaps Ahaziah thought that he would be free of the message of death if he brought the prophet under control, or even killed him. Subduing the prophet would be, according to the king, a way of neutralizing the evil omen.

The basic question seems to be, Who is able to shape the movements of history? Ahaziah believed that the god of Ekron could reveal to him the future in order for him to act accordingly, but he soon realized that only the Lord, through His word, shapes the future and fills it with hope or judgment. The military arrived at the house of Elijah and demanded that he descend as an act of submission to the king, but Elijah responded with a divine judgment that served to legitimize him as a prophet of the Lord. On Mount Carmel the fire that descended from heaven had vindicated God; now fire, not Elijah, descended from heaven showing that he was the messenger of the Lord. The captain of the third military unit did not ask for the submission of Elijah but rather submitted himself and his soldiers to Elijah to avoid divine judgment; lives were preserved only in submission to the will of God delivered by the prophet.

Elijah descended not in obedience to the king but in obedience to the divine mandate, and he went with the soldiers as the ambassador of the Lord. By now the king had realized that opposition to the word of the Lord results in judgment, and he quietly listened to Elijah as he delivered to him the original message of divine judgment. In the conflict between the authority of Ahaziah and the prophetic authority of Elijah, the powerful word of the Lord prevailed. The pattern of prediction and fulfillment, so common in the books of Kings, reveals who is the Lord of history. The narrative closes with the statement that Ahaziah died in fulfillment of the word of the Lord that Elijah had delivered to him.

2:1–11. Elijah's Departure in a Fiery Chariot.

The intriguing thing about this passage is that it takes for granted that Elijah was about to depart into the heavens. Everybody in the story seems to have known about it before it happened. When two groups of students at Bethel and at Jericho asked Elisha about it, it apparently caused him distress. The narrative focuses on Elisha's determination to stay with Elijah to the very end. The unspoken expectation, and yet uncertainty, of what was in store for Elijah is what gives a sense of drama to the story. The three requests from Elijah for Elisha to turn back and Elisha's determination to continue (vv. 2–6) were probably a test intended to reveal Elisha's commitment to the prophetic ministry as the successor of Elijah.

Elijah's mantle had been introduced earlier (1 Kin. 19:19) as a symbol of the prophetic calling, but in this passage it becomes significant as a symbol of spiritual authority. The use of the mantle to divide the river (2 Kin. 2:8) brings to mind the miraculous use of Moses's rod at the Red Sea. The crossing of the Jordan itself "on dry ground," here and in Elisha's return a few verses later, would remind any Hebrew of the earlier and more famous crossing. This episode marks the last time in Scripture that a body of water is miraculously dried up to allow passage on dry ground. In the final moments of their relationship, Elijah asked Elisha a question that is reminiscent of the question God asked Solomon at the beginning of his reign: What would he like to receive? Elisha's answer carried special meaning because a double portion was, in the practice of the time, what the firstborn would legally inherit from the father to establish the firstborn as the leader of the family (Deut. 21:17). The request and the imminent fulfillment of the answer publicly legitimized the leading prophetic role Elisha would fill in Israel. While miracles are not by any means the full measure of the work of a prophet, there was a strong emphasis on them in the stories of Elisha. So commentators who have studied the matter carefully have noted that the number of miracles wrought by Elisha as listed in Scripture is exactly double the number performed by Elijah—a clear, if symbolic, indication of the fulfillment of Elisha's request for a double portion of Elijah's spirit.

The closest parallels to the phenomenon of being taken away in a chariot of fire associated with a whirlwind occur in Ezekiel and Job. Ezekiel saw a whirlwind coming from the north with fire (Ezek. 1:4) and God's throne in its midst (1:5, 22, 25–26). Similarly, Job saw a whirlwind coming, and God spoke to him from it (Job 38:1; 40:6). Other uses of the term "whirlwind" refer to God coming in judgment (e.g., Zech. 9:14). In all these biblical references, the whirlwind or powerful storm (the same word is often used in Hebrew) came toward the one describing it, but with Elijah, the whirlwind went away from the viewer. This unique and special revelation of God's presence and its description in the biblical text can be difficult for the modern reader to understand.

Nevertheless, the story teaches important truths. First, Elisha was being tested for his persistence. Perhaps he was a little reticent to bid farewell to his master, but he needed to be able to keep up with the mundane and ordinary as well as to stand up to the blatant evils that would face him. That meant simply plodding along, even if it meant doubling back a few times to where he had been. Second, Elijah visited the schools of the prophets to tie up loose ends before his departure. The students of those schools knew what was happening, thus providing a good precedent for youth today to be informed so that they can at least observe God's action among His people. Third, the only other times that water parted was during the Exodus—at the Red Sea for the first generation leaving Egypt and at the Jordan for the second generation entering the promised land. What Elijah did in dividing the Jordan with his rolled-up mantle signified a new beginning. The end of one era had come and a new day of opportunity and salvation was dawning. Finally, the translation of a living human being to heaven speaks about the reality of heaven as a place accessible to human beings. There is an element of hope present in the narrative in the sense that if one human being was taken to heaven, then others could also enjoy this privilege. The Christian hope points to the moment when the resurrected righteous will ascend to meet the Lord and be with Him forever.

2:12—9:37

Elisha and the Kings

In the record of Elijah and Elisha, the books of Kings register a wide and rich portfolio of prophetic ministry. In addition to working for national repentance and revival, their ministry also demonstrated God's care for the needs of individuals that the apostate kings of their time failed to have. The prophets provided food, helped eliminate debt, facilitated God's blessing for childless parents to have a child, cared for widows and orphans, and raised the only sons of women from the dead. Both prophets were closely associated with the schools of the prophets.

2:12–25. Elisha's Ministry Commences. Elisha's reaction to Elijah's disappearance was rather dramatic. He cried out, tore his robe in two (v. 12), picked up Elijah's mantle (cloak) that had fallen from him—a detail mentioned twice in vv. 13–14—and headed back to the Jordan (v. 13). This repetition emphatically reinforces the nature of Elijah's dramatic departure and the mantle falling down from above in the process as part of the sign that was promised to Elisha for receiving a double portion of Elijah's spirit. The waters of the Jordan were then divided in order for him to cross over (v. 14).

Back in Jericho, the men of the city told Elisha about their desperate water situation (v. 19). As a response, the prophet asked for a new bowl full of salt and tossed it into the water supply. The biblical author stated that the water remained healed until his own day, and that is still the case. This was Elisha's first miracle and was performed for the benefit of God's people. The Lord supplied for them drinkable water, which was a vital need. The God who defeated powerful armies is the same who cares for the daily needs of His servants.

Those who mocked Elisha (v. 23) were small or young (Heb. qatan) ne'arim—a term that can mean “boys,” “lads,” “youths,” or “servants.” Accordingly, Bible translations differ in regard to what they are called. Ultimately, we do not know exactly how old they were, but they were acting like a gang of juvenile delinquents. Their actions were clearly reprehensible (cf. Deut. 21:18–21). The fate they met parallels what happened to the soldiers who attempted to arrest Elijah (2 Kin. 1:10, 12). It was also a judgment against the inhabitants of Bethel and their worship of the golden calf placed there by Jeroboam. This judgment echoed the account of the serpents in the wilderness during the Exodus (Num. 21:5–9)—when God's people turned their backs on Him and mocked Him, He withdrew His protection from them, and they suffered the consequences of facing their ever-present dangers without God's protection. The youths who mocked Elisha were in reality mocking God, and they too reaped the consequences. Their action stands in marked contrast to those of the students who honored Elisha.

3:1–25. Moab Rebels. While the book opens with the statement that Moab rebelled (1:1), it is only in chapter 3 that more is said about this. The rebellion came when a new king (Jehoram or Joram, 852–841 B.C.) ascended the throne of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. This means that both kingdoms had a king of the same name at the same time: Jehoram of Judah reigned from about 853 until 841 B.C. Jehoram of Israel was the brother of the previous king, Ahaziah, whose brief reign ended after falling from a high window.

Although Jehoram of Israel did evil in God's sight, he did curb some of the idolatrous practices of his forebears by removing a sacred pillar that his father had made to honor Baal (3:2; see also 1 Kin. 14:23). But he continued the worship practices that Jeroboam introduced (2 Kin. 3:3). Although the record of events during his reign continues through 8:15, Jehoram of Israel was not the main player; it was Elisha. The king is almost incidental to all else that was happening.

It is clear that regardless of its many other problems, the Northern Kingdom had significant political influence in the region, enough to be able to exact a significant tribute from Moab, across the Jordan and to the south along the east side of the Dead Sea. Moab first fell under the control of Israel during the reign of David (2 Sam. 8:2)—control that continued in the Northern Kingdom after the split since at least two tribes (Rueben and Gad) dwelt in the area.

The amount of the tribute gives us some idea of the livestock production of Moab, now part of the modern country of Jordan and a region roughly equivalent in size to the Dead Sea. A tribute usually was understood as a token tax to acknowledge subservience to another authority—in this case Israel. An adult ram produces as much as thirty pounds (13.6 kg) of wool yearly. Thus, 100,000 rams could potentially produce 1,500 tons (about three million pounds) of wool each year. If this was only a token, the amount of wool produced yearly in Moab alone was staggering, illustrating how lush the land east of the Dead Sea was at that time.

This story illustrates Jehosaphat's puzzling relationship with God and with the Northern Kingdom. The chronology of his various military alliances with Ahab and his son may be difficult to reconstruct from the various accounts in Kings and Chronicles, but almost all of the alliances ended in disaster, and in most of them he was directly or implicitly rebuked by the Lord (2 Kin. 22:32, 48; cf. 2 Chr. 19:1–3, 36–37). Worst of all for its long-term consequences, Jehosaphat, a scripturally honored “good” king of Judah, had allowed his son to marry a daughter of Ahab, which corrupted Judah for generations (2 Kin. 8:18; see also 1 Kin. 22:44; 2 Chr. 18:1). About this alliance with Jehoram, Elisha made it explicit again that the Lord decried the bad company Jehosaphat kept with the king of Israel (2 Kin. 3:14).

The roundabout route of the allies' attack is interesting. It would have been much more efficient for Israel and Judah to attack from the north and Edom from the south. Instead, they all apparently traveled together around the south end of the Dead Sea to attack Moab from that direction. It can only be assumed that Moab had fewer defenses on its southern border, making it a more attractive place to invade.

As noted earlier, at times of crisis the Lord's prophet was nearby (v. 11) to pronounce judgment or, in this case, to rescue his wayward people. Why Elisha was nearby, when all of his previous miracles took place north of the Dead Sea, is not stated. It is possible that the Lord sent him there in advance, as He directed Philip to meet the Ethiopian on the road to Gaza (Acts 8:26). Even though Jehosaphat was the king of Judah (the Southern Kingdom) and almost all of Elisha's ministry was in Israel (the Northern Kingdom), Jehosaphat knew enough about Elisha to know that he truly was a man of God. This could have been either from Elisha's own reputation or simply because Jehosaphat learned that Elisha had been a servant of Elijah, as indicated by the saying about pouring water on Elijah's hands (2 Kin. 3:11).

The reference to music (v. 15) is one of the few places in Scripture where the association is made between music and prophetic utterance (see 1 Sam. 10:5). Why Elisha called for a musician is not stated, but it seems likely that the music was not to induce a trance, as commonly understood, but simply to put the moment in a setting of meditative and reflective communion with God on noble themes.

The destruction ordered on Moab—including commands to spoil fields, stop up wells, and cut down good trees (2 Kin. 3:19)—indicates the Lord's intent for stark judgment on Moab. Such complete destruction contrasts with the style of conquest commanded in Deuteronomy 20, where the Israelites were instructed to preserve resources, particularly fruit trees, in areas they intended to inhabit. The purpose here was not to conquer and settle new territory but to inflict lasting damage on a long-standing enemy. Indeed, the land is arid today largely because of deforestation.

The writer relates the miracle of the water (vv. 16–24) to the time of the morning sacrifice. It would be unusual to state the matter in this way unless the writer wished to convey a spiritual, salvific significance to the timing of the event. God's salvation here is presented with the imagery of both water and sacrifice. Understood in this way, it is not surprising that to the Moabites, the water had the appearance of blood, even if they misunderstood its meaning.

The particular Hebrew word qetsap used in v. 27, sometimes translated as “fury” or “indignation,” refers in the majority of cases to the wrath of God that comes in judgment. How this wrath is to be understood here is not made plain. In one view, this wrath may not be emanating from the Moabites but from God, who brought an end to the battle and put a limit on Israel's further success. It has also been suggested that this wrath refers to the fury of the Moabites against Israel, as indicated by the horrific lengths to which the king went in sacrificing his son in order to attempt to defend his city. In this reading, we understand that the Israelites were so appalled at this action that they withdrew from the siege (v. 27).

Without Elisha, the Israelite confederation had no chance of surviving their long desert trek. Had Jehosaphat not asked for God's direction, Elisha would not have been able to act. While the story ostensibly follows Jehoram, Jehosaphat becomes the key character, despite his repeated, dubious relationships with Israel. He was the one who followed God, asked to consult His true prophet, and lived to witness a victory. Certainly, it was a lesson for him, and it also should have been for Jehoram.

4:1-7. The Widow's Oil. The story of the widow afraid for her future after her husband's death gives us a view of the social structure of the times. A widow was easy prey for anyone who desired to extort her dead husband's wealth, and if she could not meet her dead husband's financial obligations, she could lose her home, her children, or both to pay the debt. This particular widow was in danger of losing her two sons, whom the creditor claimed as his slaves in order to pay a debt. The sons would have to work for the creditor until such time as he considered the debt paid (a situation ripe for abuse) or until the next Jubilee year when all such workers were to be released (Lev. 25:39-41). This arrangement was not supposed to be as restrictive or as severe as slavery—Israelites were not to be bought and sold as slaves, as was permitted with foreigners, and their servitude was not permanent (Lev. 25:39-46).

The widow did not want this for her sons, so she pleaded with Elisha for help. Her husband had been one of the sons, or students, of the prophets (2 Kin. 4:1), and she thought this piece of information might help her case. But Elisha looked past that detail to what she had in her hands—a little oil—and that was what he worked with (v. 2).

This miracle parallels that of Elijah when he went to stay with the Phoenician widow during three years of drought (1 Kin. 17:14-16). Both widows were able to support and maintain their families because of a prophet in their midst. Their acceptance of and respect for the prophet indicated their dependence and reliance on God, and God honored them at a time when the majority of the people around them had rejected God and given their allegiance to Baal instead.

4:8-37. The Woman from Shunem. The small town of Shunem, now known as Sulam on the eastern outskirts of the modern city of Afula, was in the Jezreel Valley about sixteen miles (25.7 km) southwest of the southern tip of the Sea of Galilee and about the same distance from Mount Carmel to the northwest. The town must have been along a route traveled regularly by Elisha for his ministry in the region.

Elisha's question in v. 13 is unusual in that he was apparently anticipating using his political influence to help her rather than performing a miracle. The idea of what should be done for her is recorded as having come from Elisha's servant Gehazi, rather than being an original prophetic insight from the prophet himself. This may give us a glimpse into the role of the prophet, at least in Elisha's case, who sometimes lived in the moment and, through the Spirit of God, reacted to outside information and circumstances as they occurred rather than always from anticipatory insight.

The narrative of the promised son (vv. 14-17) easily brings to mind another such promise, also given in the context of hospitality provided to travelers, with an initial, similarly incredulous reaction from the mother-to-be (Gen. 18). This story is different because the promised son is not later recorded as playing a major role in the history of God's people, as did other promised sons like Isaac, Samson (Judg. 13:3-5), and Samuel (1 Sam. 1:17). However, with this miracle, Elisha demonstrated that he indeed had the spirit that Elijah had, who had also raised a boy back to life (1 Kin. 17:22). The prophetic announcement was fulfilled as Elisha had spoken—the word of God impacted the life of the woman and her husband in a unique way.

The boy's death is commonly attributed to sunstroke (2 Kin. 4:18-20). We are not told why the mother concealed the death from the boy's father. The mother is the major character in how the story is told, and the father's role is incidental. It may be that this was also true in the actual life of the family, at least in relation to raising the son. The father was understandably puzzled at the request for a service animal during the busy harvest, which probably would have caused some inconvenience. The woman's determination to save her son caused her to engage in a demanding a thirty-two-mile (51.5 km) round trip to Carmel and rested entirely on the desperate hope that the prophet could be found there. Her desperation and grief also compelled her to engage in an intimate gesture of importunity toward Elisha that his servant considered inappropriate or offensive (v. 27). Elisha, as Christ did later with many who approached him familiarly, resonated with the woman's grief, whatever the cause, and welcomed her approach and honored her faith.

The story of the boy's resurrection is notable for the process by which Elisha was involved in its accomplishment. As with some other miracles recorded in Scripture, there was a process involved. Elijah prayed seven times at Mount Carmel before the rain came (1 Kin. 18:36-37); Naaman washed seven times in the Jordan before his leprosy was healed (2 Kin. 5:10, 14); Jesus used a two-stage process to heal a man's blindness (Mark 8:23-25). Elisha's instruction for his servant to go on ahead and place his staff on the child raises in the mind of the reader the expectation that that will be the means of the boy's resuscitation (2 Kin. 4:29). But it is only Elisha's direct involvement, and that through a repeated ritual, that resulted in the intended effect (vv. 32-35). It may be that even though Elisha was the intended agent of a profound miracle (the boy had been dead for a considerable period of time), the Lord was using it as a faith-building experience for Elisha as well as the others who witnessed or became aware of the miracle.

The incident of the promised son who then became sick, died, and was resurrected illustrates that the prophetic word had again restored life and wholeness, not nationally, as was so desperately needed, but to an individual as a token of what God can do for all the faithful and willing.

4:38-44. Death in the Pot. Elisha retraced his steps back to Gilgal (near Jericho) and its school of the prophets. A famine had struck the land as a reminder of the broken covenant (Deut. 28:15, 24) and as an echo of the encounter between Elijah and King Ahab (1 Kin. 17:1). The famine showed that Baal, the storm god, was totally powerless and that it was the God of Israel alone who provides rain in its season (Lev. 26:4). When a poisonous plant found its way into the students' stew, Elisha worked a miracle. Elijah had done something similar during a famine when the meager food supplies of a widow were hardly enough to provide for her household (1 Kin. 17:10-16). This time again the Lord provided more than needed (2 Kin. 4:42-44), something echoed later in one of the miracles of Jesus (Matt. 14:13-21). That Elisha supervised the feeding of more than one hundred persons indicates that his prophetic ministry had a greater effect than that of his mentor Elijah.

The miracles performed by Elisha reveal a particular interest in the needy condition of women and reveal a God for whom gender is no barrier to personal, social, and spiritual fulfillment. But the miracles cut deeper. They were about providing food and making the infertile fertile. They were an attack against the claims of Baal to be in charge of the fertility of the land and the people. The one who could make humans and the earth fertile and who could provide food for His servants was the God of Israel. But sadly, the nation was placing its hope on the false claims of Baal and was heading toward disaster.

5:1-27. Naaman the Leper. Naaman was a senior commanding officer of the Syrian army (the nation was called Aram at the time), whose military successes were attributed directly to God (v. 1). It was unclear what his skin condition actually was since the Hebrew word (tsara) used is a generic term that includes rashes, fungal infections, leprosy, psoriasis, and other conditions. The fact that he was still able to associate with people may indicate that the Syrians did not consider the disease to be contagious.

That he had a young girl working in his home was evidence of his success in raids across Israel's border (v. 2). Even though Ahab and Ben-Hadad had formalized a treaty (1 Kin. 20:34), it did not hold and there had been various skirmishes between them. In the narrative, the strong faith of the servant girl from Israel in Naaman's house was also an example of what God had told Elijah on Mount Horeb about the 7,000 who had still not bowed to Baal (1 Kin. 19:18).

The faith of the servant girl is remarkable. That she would honor her captor by suggesting, in good faith, that he visit the prophet of the Lord in Israel (2 Kin. 5:3) indicates that even in the distress and distraction of her captivity, she knew who she was. Despite the apparent benevolent treatment by her captors, she had not lost her identity, and she exemplified what was evident and later reiterated as an important teaching of Scripture: servants and slaves and the otherwise oppressed, even under adverse circumstances, are called to serve their persecutors and captors with good deeds (Prov. 25:21-22; Matt. 5:38-48; Rom. 12:19-21; 1 Pet. 2:20-25).

The response of the king of Israel to Naaman's visit indicates the obtuseness of his mind (2 Kin. 5:7). The request was for a miracle. Obviously, the king had no confidence in his own ability perform miracles, but it did not occur to him to see the possibilities for glory to God by sending Naaman to the one person in the Northern Kingdom who had the widespread reputation of doing so. The king viewed the matter only in the political arena rather than the spiritual realm. Elisha, apparently through prophetic insight, had to intervene in order to rescue the opportunity for good. It is a lesson for any leader, who should always look beyond the immediate reflexive interpretation of a situation to consider what possibilities God might have in mind.

The instruction to wash seven times (v. 10) appears to have been intended to demonstrate to Naaman that one must be diligent and exact in following God's commands. Six times was not enough to ensure the healing nor to test the full measure of Naaman's faith.

Naaman's gift, first offered to the king and then to Elisha, was an enormous sum: 750 pounds (340 kg) of silver (worth today over $150,000), and 150 pounds (38 kg) of gold (worth today over $3 million). It was common in the ancient world to pay the priests of the deity in advance to secure future blessings. That Naaman waited until after the miracle to offer gifts shows two things: first, that he was not inclined to believe that a foreign god would help him (vv. 11-12), and second, that he recognized the different character of Israel's God after the miracle (v. 15). The gift offer came from a grateful heart. Elisha's refusal was intended to convince Naaman that it is not wealth that makes a person whole but his faith in and reliance on God. Naaman obviously had an inaccurate concept of the God of Israel. With this in mind, he had assumed that God and His prophet needed gifts in payment. When he could give nothing, his sense of honor caused him to ask for something that would itself demonstrate his honor and gratitude—two mule-loads of soil (v. 17). His explanation for what seems to us an unusual request was that from that time forward he would only sacrifice to the Lord God. The relationship between his request and his explanation may be interpreted in at least two ways. First, it was commonly thought in the ancient Near East that a god's influence was confined to a geographical location (e.g., 1 Kin. 20:23). Thus, Naaman may have believed that if he took some of the ground where God had displayed His power back to his home, he would be able to worship Him at that new place too. Alternatively, Naaman's strong affirmation of faith may indicate that he considered himself now to be an Israelite and was symbolically claiming his inheritance by taking with him a portion of the land.

Naaman had become a worshiper of the true God. His request for a dispensation when appearing to genuflect to another god presents an interesting use of language. Naaman called that god "Rimmon" (2 Kin. 5:18). There are several occasions in Scripture where the Hebrew language makes a joke or an ironic statement about the meaning of names by employing wordplay—where the same or similar words are used with different meanings (see Gen. 17:17; 18:12-15; 21:6, 9; 26:8 and notes; Dan. 1:7). The actual name of the god is "Ramanu," which means "the thunderer" and is, of course, a reference to Baal, the storm god. Altering the vowels to "Rimmon" changes its meaning to "pomegranate." So the thunderer was turned into a pomegranate. When Naaman used this term, he was probably intentionally confessing faith in the God of Israel while renouncing his former faith in Baal.

The wonderful story turns sour at this point with Gehazi's betrayal (2 Kin. 5:20-27). He dishonored the Lord by taking money from Naaman. Elisha knew what Gehazi had done and told him that Naaman's skin disease would now cling to him and to his descendants forever. That effectively ended Gehazi's career. Although he now had money for olive groves, vineyards, flocks, herds, and servants, he also had what Naaman was prepared to pay a much larger fortune to be rid of. The very thing that made Baal worship attractive—wealth—was now Gehazi's, but at what cost? He had lost his wholeness and his future and became an example of a nation insistent on divorcing itself from God. The story is indeed about two men. One was a non-Israelite who came to know the God of Israel and concluded that there was no god like Him. The other was an Israelite whose association with the prophet gave him high spiritual leadership advantages yet who, like the leaders of the nation, had no respect for the Lord of Israel. The literal leprosy of Naaman would cling to Gehazi, and the metaphorical leprosy of other nations would cling to Israel and would permanently separate them from the Lord. The word of the Lord, spoken through the prophet, healed Naaman and brought judgment on Gehazi and the nation represented by him.

6:1-7. The Lost Ax Head. The story of the lost ax head gives fascinating insights into the person of Elisha and his interpersonal skills. He was obviously very closely involved in the development of a new generation of prophets.

A group of students at the school of the prophets near Jericho shared with Elisha their plan to enlarge the place where he and the students lived. He is portrayed as a loved and respected mentor who provided not only for their education but for their lodging and even for their food as well (4:38–44). It is interesting that the students made the plans and he empowered their vision, rather than Elisha being the one to dictate and micromanage (6:1–2). The presence of this master-teacher was highly valued, and when his students invited him to join their physical labor, he accepted, grateful for every available teaching moment (v. 3).

When one of the students lost a borrowed ax head, Elisha focused on the solution rather than on the cause (v. 6). The retrieval of the ax head was also left to the student—Elisha did not reach out and pick it up, but he asked the student to do it (v. 7). This story illustrates not only what it means to be a successful mentor but also the success of a group trusting in God and heeding the prophetic word in their midst. It also reveals that the prophetic ministry seeks to build up faith among those who, in the midst of national apostasy, are still serving the Lord.

6:8–23. A Banquet for the Enemy. The uneasy peace between Syria (Aram) and Israel was further weakened by the continuing cross-border skirmishes with the Syrian king (see 1 Kin. 20:34). The story of the capture of the Syrian army teaches us several things. First, God can intervene in the most private counsels of His opponents to foil their plans and accomplish His purposes. He knows everything, down to the smallest detail.

Second, and related to the first, God is in complete control of events, even in what appears to us to be the direst crises. The prophetic assertion “Those who are with us are more than those who are with them” (v. 16) has comforted God’s people for millennia. The mental image of the host of the Lord surrounding and protecting his faithful servants gives us a glimpse of the protecting role of the heavenly army in the cosmic battle on earth.

Third, the prophets may sometimes, without blame, use benevolent misdirection to ultimately accomplish goodwill among enemies. Elisha was comically artful in his message to the blinded besiegers at Dothan. They sought him, without success because of their blindness, at Dothan, which was where he really was. But they would find him (when their eyes were opened) in another city (Samaria), which was also correct.

Fourth, God desires His apparent enemies to come to a knowledge of Him and experience His grace. Elisha’s insistence that the captives be treated with kindness and allowed to return home unharmed explicitly anticipated the teaching of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount when he told his followers to do good to their enemies (Matt. 5:44).

6:24—7:20. Siege of Samaria. We do not know the exact time sequence, but the Syrian army was again on the offensive against Israel. Ben-Hadad continued to fulfill the words of the young prophet who had rebuked Ahab for not killing the Syrian king (1 Kin. 20:34, 42). Now he set out to besiege Samaria—about 120 miles (193.1 km) south of the Syrian capital, Damascus. Jehoram’s army had not been able to stop the Syrians or break their siege, and a severe famine was afflicting the besieged city. Famine is one of the covenant curses, and therefore one of the main indicators of the broken covenant (Lev. 26:18–20, 25). The inhabitants of Samaria were compelled by hunger to eat their own (unclean) donkeys (2 Kin. 6:25; see Lev. 11:3) that had presumably died of starvation. The fact that they paid eighty shekels (about two lbs or nearly one kg of silver) for a donkey’s head reveals their desperate situation. To give some idea of that cost, the average income at the time was about one shekel a month. Added to that, fuel for cooking was also at a premium, and all that was left to burn was dove dung, worth five shekels (five months’ wages) for about cup.

More evidence that Israel was experiencing the specific curses of breaking the covenant is provided in the story of Jehoram’s interaction with the two women (2 Kin. 6:26–30). The famine had become so great that mothers were willing to eat their own children, just as had been foretold (Lev. 26:27–29). Jehoram’s reaction to the revolting encounter was similar to his father Ahab’s reaction to an earlier famine: he blamed the prophet of God (1 Kin. 18:17), and the formulation of his intention was similar to Jezebel’s oath to kill Elijah. It exhibited the very kind of stubborn rejection of God that the covenant curses, so clearly evidenced here, were intended to punish. The messenger Jehoram sent to Elisha was a senior army general whose position was similar to Naaman’s in the previous story; he was someone on whom the king depended. The military situation was a far cry from the days when the Syrians were offering David tribute (2 Sam. 8:6). It was a sorrowful reminder of how far Israel had fallen in its rejection of God.

Through prophetic insight, Elisha anticipated the arrival of the messenger, who was refused an audience but to whom Elisha announced both a promise for Samaria and a curse on the unbelieving messenger (2 Kin. 6:32–7:1). The mockery of the messenger was serious because while he was apparently acknowledging the existence of Israel's God, he was denigrating His power. What he did not know or chose to ignore was that the prophetic word defeats the enemies of His people as it is fulfilled within history (7:17–20).

The account of the four lepers carries an element of dark humor and ultimate comedy (vv. 3–11). Their situation was desperate. Upon deciding they had nothing to lose by going to the enemy, they discovered the Lord's deliverance and became the messengers of salvation to those who treated them as outcasts. God's best news is sometimes given first to those who may be viewed by society as of little account. The shepherds of Bethlehem (Luke 2:8–20) and Mary Magdalene in the garden of the resurrection (Luke 24:1–12; John 20:11–18) are similar examples.

The listing of the spoils they found in the Syrian camp is similar to the goods Naaman the Syrian had brought to Elisha to be free of his leprosy. These resources gave this group of lepers a new start in life. The riches of this life are God's to distribute for His purposes, and we are called to share the good news He bestows on us. Those who reject that good news may be crushed by the results of it, as was the officer at the gate (2 Kin. 7:17).

As Elisha had said, the messenger who had disbelieved saw the large quantities of food greatly reduced in value but did not benefit from it because he was killed (vv. 18–20). The word of the Lord spoken through the prophet found fulfillment in judgment against a leader who had forsaken and challenged the Lord. This officer represented a nation that had largely given up on God and had given its allegiance instead to other gods. And yet, when trouble came as a direct result of breaking the covenant with God, they could not cope with the crisis.

The nation had forgotten that the Lord can be trusted in good times and in bad times. Instead, they blamed God for their troubles, charging Him with being inaccessible and venting their wrath on those they knew had a close relationship with Him. But God is good, and He provided not only for the faithful ones but for all those around. They all benefited from a great feast of good things supplied by God's saving love.

8:1–6. The Woman of Shunem Escapes Famine.

It appears that the narrative of vv. 1–2 is retrospective, recalling a number of years previous, when Elisha advised the woman of Shunem to leave the country to escape a famine. The implication seems to be that the famine during the siege of Samaria was only part of that longer famine lasting seven years. This story continues the theme of Elisha's prophetic ministry in the lives of ordinary people. While the stories of his predecessor's ministry focus more on the national spiritual condition of Israel, the stories recorded about Elisha's ministry have a strong focus on the health and well-being of individuals. In this case, it was Elisha's reputation, as reported by Gehazi, that helped the woman, rather than Elisha's direct intervention to solve her problem. Doubtless, when the king learned from Gehazi of the great things Elisha had done for her, it helped him decide that he needed to help her too. While the order of the narratives here is not clear, it seems likely that this story occurred after Gehazi's disgrace in the Naaman incident. If so, we learn that Gehazi still admired his old master and that God was still willing to use Gehazi, greedy and disgraced as he was, as an agent to accomplish His purposes and restore the woman's land. The same can be said of the king, who himself had rejected God. The Lord had not totally abandoned these men. He is not willing that any should die but that all should repent and live (2 Pet. 3:9). God was willing to use them as much as He could to help this woman bring glory to Himself. No one is beyond redemption as long as they live, and God can use anyone as an agent to accomplish His purpose of blessing those who trust in Him.

8:7–15. A New King for Syria. No time frame is given between the fleeing of the Syrian army at the siege at Samaria and the time that Elisha went up to see the sick King Ben-Hadad. The king loaded forty camels with presents and sent one of his senior officers, Hazael, to ask Elisha if he would recover from this illness. It is ironic that when Israel's King Ahaziah was ill, he sent emissaries to the prophets of Baal at Ekron to see whether or not he would recover (2 Kin. 1:1–2). Similarly, Naaman came to Israel with great gifts so that he too might be healed. While God's people ran to pagan prophets, idolaters were seeking out the one true God.

In restoring Elijah after his flight from Jezebel, God commissioned him to anoint a new king for Syria (1 Kin. 19:15–16). The text does not say whether Elijah ever managed to see Hazael, but Elisha got the chance to meet him (2 Kin. 8:9). God predicted that Hazael would be king. This does not mean that God intended Hazael to assassinate the previous king, but just that Hazael was impatient to carry out what he knew to be God's will. His violent action was a denial of the meaning of his own name, "the one who sees God." Instead of seeing or understanding how God would bring about his ascension to the throne, Hazael followed his own ambition and took matters into his own hands.

8:16–24. Jehoram or Joram of Judah (853–841 B.C.). Jehoram of Judah was the son of "good" King Jehoshaphat, but his marriage to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, did not bode well for his reign (v. 18). He is described as one who followed the kings of Israel, especially the house of Ahab, in doing evil in the sight of the Lord. God preserved Judah in order to leave a light burning there and for the sake of the covenant made with David (v. 19). This is an important theme, and one that is repeated on other occasions, for instance, when Jeroboam split the kingdom (1 Kin. 11:36), and when Abijah was preserved despite his apostasy (1 Kin. 15:4). God was not yet ready to give up Judah.

With the weakened ties to God, it was easier for the subdued nations paying tribute to Judah to rebel, and this was exactly what Edom did (2 Kin. 8:20). Jehoram tried to defeat the Edomite army but failed, and his army deserted and fled to their own homes. Edom was never again under the control of Judah, and when the Babylonians conquered Judah and took them into captivity the Edomites were cruel with the Judeans—for which later prophets condemned them (e.g., Obadiah 1:10–14). Emboldened by this rebellion, another vassal state, Libnah, also rebelled (1 Kin. 8:22). The summary statement for Jehoram's reign again refers the reader to the court chronicles of the kings of Judah and indicates that he was buried with his fathers in the city of David (2 Kin. 8:23–24). His son, Ahaziah, replaced him.

8:25–29. Ahaziah of Judah (841 B.C.). The narrative of Ahaziah can be divided into two parts, with this as the first and the second being in 9:27–29. The first part mentions his relationship to Ahab's dynasty. The Hebrew word khatan in 8:27 essentially refers to any relationship by marriage. It has been translated and understood by some to mean specifically "son-in-law" (in which case Ahaziah would have followed in his father's and grandfather's footsteps by marrying into Ahab's family), but the word here could simply mean that he was connected to Ahab's family through his father's marriage into it (v. 27). It is true that since Jehoshaphat's reign there had been peace between Israel and Judah, but at the same time Ahaziah's reign paralleled the idolatrous excesses of the house of Omri, especially of Ahab, in doing evil in the sight of the Lord.

The narrative next describes a battle in which both kings joined forces against the Syrians at Ramoth Gilead (v. 28). A similar battle had been fought a generation earlier, when Ahab and Jehoshaphat were soundly beaten and Ahab was mortally wounded (1 Kin. 22:1–4, 34–35). With this latest battle, the king of Israel (now Jehoram) was wounded, and Ahaziah visited him (2 Kin. 8:29). History seems to have been going around in a circle—as it often does when people cast themselves away from God. It is only in following God that history progresses toward a grand and glorious climax.

9:1–37. Jehu and the End of Jezebel. The anointing of Jehu as king is unique in that the prophet sent his messenger to anoint him and to define Jehu's mission to him. The fact that Jehu was anointed in secret parallels the anointing of David. The significant difference is that Jehu proclaimed himself king immediately after the anointing and did not wait for the Lord to do things at the appropriate time. This may account for the ruthlessness of his action.

Although Jehu may have exceeded God's intentions (see Hos. 1:4), he was God's instrument in bringing the dynasty of Ahab to an end. That the dead body of Joram, Ahab's son, was thrown on the very ground that Ahab had stolen from Naboth (2 Kin. 9:24–26) is a stirring reminder to us that the word of the Lord, whether affirming His deliverance or promising His judgment, will be fulfilled. Jehu's recitation of the prophecy recognized, as God told Elijah (1 Kin. 21), that some of it would be fulfilled, not in Ahab's time, but in that of his son.

Ahaziah did not escape, despite his best efforts. He was shot some distance away, along the road near Ibleam (2 Kin. 9:27). Ibleam is about nine miles (14.5 km) south of Jezreel, and Ramoth Gilead is about forty-five miles (72 km) east of Jezreel. The pursuit of Ahaziah was protracted and deliberate. The narrative in Chronicles states that Jehu's men found Ahaziah hiding in Samaria, and they took him to Jehu, who had him executed (2 Chr. 22:9). The account in Kings says that Ahaziah died in Megiddo, and his body was then returned to Jerusalem to be buried with his fathers (2 Kin. 9:27–28). It has been suggested that the two accounts can be reconciled by acknowledging the possibility that Ahaziah was wounded in Samaria, pursued by Jehu to Megiddo, captured by Jehu's soldiers in Samaria after having fled back there, and brought to Jehu, who had remained in Megiddo, for execution.

When Jezebel heard of Jehu's return, she prepared herself to look her finest and waited for him while watching from an upper-level window. Dressed like a queen and adorned with religious jewelry that would assure her the protection of her gods, she was ready to face her enemy. When she saw Jehu, she mockingly asked if he had come in peace, and called him Zimri, murderer of his master (v. 31). Zimri had killed King Elah, son of Baasha, and had destroyed Baasha's entire household, but his reign had only lasted seven days (1 Kin. 16:15–20). Jezebel was implying that Jehu would not last any longer. The section closes with a reminder of the words of Elijah regarding the details of Jezebel's death and the disposition of her body, carefully noting that the matter was resolved in just the way God said it would be. The word of the Lord was working within the arena of history, accomplishing the divine intent.

10:1—15:7

The Kingdoms' Renewed Hostilities

During the time the dynasty of Jehu ruled over Israel for four generations, the royal line in Judah had almost been snuffed out by Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and the prophet Elisha died after a ministry lasting about sixty years. Despite the state of war resuming between the Northern and Southern Kingdoms, both became richer as a succession of kings brought greater prosperity (and idolatry) to their respective nations.

10:1–36. Jehu of Israel (841–814 B.C.). This chapter is a straightforward recounting of the expeditious and excessive way Jehu began to fulfill his divine mandate for the destruction of Ahab's dynasty. He cleverly arranged that the caretakers of Ahab's sons, who lived in Samaria, be the very ones responsible for the deaths of those in their care. His use of threatening political pressure and brute force quickly won the support of the people of Jezreel in the slaughter of any member of Ahab's family or court in that city. He then moved on to Samaria to complete his work as he saw it. But it appears that he had already exceeded the limits of his God-given authority to wreak judgment on Ahab.

Jehu's meeting with Jehonadab, son of Rechab (vv. 14–16), on the way to Jezreel is important to note. Jehonadab was quite a significant figure in Israelite history and is featured in a later account by Jeremiah. Jeremiah referred to Jehonadab's ("Jonadab" in some versions) group as desert dwellers living in tents and refusing to build houses, plant vineyards or crops, or drink wine (Jer. 35:6–10). It appears that Jehonadab responded positively to the purging of the Baal cult that Jehu was undertaking. He had apparently come to see for himself.

Jehu's cunning was again at work in the slaughter of the prophets of Baal. Under the ruse of zeal for the worship of Baal, he identified all the leaders of the cult and promptly slaughtered them. The temple was then demolished, and the site was desecrated by turning it into a refuse dump or public toilet (2 Kin. 10:27). The specific word used can refer to a latrine or a cesspool. In this way Jehu eliminated Baal in Israel (v. 28).

However, Jehu's zeal against the fertility cult of Baal did not extend to the worship of the golden calves Jeroboam had set up at Bethel and Dan (1 Kin. 12:28–29). That worship, though it used forbidden idols in the conduct of its rituals, still had pretensions of being directed to Yahweh, the true God of Israel, because the nation had strayed so far in their understanding of what true worship was. Thus, despite Jehu's vigorous and violent actions to cleanse Israel of the worship of false gods, he failed in his obligation to end false worship of the true God. The spiritual lesson we can learn from this applies both personally and corporately. Our zeal for reform against obvious wrong can create false confidence and self-satisfaction that blind us to other commonly accepted, and equally dangerous, impediments to our relationship with God. Despite Jehu's failings in this regard, God commended him for bringing the house of Ahab to an end and promised him a son on the throne to the fourth generation. Jehu's was the most enduring dynasty of the Northern Kingdom, and Jehu was the only northern king who is described as having made any attempt to fulfill God's purposes. For him, that purpose was to bring justice to the family of Naboth for the atrocious way in which Ahab and Jezebel had confiscated Naboth's property after arranging for his death (1 Kin. 21:13–16). Jehu's destruction of Ahab's dynasty was a judgment of God and a reminder that God ultimately settles the score of all the injustices that the innocent have suffered throughout history.

However, it was also the case that through Hosea, the word of the Lord made it clear that the bloodshed at Jezreel was much more than God had asked for, so there would be a price to pay (Hos. 1:4). Jehu's dynasty ended in bloodshed, just like Omri's. Zechariah, the fourth and last member of Jehu's dynasty, was murdered in Samaria after only a six-month reign (2 Kin. 15:8-10). This was similar to Jehu's assassination of the last reigning monarch of Omri's line (9:24).

The final description of Jehu's reign outlines the territories that he lost to Hazael of Aram (Syria) because Jehu disregarded God's covenant and slavishly followed in the footsteps of Jeroboam's apostasy (10:31). This was also a fulfillment of Elisha's prophecy concerning Hazael (8:12). As a result, Jehu lost all the territory on the east side of the Jordan (10:32-33)—one of the covenant curses was loss of land (Deut. 28:25, 33, 63). The account of the twenty-eight-year reign of Jehu comes to an end with the usual concluding formula of his burial in Samaria, a reference to the chronicles of the kings for more information, and the naming of the son who replaced him (2 Kin. 10:34-36).

11:1-16. Athaliah of Judah (841-835 B.C.). It is not only the Northern Kingdom that suffered the wholesale loss of its leaders; the kingdom of Judah suffered the same fate under Athaliah, who was the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, widow of Jehoram (son of Jehosaphat, king of Judah), and mother of Ahaziah, whom Jehu had killed.

Though Athaliah is the antagonist in this story, another woman plays a history-changing, positive role. Jehosheba was the sister of Azariah. Whether she herself was also a daughter of Athaliah is not made clear. Athaliah's wickedness, worthy of her parents, was evident in her attempted assassination of all the heirs to the throne. We are left to wonder how Jehosheba was able to hide Joash at the time of the slaughter. One can only admire her resourcefulness in maintaining the secret for so long (vv. 2-3). It seems likely that Jehosheba's standing as a king's daughter, a king's sister, and the wife of the priest Jehoiada gave her more connections and resources to accomplish her ruse than would have been available to the dead king's widow and actual mother of the child. Jehosheba's action reminds us of the resourcefulness of another woman of Scripture who worked to save a future leader from death by hiding him in the rushes of the Nile (Ex. 2:1-3). Whether by familial reflex, political judgment, or spiritual conviction, or perhaps all three, Jehosheba managed, in a moment of desperate national crisis, to preserve the Davidic line against the invasive machinations of the one remaining individual element of Ahab's dynasty whom Jehu had not killed—Athaliah. It is interesting to reflect on the role of these two women in the lineage of Christ. One, Athaliah, as the mother of Ahaziah, became, in spite of her attempts to destroy that lineage, a direct ancestor of Christ. The other, Jehosheba, who was not directly of the same lineage, worked courageously to preserve it.

The narrative does not explain why Jehoiada waited until Joash was seven years old before staging a coup against Athaliah. Possible reasons include: (1) the presumption that it is easier for a populace to imagine as king a seven-year-old boy than an infant or toddler; or (2) it took time for the baleful effects of Athaliah's oppressive rule to become apparent to the military leaders whose support would be necessary to make the coup successful. In any event, the people and the military leadership were ready, and Jehoiada's detailed organization worked exactly as planned. Some experts have explained that the military contingent was supplied with weapons from the temple to avoid rousing the premature interest or expectation that was likely to occur if other weapons were brought to the event. The narrative doesn't explain why a Sabbath was chosen, but we can assume that it was also to further reduce suspicion that anything momentous was about to occur. It could also be that having the coronation on a Sabbath would add, in retrospect, to the significance of the event. Restoring the Davidic line gave promise of a restoration of the Mosaic covenant, and the Sabbath itself was perhaps the most notable sign of that covenant. It would be a perfect combination of salvific symbolism.

The inauguration process was in fact divided into two parts: first, the coronation, which took place in the inner temple court, and then the enthronement, which took place in the palace. More symbolism was invoked by having the new king stand by one of the pillars of the temple. This act, the significance of which was apparently understood well enough by the people to be considered a royal custom, is seen again in the story of Josiah (2 Kin. 23:3), when he called the nation to renew the covenant after the long, dark years of Manasseh's rule. Jehoiada's success in bringing about this reform, made possible by his wife's earlier wise and courageous act, brought a final end to the dynastic degradation of Ahab and gave Judah one more chance to fulfill the Davidic promise.

The fact that there is no summary statement about the reign of Athaliah suggests that she was not accepted as one of the “kings” in the line of David—which of course she was not.

11:17–12:21. Joash or Jehoash of Judah (835–796 B.C.). Little is said about Joash in his early years apart from his desire to refurbish the temple. Under the influence of Jehoiada, the high priest, he did what was right in the Lord’s estimation (12:2). Joash began his reign at the age of only seven (11:21), so it was to some degree inevitable that he would follow someone much older, such as Jehoiada. But when Jehoiada died, the leaders of Judah convinced Joash to go back to the worship of the fertility cult; and Baal worship was reintroduced (2 Chr. 24:17–18). The fact that the high places were not taken away sent a bad signal (2 Kin. 12:3). The same was said of Asa four generations earlier (1 Kin. 15:14). Asa gathered up all the treasures of his kingdom and sent them to the king of Syria (Aram) to pay him to fight against the Northern Kingdom. That opened up the floodgates of unwanted attention from the warlike Arameans, who would continue to plague both Israel and Judah for the next one hundred years until the Assyrians gained the ascendancy. Joash did the same as Asa by using the palace and temple treasuries to persuade the Syrians not to attack Jerusalem (2 Kin. 12:18).

An example of Joash’s inexperience in his early years is the way he organized the reparation of the temple. He made the priests responsible for collecting the money and using it for repairs (v. 5). Years later, in his twenty-third year, he realized that the temple had not yet been repaired. So he called the priests together and asked about this problem. Since they did not answer, one can presume there had been a culture of misappropriation, apathy, and compromise among them. At the king’s insistence, the priests agreed to collect no further money and not to be involved in the work of repairing the temple (vv. 7–8). Joash’s suggestion of a wooden chest to collect public contributions, together with the careful way in which it was counted, bagged, and paid to the tradesmen (vv. 9–16), showed that Joash had matured as a leader.

He also made clear that financial resources would only be used for the work of repairing the temple (vv. 13–14). After the work was complete, the money left over could then be used to obtain vessels of gold and silver for the temple (2 Chr. 24:14). The persons involved in the work of repairing the temple were so trustworthy that no account was required from them (2 Kin. 12:15). This was in obvious contrast to the behavior of the priests.

As noted above, Joash apostatized into idolatry after Jehoiada died, and 2 Chronicles 24:25 indicates that Joash was assassinated by his servants because of his murder of Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada (as well as possibly his brothers—the Hebrew refers to Jehoiada’s “sons,” but some consider this to be a copyist’s error—cf. the LXX), because Zechariah prophesied against Joash.

13:1–9. Jehoahaz of Israel (814–798 B.C.). When Joash was collecting money in a wooden chest to repair the temple, a new king was coming to the throne in the Northern Kingdom: Jehoahaz, son of Jehu. He, like all his predecessors, supported the state religion established by Jeroboam I (v. 2). Consequently, God sent Hazael and later his son Ben-Hadad, kings of Syria, to oppress Israel (v. 3). The oppression was so comprehensive that the northern army was decimated, leaving only fifty in the cavalry, ten chariots, and 10,000 infantry (v. 7), compared to the 2,000 chariots and 10,000 soldiers the Assyrian King Shalmaneser III captured in the battle of Qarqar (854/853 B.C.).

The oppression that the Arameans (Syrians) inflicted upon Israel sent Jehoahaz pleading to God for relief (vv. 4–5). The narrative in Kings follows the pattern that is found in the accounts in the book of Judges: when the people descended into idolatry, God sent an oppressor; when the people repented and prayed for relief, God sent a deliverer. The text does not specify the identity of the deliverer. It could have been the Assyrian King Adad-nirari III, whose conquests into Syria rendered it powerless, or, after the pattern set in the book of Judges, the deliverer could have been a prophet like Elisha or one of his students.

13:10–25. Jehoash or Joash of Israel (798–782 B.C.). The reign of Joash is briefly summarized by the observation that he did evil in the Lord’s estimation (v. 11). There was little to say about a life wasted in rebellion against the Lord. It was during the reign of Joash that Elisha died. King Joash visited the aged and sick Elisha and recited the statement Elisha made to Elijah before the latter was taken into the heavens in a “chariot of fire” (v. 14; cf. 2:11–12). It would appear that the king was expecting a chariot to come for Elisha too.

His interaction with the aged prophet may be read with irony and pathos. He came to pay his respects to a man whose leadership he had obviously rejected. We do not know the motivation for the visit. It could have been genuine guilt, or a facile and desperate effort for some kind of deliverance from the Syrians. But even then, the Lord was willing to show His continuing love and concern for a people who had so steadfastly rejected Him. The exercise of shooting the arrows was apparently intended to show Joash God's willingness to favor Israel but also to symbolically demonstrate their leader's characteristic weakness to follow through until the Lord's work was finished. Joash's limited striking of the arrows, strongly rebuked by Elisha (13:18–19), was an effective parable to show his own weakness in accepting the help of the Lord to do what was necessary to achieve ultimate victory.

Probably soon after that conversation, Elisha died and was buried. Sometime later his bones were disturbed when a squad of Moabite raiders interrupted a funeral. The alarmed locals quickly pushed the body into the closest tomb, Elisha's, and before they could escape from the raiders, the corpse of the man came into contact with Elisha's remains and came back to life (vv. 20–21). The story serves to reaffirm the ministry of Elisha as a man of God. But perhaps it also suggests that the God who can raise the dead is also able to revive a dead nation if only they would listen to the message of His dead prophet.

The hardship that followed came from the Syrians (v. 22), but it was tempered by God's compassion and His faithfulness to the covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (v. 23). This divine compassion and faithfulness was manifest when Joash won three significant military victories against the new king of Syria, just as Elisha had prophesied before his death (v. 25). The word of the Lord remained active among His people in spite of their sin.

14:1–22. Amaziah of Judah (796–767 B.C.).

Amaziah came to the throne when he was twenty-five years old, following the assassination of his father Joash (not to be confused with Jehoash/Joash of Israel). Evidently he had a character similar to that of his father: doing the right things but lacking a deep, inner conviction (v. 3). That the right he did was not as his ancestor David had done comports well with the parallel description in the account in 2 Chronicles 25, which says he was not wholehearted in his right doing. These two descriptions, when combined, give us a scriptural understanding of the Davidic ideal of a strong, unhesitating, wholehearted commitment to the Lord. Joash's unfaithfulness is seen in the continuation of the very popular high places and in the worship of the gods he captured from the Edomites (2 Chr. 25:14). The rationale for only executing those directly involved in the assassination and not their families (2 Kin. 14:5–6) was the stipulation in the Mosaic law that fathers were not to be put to death for the wrongs of their children, and children were not to be put to death for the wrongs of their fathers (Deut. 24:16).

Amaziah then attempted to regain some of the territories that used to be part of the kingdom but had been lost to various raiders as divine judgments against a protracted series of apostasies. He successfully won back Sela, a small city on the northern border of Edom, about eighteen miles (29 km) southeast of the southern end of the Dead Sea (2 Kin. 14:7).

The events of Amaziah's reign are described in more detail in 2 Chronicles 25. Of those mentioned in this passage, it should be noted that some interpreters suspect that Amaziah had proposed a marriage alliance between his son and the daughter of Jehoash, king of Israel. When that proposal was rejected, this theory holds, Amaziah prepared for war and Jehoash sent his mocking message to Amaziah in response to the proposed alliance and his overconfidence after having just defeated the Edomites. As the Chronicles account details, that overconfidence was on full display in Amaziah's inexplicable and stupidly brazen (by our logic) honoring of the very gods of the people he had just destroyed.

A defeat in the war with Israel resulted in yet another plunder of Jerusalem, major damage to the wall, and Amaziah's capture and long-term imprisonment. While he was away, the people of Judah chose his son Azariah (Uzziah) as his replacement in a technical, if not meaningful, coregency. When Amaziah was released upon the death of the king of Israel, his return to Judah and his apparent resumption of kingly duties alongside, or instead of, the son who had been selected in his place, was not well received, leading to his assassination. Thus ends the sad saga of a king who, nevertheless, is to be remembered as one who did what was right in the eyes of the Lord.

Both Amaziah and his father started well but were spiritually weak, bowing to the pressures of popular culture and worshipping gods who were unable to protect them.

14:23–29. Jeroboam II of Israel (793–753 B.C.).

The rise of Jeroboam II was a new day for Israel. His long and fruitful reign was due in part to the presence of Assyria that kept Syria occupied and away from Israelite territory. But behind the historical events was the hand of the Lord, who appointed Jeroboam II to save Israel from the long-term affliction they had been suffering (vv. 26–27). This was despite the fact that Jeroboam II did not do anything to change the course of evil that Jeroboam I had institutionalized in Israel. His reign was only characterized as evil (v. 24). The Lord was still fighting for the affection of His people.

One impressive accomplishment of Jeroboam II was that he restored to Israel the entire territory east of the Jordan River (v. 25). The prophet Jonah was a great supporter of Jeroboam II, which probably explains why the prophet did not want to go to Nineveh. He may have thought that assisting the Assyrians would hinder the great work Jeroboam was doing in restoring the former glory of Israel. Jeroboam's capture of the territories of the Syrian cities of Damascus and Hamath, which were previously under the control of Judah, was a reminder of the glorious days of Solomon, sadly eroded by the unfaithfulness of the nation. The admission in the narrative that God did not want to blot out the name of Israel from under heaven (vv. 27) adds a very distinct flavor to this particular era. Although the nation was not interested in the Lord and would rather worship Baal, God was not interested in destroying it. God had not yet given up on His people.

15:1–7. Azariah or Uzziah of Judah (792–740

B.C.). The fact that the narrative of Kings devotes only seven verses to Uzziah is not a reflection on his ability and effectiveness as a king but on his spiritual shallowness. He did the right things, but he was not brave enough to touch the entrenched traditions of the syncretistic high places (v. 4). No other king reigned as long as Uzziah—fifty-two years (v. 2). With a weakened Syria and a weakening Assyria, both Northern and Southern Kingdoms enjoyed a period of prosperity not seen since the time of Solomon. Uzziah won back all the land of which the Philistines had regained control (2 Chr. 26:6–7); he accepted tribute from a number of foreign lands; he fortified Jerusalem; he fortified and provided new water supplies for the main areas of agriculture; and he modernized the army and cultivated new military technologies. He was admired and respected throughout the entire region.

However, when he was the strongest, his weaknesses appeared. In line with the normal practice of ANE royalty, he elevated himself to the point that he felt justified going into the temple and offering incense on the altar in the Holy Place (2 Chron. 26:16). It is notable, and perhaps a credit to Uzziah's heretofore faithful leadership, that a large contingent of priests had the courage to confront him for his wrong action. It is easy to imagine that in other times, thoroughly wayward kings would have so completely intimidated the priesthood that such an action would not have been challenged. But like David, who numbered the people against the counsel of Joab (2 Sam. 24:3–4), Uzziah was too proud to back down. It should also be noted that the Lord was obviously still active in the temple and jealous of His prerogatives. In other words, the generally good leadership of Uzziah up to this point had created an environment where God was actively present, and he was furious when he was confronted by this large group of priests and told that he had overstepped the limits of his authority. In the moment of his rage, leprosy broke out on his face and he was taken out of the temple by eighty very determined priests (2 Chron. 26:17–20). The fact that he was in isolation for the rest of his life (2 Kings 15:5) suggests that this form of skin disease was indeed the dreaded disease now known as Hansen's Disease. Consequently, his son Jotham served as coregent until his death.

15:8—17:41*Last Days of the Northern Kingdom

There were only six more kings of Israel before the nation came to an end, and four of them were assassinated. Jehu's dynasty ended when Zechariah was assassinated, and the kings that followed each had single-reign dynasties except for Menahem, whose son succeeded him. The nation finally met its end when the Assyrians defeated them, took the people into exile, and repopulated the land with subjugated peoples from other regions.

15:8–15. Zechariah of Israel (753–752 B.C.) and Shallum of Israel (752 B.C.). Zechariah was from the fourth generation of Jehu's sons. According to the word of the Lord, he would be the last one (10:28–31). Zechariah's reign lasted only six months before he was assassinated in a palace plot (15:10). His reign is summarized like all the others: he did what was evil in the Lord's estimation, and he practiced the sins of Jeroboam. His sad end is yet another indication of the intimate connection there seems to be between a people's faith and their success. A bad king appears to be a reflection of the bad society from which he comes, and the short reign of a king is usually indicative of social upheaval. After a few decades of prosperity, it now appears that Israel was entering a period of turmoil and hardship. In the death of Zechariah, the biblical writer recognized the fulfillment of the word of the Lord that He spoke to Jehu (v. 12).

Shallum may have been one of Zechariah's generals who probably did not have the full support of his colleagues when he assassinated the king. It is uncertain whether Jabesh was his father or his hometown; but either way, Shallum probably was from Gilead in the tribal lands of Gad if Shallum and Menahem were from the same tribe, and Menahem's father's name is a reflection of the tribe's name. His reign only lasted one month (v. 13). There is no value judgment on his reign, perhaps because it was too short. More space is given to the one who plotted against him: Menahem.

15:16–22. Menahem of Israel (752–742 B.C.).

It appears that Menahem was from the same tribe as Shallum, and he probably eliminated Shallum because he was working against his own clan. Menahem's father was Gadi, which is possibly an indication of a link to the tribe of Gad. Menahem was much more successful and enjoyed more support than Shallum. It is not clear from the text whether Menachem attacked Tiphseh (v. 16) just before or just after he ascended the throne. Tiphseh was the northernmost point of Solomon's realm (1 Kin. 4:24) and was the site of a major crossing of the Euphrates River. Its modern name is Dibseh, and it is located in modern Syria. The fact that Israel's army was so far from home suggests that the prosperity and expansion brought in by Jeroboam II still inspired their nationalistic hopes.

During Menahem's reign the Assyrian king attacked, devastating the Northern Kingdom financially. The king who attacked was Tiglath-Pileser III, also known as Pul. Assyrian kings usually had two names: their Assyrian name and a Babylonian one. Tiglath-Pileser III was also known by his Babylonian name, Pulu, and the author of Kings shortened it to Pul (cf. 1 Chr. 5:26).

Menahem took the required money from the wealthy. If each of the super-rich (literally in Hebrew, "the mighty of wealth") were taxed 50 shekels of silver (2 Kin. 15:20), about 1.25 pounds (0.5 kg), which means there were nearly 57,000 of them in Israel—an indication of the financial strength that was reached under Jeroboam II. But this desperate measure also hints at the nation's approaching end. The summary of Menahem's reign characterizes it as evil and not departing from the sins of Jeroboam I (v. 18). It refers to further records of his accomplishments elsewhere and that he was buried with his fathers. His son Pekahiah replaced him on the throne.

15:23–31. Pekahiah (742–740 B.C.) and Pekah of Israel (752–732 B.C.). Pekahiah only reigned two years before being killed in the citadel of the palace by another influential Gileadite, Pekah.

Pekah's reign seems to have been quite long and stable, lasting twenty years—an indication that he had more popular support than his predecessors. However, he too followed his predecessors in maintaining the evil of Jeroboam's idolatry.

In his days the imperial ambitions of Assyria's Tiglath-Pileser III led to the capture of large areas of Israel (v. 29). First Ijon was captured, a city at the far north of the country, about thirty-five miles (56.3 km) north of the Sea of Galilee, then Abel-Beth-Maachah fell, about twenty-six miles (41.8 km) south of that. Hazor was the next city to fall. It was an important military outpost about nine miles (14.5 km) north of the Sea of Galilee, set on a ridge with a commanding view of the entire area. This was a major blow to Israel's military. The Assyrians kept pressing south to Kadesh, on the southwestern shores of the Sea of Galilee, effectively securing control of the entire region of Galilee. They then secured the region of Gilead (the home region of Pekah). Mentioned in the list of captured towns and regions (v. 29) is Janoah, in the territory of Samaria and only about twelve miles (19.3 km) southeast of Samaria. Janoah was on the west side of the Jordan River and the newly captured region of Gilead was on the eastern side. Israel was becoming increasingly hemmed in.

Part of the imperial policy of Assyria was to uproot a people and scatter them in other areas of its empire, replacing them with foreigners gathered from across the empire. This seems to have been intended to break national and tribal identity and solidarity. It meant that the tie between the tribes of Israel and their inheritance in the promised land was now severed—they were exiled and replaced by foreigners. Israel had less than ten more years before this process was completed and the Northern Kingdom ceased to exist. In 722 B.C. the Assyrians would return and complete what had just begun.

15:32—16:20. Jotham (750–732 B.C.) and Ahaz of Judah (735–716 B.C.). Jotham came to the throne just two years after his northern counterpart Pekah. Jotham was another Judean king who did what was expedient in following God, even to the point of embellishing the temple complex, but he did not remove the high places (v. 35). The major event during his reign was the buildup of military tensions with the Northern Kingdom, which had renewed its ties with Syria (v. 37). This tension reached its climax in the reign of Jotham's son Ahaz, who probably reigned for a few years as coregent with his father before his death (v. 38).

Whereas Jotham tried to make things look good, Ahaz cut the ties to God and went the way of the kings of the Northern Kingdom. In former times, when the people's corruption sank to a lower level, God sent judgment on them in the form of foreign invaders. The same pattern followed Ahaz's apostasy—this time the invaders were an alliance between Israel and Aram (Syria; 16:5).

The text makes clear that the primary motivation for Ahaz's promotion of the worship of other gods, despite the "good king" legacy of his father and grandfather, was of his own apostate volition and in admiration of the degenerate worship practices in the Northern Kingdom. More of his open disdain for the faith of his fathers is recorded in Isaiah 7. That narrative describes how he disdained the promises of God to rescue him from the invasion and instead chose to rely on an alliance with Assyria. Thus, some of his actions in changing the rituals at the temple and some of its architecture, as recorded in 2 Kings 16:10–18, may also have been politically motivated. His apparent appreciation for the design of the altar he saw in Damascus, where he met the Assyrian king, and his arrangements for erecting a copy in the temple in Jerusalem may have been part of his plan to show obeisance to Tiglath-Pileser for his help against the Arameans. The text clearly states that his change of the royal entryway to the temple was done for that purpose (v. 18). Historians have noted that Assyria made it a matter of policy to require subordinate peoples to pay homage to their overlord's favorite deities. Whether that was exactly the dynamic operating here is not explicit, but certainly Ahaz was not resisting the pattern.

The brazen nature of Ahaz's apostasy is evident in his personal involvement in the offering of sacrifices (vv. 12–13). That was the very act that God had punished by striking his grandfather, Uzziah, with leprosy (2 Chron. 26:17–20).

The narrative books of the Bible present many cases such as this where God's professed people seem willfully indifferent to the explicit lessons from the past about reward and punishment, and blessings and curses. It is a stark and sobering reminder to readers of today, having no claim to evident moral superiority, to beware of engaging in the same folly. Ahaz's reign proved to be very costly—it drew the attention of Assyria to Israel and Syria, resulting in the death of the Syrian king and the scattering of the inhabitants of Damascus. This was a stark indication of what would happen not just to Israel but to Judah as well. Assyrian worship practices were now imposed upon the kingdom of Judah, which not only reduced their faith to the level of the dominant culture, but also put the entire nation, and its messianic future, in jeopardy.

17:1–6. Hoshea of Israel (732–722 B.C.). Hoshea was the last of the kings of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. His reign was characterized by the intriguing description of him doing evil, but not like his predecessors (v. 2). The narrative follows with a description of the incursions of Shalmaneser V, successor to Tiglath-Pileser III of Assyria. Hoshea used the opportunity of Assyrian political transition and instability to ally himself with Egypt, hoping for the Egyptians to reassert some of their former glory and free the Israelites from the Assyrian yoke. In the ANE the transition of power from one king to the next often spurred attempts by a number of vassal nations to try to regain independence from their overlords, but this backfired for Hoshea.

The account in Kings mentions the name So, the Hebrew version of an Egyptian name that is difficult to connect with any specific pharaoh. It may possibly be Osorkon IV (730 to c.a. 715 B.C.), who ruled from his capital at Tanis over the eastern delta region bordering the promised land, or it may be a high official of that time. Isaiah's condemnation of Israel's reliance on Tanis (using the Hebrew version of its name, Zoan; Is. 19:11–13; 30:1–5), which was the northern capital of Egypt at this time, supports either of these options. However, Hoshea miscalculated the resolve and military capacity of both the powerful Assyrians and the weakened Egyptians. The new Assyrian king was greatly angered when he discovered Hoshea's plot. Shalmaneser V reacted swiftly, both to punish Israel and to minimize Egypt's influence in the region. Hoshea was taken prisoner (2 Kin. 17:4).

Shalmaneser V now swept through Israel besieging Samaria (v. 5). The narrative in Kings recounts that the siege took three years, which is testament either to the very effective fortifications of the city or that Shalmaneser V died and was replaced by another, which caused another period of instability. Records of the time state that both Shalmaneser V and Sargon II (his successor) were responsible for deporting the inhabitants of Samaria. But it was Sargon who claimed that he broke the siege. When Samaria fell, its people were scattered across the northwestern reaches of the Assyrian empire—Halah, by the Habor River, Gazan, and the cities of the Medes (v. 6). These were towns and territories located in what are now the Kurdish regions of eastern Turkey and Armenia.

17:7–23. Rationale for the Destruction of Israel.

Following the description of the windup of the nation of Israel, there is an extended explanation why such a drastic action occurred. The people sinned against the Lord, who had freed them from the bondage of Egypt, by giving their allegiance to other gods (v. 7). Following this brief introductory statement, the narrative unpacks a litany of wrongs. First, they patterned their life after other nations (v. 8). The Hebrew word khuqqah—variously rendered as “statutes,” “practices,” or “customs”—refers to appropriate behaviors that respected the boundaries of personal conduct, and it has a religious rather than a legal focus. The term also contains an element of divine promise—the undergirding principle that sustains the covenant. Instead of being in harmony with the covenant, the Israelites were more concerned about being in conformity with the surrounding cultures, even if that meant violating their corporate conscience and identity and abandoning their God. This was rendered even more distasteful since it was the very nations that God drove out of the promised land—because of their crimes against humanity—that the covenant people were trying to emulate.

Next, they secretly did things against the Lord that were not right (v. 9). The text specifies these behaviors as their construction of numerous shrines in forests, fields, cities, and hilltops, setting up the trappings of worship borrowed from the surrounding nations. These included ritual stone slabs or columns (both have been found by archaeologists), wooden representations of the fertility goddess (the Asherah poles or pillars; v. 10), offering sacrifices and incense (it seems that anybody could do this without the need of specially consecrated priests), and serving idols—all of which God had warned them not to do (vv. 11–12).

But above all, the nation of Israel spurned the appeals and warnings from numerous prophets and seers. The word of the Lord came to the people through these prophets, but they did not listen. The prophets’ common theme had been warnings to turn from their evil ways and to observe God’s prescribed principles (v. 13). These stipulations cover the code of moral behavior and the obligations of the covenant, both couched in a relationship with God. However, the people persistently refused to cooperate, and each succeeding generation chose to remain committed to the rebellion of the previous generations. They rejected all that God tried to offer them and became instead firm followers of the idols of the nations that God had specifically charged them to drive from the land because of their idolatry and crimes against humanity (vv. 15–16). One of these crimes was the practice of burning their babies in the fire as sacrifices. Together with this, they also became involved in witchcraft and taking notice of omens, selling themselves (like prostitutes) to do evil and provoke God (v. 17).

Since Israel was so intent on copying the nations in every aspect, God gave them the same fate. None of the surrounding nations of that time exist today as a nation, and their gods are only found in history books. The ten tribes of the Northern Kingdom were to have a similar end (vv. 18, 20). However, Judah was not left out of this. They too copied Israel (v. 19). Their “lamp” (1 Kin. 11:36; 15:4; 2 Kin. 8:19) was kept burning so that God could keep His promise of the coming Messiah. If Judah at least was not preserved, there could not be the Messiah as God had promised His people.

Because of a deep-seated rebellion in the houses of both Judah and Israel, the original united kingdom was torn apart. Israel’s first king, Jeroboam I, drove Israel away from God (17:21). Each successive generation of Israelites followed the pattern set by Jeroboam, until Israel was removed from its land and scattered across Assyrian lands. God’s response to Israel’s apostasy is summarized in v. 20. Moses foretold this and described the land as vomiting out its inhabitants if they rejected God (Lev. 18:24–28). The summary of the sins of the nation closes by saying that the Lord removed Israel away from Him just as He had foretold by His prophets (2 Kin. 17:23). Their exile was not the result of the religious or military superiority of their enemies. It was the powerful fulfillment of the word of the Lord in judgment against a rebellious people.

17:24–41. Israel's Repopulation. True to Assyrian tradition, people were uprooted from a number of Babylonian cities and transplanted in the land of Israel (v. 24). This helped to break the resolve of the two subdued people-groups (Assyria controlled both Babylon and Israel) and to foster greater cohesion and loyalty for the Assyrian regime. The narrative specifically mentions the towns of Cuthah (Kutha), which was about twenty-five miles (40.2 km) north-east of Babylon, Ava (Ivah) and Sepharvaim, which were close together (near the ancient city of Accad and the modern city of Fallujah)—all of which were on or near the Euphrates River. Hamath, about 130 miles (209.2 km) north of Damascus, was on the Orontes River in modern Syria. The inhabitants of these cities were then transplanted into Israel's deserted cities and the nation was renamed Samaria, becoming one of the provinces of Assyria (v. 24).

The people sent to repopulate Israel did not know God's mishpat (v. 26)—variously rendered in this context as “custom,” “rituals,” “what the god of the land requires,” and so forth. The most basic meaning is “judgments,” and in Israel's case refers to issues of social justice and the way they needed to care for the needy (orphans and widows) and destitute (Deut. 10:18; Is. 1:17; Jer. 22:3). Without that religious background, the foreigners would not be able to please God.

One priest was allowed to return home to teach the new inhabitants. He established his base in Bethel, the site of one of the golden calves that Jeroboam established (1 Kin. 12:28–33) and the former location of the wilderness sanctuary (2 Kin. 17:28). It is nearly certain that he taught the new inhabitants the hybrid religion of Israel that saw God represented as a golden calf. Each people group brought their own gods with them and their traditional worship forms as well (v. 29). They served both their own idols and the God of Israel.

In commenting on these aberrations, the narrative points to the genuine form of worship that God intends His people to follow. Rituals are fine as long as they are not disjointed from a life grounded on God's principles (v. 34). True religion impacts the whole person and the whole of life's experience; God's version of religion was based on a commitment to the covenant (v. 35). However, being in a covenant relationship brings responsibilities. The human part was to avoid worshipping other gods and worshipping with thanksgiving the One who freed His people from slavery and oppression. If God is kept as a close and precious companion, there is no need to fear any evil (v. 39).

Right up to the time of the writing of Kings, the new people of the province of Samaria also served their idols and passed on the rituals to each successive generation (v. 41).

18:1—25:30

THE SOUTHERN KINGDOM

The book of 2 Kings concentrates now on the last eight kings of the Southern Kingdom of Judah. Only Hezekiah and Josiah are described as doing what was right in the sight of the Lord, while the other six kings followed the idolatrous pattern set for them by the northern kings.

18:1—20:21

Hezekiah Reigns

Hezekiah had the courage to break a national tradition of tolerating the high places and the custom of venerating Moses's bronze serpent. He reclaimed territory lost to the Philistines and, facing the threat of a vast Assyrian army, placed his trust in God. His spectacular successes were blunted by two moments of weakness. First, he used gold and silver from the temple and palace to bribe the Assyrians into a peace deal. Second, when visited by Babylonian dignitaries in response to his miraculous healing, he chose self-glorification.

18:1–12. Hezekiah Ascends the Throne (716–687 B.C.). Verses 3–5 state that there was no other king like Hezekiah, who alone acted like his ancestor David. A similar statement is made concerning Josiah, but there are different emphases: Hezekiah's trust is highlighted in the former, and Josiah's adherence to the law in the latter. He was the first king to do something about the shrines and high places that Solomon had first popularized at the end of his reign. Hezekiah wasted no time in breaking and burning the stone and wooden objects of the fertility cult that cluttered each of the shrines and high places, effectively destroying them. He broke into pieces the bronze serpent made by Moses (v. 4; Num. 21:5–9). Its name, nekhushstan, is a play on the words for “serpent” and “bronze” and would have been understood by some as the healing serpent god of the ancient world and by others in a derogatory way as “that bronze thing.”

Hezekiah is praised above all of the kings of Judah for the level of his trust in God and his faithfulness to the covenant (2 Kin. 18:5–6). He was not hampered by the curses of the covenant as other kings were. Hezekiah was therefore able to free himself from Assyrian control and to regain control of both the cities and the agricultural lands of Philistia (v. 8). The next narrative (vv. 9–11) recaps the last days of the Northern Kingdom (cf. 17:5–6), providing a rationale for the drastic measures that God took (18:12; cf. 17:7–23, 33–40).

18:13–16. Assyria Invades Judah. As noted earlier, Ahaz's unwise interactions with the Assyrians inevitably attracted their attention to the possibilities of profitable conquest in the broader regions of the Holy Land, particularly in Judah. About twenty years later, the armies of Sennacherib, the Assyrian king, were outside the walls of Jerusalem after decimating the rest of the country.

Hezekiah's first tactic, like that of his unwise father, was to pay a tribute by stripping the temple of much of its valuable property. The temple walls, floor, and doors had all been stripped of their gold when Pharaoh Shishak invaded during the time of Rehoboam (1 Kin. 14:25–26). It appears that Hezekiah had tried to reverse this (2 Kin. 18:16) at least in part; but when Sennacherib invaded, Hezekiah chose to take the gold back off of the doors and pillars and offer it as tribute rather than turn to God for help.

18:17—19:37. Siege of Jerusalem. Unfortunately, instead of satisfying the Assyrian king, this generous gift had the opposite effect. He concluded that perhaps there were more treasures locked up in the city and sent three senior officers with an army to Jerusalem. They stood beside the same pool that Isaiah stood by when assuring King Ahaz of divine victory (v. 17; cf. Is. 7:3–4). The Tartan was the senior military officer, the Rabсарis was the chief eunuch or court official (cf. Dan 1:3), and the Rabshakeh was the king's chief advisor.

The story of the confrontation at the wall of Jerusalem and its aftermath is remarkable for its dramatic interest, and that may be why it is one of the few narratives that is recorded in varying detail in three separate passages in Scripture (2 Kin. 18:17–37; 2 Chr. 32; Is. 36). This is a case in which the conflict is explicitly described as one between the armies of God's people and the Assyrians and between the Assyrian gods and Yahweh. The Lord is directly contrasted with the pagan gods and declared by the Assyrians to be incompetent to save. Therefore the resolution of the narrative is extremely important in that it typifies the ultimate resolution of the cosmic conflict when the Lord permanently defeats all spiritual powers and rescues His people.

In the first message, the Assyrian emissaries offered objective evidence to support their convictions. They pointed to their unquestionable military superiority and to the superiority of their gods by insinuating that since the Hebrew God had not saved other Hebrew cities He could not, or would not, save Jerusalem. The gods of other nations had not been able to deliver their cities from the Assyrians (2 Kin. 18:33–35). The emissaries also made some daring claims. They argued that Hezekiah could not rely on His own God because the destruction of the high places where the people worshiped Him had most probably angered his God (v. 22). In order to provide a religious foundation to their attack against Jerusalem, the Assyrians claimed that the Hebrews' own God had authorized the invasion (v. 23). To what extent this might have been true cannot be known from the record. But there are other places where Scripture indicates that God instructed (2 Chr. 35:21) or goaded (Ex. 4:21; 9:16; 12:12) otherwise evil powers to act as His agents for purposes of judgment. If the claim was truthful, then God had moved them to go against Jerusalem to defeat and humiliate them by displaying His majesty and power over humans and false gods.

The Assyrian emissaries were not interested in diplomacy but in breaking the spiritual backbone of the people and the king. This is made clear in the spurned request that the Assyrians speak in Aramaic, the common language of diplomacy at the time. The Assyrian emissaries instead engaged in vigorous military and religious propaganda to undermine any confidence the Hebrews might have had in their own God or in Hezekiah's leadership.

The response of the people was not to respond to the arguments of the Assyrians. They did not utter a word. Their silence indicated that Hezekiah still had their full confidence because it was on his specific orders that they chose not to respond (2 Kin. 18:36). How tempting it would have been to try to defend Hezekiah, his reforms, or their God with vigorous, noble, and defiant speeches. But this was one of those many times in institutional or personal conflict when considered silence is the most effective defensive weapon.

Nevertheless, the presence of the Assyrian emissaries created distress among God's people. In his message to Isaiah (19:3–4), Hezekiah described the day with three specific and meaningful terms: tsarah ("trouble" or "distress"), tokekha ("rebuke"), and ne'atsah ("contempt," "disgrace," or "blasphemy"). In other biblical passages, tsarah is described as the consequence of gross injustice (Gen. 42:21) or of the absence of God (Deut. 31:17). In most cases it is something from which God delivers His people (e.g., Gen. 35:3; 1 Kin. 1:29; Jer. 30:7; Pss. 34:18; 50:15). It is the anguish caused by a threat to human existence that only God can resolve.

This experience was viewed as a rebuke in the sense of feeling that the people were under God's condemnation, as insinuated by the Assyrians. But it was also a day of humiliation, contempt, and even blasphemy against God. Isaiah's response to Hezekiah's message filled the hearts of the people and the king with hope: God Himself was to fight for His people by causing the Assyrian king to return to his land where he would die (2 Kin. 19:6–7). Would the people listen to the word of the Lord or to the threats of the Assyrian emissaries? Faith must learn to take a simple promise from the Lord for what it is—absolute assurance—because nothing can be more assured than the word of the Lord.

Sennacherib's second message to Hezekiah, delivered by letter (vv. 8–13), simply put the arrogance and blasphemy of the first message in writing. Hezekiah took the letter to the very presence of God—the One who had been maligned by the Assyrians—in His temple to express his trust in the Lord (vv. 15–19). The primary concern of the king was God's honor, reputation, and power. Hezekiah wanted all the earth to acknowledge that Yahweh alone is God.

The Lord's response to Hezekiah came through Isaiah in three parts (vv. 21–34). The first part of this reply was a taunting song directly addressed to Sennacherib for the enjoyment of the Hebrews, describing, among other things, Jerusalem's ultimate victory, the folly of Sennacherib's blasphemy against God, and the stark if unrecognized reality of his complete subservience to the will of God (vv. 21–28).

The second part was addressed directly to Hezekiah (vv. 29–31), promising in specific detail a timeline for the restoration of the fortunes of his people as illustrated by a schedule of their food supply. The wording used was the very language of the sabbatical year (Lev. 25:20–22), even of the Jubilee year, a reference that thus signified the coming of a time of freedom and restoration.

The third part filled out in more specific detail what the future of Sennacherib's military campaign would be and what would happen to Sennacherib himself (2 Kin. 19:32–34). While the exact details were not given, it didn't take long to see the evidence. The deliverance came in a stunning manner that has no parallel anywhere in Scripture (v. 35) and that would have brought to mind among the faithful a remembrance of the death and deliverance on the Passover night of the Exodus.

20:1–11. Hezekiah's Illness and Recovery.

This narrative does not follow chronologically from the previous chapter and most likely describes what happened about three years earlier. Several factors lead to this conclusion: it better fits the historical context of the Babylonian characters involved (v. 12), it describes much treasure being shown off (v. 13), and Assyria was still seen as a major threat to Jerusalem (v. 6).

The sickness that afflicted Hezekiah was probably an ulcerated sore or boil (v. 7) that gave him a raging infection that was about to overwhelm his life (v. 1). Isaiah's visit, with the doleful message of Hezekiah's impending and premature death (he was only thirty-nine) provoked a natural response from one who obviously saw himself as a faithful servant of God. The image of turning his face to the wall (v. 2) should probably be understood as an act of intense devotion, of shutting himself immediately off from the world for deep, earnest communion with God. The immediacy of God's response to Hezekiah's desperate plea is amazing because Isaiah was still on his way out of the palace when the Lord instructed him to return with a different message for Hezekiah. This must rank among the quickest direct answers to specific prayer recorded in Scripture. Isaiah's message doubtlessly brought great joy to Hezekiah. While there are examples in Scripture when God informed people of their imminent death, such as the stories concerning Aaron (Num. 20:24), Moses (Deut. 32:48–52), the false prophet Hananiah (Jer. 28:16), and the wicked king Ahaziah (2 Kings 1:16–17), there is no other case except that of Christ (Dan. 9:26–27) where the very year of a person's death is predicted so long in advance.

To what extent Isaiah's prescription of a fig poultice had any direct therapeutic role in Hezekiah's healing cannot be known. The exercise may have been yet another example in Scripture where one is instructed to perform some apparently arbitrary physical action as a sign of faith in the Lord's miraculous work (Ex. 14:16; 17:16; 2 Kin. 4:1–7; 5:9–15; John 9:1–7). Hezekiah's request for a sign is not condemned as a lack of unquestioning faith. Asking God for a specific sign of assurance of what He will do is different from ignoring or denying what He has done for us in the past as evidence of His care.

The fulfillment of Hezekiah's wise choice for a sign leaves much room for contemplation of the miracle. The turning back of the shadow on the sundial was noted in Babylon (cf. PK 344.3), which assures us that this was not an isolated miracle for Hezekiah's benefit but was a sign to the world that God is in complete control of the creation He has made. How He accomplished it, aside from simply rotating the earth in the wrong direction for the allotted time, is not known.

20:12–21. Visitors from Babylon. Berodach-Baladan (v. 12) was a distortion of a foreign ruler's name. Isaiah's spelling of the name, Merodach-Baladan (Is. 39:1), is closer to the Babylonian equivalent: Marduk-apal-idinna. Accordingly, some translations have "Marduk-Baladan" in both places. He ruled over Babylon in two terms from 721 to 710 B.C. and again for a brief time from 704 to 703 B.C. It is not certain why he sent envoys and gifts to Hezekiah. Unquestionably, reports of the miraculous sign and healing reached Babylon, and the king wanted to know more about the God who would do this.

The record of Hezekiah's naivete in dealing with the Babylonian emissaries is a sad but potent reminder of the consequences of doing things in our own way and forgetting to ask God for guidance in the fulfillment of our duties and the nature of our witness. How much different might the result have been if Hezekiah had thought to consult with Isaiah, or had just prayed earnestly to God, before the arrival of the guests.

The story of Hezekiah, a good king like no other except David, is a stark caution to those who profess faith in God and who may have a stellar reputation for all the positive things they have accomplished. Unrestrained pride or momentary carelessness can undo it all in a moment. Past accomplishments do not protect a person from making unwise decisions that could have a negative impact on their future. While under the spotlight of honor and glory, Hezekiah gloated in self-importance and directed the Babylonian emissaries to his own treasures (2 Kin. 20:13). Instead, he should have shared with them the goodness of a life lived in a covenant relationship with the God of Israel.

In spite of this mistake at the end of his life, Hezekiah was remembered as a good king who accomplished much for God and His people, including, most importantly, bringing people back to a right worship of God. Aside from the religious reforms, he expanded the city of Jerusalem and had a massive tunnel constructed to bring water from a spring outside the city walls into a pool inside, which allowed the city to endure a much longer siege in times of war (for more on Hezekiah's Tunnel, see "Archaeology and the Bible," p. 77).

21:1–26

Manasseh and Amon and the Sealing of Judah's Doom

Manasseh was born after Hezekiah had been healed. Seemingly all that Hezekiah had worked for was reversed by his son and later by his grandson. The extent of this moral degradation is described as surpassing that of the Canaanites whom God evicted from the land. To be consistent, God now had to evict this nation from the land as well.

21:1–18. Manasseh (697–643 B.C.). The name of Manasseh's mother, Hephzibah, means "my delight is in her" (cf. Is. 62:4). It ironically expresses God's desire for His covenant people. Manasseh was only twelve years old when he became king, so presumably his mother's influence was still quite strong. Yet there is no indication that Manasseh took God seriously. The first thing he did was to rebuild all the high places and reinstall altars and images both in the shrines and in the temple (2 Kin. 21:3–4).

Manasseh set up altars (and their accompanying shrines) for the astral cult in both the priests' court and the outer court (v. 5). He also placed a carved image for Asherah in the temple building itself (v. 7). With a sense of outrage, the narrative states that this latter action was a direct affront to God and His desire to place His name in the temple. The contrast is rather startling—God, who asked not to be represented by any human-made object, had now been sidelined by a piece of wood, carved according to the fancy of some artisan, which was now being worshiped by a people who seemed oblivious to their own spiritual history, heritage, and future.

Just as Samaria had been destroyed because of its rejection of the Lord, so too would Jerusalem be wiped clean because of its filth (v. 13). This means that God would bring the covenant relationship to an end, delivering His people into the hands of their enemies (vv. 14–15). This would in fact be a temporary but necessary measure to ensure that a remnant would survive and that the Messiah would come from them. This harsh judgment on the remnant of God's inheritance (v. 14) needs to be balanced with what Micah recorded about the same remnant: God would one day pardon them (Mic. 7:18). The prophet Zechariah announced that God was determined to restore the remnant (Zech. 8:11–15). Without strong discipline, the remnant would have no future. Only God's word of judgment could reverse their course toward annihilation. The purpose of God's judgments is always for the salvation of His people, not for their destruction.

The fertility cult of Canaan, which was founded on blatant sex and financial greed, was also suffused with a lack of respect for human life. Hence it is not surprising that Manasseh filled Jerusalem with blood (2 Kin. 21:16). This was directly related to his idolatry. It is possible that the garden in which he was finally buried (vv. 17–18) was one dedicated to a Canaanite astral deity (v. 3). Intriguingly, 2 Kings does not report Manasseh's repentance during his captivity in Assyria, where he was led to recognize that the Lord was God (2 Chr. 33:10–13). Ultimately, even this did not save Jerusalem from the coming judgment described in Kings.

21:19–26. Amon (643–641 B.C.). Amon followed his father to continue the worst corruption that Judah had seen. He forsook the Lord and continued promoting and practicing the idolatry of his father (vv. 20–22). Amon only reigned two years (v. 19) before he was killed in a palace plot (v. 23). Evidently this was not a popular move, and the perpetrators were hunted down and killed in a popular backlash. They put Amon's eight-year-old son, Josiah, on the throne to replace him (v. 24). Amon was buried with his father in the garden tomb, which was possibly a last act of worship to an astral deity (v. 26).

22:1—23:30

Josiah's Reforms Delay the End

Josiah's activities as a young man paralleled much of what his forbearer Joash did eight generations, or about two hundred years, before. His enthusiasm in restoring the temple, the use of a wooden chest to collect money, his trust in the workmen who did their work faithfully and well, plus the godly influence of his mother—all of these factors slowed down the progress of the nation toward an inevitable disaster.

22:1–2. Josiah Ascends the Throne (641–609 B.C.). Josiah was only eight years old when he became king. His mother's name means "well beloved," and her father's name means "witness of the Lord." They were God-fearing people from the Judean heartland, and their son took their godly influence to heart. Fortunately, Josiah's mother and her family had more influence on the boy than his father. The description of Josiah walking in all the ways of David was a positive one that few kings received. The statement that he did not turn aside to the left or to the right (v. 2) is an expression that shows Josiah's faithfulness in every detail.

22:3–20. The Book of the Law. Josiah was stung by what he had learned from an old scroll found in the temple and wanted to know how to deal with the divine consequences of all the depravity of his people (vv. 11–13). It is likely that the scroll they found was Deuteronomy, which describes the results of breaking the covenant with God. The text underlines the confusion of Josiah's leadership circle as they asked themselves why such a calamity befell the land. They would then understand, according to the book, that this was the result of abandoning God and worshiping idols (Deut. 29:23–28). What the book said perfectly mirrored the condition of Judah. The word of God spoken to Moses anticipated the future condition of the people.

23:1–24. Josiah's Reforms. The gathering of the elders attracted the attention of the entire city, and they all made their way to the temple where they heard Josiah read from the old scroll as he stood by one of the two pillars outside the entrance to the Holy Place (v. 3). This was a significant gesture that repeated what Joash had done when he was installed as king—and which followed the tradition for all kings (11:14).

There Josiah committed himself to covenant loyalty to the Lord, pledging compliance to His commandments. The narrative says that everyone assembled there followed the king's lead (23:3). This paralleled the challenge Joshua gave to the people at the end of his life to choose which God they would serve, after which he affirmed that he and his household would serve the Lord (Josh. 24:15). Elijah did much the same on Mount Carmel (1 Kin. 18:21–22). Josiah's profession of faith is an example for spiritual leaders of God's people throughout the ages.

Josiah inspired the most far-reaching reform the nation had ever seen, beginning in the temple, then throughout Jerusalem, in all Judea, and the province of Samaria (cf. Acts 1:8). As a part of this reform, he ensured that all priests throughout Judah participated in the desecration of the illicit worship sites (2 Kin. 23:8). This implies that they were unable to participate in legitimate priestly rituals until they had been cleansed of ritual defilement. The intriguing reference to the gates that were a part of this ground-shaking reform is illustrated by the many podium-like cultic structures associated with city gates that have been excavated in Israel (e.g., at Bethsaida and Dan). Idolatry did not require hills and mountains but was facilitated by regular city architecture.

One of the most significant high places they desecrated was in the valley of Topheth (v. 10), which had been dedicated to Molech for the fiery sacrifice of babies (see Jer. 7:31). Defiling Topheth effectively ended its cultic use, and from this point on it just served as the city rubbish dump, where trash rather than babies fueled its never-ending fires. The place took on eschatological symbolism when Jesus used it to describe hellfire (Matt. 5:22; 10:28; 23:15, 33).

The narrative gives extensive details of Josiah's work to rid Judah and the territory of the now-defunct Northern Kingdom of the symbols, the structures, and even the personnel of all false and idolatrous worship. It was the most thorough physical deconstruction of false worship in the history of Judah, clearing out worship places from as far back as the time of Solomon, three hundred years before.

Once this work was completed, Josiah returned to Jerusalem and organized the most extensive and impressive Passover held since the time of the judges (2 Kin. 23:21-23). To complete the reforms, Josiah literally swept away spirit mediums and practitioners of the occult together with all types of fertility idols. All these actions were done in obedience to the law of Moses found in the scroll that Hilkiah the priest had discovered (v. 24).

23:25-30. Josiah Meets His End. Despite Josiah's unique zeal for getting the nation back on track, it was not enough to prevent the impending judgment brought on by generations of apathy toward God and especially by the excesses of Manasseh's reign (vv. 25-26). Judah would end up like Israel, despite God's intention to permanently dwell there (v. 27). But God would find a way to fulfill His saving word, namely, through the coming Messiah. God always preserves a remnant of His people.

Following the concluding statement of Josiah's reign (vv. 25-28), there is a description of how he met his end. He took it upon himself to halt the advance of Pharaoh Necho, who was on his way to join the Assyrians in battle against the new rising superpower, Babylon. But Josiah was killed by the Egyptians at Megiddo (v. 29). His body was taken back to Jerusalem, and his son Jehoahaz replaced him on the throne (v. 30).

23:31—25:30

Judah's Last Days

The remaining four kings of Judah are all characterized as doers of evil. In their days the Babylonians had become the superpower, but in its death throes Egypt made some last excursions into Judah. The Egyptians took Jehoahaz, the son of Josiah, to Egypt, where he died in prison. His three successors were each subjected to Babylon and met the compounding wrath of the Babylonian army when they tried to rebel.

23:31-37. Jehoahaz (609 B.C.) and Jehoiakim (609-598 B.C.). Shallum was Josiah's fourth son (1 Chr. 3:15), and his royal name was Jehoahaz. It seems unusual that he was chosen before his three older brothers. Josiah's firstborn son was overlooked (unless he died in childhood) and so were the next two older brothers, Jehoiakim and Zedekiah. Jehoahaz's brief three-month reign was characterized as evil (2 Kin. 23:31-32). Necho took Jehoahaz prisoner and cut his reign short, sending him to Egypt where he eventually died (v. 34). Necho appointed Josiah's second son, Eliakim, as a puppet king and changed his name to Jehoiakim (v. 34). Jehoiakim's first duty was to pay the tribute imposed by Necho (v. 33), and consequently he imposed a heavy tax on the land to meet the obligation (v. 35).

24:1-7. The Exile (605 B.C.). The regional politics worsened for Judah when Babylon gained supremacy in the region by defeating the Assyrians and sweeping away the Egyptians. Because it was a vassal of Egypt, Judah was swallowed up in the Babylonian expansion, and Jehoiakim became a vassal of Babylon instead (v. 1). It was at this time that Daniel and his friends were taken into exile to Babylon (Dan. 1:1-3). At first Jehoiakim cooperated with the Babylonians, but three years later he rebelled. Judah became the object of attack by raiding parties inspired by Babylon that inflicted much damage in fulfillment of the word of the Lord spoken by the prophets (2 Kin. 24:2). When Nebuchadnezzar arrived at Jerusalem to begin the suppression of Jehoiakim's rebellion, Jehoiakim was already dead or had died during the siege, and his young son Jehoiachin replaced him (v. 6). This was the end of the reign of another king described as evil (23:36-37). Egypt no longer rated as a regional power, and Babylon assumed all its territory from the eastern border of Egypt right up to the Euphrates River (24:7)—a territory that was once under the control of King Solomon (see 1 Kin. 4:21, 24).

24:8-16. Jehoiachin (598-597 B.C.) and the Second Deportation (598 B.C.). Jehoiachin followed the tradition of most of his forebears and did evil in the sight of God—his reign lasted only three months (vv. 8-9). When Nebuchadnezzar arrived outside the besieged Jerusalem, Jehoiachin went out to him, accompanied by his mother, his chief officers, and his courtiers, and surrendered to him. He was taken prisoner (vv. 10-12), and Nebuchadnezzar emptied the treasures of the palace and the temple treasuries. He cut in pieces the gold objects still remaining in the temple from Solomon's time and deported ten thousand of Jerusalem's leaders, artisans, metallurgists, and potential military personnel. Ezekiel was one of them (Ezek. 1:2). This tactic effectively removed from Jerusalem all those capable of leading a revolt or manufacturing supplies for an army. (The book of 2 Kings does not mention the lengthy siege of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 605 B.C. that resulted in the first deportation of Jews to Babylon.)

24:17-20. Zedekiah (597-586 B.C.). Mattaniah and Jehoahaz were full blood brothers, so Mattaniah—given the royal name of Zedekiah—was Jehoiachin's uncle even though he was only about three years older (2 Kin. 24:17-18). Zedekiah also reigned for eleven years (v. 18), the same as Jehoiakim. He too did evil in the eyes of the Lord (v. 19). Although he initially cooperated with Babylon, he also rebelled, following Jehoiakim's example (v. 20).

25:1-21. Jerusalem Destroyed (586 B.C.). The inevitable siege commenced in the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign and lasted two years (vv. 1-2). The narrative notes that Judah, the people group, was taken away from its own land (v. 21). This is a tragic admission. The divine gift of the land was withdrawn from the people because of their rebellion against the Lord who had redeemed them from Egypt and who had entered into a loving covenant relationship with them. After the nation's first generation of leaders had died, the land descended into a state of anarchy (the time of the judges) and then of entrenched idolatry during the time of the kings. Despite the few kings who really turned to God with their reforms and the prophets who made it clear that only God is worthy of worship, the nation seemed determined to head in the direction of their own destruction. The Canaanite religion enticed them by providing a fatal, false sense of security. Both the Northern Kingdom of Israel and the Southern Kingdom of Judah were cast out of the land and taken into exile. The destruction of their temple was a sad reminder of the fact that they had now lost the national identity and the privilege of having God living among them, cleansing them from sin. The loss was devastating and left the nation in chaos.

25:22-26. Judah in Exile. A few weeks after the start of the Exile, Ishmael, from the royal line, returned with a group of activists and killed Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had appointed as governor, his associates, and the Babylonian military personnel garrisoned there (v. 25). At this, they, and many frightened locals, fled to Egypt, their political savior (v. 26). The prophet Jeremiah was forced to go with them (Jer. 43:5-7), even though he had warned them not to go to Egypt (42:19). They went back to the place from which the Lord had liberated them.

25:27-30. Jehoiachin Released. In the year 560 B.C., thirty-seven years after Jehoiachin was taken from Jerusalem, a new king ascended Babylon's throne. As a measure of goodwill, he released Jehoiachin (now about fifty-five) from his prison (v. 27; for more, see "Old Testament Timeline," p. 94). For some reason Jehoiachin became the favorite among the captive kings and was not only provided regular clothes rather than his prison uniform, but also given a prominent place at the king's table (vv. 28-29). Furthermore, he received regular food supplies for the rest of his days (v. 30).

This dramatic finale to the book is an indication of hope that the nation of Israel and its kingly line still had a future. The judgment against them would not be permanent or final; they would be restored. The covenant God made with Abraham would still come to pass. The covenant God made with David would still be able to climax in the Messiah. The kingdom of God would have a future, and the meek would one day inherit the earth (Matt. 5:5).

1 CHRONICLES

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. First and Second Chronicles were originally one book, as indicated by a scribal note found in the Hebrew copies, placing the “middle verse” at 1 Chronicles 27:25. Its Hebrew title, dibre hayyamim (“matters/events of the days”), refers to records that were kept of activities usually associated with the king. These sources were mainly courtly journals recording salient events. The two books of Chronicles are cited thirty-two times in Kings and two times in Esther. The books of Chronicles appeared separately for the first time in the early Greek version, the Septuagint (LXX), with the name paraleipomenon, “a thing left aside (for the moment),” as if they were an appendix for the sake of completeness. The author does assume that the reader knows the content of the former historical books when presenting genealogies and administrative lists in a more complete form than could be compiled from them. But that is not the main function of the Chronicles. Jerome, the author of the Vulgate Latin translation, does more justice to its character as “a chronicle of the whole of sacred history,” thus recovering the sense of the Hebrew name and originating the modern title.

Many have believed that the author of the Chronicles also wrote Ezra and Nehemiah, which were originally a single book. But the Chronicles differ in the implicit assessment of the reign of Solomon (contrast Neh. 13:26, partly echoed in 2 Chr. 1:12), as well as its emphasis on swift retribution for sin. The author of Chronicles is thus unknown, but his emphasis on Levite choristers (mentioned about one hundred times in the books of Chronicles, but only one time in the books of Kings and two times in the books of Samuel) has led some to surmise that he was also a Levite.

Date. The books of Chronicles are addressed primarily to the Judeans who returned to their land following the decree of Cyrus in 537 B.C.

The books were probably composed during the latter part of the fifth century B.C. and, if so, could be the last of the OT books to be written. Clearly, part of the genealogical information (e.g., 1 Chr. 3:19–24) reaches into the second half of the Persian period (539–331 B.C.). The position of the books of Chronicles in the Hebrew Bible, at the very end of Scripture, agrees well with a late date. Matthew 23:35 refers to the sweep of biblical history by alluding to the time comprised by Genesis 4:8 and 2 Chronicles 24:20–21, much as “from Genesis to Revelation” would be used today (see “Formation of the Biblical Canon,” p. 21).

Backgrounds. Though often seen as dull today, the books of Chronicles were written, just as the Pentateuch and the rest of the historical books of the OT, in order to guide God’s people through momentous transitions in their history. The Pentateuch had inspired a group of impoverished family clans after they had escaped from the oppressive power of Egypt into less developed but freer lands, there to become a nation under God, while the other historical books mapped the transformation of this new nation into kingdoms of note in the ancient world, showing how faithfulness to God’s covenant did result in the blessings promised therein.

Once those blessings had been lost through disobedience, those who returned from the Exile in Babylon found themselves as a minor district in an outlying province of the Persian Empire. Research in dusty archives was necessary in order to convince the Persian government that in times past there had been kings in Jerusalem: nobody thought of those Judeans as a nation any longer (Ezra 4:19–20), but only as a cultic group huddling around a few sacred objects (Ezra 1:7–11). The books of Chronicles served to show them how to remain God’s people even without national independence or a king of their own.

Theology and Purpose. The books of Chronicles do not overtly discuss theology, except in short statements by way of explaining the success or failure of people of the past. Its main purpose was pastoral in nature: the book aimed to save the Judean community from a complete loss of heart that would only facilitate their absorption into the surrounding culture. Such a process had already begun in other Palestinian communities that also treasured the Pentateuch, as the books of Ezra and Nehemiah report about the Samaritans. This danger was averted in Judah thanks, to a great extent, to reflection on the history of the people of God such as is expounded in the Chronicles. The books also provide an answer to the question of the fall of the city and the destruction of the temple. It establishes a clear connection between the behavior of the kings and the people, and the corruption of the temple services (2 Chr. 28:22—29:36; 36:14–20; see “The Temple in Chronicles,” p. 541).

1. The Glorious Past of the Covenant People.

In order to understand the present situation of the people after the Exile, the books of Chronicles focus on the past history of Jerusalem and the temple and its services. It takes us back to the moment when David began to make preparations for the construction of the temple that would occur under the leadership of Solomon. The one link of the postexilic community with a glorious past that would not raise the hackles of Persian authorities too much—provided it was handled with much care, and a generous amount of providential guidance—was the temple. It had been a marvel of the ancient world before its destruction by the Babylonians. Now Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Empire, authorized its reconstruction (2 Chr. 36:23). The continuity of the covenant is underlined through an emphasis on the covenant of God with David. His lineage is given a special place in the genealogical lists (1 Chr. 3), and God’s promises for him are repeated (1 Chr. 17, from 2 Sam. 7). But in the Chronicles the generic “seed” or “offspring” of the dynasty (2 Sam. 7:12) is specified as one “of your sons,” namely Solomon, the temple builder (1 Chr. 17:11–12). David and Solomon were not only the glorious past but also the root from which God would make Israel to sprout again. Their throne was “the throne of the LORD” (1 Chr. 29:23; 2 Chr. 9:8). Their reigns are presented in idealized form: none of the grave sins of David or Solomon are remembered in the Chronicles except David’s census, for those kings are models to be followed by future leaders. The same, to a certain extent, is true of Hezekiah and Josiah.

2. The Rise and Fall of the Nation. The glorious past of Israel poses an immediate question: What went wrong? Why were the people of God in such a wretched state? Systematically, the books of Chronicles relate the fate of kings, and the people subject to them, to their obedience or disobedience to the provisions of God’s covenant and to the temple services. The author underlines the principles of David transmitted to Solomon in 1 Chronicles 28:9: Their goal was to know God intimately and serve Him loyally and willingly, keeping in mind that He is found by all who seek Him, but rejects those who reject Him, which meant He would ultimately destroy them forever if they persisted in this rejection. This is no mere formal obedience, but one that arose from the heart in true humility (see 2 Chr. 7:14, 22 a passage with a clear message for us today).

Emphasis on obedience to the law of God as a key to success is pervasive in the OT, and the blessings associated with faithfulness to the covenant are already specified in the Pentateuch (most prominently in Lev. 26 and Deut. 28). The books of Chronicles do not hesitate to identify the actions of the people or the monarchs that created well-being or disaster. The author usually includes an evaluation of the religious character of each reign together with statistics. In practice, however, things were not so clear-cut: punishment might be delayed by amends (2 Chr. 34:27–28), with the unintended consequence that some people might get it absolutely backward: they might attribute their misfortune to the renewed obedience and godly reforms of their kings, and their former prosperity to the evil deeds of previous times (Jer. 44:15–19). Thus, the just judgment of God is a tenet of faith, not an obvious conclusion to be drawn from the experiences of daily life. But even if the “obey and live, disobey and die” theology is limited in its explanatory power for the vicissitudes of this life, that very fact opens an opportunity for the doctrine of the future and righteous judgment of God.

3. God’s Sovereign Elections. God made clear He had chosen the tribe of Levi alone for priesthood and temple service (e.g., 1 Chr. 15:2; 23:24–32); the lineage of David to rule the nation (e.g., 1 Chr. 28:4; 2 Chr. 6:6); the reign of Solomon in order to build the temple (1 Chr. 28–29); the city of Jerusalem as the residence of His name (e.g., 2 Chr. 6:6, 34, 38; 12:13); and even the specific site for the temple inside its limits (2 Chr. 7:12; cf. 1 Chr. 21–22). Though these choices were not a guarantee of salvation for the persons involved, neither could those who disrespected them have attained the favor of God. The corruption of the chosen leaders and their institutions led to the collapse of both. Although the Chronicler believes that the people from both the Southern and Northern Kingdoms were still the elect people of God (e.g., 2 Chr. 30:5–9; 2 Chr. 11:4), he also understands that the northern tribes have “been in rebellion against the house of David to this day” (2 Chr. 10:19). Outside Judea there was no valid priesthood, since the priests and Levites who once resided in the north had moved around Jerusalem (2 Chr. 11:13–14). However, people from the ten rebellious tribes were not to be excluded from the covenant provided they repented and returned to worship in Jerusalem (2 Chr. 30:9–10).

5. Listening to the Law and the Prophets. The Chronicler narrates the reigns of the kings of Judah, not of rebellious Israel, and then only briefly except for those of the “good” kings, singled out because of their compliance with the law of God: David (e.g., 2 Chron. 6:16; 23:18), Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. 17:3–9), Joash (24:6), Hezekiah (29:10–11), and Josiah (34:19–21). These kings also sought and respected the word of God through the prophets: Nathan and Gad in the times of David and Solomon (1 Chr. 29:29; 2 Chr. 29:25) and Ahijah and Iddo later (9:29), as well as the prophetess Huldah in the times of Josiah (34:20–28), among others. Of special note is the prophecy of Jahaziel, the Levite who led Jehoshaphat to confront the armies of the enemies of Judah by singing praises to God (2 Chr. 20:14–17), and the admonition of the king to trust in the messages of God’s prophets in order to thrive (v. 20). The stories of these kings are used to establish that if the kings had remained faithful to the Lord, the destruction of the city and the hopeless experience of the Exile could have been avoided.

Yet, out of the chaos of the Exile God provided for His people a future and a hope (Jer. 29:11).

Literary Features. In order to preserve hope and awaken a sense of national pride, the Chronicles contain narratives that review the history of God’s dealings with His people since the remote past. Part of this history is merely alluded to in genealogical and administrative lists, since the author presupposes the reader is well acquainted with the former historical books, but a modicum of new information is added. Other historical narratives are retold by quoting extensively from Samuel and Kings but are given a different perspective and new emphases. However, more is left out, in accordance with the purpose of the author, than is repeated or supplemented. The records of the glorious reigns of David and Solomon are especially singled out, both because of their value in buoying the spirits of the community of returned exiles and because of the connection of those kings with the temple, the center of community life. Sermons and addresses of those kings to the people are added as an aid to the purpose of the author (see “The Temple in Chronicles,” p. 541).

COMMENTARY

1:1—9:44

THE ANCESTORS: GENERATIONS OF GOD’S PEOPLE

Reviewing past history is a means to establish roots and, consequently, identity. To us, history is a parade of centuries; to the ancients, it was a parade of ancestors. Some names may remind

The Genealogies of 1 Chronicles 1—9

The genealogies recorded in 1 Chronicles 1—9 are the longest in the Bible and require some attention. The fact that they are part of the book and that they are placed at the beginning of the book indicates that they have a very specific purpose. We should explore some of the theological value of the genealogies within the book itself.

1. Genealogical Details. These genealogies begin with the pre-Israelite history from Adam or Creation (1:1–3) to the Flood (v. 4), and from the post-Flood nations (vv. 5–26) to Abraham (v. 27). From this point on, the list of names is restricted to the sons of Abraham through Hagar (vv. 29–31), Keturah (vv. 32–33), and Sarah (v. 34). The genealogy narrows down even more by listing only the descendants of Isaac (Esau [vv. 35–54] and Israel [2:1–2]). At this point we reach what seems to be one of the main genealogical interests of the biblical writer: Israel as the people of God. The tribes that came from Jacob/Israel are listed beginning with Judah (2:3–4:23). The intention of this section is to take the reader to David and his descendants (3:1–24). Other descendants of Judah are also listed (4:1–23). Then the descendants of the other tribes are given. It has been suggested that the list of the tribes follows a general geographical pattern. Judah is at the center, and the next one mentioned is Simeon (vv. 24–43), one of its closest neighbors. The movement is from south to north, east of Jordan (Reuben, 5:1–10; Gad, 5:11–22; the half tribe of Manasseh, 5:23–26; and Levi, 6:1–80). This is followed by the northern tribes of Issachar (7:1–5), Benjamin (vv. 6–12), and Naphtali (v. 13), and concludes with a movement from the north to the south (Manasseh, vv. 14–19; Ephraim, vv. 20–29; Asher, vv. 30–40; and Benjamin/Saul, 8:1–40). In chapter 9 we find a genealogical list of those who returned from Exile, with a primary emphasis on the Levites (9:1–34). At the end, we return to the genealogy of Saul, thus preparing the way for the reign of David (9:35–44).

2. Purpose of the Genealogies. First, it is obvious that these genealogies contain a compressed history of global dimensions. They begin affirming the historical facts of the Creation and the Flood and close with the beginning of the reign of David. But they also include the Exile and the return from the Exile, thus providing an element of hope. At a time when the people of God were discouraged as a result of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and a return from a devastating exile, God assured them that they were part of a world history over which He is Lord. This history had not come to an end but remained open to His guiding hand as it had been in the past.

Second, history is depicted here as a result of the human capacity, given to them by God, to procreate. This begetting traces the human race to a common ancestor created by God in His image: Adam. This particular genealogy binds the people of God to the human race in a bond of existential solidarity that should exclude prejudices of any kind. In the list, the birth of Abraham takes us back to his election in order to be used by God to bless all the nations of the earth.

Third, based on the amount of space assigned to them, these genealogies place the emphasis on David and the priesthood (Levites). Genealogies were sometimes instrumental in the divine assignment of specific religious and social responsibilities and privileges to some, but every individual had a role to play in the arena of history simply because he or she had been begotten. In the Bible, the roles of king and priest played an important function as instruments used by God to represent the saving work and ministry of Jesus in whom the kingly and priestly offices coalesced. He was not simply the son of Mary. He was the Son of God, in a unique way, and to Him His Father assigned a unique responsibility, which He willingly accepted, namely, the redemption of the human race. The genealogies of the books of Chronicles are open-ended, pointing to the future son of David and to His priestly work—two ideas that pervade these books.

the reader of specific stories in other parts of the Bible, and in the case of the original readers, also of family stories transmitted orally. The genealogy begins with Genesis and the patriarchs (1:1–27), then moves to Abraham and his descendants (1:28–53), the tribe of Judah (2:1–4:23), the eastern tribes (4:24–5:26), the tribe of Levi (6:1–81), and the remaining tribes (7:1–9:44).

1:1–54

From Adam to Jacob

By beginning with Creation, the history of God's people, through the record of the genealogies in the Chronicles and earlier books, is incorporated into universal history and highlights the divine purpose for them.

1:1–27. The Patriarchs. In a sense the author rushes through Genesis, for he is only reminding the reader, by means of genealogical lists, of the foundational times of Creation, the Flood, the dispersion from Babel, and the story of Abraham. Family branches furthest away from Israel are dealt with first before concentrating on those of primary concern. Thus, both Japheth and Ham precede Shem. Nimrod (v. 10) appears only as a mighty warrior, no longer in the enigmatic character of a “hunter before the LORD” (Gen. 10:9). The family branch of Aram (1 Chr. 1:17) is worthy of a passing mention among the Semites, as is that of Joktan (v. 20), being the more remote branch of Eber. After these digressions, the genealogy of Shem (v. 17) is repeated (vv. 24–27), so the reader is not sidetracked from the more immediate branch of Peleg, from which Abraham arose.

1:28–54. The Descendants of Abraham. Ishmael (vv. 29–31), the son of Hagar, seems of less interest to the genealogist than the sons of Keturah (vv. 32–33). Genesis 25:1 leaves the impression that Keturah was a new wife after the death of Sarah. Our passage, therefore, explains that she was a concubine, not (as in modern usage) a kept mistress, but an actual spouse (Judg. 19:3–5), albeit one with incomplete inheritance rights (Gen. 25:6). The line of Esau/Edom/Seir is also dealt with in some detail (1 Chr. 1:35–54), not only as neighbors of Judah but also as brothers of Israel. The long list of Edomite chiefs and kings emphasizes that kingship arose in Edom before Israel (v. 43).

In 1:36 the Hebrew text ends the list of descendants of Eliphaz with “and Timna and Amalek.” This is not always reflected in the English translations. The first five sons of Eliphaz in this verse are not joined by “and,” except as supplied by translators. The “and” before Timna originally seems to have introduced an explanatory clause, “and by Timna, Amalek,” as in the LXX. This is in agreement with Genesis 36:12, where Timna is the mother of Amalek. Most modern translations try to represent this more accurate understanding.

2:1—7:40

The Tribes

This section begins with a list of the twelve sons of Jacob (2:1–2) but immediately concentrates on Judah. The order of the names, given in various ways in the OT, here follows loosely Genesis 35:22–26, where they are listed according to their respective mothers.

2:3—4:23. The Descendants of Judah. They are given the pride of place (because Judah is the cradle of rulers, 1 Chr. 5:1–2) with emphasis on the genealogy of David (2:9–55) and his descendants (chap. 3). His tribe then receives much more space in the text (102 vv.) than the other tribes (Levi, 81 vv.; all others combined, just 126 vv.). We can divide the list into several groups. First is the list from Judah to Chelubai (2:2–9). Ram (2:9), who does not appear in Numbers 26:20–21, is taken from the genealogy of David in Ruth 4:18–22. The Hebrew kelubay (1 Chr. 2:9) is an alternate form of Caleb (2:42); the latter spelling configures the word for “dog” in Hebrew.

Second, we find the family of David. The Chronicler reports that David was the seventh and last son of Jesse (2:13), while 1 Samuel 16:10–13 makes him the eighth, giving also some of their names. Perhaps a fifth son (Elihu in 1 Chr. 27:18) later died without children, leaving Jesse with just seven sons for genealogical purposes.

Third, we have the family of Caleb son of Hezron. His family (2:18–24) appears next to David’s, perhaps because it furnished Israel with the talent of Bezalel (2:20), the master craftsman of the sanctuary. He should not be confused with Caleb the son of Jephunneh (4:15), one of the twelve spies who, together with Joshua, showed an attitude that differed from that of the other ten (Num. 14:24, 30). This incident happened one year after the erection of the sanctuary, when the spy Caleb was only forty years old, so he could hardly have been the grandfather of Bezalel, the sanctuary builder.

Fourth, the families of Jerahmeel and Caleb are listed (1 Chr. 2:25–55). The Chelubai of v. 9 resurfaces as “Caleb” (vv. 42–48), with another list of his descendants, where the emphasis is on place-names.

The fifth group is formed by the family of David (3:1–9). He is here on record as having reigned in Hebron over Judah as their native prince for seven and a half years before his reign of thirty-three years in Jerusalem as an elected king of all Israel (v. 4), in conformity with the report in 2 Samuel 2:11 and 5:4–5. In 1 Chronicles 10–11, however, his reign in Hebron, which partially overlapped with the claim of Esh-Baal/Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, is omitted, as the reign of the latter is not detailed either. Daniel, here in v. 1, is another name of Chileab (2 Sam. 3:3). The name Daniel means “God is my judge,” while Chileab means “like unto the father,” perhaps in affirmation that David was the baby’s father, not Nabal, the former husband of Abigail from Carmel.

The sixth group is that of the royal line from Solomon to the kings of Judah (1 Chr. 3:10–24). The names in this line appear in the Bible in diverse forms; some may be throne names. Zerubbabel (v. 19) is here the nephew of Shealtiel, while elsewhere he is his son (e.g., Hag. 1:1; Matt. 1:12). Probably Pedaiah was his biological father, while Shealtiel was the juridical father, having died without offspring. However this may be, the lists of Zerubbabel's descendants here, in Matthew, and in Luke, are all different. In 1 Chronicles 3:22 we read of Shemaiah and six sons, though only five are named after him. We should probably read "The sons [as in v. 21] of Shecaniah were Shemaiah and the sons of Shemaiah, Hattush, Igal, Bariah, Neariah and Shaphat—six in all."

Finally we have the clans of Judah (4:1–23). These families included that of Jabez (v. 9), a clan leader who made a simple but eloquent request of God, which was, in a variation from the literary style of the genealogy, recorded for posterity. Jabez requested an extension of his land—God's loving hand of providence, protection, and avoidance of causing (or according to some, receiving) pain. There were families of scribes who lived at a place called Jabez (2:55), which was perhaps named after the person. Some have even suggested that these scribes were somehow related to Jabez or connected with him in some other way (such that his prayer had relevance to their work), but the text does not indicate anything specific. These scribes, the Tirathites, Shimeathites, and Sucathites, may be interpreted either as sub-family names deriving from the names of the respective heads (cf. 2:53) or as sub-specializations of scribes, namely, those who read aloud the words to be written, those who took them down in writing, and those who checked the final copy. Other clans of Judah specialized as skilled craftsmen (4:14) and potters (4:23).

4:24—5:26. The Eastern Tribes. The eastern tribes were those of Simeon (4:24–43), Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (5:1–26). The tribe of Simeon was originally surrounded by territories of Judah. Part of the tribe was later incorporated into those territories, while the rest migrated eastward. Reuben lost his birthright, which entailed a double portion of inheritance, to Joseph (5:1–2). This was accomplished de facto when Jacob adopted both sons of Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim, as his own (Gen. 48:12–16). Thus Joseph disappears from most lists of the twelve tribes in the Bible, while Manasseh and Ephraim now had rights to inheritance equal to those of their uncles. The wilderness (desert) by the river Euphrates (1 Chr. 5:9) was a result of gradually diminishing rainfall from Gilead (the territory of the Reubenites) toward the east. The Hagrites conquered by them (5:10) were descendants of Ishmael and his mother Hagar (cf. the Hagrites Jethur and Naphish in 1:31; 5:19).

The members of the tribe of Gad (5:11–22) are listed differently than in Genesis 46:16 or Numbers 26:15–18; here the tribe seems organized, not by ancestor, but by military chief (5:12). The same applies to the half tribe of Manasseh (vv. 23–26). This suggests that the source was a military census, perhaps related to the warfare of Saul in the region (1 Sam. 14:47). The figures of 50,000 camels, 250,000 sheep, and 100,000 men seem strangely high, compared to just 2,000 donkeys (1 Chr. 5:21). Since the Chronicles used archives from a bygone era, the author may have misunderstood some of the numeral symbols used in preexilic Israel, which, as archaeology shows, constituted an incipient, complex, and unstable system. We should probably read this verse as listing 1,050 camels, 1,250 sheep and 1,100 men. The same problem reappears often in the work (e.g., 1 Chr. 22:14). The eastern tribes, like the northern ones, acted like a prostitute (5:25) spiritually, by being unfaithful to the Lord, who was the legitimate husband of Israel. The Assyrian deportation was the consequence of this harlotry. Pul, the king of Assyria, (5:26) was not, as in some older versions, different from Tiglath-Pileser; the latter was his throne name (2 Kin. 15:19, 29).

6:1–80. The Tribe of Levi. This genealogy is based on the three sons of Levi: Kohath (vv. 2–15), Gershon (vv. 16–28), and Merari (vv. 29–30). Two specific roles of the Levitical tribe are mentioned: the musicians in the temple (vv. 31–48) and those in charge of the priesthood (the family of Aaron; vv. 49–53). The section closes with a discussion of the Levitical cities as the dwellings of the Levites (vv. 54–81). The Zadokites (vv. 2–15) replaced the lineage of Ithamar (6:3), which had held the high priesthood (1 Sam. 3:27–30) until Abiathar became embroiled in the royal pretensions of Adonijah and was deposed by Solomon (1 Kin. 2:20–23). The present passage aims to demonstrate the legitimacy of the Zadokite line through Eleazar, the brother of Ithamar. The other Levitical branches included the family of Samuel (1 Chr. 6:28), here placed in the clan of Kohath (6:33–38), probably by adoption into the family of Ebiasaph, Assir, and Tahath (cf. vv. 23, 37) after being dedicated by his mother Hannah to the temple (1 Sam. 1:19–28). The original organization of the musicians for the house of the Lord is traced back to David (v. 31). Even though Samuel, raised as a priest assistant, was eventually able to offer sacrifice, the distinction between the musical Levites (1 Chr. 6:31–48) and the altar-going Aaronites (6:49–52) is upheld. The family of Aaron is specifically mentioned because it constituted the priestly family (vv. 49–53). The genealogy of Zadokite priests is repeated from vv. 3–8, bringing it up to the times of David and Solomon only (cf. v. 10). As elsewhere, the main concern of the list is to show the legitimacy of the Eleazar-Zadok line. But it also reminds us of the Aaronite/Levite distinction, and in this way, it also serves as an introduction to the next section, the Levitical cities (vv. 54–81). The list includes the cities of refuge (Josh. 21), where Levites acted as judges in capital cases, but it goes on to cover every major city in the kingdom of David. This expansion of the original listing may reflect an attempt to establish a wider and more accessible judicial system by assigning special sections in the larger cities to Levitical judges. In this sense alone they become also “Levitical cities.”

7:1–40. The Rest of the Tribes. The first one is the tribe of Issachar (7:1–5). In contrast to Gad or Manasseh, the names of the sons of Issachar here do match in general terms with Genesis 46:13 and Numbers 26:23–24, but the numbers given for the two main branches and others, totaling 87,000, correspond to the time of David (1 Chr. 7:2) and may reflect the ill-conceived census of chapter 21. The tribe of Benjamin (vv. 6–12) is also reported in military terms. In v. 12 the Hushim are said to be descendants of “Aher” (lit. “another one”), a term sometimes used in Hebrew to avoid mentioning a name with unpleasant associations. This might refer to Dan (Gen. 46:23; Num. 26:42), whose descendants are not otherwise listed and who are also absent from 1 Chronicles 6:68–69, where they would be expected (cf. Josh. 21:23; Rev. 7:5–8). This is probably related to the idolatrous apostasy of the tribe (Judg. 18–19). Together with Dan, the tribe of Naphtali (1 Chr. 7:13) constituted the only descendants of Bilhah, so after the disappearance of Dan from the scene there were no others; this is perhaps the significance of Bilhah’s mention here.

The tribe of west Manasseh is discussed in vv. 14–19. Verse 14 is difficult to translate; the LXX makes Asiel a brother of Machir, the firstborn (Josh. 17:1). The exact relationship of Huppim and Shuppim to other family members is also unclear. As for Zelophehad (v. 15), Numbers 26:33 and Joshua 17:3 indicate that his father was Hephher, a son of Gilead, and was therefore his grandson.

The family history of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chr. 7:20–29) opens with a tragic incident of patriarchal times, before the Israelites went to Egypt. The report on the tribe of Asher (vv. 30–40) agrees in general terms with Genesis 46:17 while adding a wealth of detail that demonstrates the access of the Chronicler to other ancient sources.

8:1–40. The Ancestry of Saul. Here the report differs from the account already given in 7:6–12. Besides different names, the list is also unique in often employing the term yalaḏ, “begot” or “was the father of” or “bore” (vv. 1, 8, 9, 11, 33–37), perhaps because it originated from a different archive. Some differences may be due to alternate names; in other cases the names may be links omitted by some lists which use “son” in the sense of “descendant.” Gera (v. 3) may have been in fact the ancestor of Ehud the judge (Judg. 3:15); the migration to the lands of Moab (1 Chr. 8:8) may explain why Ehud tangled with King Eglon there. The names Esh-Baal (v. 33) and Merib-Baal (v. 34) do not imply that Saul and/or Jonathan were worshipers of Baal. The term only means “owner” or “master”; it could be applied to the true God and is the regular Hebrew word for “husband.” In its religious use, it later became identified with the Syrian god Hadad, who was invoked by his followers as their lord or “baal” (Hos. 2:16–17). For this reason scribes later replaced those names with Ish-boshet and Mephiboshet (2 Sam. 2:8; 4:4; 9:6), where “boshet” (“shame”) parodies such invocation.

9:1–44. The Dwellers in Jerusalem. This list of returnees from the Exile includes some from the northern tribes and Benjamin (9:1–9), but its primary emphasis is on the tribes of Judah and Levi. The Aaronite (priestly) branch of the latter is specified first (vv. 10–13), then the others in charge of security (vv. 17–27) and equipment (vv. 28–34). The list then repeats in vv. 35–44 essentially the same information as 8:29–40. This repetition serves to focus on King Saul, whose last battle and death follow (10:1–14). Overall, the brief highlighting of Saul in 9:35–10:14 is an appropriate transition to what seems to be the primary concern of the Chronicler: the reigns of David and Solomon.

10:1—29:30

DAVID’S REIGN AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE TEMPLE

After a discussion of the death of Saul (10:1–14), this long section concentrates on the rise of David to power (11:1–12:40), his decision to bring the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem (13:1–16:43), his covenant with God (17:1–27), and his military success (18:1–20:8). The rest deals with matters related to the future temple, beginning with the selection of the site (20:1–30), interrupted by the military census (21:1–6), and followed by specific preparations for the building of the temple (22:1–19) and the organization of the temple services (23:1–26:32) and the kingdom (27:1–34). Since David would not build the temple, he left for his successor instructions for the building project (28:1–29:30). After parading the broad sweep of Israelite history through comprehensive genealogies, the books of Chronicles focus on the story of the temple, which was central to the identity of the community of those who returned from Babylon. The topic is close to the center of the theology of the books (see “The Temple in Chronicles,” p. 541).

10:1–14

The Death of Saul

Since David was not a crown prince, an account of the change of dynasty was necessary. The end of the house of Saul (vv. 1–7) was no mere accidental overthrow of a king by foreigners. God had in Israel a kingdom and a throne (note the emphasis on these concepts in 1 Chr. 17:14, an emphasis absent in 2 Sam. 7:16), and He had already chosen David. It was only because of the godly men of Jabesh, in Transjordan, that Saul escaped the ultimate indignity: his remains unburied (1 Chr. 10:8–12). He did not, however, escape the profanation of his corpse by enemies (his head in one place, [v. 10] and his body in another, [1 Sam. 31:10]). The well-known Philistine god Dagon (1 Chr. 10:10) does not appear in the extant copies of the Hebrew text of 1 Samuel 31:10, the source of the present account, but only in copies of the LXX. The seven-day fast (1 Chr. 10:12) was customary among the bereaved; it was limited to certain types of food or times of the day (the opposite is presented as an exception to the rule in Matt. 4:2; Luke 4:2). A theological evaluation of the tragic death of Saul is given (1 Chr. 10:13): it was the result of his unfaithfulness. Two reasons are specified: he did not keep the word of the Lord, and he consulted a medium (v. 13). Here the Chronicler elaborates on 1 Samuel 28:7–20; 31:1–3. The Lord had strictly forbidden the practice of consulting the spirits in Israel (Deut. 18:11).

11:1–12:40

David's Rise to Power

The Philistines were able to eliminate Saul and his three sons and all his official “house” (1 Chr. 10:6). Another son, Esh-Baal/Ishbosheth, survived, but he lacked preparation and/or talent for the throne (see his turning against his own power base in 2 Sam. 3). Even among Saul’s intimate circle, the promises of God to David were known and weighed heavily on the outcome of the ensuing civil war (2 Sam. 3:9–10). In consequence, 1 Chronicles skips this civil war entirely, instead focusing immediately on the rise of David’s star.

11:1–9. The Capture of Jerusalem. This conquest was not merely a mop-up operation that eliminated the Canaanite strongholds still present in the land, centuries after the Exodus. Rather, it was crucial for the success of David as the king of a united monarchy. The reader has already been informed in 3:4 of the reign of David in Hebron over the tribe of Judah alone (2 Sam. 2:4, 7), so the Chronicler does not repeat it here. The emphasis is rather on “all Israel” (1 Chr. 11:4), perhaps indicating either that David and his men in 2 Samuel 5:6 represented the whole nation or that there was a special force under David in addition to a larger national army. The implication was that this city, hitherto in foreign hands and therefore not in any particular tribe, was to become the capital of the whole nation. At the same time, the capture granted David the aura of a conqueror. This was how he became increasingly renowned and powerful (1 Chr. 11:9).

11:10–47. The Mighty Men of David. These were the men who had taken a firm stand in support of David’s rule over all Israel (11:10). The three great warriors, the mighty men (vv. 11–12), were the innermost circle of David’s supporters in the armed forces. In our copies of Chronicles two are named: Jashobeam and Eleazar, and in 2 Samuel 23:9–12 Shammah is also mentioned. These three men seem to have been different from the three of the thirty chief men (1 Chr. 11:15), two of whom are named (vv. 20–26), who in turn were different from the mighty warriors named in vv. 26–47.

Despite the mighty acts of David’s men, it was the Lord who always brought about a great victory (v. 14). The cave of Adullam (v. 15) was not a specific cavern, but a collective term for an area riddled with hollows of all sizes. We are not given the exact location of the incident with the water of the well of Bethlehem, David's native town, but the stronghold of v. 16 was probably one of those hollows particularly well suited to his purposes (1 Sam. 23:29). The names after Uriah the Hittite in 1 Chronicles 11:41 do not appear in the account of 2 Samuel 23, neither is their geographical provenance provided as is the case with the preceding names. This illustrates how the Chronicler was able to supplement the information of Samuel and Kings with other sources.

12:1–22. The Growth of David's Army. This section shows how David was able to quickly confront the army of Abner after the death of Saul. Many of the best men came to him while he was still a refugee in the Philistine town of Ziklag (v. 1), affirming that his God was the One who helped him (v. 18). David was wary of the Benjamites (v. 17), relatives of Saul, who had betrayed him before (1 Sam. 23:12, 19–20). But Amasai (1 Chr. 12:18) put him at ease with a speech as he was moved by the Spirit.

12:23–40. David's Army at Hebron. The numbers recorded here attest to the fact that David had the support of all Israel, having a great army, like the "army of God" (v. 22). It was not only the sons of Issachar who understood the times and what Israel should do (v. 32); they all were of one mind to make David king (v. 38).

13:1–16:43

The Ark Brought to Jerusalem

Not only did the ark contain the tablets of the covenant, the Ten Commandments, but its cover, or "mercy seat," was associated with the throne of God (flanked by its guards, the cherubim). This was the very center of God's presence and communication with Israel (Num. 7:89; 1 Chr. 13:6). Lost to the Philistines and returned by God's miraculous intervention, it had been in a private house for a long time (1 Sam. 4:1–7:1), and Saul had done nothing to restore it to its rightful place (1 Chr. 13:3). It was now time for David to show not only how different he was from Saul but also to demonstrate his religious and spiritual leadership.

13:1–14. The First Attempt. David gathered all Israel (v. 5) from the Shihor (Egyptian term meaning "pond of Horus," probably one of the Bitter Lakes in the Suez area) up to the entrance of Hamath (sometimes translated as "Lebo Hamath"; lebo—"entrance" would in that case be viewed as a town in Hamath). These locations were the God-given ideal boundaries of the promised land (e.g., Num. 34:8). Since the ark had arrived from Philistia in a cart, the family keeping it may have thought that such a vehicle was an appropriate method for its transport. But as a result of handling the ark as if it were any other load, Uzza(h), one of the members of this family, was killed, and David deposited the sacred object in the house of Obed-Edom (see 2 Sam. 6). This man was a Levite and specifically a Kohathite (1 Chr. 13:13; cf. 15:24; 16:38; 26:5; Num. 16:1; hence probably a Gittite from Gath-Rimmon; 1 Chr. 6:69). David was determined that henceforth proper procedure be followed for the transportation of the ark (chap. 16). But before the necessary preparations could be completed, he had to confront the Philistines, enemies of both the Israelites and the Tyrians.

14:1–17. The Philistine Wars. Hiram, king of Tyre (Phoenicia), was also an enemy of the Philistines. This explains the association of the topics here. Hiram sent David, his ally, a gift of palatial timber, for which his nation was famous. David interpreted this to mean that the Lord had established him as king over Israel (vv. 1–2). The Chronicler takes this opportunity to record David's palaces and new wives in Jerusalem (v. 3; 15:1). Even though displeased with the careless handling of the most sacred symbol of His presence, God was pleased with the intentions of David and provided him with the intelligence and strategy needed in order to defeat his enemies (14:8–16). His military victories gained through the Lord's help caused all nations to fear him (v. 17)—the fulfillment of God's covenantal promises (Deut. 2:25)—and his power was greatly enhanced.

15:1–24. Preparations for Moving the Ark. The account of 2 Samuel 6 is here enriched with much detail, emphasizing the care of David and the priests in preparing a place for the ark (v. 1; Heb. maqom, "a sacred site"). First, only the persons and transportation methods authorized by the law were to be used (1 Chr. 15:1–10; cf. Ex. 37:4–5; Deut. 10:8). Second, those approaching the ark had to be purified (1 Chr. 15:11–15). Separating sacred objects from ordinary ones helped the people to place supreme importance on God's word, so different from changeable, erring human words and concepts. Third, sacred music was to be used (vv. 16–24). The perspective and peculiar concern of the Chronicler is clear here: this sacred ministry was placed in the care of the Levites (vv. 16–24), even before their official appointment (16:37–43). Sanctuary music included singing and instruments. Levites played strings and percussion; the priests blew the trumpets (15:24).

15:25—16:3. The Procession with the Ark.

First, there was a convocation (v. 25). The importance of the occasion required not only sacred personnel but also representatives from the people: the king, the elders of Israel, and the captains over thousands. The procession was, second, characterized by joy (v. 26). Bringing the ark was an especially joyous occasion (cf. v. 25), so music and a ceremony of sacrificed bulls and rams were provided. Third, proper attire was required (v. 27). None were allowed to approach the ark without sacred garments; even the king had to put on linen and an ephod (lit. “panel,” placed on the chest). This was required only of high priests who had to approach the ark in the course of their yearly ministry in the inner sanctum. Now the symbol of God’s presence was outdoors. Fourth, there was acclamation (v. 28). Popular shouting expressed the feelings of the people for their national religious symbol. All of this contrasted with the attitude of Michal (v. 29), Saul’s daughter and David’s wife (1 Sam. 18:17–30), who apparently believed that David’s personal behavior, amid all the music and dance (1 Chr. 15:29) in honor of a single sacred object, was unnecessary and undignified, at least for the king. Such an attitude on the part of a member of Saul’s family toward the religious past of Israel and the new king revealed her discomfort with David as king and with what he was doing.

David had erected a tent or tabernacle (16:1) to house the ark in Jerusalem (16:1–3). This differed from the sacred tabernacle of the wilderness, which had somehow survived the destruction of the temple of Shiloh by the Philistines (Jer. 7:12; cf. Josh. 18:1; 1 Sam. 1:3, 7, 24) and was now functioning as the focal point of sacrifice in Gibeon (1 Chr. 16:39; cf. 2 Chr. 1:3–6).

Because of the double-shrine situation, only some priests and Levites were assigned to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 16:4–6); the rest were left in Gibeon for the time being (16:38–39). It may be surprising that David did not bring the tabernacle from Gibeon to Jerusalem, but such a move would have been easily understood as a rejection of Gibeon as a place of worship. Instead, he was to eventually provide an awe-inspiring temple, surpassing the house of the Lord lost in Shiloh, which would silence any possible critics. The religious act concluded with a hymn of praise composed by David for this most important occasion (16:7–36). This composition includes material also found in Psalms 105:1–15; 96:1–13; and 106:47–48.

16:37–43. Arrangements for Regular Worship.

The worship program in Jerusalem was intended to invoke, thank, and praise God in Jerusalem with prayer, song, and musical instruments (16:4). The burnt offerings of the daily service (16:40) were offered on the altar located in Gibeon. Just as in the early Davidic reign, those who returned from the Exile kept sacrifices together with verbal worship in the synagogue. The role of Zadok (v. 39) in the Gibeon worship center foreshadowed the future importance of his lineage (see commentary on 6:1–81).

17:1–27

Covenant of God with David

While the Chronicler does not explicitly elaborate the foundational concept of God’s covenant, this section sets forth the promises given to David that imply an eternal commitment of God toward His people.

17:1–15. David’s Desire to Build a Temple and God’s Promises.

In contrast to Saul, David’s godliness was deep and sincere. Israel was no longer a group of tribes wandering in the desert or suffering the harassment of enemies. David felt that the newly found comfort needed to be correlated with the quality of the structures erected by Israel for worship (v. 1). His pious desire was met with the enthusiastic initial approval of Nathan (v. 2), who was immediately overridden by the Lord, in whose name the prophet was speaking (vv. 4–6). God had not dwelt in one and the same place since the Exodus (v. 5), nor was He concerned with having a luxurious palace of cedar (v. 6). But He did take note of David’s intention. Instead of David building for Him, God Himself would build a “house” for the faithful king (v. 10), a perpetual dynasty. As for David himself, his role was that of a warrior (vv. 8–9; cf. 1 Kin. 5:3), so it would fall to one of David’s sons (1 Chr. 17:11) to actually construct the temple (v. 11). Though the emphasis of the Chronicler is on Solomon, he does record divine promises to establish the Davidic king forever (v. 12) as God’s “son” (v. 13; Pss. 2; 110). For the Chronicler this means indeed forever, as is strongly emphasized in the text (1 Chr. 17:14; Ps. 45:6–7). Such perpetual sonship was to provide an important foundation for the conception of the Messiah in the NT (Rom. 1:3–4; 8:29; Heb. 1:8).

17:16–27. The Response of the King. The story now shows the humility and godliness of David. He perceived that this was indeed the word of God, not of Nathan (cf. 17:2), so he sat before the Lord (i.e., before the ark that represented Him; v. 16) and acknowledged the greatness of God and His grace toward Israel (vv. 19–22) in contrast to his own unworthiness (vv. 16–17). At the same time he accepted the promises with faith (vv. 23–26), convinced that God had indeed made Israel His own people forever (v. 22), which is the central concept in the covenant (e.g., Gen. 17:7; Lev. 11:45; Jer. 31:33; Rev. 21:3).

18:1–20:8

The Military Glory of David

This section underlines David's role as a warrior, which prevented the realization of his dream to construct the temple. But the narrative illustrates what God was willing to do for His people when they and their king were totally committed to Him. David is depicted as the ideal king to whom God gave victories over their enemies. These enemies included the Philistines (18:1; 20:4–8), Moab and Zobah (18:2–11), Edom (vv. 12–13), and the Ammonites and the Syrians (19:1–20:3).

18:1–13. Victories over the Philistines, Moab, Zobah, and Edom. While the previous Philistine wars had been largely defensive (14:8–17), David now decided to eliminate their threat definitively (18:1), but he would have to face them again (20:4–8). The parallel in 2 Samuel 8 contains an unusual expression; modern versions tend to translate "Metheg Ammah" (lit. "the bridle of the capital") in the light of the present passage in Chronicles, as meaning that David took the control, until then exercised by Gath, of smaller towns of the area. Next fell the kingdoms of Moab (v. 2) and Zobah (in Syria, vv. 3–8). Their booty and/or tribute were dedicated or set aside (v. 11) for the future temple (vv. 2, 9–11; regarding other large numbers, see 1 Chronicles 5:21–26). Horses were admired and feared by ancient peoples as war equipment (Job 39:19–25; Is. 31:1; Jer. 4:13), but they were not to take up too much of the nation's budget (Deut. 17:16; Josh. 11:6, 9), at least until the flourishing times of Solomon (2 Chr. 9:25). David, however, was already able to establish a small chariot corps; the rest of the horses were hamstrung (1 Chr. 18:4), perhaps in order to sell them to other peoples for their meat but to disable them as war equipment.

The successful campaign against Edom (vv. 12–13) was led by one of the generals of David's kingdom, Abishai (v. 12), a brother and lieutenant of Joab (19:11). This piece of information is not recorded in 2 Samuel 8:13 or in the superscript to Psalm 60, again underlining the access of the Chronicler to records that supplement other accounts in the Bible. Although the Lord was giving David victories, he was well-organized for the task (1 Chr. 18:14–17). He administered his kingdom wisely (v. 14), following mainly an Egyptian model of organization. Abimelech the son of Abiathar (v. 16) remained in charge of the liturgy for the ark, close to the king. The Cherethites and the Pelethites (v. 17; perhaps Cretans and Pelasgians) were bodyguards from other countries, without local ties, as an added security measure. David's sons (v. 17) were administrative officers or chief officials for the king. Second Samuel 8:18 refers to them using a Hebrew word usually employed for "priests"—kohanim—suggesting that they may have performed some priestly functions, unless the term was also used to designate a secular administrative responsibility as suggested by the term used in the Chronicles.

19:1–20:8. Victories over Ammon, Syria, and the Philistine Giants. Since the Ammonite king resorted to the aid of Syrian mercenaries (19:6–7), the conquest of Ammon seems to have taken place at an earlier time, before the occupation of Syrian lands by Israel (18:5–8). These were the first to flee (v. 14), as did their compatriots from beyond the Euphrates (v. 18; on other large numbers, see 1 Chronicles 5:21–26). The crown of the "king" in Rabbah (20:1–2; present day Amman), which was taken from his head (suggesting the latter was immobile), probably refers to the Ammonite idol Milcom (1 Kin. 11:5) as read by the LXX and other ancient versions (the Hebrew letters of the name "their king" spell precisely the name of the god). This explains how such a crown might have reached the unwieldy weight of one talent (75 lb or 34 kg); David probably made use of a part of this crown with only a precious stone (singular in the Hebrew text). The king had stayed at Jerusalem (1 Chr. 20:1) where the scandalous affair with Bathsheba took place (2 Sam. 11:1–5) as well as his order to have Uriah killed by the Ammonites (2 Sam. 11:16). The Chronicler omits these incidents, probably because he is concerned only with official acts of government and institutions that emphasize the glory of David's reign.

The destruction of the Philistine giants was not a definite campaign, but a collection of incidents that took place at different times (1 Chr. 20:4–8). In one of them we read about the death of Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the Gittite, by the hand of Elhanan the Bethlehemite (v. 5). By a mechanical mistake, our present copies of 2 Samuel 21:9 misread the two Hebrew letters meaning “brother of” and have Elhanan killing Goliath himself, thus appearing to contradict 1 Samuel 17. This again underlines the value of the Chronicles for comparison with other sources.

21:1–30

The Choice of a Site for the Temple

As we have seen, the Chronicler usually omits the mistakes of David in order to emphasize his role as king and his connection with the temple. But here we find a narrative about a serious mistake made by him, namely, the story of the census. This narrative is likely included here precisely because its resolution led to finding a place for the building of the temple.

21:1–6. The Military Census. Taking a census was abominable (v. 6) because a complete list of men of military age and fitness indicated reliance on human power rather than on divine intervention since in this case it does not appear that anyone paid a ransom (see Ex. 30:11, 16). The Chronicler has Satan inciting David to take the census (1 Chr. 21:1), while 2 Samuel 24:1 attributes this incitement to the “anger of the LORD” (see below, “Satan and David”). Checks and balances in international power are, of course, fully in the hand of the Lord (Dan. 4:34–35). There is also a disagreement in terms of quantities with 2 Samuel 24:9, which may be explained by supposing that in our passage the tribe of Judah, mentioned separately (1 Chr. 21:5), is included in the total, while in 2 Samuel it is an additional five hundred thousand. In any case, David did not count the tribe of Levi (v. 6), which was exempted from mandatory military service in order to guard the temple and maintain public worship (Num. 1:47–49). Probably for the same reason he did not count the tribe of

Satan and David

The mention of Satan in 1 Chronicles 21:1 has been a point of debate among scholars. There are two main reasons for this. First, the parallel account in 2 Samuel 24:1 does not mention Satan but speaks about God's wrath against David that incited him to take the census. Second, it is debated whether the Hebrew satan in 1 Chronicles is a proper name (Satan) or a function (an adversary).

1. Usage of the Term “Satan.” The Hebrew word satan means “adversary, opponent” and is used to designate human beings who functioned as adversaries or opponents of other persons, be they military or personal (e.g., 1 Kin. 11:14, 23). It also designates the heavenly being who opposed Balaam's conduct (Num. 22:22). Concerning the absence or presence of the definitive article, some scholars have argued that in Hebrew grammar when a noun is accompanied by the definite article (“the”) the noun is not a proper name but rather refers to a particular function. In the case of the Hebrew word satan, it would simply designate a person or being who functions as the adversary/the opponent. They believe that this is the meaning of the term in Job (1:6; 2:1) and Zechariah (3:1) where the article is used. But other scholars have argued that it is precisely when the noun is accompanied by the definite article that it functions as a proper name. The prevailing view is that in 1 Chronicles 21:1, where the article is omitted, satan is a proper name and designates a being called Satan, the adversary, as is the case in the NT (e.g., Mark 4:15).

2. Linguistic Connections. There are clear linguistic connections among Job 2:1, Zechariah 3:1, and 1 Chronicles 21:1. In Chronicles Satan stood (amad, “to stand”) against Israel and incited (sut, “to incite”) David to sin. The use of the verb “to stand” (amad) together with the noun satan is found in Zechariah 3:1, establishing a connection between the two passages. In both cases he was opposing the people of God. The verb “to incite” (sut) appears in conjunction with the noun satan in Job 2:3, also establishing a connection between these two passages. In Job, he incited God against Job, and in Chronicles he incited David against God. It could be suggested that since the author of the Chronicles is aware of the other two passages his understanding of the term satan reflects the meaning of the term in the other two books. For him, satan in his two other sources designates a proper name. In other words, he is not contrasting his usage with that of the other two passages; the presence or absence of the article is irrelevant. The connection shared by the three passages makes it highly unlikely that what we have here is part of the evolution of a term from a function to the proper name of God’s archenemy. The OT indicates that there is a being who opposes God and His plans for His people (e.g., Gen. 3:1–5; Lev. 16:8–10, 20–22; Job 1–2; Is. 14:12–14; cf. Rev. 12:9).

3. The Narratives in Chronicles and Samuel. As we have seen, the role of Satan is quite clear in the three previous passages. First, he opposed God’s plan for His followers, thus becoming His adversary. This is particularly the case in Job where he opposed the way God dealt with Job. Second, he incited people to disobey God and break away from Him. Third, he wanted evil things for God’s people. According to Chronicles, Satan was standing against Israel; that is to say, he was an enemy who opposed Israel, and in order to damage Israel he incited David to take a census, fully knowing that the people would suffer as a result. In the narrative, the opponent of Satan was Joab, who advised David not to do this because it would bring guilt upon the people. But Satan had blinded David, and he was unwilling to listen. The nature of the sin is not clear in 1 Chronicles. Why was taking a census a national sin? Censuses where a ransom price was paid were taken in Israel without any penalty (e.g., Ex. 30:11–16). Perhaps, as some scholars have suggested, the difference here is that this was a military census taken without divine approval, and therefore it expressed reliance on human military power. It was a breach of the covenant relation with the Lord.

If this is the case, then the difference with the account of the event in 2 Samuel 24:1 is not of major significance. The wrath of the Lord, mentioned in that verse as the cause for the census, is now clarified as God having allowed Satan to incite David to take the census. In His anger God did not intervene to protect David. Nevertheless, God was still the Sovereign Lord who brought the plague to an end and used the experience to lead David to find a place for the building of the temple. He did not give Satan complete control over His followers (see Job 1:12; 2:6). In the process, we see David acting as the ideal king who, after sinning, repented and sought forgiveness from the Lord.

Benjamin, in whose territory the worship center of Gibeon was located.

Once David recognized his sin, there was confession followed by divine punishment (1 Chr. 21:7–15). In contrast to Saul, David seemed always willing to accept his sin and make amends. He said to God, “I have sinned greatly” (v. 8), a confession motivated by the ministry of Gad, David’s seer (v. 9; cf. 1 Sam. 22:3–5; 1 Chr. 29:29). While God grants forgiveness, a forgiven sin may still have consequences during earthly history. David was granted, however, the privilege of choosing between three divine judgments (vv. 11–13). They were to last either three years, three months, or three days (v. 12). This consistent “threeness” of divine judgments indicates that the Chronicles preserve the best reading in contrast to 2 Samuel 24:13, which reads “seven years” (although some translations follow the LXX, which has “three years”). In the course of the ensuing pestilence, the Lord looked and relented (v. 15).

21:16–30. Divine Choice for the Site of an Altar. A heavenly vision showed David the presence of the Angel of the Lord (v. 16) in terms reminiscent of the experience of Balaam (Num. 22:31). As a response to the intercessory prayer of David and the elders (representatives of the threatened city), he was commanded to build an altar at the place where the angel had received the order to stop the slaughter (1 Chr. 21:18; cf. v. 15). Approaching God must always remind us of both His mercy and His judgment. It is the divine intention that judgment would lead to salvation. The private property rights of an Israelite were inviolable: if sold, land would eventually revert to the family. David availed himself of this unique opportunity to buy from a non-Israelite, a Jebusite, so that the site for the temple would be completely independent from any particular tribe or Israelite family. While Ornan ("Araunah" in 2 Sam. 24:16), mindful of the high investiture of David (1 Chr. 21:21), wanted to donate it for such a sacred use, David insisted on paying full price (v. 24). Its amount varies between here and 2 Samuel 24. In 2 Samuel 24:20, fifty shekels of silver was the means of payment, but it refers only to the floor of the threshing place, while according to 1 Chronicles 21:25, David paid six hundred pieces of gold for the whole sanctuary mount plus the animals for the burnt offering.

The erection of the altar (21:26-30) was a sensitive act because God had authorized only one altar at a time (Deut. 12:8-14), and the altar at Gibeon was still functioning (1 Chr. 21:29). However, God had also made provision for moving the altar site, through a special revelation, to any place where He would cause His Name to be remembered (Ex. 20:24). Hence 1 Chronicles takes pains to show such revelation by means of the fire from heaven (the usual Hebrew idiom for lightning) which ignited the offering, as well as the success of the entreaty to stop the pestilence (1 Chr. 21:26-28; not found in 2 Sam.) and to make clear that the Gibeon altar was not accessible to David (1 Chr. 21:30).

22:1-19

Preparations for the Temple

David acknowledged that God had chosen this particular site for the house of the Lord God (v. 1) and started preparations to build the temple. He began to accumulate materials for the structure, to organize the work of construction (chap. 22) and the services in the future temple (chaps. 23-26). He even defined the overall organization of the kingdom with an eye on responsibilities related to public worship (chap. 27). Indeed, the whole period of David's reign is told from the viewpoint of the conception of God's temple (chaps. 10-29). Chapter 22 lists the gathering of workers and materials for the construction of the temple (vv. 2-5) and contains David's speeches to Solomon (vv. 6-16) and to the elders (vv. 17-19).

22:2-5. David Gathers Workmen and Materials. David resorted to recruiting foreigners (v. 2), the defeated original inhabitants of Canaan still living on the land, or landless immigrants. Stones are the ubiquitous building material in the Holy Land, usually in their natural state, but for monumental constructions like the temple they were shaped (v. 2) into regular blocks. Iron joints would reinforce the solidity of such walls (v. 3). Bronze and cedar (vv. 3-4) would also contribute to a temple which had to be exceedingly magnificent, famous, and glorious throughout all countries (vv. 4-5).

22:6-19. David's Speech to Solomon and the Leaders. David charged Solomon with the sacred task of building the temple (vv. 6-10), with an induction formula that Moses had used with Joshua (Josh. 1:6-9), and that David would later use again (1 Chr. 28:20). This included encouragement (v. 13), description of the task (v. 10), and invocation of God's assistance (v. 9). There is a reference to the reason for denying David the privilege of building the temple. It was not just that David could not build it because of the wars surrounding him (1 Kin. 5:3), but it was also because he had made himself unfit because he shed much blood (1 Chr. 22:8). A temple should not be a monument to the victories of a conqueror, nor a reminder of the spoils plundered from many lands (as was the case in Egypt and other ancient cultures), but a "house of prayer for all nations" (Is. 56:7). The figures in 1 Chronicles 22:14 may seem very high. They indicate about 3,600 tons of gold (3,265,865 kg; 220 cubic yards) or the equivalent of a wall of solid gold 3 feet high (0.9 m), 3 feet wide (0.9 m), and 660 feet long (201.2 m). However, we have no particular evidence to suggest that these figures are unreliable.

Joshua had established the sanctuary at Shiloh (Josh. 18:1), which was to function as the temple of the Lord once the land was kabash ("subdued," "brought under control," or "conquered") by the defeat of the Canaanites and Israel was at rest (e.g., Josh. 22:4; 23:1). In a similar way, after David defeated the Philistines and other enemies who surrounded Israel, the land was kabash ("subdued," "brought under control," or "conquered") and brought to rest (1 Chr. 22:18). Now he was ready to promote the construction of the temple. Leaders, therefore, were exhorted to collaborate with the project. The actual dwelling of God is in heaven, as this text and many others indicate (e.g., 2 Chr. 7), yet His name resided in this temple (1 Chr. 22:19; 2 Chr. 2:1); it was there that He revealed Himself to them.

23:1—26:32*Organization of Temple Services

The actual organization of the temple services took place in David's old age, soon after he made his son Solomon king (v. 1). Though using very ancient records, the Chronicler deals with the clergy following the order of Ezekiel (Ezek. 44), who had predicted, during the Exile in Babylon, a future ideal temple. The Chronicler identifies the Levites based on their genealogy; their responsibilities were assigned (1 Chr. 12:1–32). The divisions of the priests were organized (24:1–19), and the Chronicler identifies other Levites (24:20–31). The musicians were organized (25:1–30) as well as the gatekeepers, the treasurers (26:1–28), and the officials and judges (26:29–33).

23:1—24:31. Levites and Priests. Since they had not been included in the military census, their numbers were now determined (21:6). Following the prescriptions of Numbers 4:3, those who were thirty years old or older were to do the work in the sanctuary (1 Chr. 23:3), but in view of the fact that they would no longer have to carry heavy objects the minimum age was later reduced to twenty years (23:24; Ezra 3:8). They would assist the priests in working on the temple of the Lord (1 Chr. 23:4, 28–31), as musicians (vv. 23:5, 30) and temple guards (gatekeepers; v. 5). They would also help the Israelites during sacrifices (v. 31). They were organized according to the three branches of the tribe (v. 6).

A new list of priestly lineages is provided in this passage (cf. 6:49–53; 9:10–12). Ahimelech (or Ahimelek), the high priest from the line of Ithamar and Zadok from Eleazar's, aided David in forming their appointed offices of service (24:3). While Ithamarites contributed eight lineages, and Eleazarites sixteen, the resulting twenty-four orders of priests are not classified as belonging to one or the other line. One may suppose that even numbers up to sixteen correspond to Ithamarites, and all others to Eleazarites (v. 6). Their exalted status as officials of the sanctuary and officials of God is noted (v. 5). The list of Levites in vv. 20–31 mostly parallels that of chapter 23, except in two cases. In the line of Merari, the branch of Jaaziah is added (v. 26), and in the line of Gershon, the son of Levi is missing (but not the lineage of Gershon the son of Moses; v. 20; cf. 23:16). One further generation is usually added to each lineage, again illustrating the use of different records.

25:1–31. The Musicians. These were selected by David and the commanders (v. 1) or chiefs of the temple service (24:6). Most translations read "army commanders," but the Hebrew word tsaba' can be translated in various ways, including in reference to the sanctuary service (Num. 4:3). Apparently three main lines of Levites were represented among these singers and players of stringed instruments and cymbals (1 Chr. 25:1): (1) Asaph (v. 2) from the line of Gershon (6:39, 43; see 15:19; 16:4, 7); (2) Jeduthun (v. 3), also called Ethan, from the line of Merari (6:44; 15:17, 19); and Heman (vv. 4–5) from Korah's line (6:33; 15:17, 19; 16:41–42). They were to "prophesy" with music (25:1–2), which probably means that they were to sing temple hymns that were originally written under divine inspiration (see 29:30). The distribution of names of family heads among the lineages is not totally random (25:9–31). It seems as if they decided by drawing lots that the lineage of Asaph should appear first, and then, alternately (every other item), names were drawn from his line until all were assigned. The second lot fell to Jeduthun, and henceforward every other item was from that line until all its names were drawn. After finishing with the sons of Asaph, the names alternated between the lines of Jeduthun and Heman, and once the names from Jeduthun were exhausted, the remainder came from the line of Heman.

26:1–32. Gatekeepers, Treasurers, and Officials and Judges. The tribe of Levi was peculiarly warlike (Gen. 49:5–7; Ex. 32:25–29), and this skill was given expression in their temple guards. If Levites did not regularly participate in war, it was not because they were not supposed to be involved in defense activities but because the temple itself needed permanent defenders (in antiquity, temples concentrated a large amount of riches, coveted by robbers and raiders) and crowd control personnel. Those assigned to this task had duties to fulfill in the Lord's temple (1 Chr. 26:12). The treasurers (vv. 20–28) appear immediately after the "gatekeepers" probably because they needed the support of those guards. Some were in charge of the treasuries of the house (or temple) of the Lord (v. 22) and received regular tithe and offerings (23:28–29), while others kept track of items like dedicated things (26:26), such as treasure collected in wars since the times of Samuel, Saul, David, and their respective generals (v. 28). In Israel, Levitical cities and city sections served as the judiciary (see 6:54–81). Special officials served also as judges over Israel outside the Jerusalem temple area (26:29), perhaps in rural areas, and others on the west side of the Jordan, away from Israel's heartland, both for all the Lord's work and in the service of the king (26:30). This shows the wide spectrum of duties that fell to the Levites once they did not have to carry the sanctuary any longer.

27:1–34

Administration of the Kingdom

As explained previously (see chap. 22), the institutions created by David did not just support the needs of the crown but also the religious needs of the people; they all contributed to the development of the temple. The administration of the kingdom involved military divisions (vv. 1–15), tribal leaders (vv. 16–23), administrators of the properties of the king (vv. 25–31), and a royal council (vv. 32–34).

27:1–24. Military Divisions and Tribal Leaders.

Some of the names of the mighty men of David (11:10–47) reappear here, but as captains of monthly relays of army/military divisions (27:1). In this way the king did not need to pay a standing army, and while not all the men needed to serve in full-time active duty roles during their turn, the kingdom enjoyed some measure of protection. Though hereditary divisions such as tribes can be dangerous in a united monarchy, it is clear that David could not do without the traditional tribal structure of the nation, if for no other reason than to supply him with the “thousands” needed for the military divisions (vv. 16–23). But that structure was altered: some tribes (Asher, Gad) had no leaders, while other tribes were subdivided (Manasseh: east and west; Levi: Aaronites and the rest of the clans). The functions of these leaders were clearly related to furnishing men for the royal service. Notice that vv. 23–24 justify the absence of concrete figures for each tribe. David now trusted the promise of the God of countless Israelites, no doubt with the help of the pestilence that interrupted his census (v. 24 and chap. 21). The manifestation of God's wrath made it impossible for Joab to complete the census; consequently, official figures were not available.

27:25–34. Managers of Crown Properties and the Royal Council. There is no indication that Israelites paid taxes under David. His expenses seem to have been defrayed from the product of royal lands: grains (v. 26), vineyards (v. 27), olive and sycamore trees (v. 28), cattle and other herds (v. 29), beasts of burden (v. 30), and various flocks (v. 31). Such production required skillful management, so David brought specialists from abroad when necessary, such as Ishmaelites to manage the camels and sheep (vv. 30–31). Part of these lands may have been acquired through conquests.

A small cabinet of five members seems to have helped David make important decisions. Verse 34 refers to Jehoiada, who succeeded Ahithophel, David's adviser, after his suicide; this is the closest the Chronicler comes to reporting the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. 15–19), to whom a counselor had given intelligent advice, but which was fortunately undone by the disinformation of another counselor, Hushai (1 Chr. 27:34).

28:1—29:30

Successor and Temple Readiness

David is reported to have made his son Solomon king (i.e., designated him officially as an heir) in 23:1, though he was already thinking of him as such in 22:5. In this last speech, David gave specific instructions concerning the construction of the temple to the leaders and to his son. He handed to Solomon the plans for the construction of the temple and financial resources (28:1–8), exhorted the young king to be courageous (vv. 9–10; cf. 29:1), and provided offerings for the temple (28:11–29:5). The leaders of the people also provided offerings for sacrifices and for the building (29:6–9). First Chronicles concludes with a hymn of praise and a prayer by David (vv. 10–20), the anointing of Solomon as king (vv. 21–25), and a summary of the reign of David (vv. 26–30).

28:1–21. The Speech. The public speech was in general similar to the one given in the palace (22:6–16). The first part had the purpose of providing a smooth transition between the reigns of David and Solomon. Just as there was no direct mention of the rebellion of Absalom (see commentary on 27:25–34), so was no mention made of Adonijah's, or the intrigues of Nathan and Bathsheba in order to secure the throne for Solomon (1 Kin. 1–2). Overall, the picture in the Chronicles is that of a peaceful transition, supported by “all Israel” (1 Chr. 29:24–25). This is not because the author wants to hide facts (he assumes many of his readers know the stories in Samuel and Kings, and refers all readers to them) but because he wants to underline the essential facts from a religious point of view.

29:1–20. The Offerings, the Hymn, and the Prayer. A key to a successful collection appeal is to show that those promoting it are also sacrificing in order to contribute. David showed that he had dedicated not only the treasure taken in wars but his own property (v. 3). Things he dedicated included not only precious metals but also quality woods and materials for flooring and mosaics (v. 2). David then offered a prayer, which began with thanksgiving for the God-given opportunity of contributing to His cause (vv. 10–15). This thanksgiving in turn started with reflection on the majesty of God: His kingdom (v. 11e) and power and glory (v. 11b). This composition was, indeed, the source of the liturgical conclusion of the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:13). It ends contrasting such majesty with the transitory nature of humanity, a passing shadow and without hope (1 Chr. 29:15). Hopelessness seems to be the natural condition of humans. After acknowledging that in giving offerings the people of God were only returning to Him what He had given them (vv. 16–17), David interceded for Israel and Solomon. What was needed, above anything else, was a heart that was shalēm (an adjectival form of the noun shalom—"peacefulness," "wholeness"), that is, a completely loyal or wholehearted commitment to trust in God and obey His instructions (vv. 18–19). This being a public prayer, it was followed by the response of the entire assembly, who bowed and prostrated themselves (29:20).

29:21–30. Solomon and Zadok Anointed: Succession of the Monarchy. The next day, the assembly confirmed (or proclaimed for a second time; v. 22) Solomon as heir to the throne (which he temporarily occupied as part of the designation ceremony; 29:22–23) and Zadok as acting high priest (Abiathar, though still alive, had fallen in disgrace after the rebellion of Adonijah; 1 Kin. 1:25). The anointing was accompanied by sacrifices for all Israel (1 Chr. 29:21). The Chronicler recognizes again a reign of David in Hebron, which he does not detail (see commentary on 3:1–9); he subsumes these seven years under the forty years of his reign over all Israel (29:26–27). Actually, the reign in Hebron had been only "over Judah" (2 Sam. 5:5), but the Chronicler is here emphasizing David's long life of riches and honor. The civil war in times of Esh-Baal/Ishbosheth was only a minor detour in that long and glorious march. Recognition is also given to sources in the books of Samuel, Nathan, and Gad (1 Chr. 29:29), authors who may indeed have had a hand in the composition of the history in our present books of Samuel and Kings, which have a definite prophetic perspective. The kingdoms of the lands (v. 30) may be a reference to those conquered by David (see chaps. 18–20). First Chronicles, like every book in the OT, closes leaving the reader with the expectation of more divine activity in the history of God's people. In this case, the people expectantly looked forward to the building of the temple as a center of worship and atonement.

The Temple in Chronicles

The topic of the temple in Chronicles runs from the beginning to the end of the book. In the genealogies we find a significant amount of material dedicated to the tribe of Levi and the work of priests and Levites (1 Chr. 6:1–80; 9:10–34). At the close of the book, Cyrus states that the Lord God of heaven commanded him to build a temple (lit. "house") for Him in Jerusalem (2 Chr. 36:23). In between these two textual segments, we find the history of the interaction of the kings of Judah, the people, and the temple. The genealogies also assign a significant amount of attention to King David. The tribe whose genealogy is, arguably, more carefully described than others is that of Judah (1 Chr. 2:3–55; 4:1–23), from which David came, and within it the family of David receives significant attention (3:1–24). The genealogy of King Saul and his death are mainly a foil to prepare the way for the rise of the ideal king of Israel, David (10:1–14). The theology of the temple in the books of Chronicles is worth exploring because of its connections with the kings and the people of Israel and their final fate.

1. David and the Temple. After the conquest of the city of Jerusalem, David manifested his personal devotion to the Lord by bringing the ark of the covenant to the city (1 Chr. 13:1–14). He recognized that the success of his role as king was determined by his commitment to the Lord manifested in his concern for properly handling the symbols of His presence and by obedience to the laws that regulated proper worship. Early in his career David realized that following the laws related to the sanctuary services was of supreme importance. The drastic failure of his first attempt to move the ark taught him that success was related to obedience to the divine will. In the second attempt, David followed the biblical directives and was successful (15:1-29). This pattern of success determined by submission to the cult is used throughout Chronicles to evaluate the reign of the different kings. David's practice would become the model.

The capture of the city of Jerusalem instilled in David the desire to build a temple to the Lord—a responsibility of kings throughout the ANE. He wanted for God the best house he could build (17:1; 22:5). But God surprised him by promising David that God would build a house (dynasty) for him that would last forever; one of his sons would always sit on the throne of Israel (17:10-14). David would not build the temple, but his son, Solomon, would do it (17:4, 12; 22:5). However, David would prepare everything needed for the construction, but the Lord Himself would choose the place and provide the tabnit (see Ex. 25:8-9) or model to be used in the construction. The first He did by manifesting Himself to David on Mount Moriah (1 Chr. 21:16, 18; 2 Chr. 3:1; 7:12; 12:13) and the second by revealing the plans for the building (1 Chr. 28:19; 2 Chr. 29:25). Thus, the temple and its services were invested with unquestionable divine authority.

David bought the land where the temple would be built (1 Chr. 21:18-30) and gathered everything Solomon would need for the building (22:1-4, 14-16; 29:2-9). He also organized the work of the priests (24:1-19) and Levites (23:1-32; 24:20-31) as musicians (25:1-31), gatekeepers (26:1-19), and treasurers (26:20-32). David encouraged his son to build the temple and to obey the laws of God (22:13). The reference here to these decrees, statutes, or judgments is not only to the moral law but more specifically to the law related to the sanctuary services (1 Chr. 16:40; 2 Chr. 23:18; 31:2-3). David established the foundation for the proper worship of the Lord in the place the Lord had chosen for this purpose. The future of the nation and of the Davidic dynasty would depend on their submission to the worship of the Lord in His temple according to the instructions He gave them. Temple, king, and nation had been permanently united.

2. Solomon and the Temple. The responsibility for the actual construction of the temple fell to Solomon, and he performed the task in perfect obedience to the instructions God gave to David. His first recorded action was to go to Gibeon, where the sanctuary was located, to worship the Lord and seek His guidance (2 Chr. 1:3-6). He then proceeded to build the temple on Mount Moriah (3:1-5:1). Finally the ark of the covenant was brought into the Most Holy Place of the new temple (5:2-12) and, as the Levites played their musical instruments praising the Lord for His goodness, mercy, and faithful love (v. 13), the glory of the Lord filled the house, thus sanctifying the temple (v. 14). The Lord was again residing among His people as His kingdom.

Solomon's prayer of dedication is theologically rich and closes with an invitation to God to arise and come to His resting place (6:41; 1 Chr. 17:5-6). At that moment fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt offering and the sacrifices, and the glory of the Lord filled the temple (2 Chr. 7:1). The people bowed down to their majestic and powerful God and worshiped and praised Him. In a sense the experience of the people at Sinai was being repeated, but this time the Lord was moving from the tent of meeting to a temple made of stone: a permanent dwelling. Soon after this, God appeared to Solomon once more in answer to the dedicatory prayer.

God promised Solomon that He would establish his throne and kingdom, as He had promised David (7:18). But this promise was always conditional. Solomon was expected to obey God's laws (v. 17), with an emphasis primarily on obedience to the laws related to the temple services. God explained to him that if he disregarded His commands and worshiped other gods, Israel would be deported and the temple destroyed (7:19). This was an explicit statement regarding the theological, political, and social centrality of the temple in the life of God's people. As a result of disregarding proper worship in the temple, the gifts of the dynasty of David, the land, and the temple would be withdrawn from the people. The future of all was dependent on serving the Lord according to His will in His holy temple (v. 28). What made Israel the people of God was the presence of the Lord in His temple.

3. Temple and Kings. Through David the Lord made clear that the primary responsibility of the king was to promote and care for the temple and its services, and to lead the people in the exclusive worship of the resident deity, the Lord. The success of the king and the nation were contingent on it. Solomon obeyed the Lord, and, like David, he and the nation prospered. Rehoboam abandoned the Lord (2 Chr. 12:1), and He handed the king over into the hands of the king of Egypt (v. 5). He was preserved because he humbled himself. The Northern Kingdom is considered by the Chronicler to be without hope because they built their own place of worship and appointed their own non-Levitical priests to serve on the high places in the worship of demons and the calf idols made by Jeroboam (11:15). It became like “the peoples of other lands” (13:9).

Second Chronicles identifies good kings, such as Abiah (13:10–12), Asa (14:2–15), Jehoshaphat (17:6–9), Jotham (27:2, 5–6), Hezekiah (29:35; 30:11–19), and Josiah, as those who undividedly served the Lord in His temple. Their fate was directly related to the temple worship. Some of the others had divided loyalties, including Joash (23:18), Amaziah (25:14–16), Uzziah (26:16–21), and Mannaseh (33:3–9, 12–17); they were ultimately abandoned by the Lord. Jehoram (20:33; 21:9–11), Ahaziah (22:2–4), Ahaz (28:2–4, 22–25), Amon (33:23–24), and Zedechiah (36:13–14) were unfaithful to the Lord and corrupted the temple services and/or ignored the worship of the Lord in His temple. The sin of these kings was not just idolatry but an idolatry that in Chronicles is explicitly connected to the temple of the Lord.

In the long run, most of the kings of Judah showed no respect for the temple of the Lord and sought other gods and built other places for worship. During all of this the Lord sent them warnings through the prophets because He had compassion for His people and His temple (36:15). But this was to no avail because they mocked God’s messengers, despised His words, and laughed at His prophets until the Lord’s anger arose against His people—“there was no remedy” (v. 16).

The defilement of the temple reached such a condition that God abandoned it, and since it was directly related to the survival of the Davidic monarchy and the nation, all three—monarchy, kingdom, and temple—came to an end. God handed them to the king of Babylon, who killed King Zedechiah, took to Babylon the articles of the house of the Lord and the treasures of the kings, and finally burned the house of the Lord and all the palaces (2 Chr. 36:17–19).

The collapse of the temple, the monarchy, and the nation was a most disturbing occurrence for the people of God. It was not a return to the pre-monarchy period and experience but rather a return to their time of enslavement in Egypt when they were not a nation and did not have a king or a temple. The covenant had come to an end primarily because of the failure of the kings to support and seek the Lord in His temple. Why was the survival of the monarchy and of the nation so deeply connected to the temple services? Chronicles provides its own answer.

4. Temple and Theology. We have described how important the temple was for the future of the monarchy and the nation. Now we should examine what the Chronicler has to say about the theological foundation of that significance.

First, the temple was a unique space. There could not be another place like this because there is no other God like the Lord, who in fulfillment of His covenant promise to Israel chose to dwell among them (2 Chr. 6:14). But perhaps more important, what made the temple unique was that God selected the place and sanctified it with His presence (7:16); it is His “house” or temple (e.g., 1 Chr. 9:26–27; 23:28; 2 Chr. 3:3; 22:12). The biblical God localized Himself within the space of His creatures, thus indicating that He was a personal being who wanted, for a variety of reasons, to interact with His people. But the localized presence of God in His temple created a theological problem for Solomon: He could be confused with another creature. Solomon clarifies that this is not the case because if heaven itself cannot contain God, how much less an earthly temple (2 Chr. 6:18).

Created space is not sufficient to be a house for God, and yet He chose to dwell in heaven (e.g., vv. 21, 30) and in an earthly temple (v. 2). Solomon's prayer makes clear that the true dwelling of God is in heaven but that He has established a close connection between both dwellings. In the earthly temple resided the name of the Lord (v. 6; 20:8); that is to say, this is the place where the Lord revealed Himself to His people—the name stands for the Lord as the One who could be invoked and who would answer (20:9). This explains why it is said that the temple was built for the ark of the covenant (1 Chr. 17:1; 28:2; 2 Chr. 6:41), which was the visible symbol of God's presence by which He guided His people (1 Chr. 13:3–4).

The uniqueness of the temple as God's dwelling place also lies in the fact that it was the center that unified the people of Israel and the monarchy. The king and the people found in it a common nucleus around which they together sought and worshiped the Lord as one nation. Setting it aside would result in chaos and the disintegration of the nation. As a unifying center, the name of the God who resided there had power over the nations and when necessary defeated them or gave them victories (e.g., 2 Chr. 12:5; 14:12); He used them according to His purpose. The presence of God in the unique place had a universal impact that no other space could have. Any other place of worship in Israel that would dare to compete with the dwelling of God was to be destroyed. The kings were to destroy the high places that occasionally were built to worship God (20:33; 33:17) but that most of the time had been built to worship other deities (14:3, 5; 17:6; 31:1; 32:12). When other temples were built for Baal, the Lord reacted with anger and called for the destruction of such places (23:16–17). In Israel the very core of worship and service was centralized in the temple because the name of the Lord dwelt there.

Second, the temple was a place of prayer for all people. This is one of the most fundamental characteristics of the temple in Chronicles, as found in the prayer of Solomon. God put His name in the temple in order to hear the prayer that the king and the people would make "toward this place" (2 Chr. 6:20–21). These were mainly prayers of supplication coming from hearts that sincerely sought the Lord in times of oppression as a result of their sin (vv. 24–25) or when they simply needed His help (v. 34). It was through prayer that the deep connection between the heavenly and earthly dwellings of God was expressed. Solomon asked the Lord to listen from His dwelling in heaven when the people prayed to Him in the earthly temple and to answer their prayers and forgive them. The temple connected worshipers with the God whose ultimate residence is in the heavens and who made efficacious whatever took place in the earthly temple. Heaven and earth found a very particular point of contact in the temple (cf. John 1:14). It was from His dwelling in heaven that God granted forgiveness to His repentant people and delivered them from oppression (2 Chr. 7:14). In other words, the Name of the Lord, who resided in the temple, connected worshipers to the true dwelling of God in heaven. This privilege was also given to the aliens in Israel who came to the temple to pray. Solomon prayed for them specifically for the purpose that all peoples of the earth might come to reverence God and His name, recognizing this temple as belonging to Him (6:33).

Third, the temple was a place to offer sacrifices to God (7:12). The first human ritual act at the end of the dedication of the temple was placing sacrifices on the altar of the temple, and then as a divine response, "fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt offering and the sacrifices" (2 Chr. 7:1). Sacrifices such as the burnt and peace offerings were offered primarily to express joy and gratitude and to thank the Lord for the many blessings received from Him (7:7–9). But in the case of sin, an atoning sacrifice was needed. It was the responsibility of the priests to make atonement for the sins of the people on the altar of burnt offerings and the altar of incense (1 Chr. 6:49). During his dedicatory prayer, Solomon asked God to listen to His people and to forgive their sins, but nothing was said about how that forgiveness was possible. The reformation initiated by Hezekiah indicates that this was related to atonement through the sin offering (2 Chr. 29:24). Here the Chronicler is unquestionably supported by the Levitical law regulating the services in the temple.

Fourth, the temple was a place of hope. Prayer presupposes the presence of hope in the human heart. In Chronicles, prayer was not taking the place of the sacrificial system, but it was emphasized in order to underline that genuine repentance should precede the sacrificial act. Nevertheless, since forgiveness was not the automatic result of sacrifices or prayers (6:39), the Lord was still ready to forgive His people under almost any circumstance. Even during the Exile and in the absence of the temple, if there was true repentance, the Lord would be willing to forgive His people from His heavenly temple (see 6:36–39). There was here a word of hope for the exiled returnees addressed by the Chronicler. They now knew that the Exile was the result of the desecration of the temple—the rejection of the Lord—but they also knew that the Exile was not the end of hope. Their return to the land was filled with hope because it showed that the Lord listened to their prayers. The temple needed to be built, and the Lord, in the absence of a Davidic king, had raised Cyrus, His servant, to initiate the process of reconstructing the temple as the first step in the reconstitution of His people. Perhaps in a veiled way the Chronicler is suggesting that the next thing was the coming of a Davidic king. The Lord was guiding His people from His heavenly dwelling. The past tragedy occasioned by the unwillingness of the kings and the people to seek the Lord in His temple resulted in the collapse of the nation, but now God was offering a new hope by locating Himself again in a new temple in the midst of His people (cf. Rev. 21:1–4). David recognized that all things in heaven and earth belonged to God—He is the great King, and He is exalted as head over all (1 Chr. 29:11).

2 CHRONICLES

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. If 1 and 2 Chronicles represent a single volume (as they originally were) and are thus the same book that is referenced thirty-four times in 1 and 2 Kings and Esther, then the original title was the Chronicles [or Record] of the Kings of Judah (see 1 Kin. 14:29), and this would mean that the Chronicles [or Record] of the Kings of Israel (see 1 Kin. 14:19) has been lost. In the Hebrew Bible the title is Matters [or Events] of the Days [or Times]. The LXX called it Things Omitted [or Left Aside] and split it into two books. In the fourth century A.D., the title in the Latin translation (Vulgate) appeared as Chronicles of the Whole of Sacred History. During the early years of the reformation, Bibles used by both Protestants and Catholics included a shortened version of the Vulgate's title and retained the split of the LXX, resulting in the 1 and 2 Chronicles that we use today.

The books of Chronicles do not indicate who wrote them, though the Jewish Talmud has a statement suggesting that Ezra wrote a part of them. In 2 Chronicles the narrative essentially begins with Solomon's construction and dedication of the temple, and the book ends with the command to rebuild it (36:23). The incomplete thought at the end of 2 Chronicles (36:22–23) is repeated and completed at the beginning of Ezra (1:1–2) using an ancient composition technique that appears in other non-biblical documents. This technique (called “catch-lines”) helped readers know that the two scrolls (tablets) were meant to be read together; but since the scroll (tablet) was not long enough, the narrative had to be continued on a new one. Thus, it seems that Ezra at least had a hand in the closing statement of the book of 2 Chronicles, if not much more. It is also clear that the author(s) relied on historical documents since it is impossible for anyone to have lived through the entire period.

These documents are named as the books of the records of the kings of Israel (1 Chr. 9:1), King David (1 Chr. 27:24), Samuel the seer (1 Chr. 29:29), Nathan the prophet (1 Chr. 29:29), Gad the seer (1 Chr. 29:29), Shemaiah the prophet (2 Chr. 12:15), Jehu the son of Hanani (2 Chr. 20:34), the kings of Judah (2 Chr. 25:26), and perhaps even the Chronicles (or record) of the kings of Judah. These statements regarding references make it plain that much more was written about the kings of Judah than is recorded here, indicating that the selections that survive in 1 and 2 Chronicles were likely compiled to teach spiritual lessons.

Date. The closing statement of the book (the decree of Cyrus) can be dated to 537 B.C. Chronicles was designed to review Jewish history (the kingdom of Judah), which is why the kings of the Northern Kingdom of Israel are not recorded. Chronicles is the last book in the Hebrew Bible (coming after Ezra and Nehemiah), which suggests that it was written late. Also, in the genealogical section at the beginning of 1 Chronicles, information traces a family well into the Persian period (1 Chr. 3:19–24). Thus, the date for the composition of the final version of Chronicles must be after 537 B.C. with an understanding that some portions may have been written earlier.

Backgrounds. By the opening chapter of 2 Chronicles, David had died and Solomon had just been anointed king. The political struggle for the throne that is described in 1 Kings 1–2 is skipped in the narrative of 2 Chronicles 1, and instead the story of Solomon picks up where 1 Kings 3 begins—with Solomon's request for wisdom.

In 971 B.C. (the year that David died), there were no immediate threats to his kingdom from outside entities. To the north, Mesopotamia was entering a dark age. Assyria would not begin to become the strong empire that would dominate the political landscape in this region for almost sixty years. To the south, Egypt was at the beginning of the Third Intermediate period, with a king in the north (Siaman) and the high priest of Amun ruling the south, and thus it was not a threat to the outside world.

Theology and Purpose. If 2 Chronicles (along with 1 Chronicles) was written for the postexilic Jews, the purpose seems clearly to establish the kingdom of Judah in the land. To support this, the Hebrews are shown to be able to trace their ancestors back to Adam (1 Chr. 1:1). The genealogical section, in which the tribe of Judah is the first tribe presented (1 Chr. 4:1), ends with a review of those who lived in Jerusalem and those of the tribe of Levi who had responsibilities there (1 Chr. 9:2–34). Saul's reign is covered in a brief twenty-four verses (1 Chr. 9:35–10:14) in order to move quickly to David, who rose to the throne at that time (1 Chr. 10:14). From that point to the end of 2 Chronicles, the entire record is a history of David and his ruling descendants. By tracing this history (the good and the bad), the Jews would be able to demonstrate that the land was theirs and explain why they were captives returning (for more on this, see 1 Chronicles: Introduction).

COMMENTARY

1:1—9:31

SOLOMON'S REIGN

Second Chronicles concentrates on the lives of the kings who followed the model of David in terms of commitment to the Lord and to His temple. It begins with the realizations of the dream of David: building a temple for the God of Israel. The task had fallen, under divine guidance, into the hands of Solomon. The first nine chapters of this book narrate the life and accomplishments of the new king. In order for him to accomplish this most important task, God gave him wisdom (1:1–17). He then went on to build the temple (2:1–4:22) and to dedicate it to the service of the Lord (5:1–22). Finally, the main achievements of Solomon are narrated (8:1—9:31).

1:1–17

The Gift of Wisdom

Solomon inherited a kingdom appointed by God to accomplish great things for Him and His people. Guided by the Lord, David had unified it and organized its administration and its religious character. The next king, Solomon, would need wisdom and God's Spirit to lead the nation.

1:1–6. The Assembly at Gibeon. As soon as Solomon felt strengthened (i.e., secure) in his throne (in part after eliminating the enemies of David; cf. 1 Kin. 2), he organized a religious convocation for the nation at Gibeon (2 Chr. 1–3). This was the place where the only authorized altar remained (that of Bezalel, v. 5; Deut. 12; 16:2; 26:2; 31:11), even though the ark was now housed in Jerusalem. David had, in fact, used the latter altar site. The thousand burnt offerings (2 Chr. 1: 6) suggest that the Gibeon assembly was not only an inaugural celebration but also a means of assuring the people that the new king was fully devoted to the God of his father David. The people were represented by their leaders, including leaders of groups of thousands and those of hundreds (v. 2; for the significance of these units in order to understand the large numbers in Chronicles, see commentary on 1 Chr. 5:21–26; 12:23–40).

1:7–17. The Vision and the Power of Solomon.

The prophetic dream reported in 1 Kings 3:5 is presented here as an appearance of the Lord in a night vision (2 Chr. 1:7). In antiquity, requests from the worshipers at the time of sacrifice were universally expected. In this case God Himself invited Solomon to express them. The wisdom granted to Solomon was multifaceted. First Kings 3:16–28 underlines his investigative acumen, while here it is connected with the design of the temple, as was the wisdom of Bezalel (Ex. 35:31). But the first expression of the wisdom of Solomon takes the form of financial and military powers. The Holy Land is the sole bridge connecting three land masses: Africa to the south, with Egypt then as a superpower; Asia Minor and lands further north in the Caucasus and Europe; and finally Syria and lands beyond it in Western Asia. The northern lands, with their vast steppes, were the cradle of the domestic horse, while Egypt was home to the best engineers of the times (notice the high price of the chariots; 2 Chr. 1:17). Solomon, thanks to David's conquests in the Holy Land and neighboring lands, was able to monopolize the trade of horses from the north and chariots from the south. Besides supplementing the equipment of Egyptians and Hittites with each other's production, he sold the complete outfits to the many Syrian (or Aramaean) kinglets (v. 17), which were in need of both horses and chariots.

Erection of the Temple

The brief introduction to this section states that Solomon was determined to construct the temple and his royal palace (v. 1). In the rest of the narrative, practically nothing is said about the construction of the royal palace, mainly because the Chronicler is interested in the temple. In order to begin the work, Solomon requested from Hiram, king of Tyre, construction materials and skillful workers (vv. 2–15). The rest of this section is concerned with the construction of the temple and its furnishings (3:1—4:22).

2:1–18. Correspondence with Hiram of Tyre.

The conscription of laborers for the temple is a starting point for the narrative (vv. 1–2), though it actually took place later (vv. 17–18). Chronicles (unlike 1 Kin. 5:15–16) adds that they were aliens or foreigners, perhaps captives taken by David in neighboring lands (now “servants”; 1 Chr. 18:2, 6, 13, and esp. v. 4). Solomon requested materials and qualified workers for the temple from David’s friend and ally in Tyre. He may have used as couriers the ambassadors sent to wish him well at his inauguration (1 Kin. 5:1–2). He detailed for Hiram the offerings and sacrifices to be performed in the temple (2 Chr. 2:4), mainly the daily services, and the theological reasons for the monumental scale of the construction (v. 5). Hiram obliged (v. 13) and sent Hiram (or Hiram-Abi or Huram, “my master” or “of my father”—’abi means “my father” and could be part of Hiram’s name or could refer to his position as “master craftsman,” as some translations have it), the son of a woman from Dan (or Naphtali; 1 Kin. 7:14—there called Hiram).

3:1–17. General Layout of the Temple. Among Bible writers, only the Chronicler tells us that the temple was located on Mount Moriah. The term appears elsewhere only in Genesis 22:2, “the land of Moriah.” The Hebrew root may be related to the action of “seeing.” But here the term appears with an article (lit. “to build... on the Mount of the Moriah where the Lord had appeared [or let Himself be seen] to his father David”). One might even translate, “on the mountain view, where the Lord had been viewed by...David.” In any case, the term connects the place with salvation, not only from the pestilence that was stopped abruptly in David’s time but from Abraham’s knife, which also was abruptly stopped by a command from the Angel of the Lord. The Chronicler does not date the start of the construction of the temple based on the era of the Exodus; he uses only the regnal date of the glorious King Solomon (2 Chr. 3:2; cf. 1 Kin. 6:1).

The foundation mentioned is that on which the Holy and Most Holy Places were to be erected. From this moment on, the temple of God would not be a portable house but a permanent one built on a foundation (e.g., 2 Chr. 6:5–10). The lavish finishing of the Holy Place was second only to that of the Most Holy Place (3:8–14). In antiquity, gold was used primarily for the sacred; this is why temples were often targeted by raiders. The cherubim were carved in relief on the walls (v. 7), and two of them were placed in the Most Holy Place (vv. 11–13), under whose wings the ark would be placed (chap. 5). The quantity of gold, though large (some 40 lbs [18,000 kg], close to an entire year of Solomon’s revenue; 2 Chr. 9:13), is consistent with the gold-plated area (the walls of the temple alone amounted to about 9,687 ft. [900 m<sup>2</sup>] or 44 lb. [20 kg] of gold per square meter, implying a very reasonable plate thickness, about .039 of an inch [1 mm]). The front pillars (3:15–17) are usually understood as freestanding fire cressets. The Jach(k)in and Boaz (lit. “May He establish” and “with strength”) were typical ornamental features of Canaanite architecture also visible in the Hazor temple excavated in the 1950s.

4:1–8. The Temple Furnishings. Though the original altar of Bezalel was still available, it was too small for the proportions of the new temple. The new altar, more than fifteen feet (5 m) high, was probably accessed through steps. The Sea of bronze or cast metal (vv. 2–5) was probably so named because it was a large basin. Small bull-head pictures, three hundred in number (vv. 2–4), decorated the rim. The word baths is not the English word “baths” but refers to Hebrew units of liquid measure. The volume of 3,000 baths is equivalent to about 18,000 gallons (68,137 L). The difference in the number given here and that in 1 Kings 7:26 (2,000 baths) could be attributed to one of the following: (1) a simple copyist error; (2) a different value for the volume of a bath during the years between the writing of 1 Kings and 2 Chronicles; or (3) a different understanding of the shape of the Sea (hemispherical or cylindrical), which could affect how the volume was estimated. The shape of the Sea was probably both hemispherical and cylindrical, with vertical upper sides and a convex bottom. The twelve bull forms which emerged from the basin and supported it (or rather half-bulls; the hind legs were not needed; v. 4) may have represented the strength of the united twelve tribes, whose numbers would become “like the sand of the seashore” (Gen. 22:17; 32:12).

The description of the lavers or wash basins in 2 Chronicles 4:6 is more succinct than in 1 Kings 7:27–39 (see commentary on 2 Chr. 4:9–22). The rest of the sacred furnishings here often intrigue students of the passage: Solomon made ten lampstands of gold according to biblical specifications (v. 7; 1 Chr. 28:15; Jer. 52:19; contrast the single menorah of the tabernacle; Ex. 25:31–40) as well as ten tables to be distributed along the long sides of the Holy Place (2 Chr. 4:8). But then in 13:11 we read of a single lampstand and a single table for showbread in Solomon’s temple. Note, however, that the passage speaks of furnishings made for the temple, not of articles later present there. This distinction is important, because 5:5 records that when the ark was brought from Gibeon to Solomon’s temple it was accompanied by “all the holy furnishings that were in the tabernacle” of that place. Other than the bronze altar, which was outside, these “holy furnishings” were none other than the single lampstand (menorah), the single table for the showbread, and the incense altar. The latter is not mentioned here with things made by Solomon, but in the summary of 4:19–22, it does appear among furnishings of gold. The picture that is conveyed by this comparison is that Solomon added ten tables and ten lampstands to the Most Holy Place and put them along the walls (perhaps one table supporting each new lampstand), a reasonable addition in view of the much larger space in this temple. The original single table for showbread and the singular old menorah should have been kept in the middle, directly in front of the ark.

4:9–22. The Court, Bronze, and Gold. This section summarizes the articles made for the service of the outside altar and surrounding courts, including the decoration of the pillars described in 3:15–17. In contrast to articles for the temple proper, which were made of pure gold, the articles for outside use were made mostly of bronze and cast in the clayish earth of Succ(kk)oth and Zeredah/Zarethan (4:17; 1 Kin. 7:46) in the plain of Jordan. The emphasis on the use of pure gold is not about the opulence of the temple but about the willingness of the people, the king, and his leaders to joyfully provide the very best they had for the building of the temple

(cf. 1 Chr. 29:3–9). The gold inside the temple was a display before the Lord of the generosity and gratitude of His people on the account of His loving-kindness.

5:1—7:22

Dedication of the Temple

The task was accomplished (5:1); it was now time to dedicate the temple to the Lord and to call the people to use it as their new place for worship (see “The Temple in Chronicles,” p. 541). The ceremony began with bringing the ark from the city of David and the holy furnishings from Gibeon (2 Chr. 5:20–6:11). Then Solomon blessed the Lord and the people (6:3–11) and offered a dedicatory prayer (6:12–42) and solemn sacrifices (7:1–10). This section concludes with another vision of Solomon (7:11–22).

5:2–10. The Transfer of the Ark and Furnishings. The elders (v. 4), or extended family heads (v. 2), represented the entire nation. They came together for the Festival of Tabernacles in the seventh month (5:3; cf. 7:8–10; Lev. 23:33–36). While the ark was already in Jerusalem, the tabernacle and the rest of the sacred objects came from Gibeon (2 Chr. 5:5; 1:3). It is surprising that the ancient tabernacle was still in existence more than 480 years after the Exodus (1 Kin. 6:1). The tabernacle was now stowed inside Solomon’s temple, which indicates that it must have also been sheltered in the temple in Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:9; 3:3). After the destruction of the temple in Shiloh (1 Sam. 4; Jer. 7:14), the tabernacle probably served again as a tent in Gibeon.

The carrying poles of the ark (2 Chr. 5:9) were more than thirty feet (9 m) long and could be seen from the entrance to the Holy Place. The writer then mentions that they are still there “today,” in his time—“to this day.” This latter expression is often seen as a mechanical transcription from 1 Kings 8:8. But there was no ark in the second temple after the Exile known by the Chronicler. The Jews believed that Jeremiah and his “companions” hid the ark and the tabernacle in a cave just before the Exile (2 Maccabees 2:4–5). The great length of the poles was related to the ceremonial carrying of the ark by many Levites. It is thus possible that the poles were left on the floor of the temple during the stealthy hiding operation, then carried away to Babylon and back, together with other golden objects (Ex. 25:14; Ezra 1:7), to be finally kept where they belonged, as a poignant memory of the missing ark.

5:11—6:11. God's Presence and Solomon's Blessing. In keeping with the character of the Chronicles, the role of the Levites and the priests is emphasized in these verses. During such a solemn occasion, all of them, not only the division on duty, were present and set themselves apart devotedly for the sacred events (5:11). When they praised God in perfect unison, His cloud of glory filled the building (v. 13). This thick or dark cloud (6:1) was not itself the glory but the shield that protected people from God's "unapproachable light" (v. 13; 1 Tim. 6:16). The presence of God sanctified the temple (2 Chr. 5:11—6:2). Blessing God's name for keeping His promises to Israel implied that the nation had been blessed by God and that Solomon anticipated God's blessings in the future (6:16–17). God had not expressed a preference for a particular tribe or family line before (vv. 5–6). Even though the sanctuary of Shiloh had also been a settled place for God's "name" (Jer. 7:12), as was now the temple (here 2 Chr. 6:6–10), it was in the territory of Ephraim, while the Gibeon sanctuary was on land belonging to the tribe of Benjamin. The present temple was a wholly new possession and so too was God's choice of the dynasty of David (v. 6). Thus the viewpoint of Chronicles, though focused on the past, also conveys clear hopes for the future, in spite of the loss of national independence.

6:12—7:10. Dedicatory Prayer and Sacrifices. Second Chronicles follows here 1 Kings 8:22–53 closely. One added detail is the platform that allowed Solomon to be seen and heard by the congregation, even when he knelt down in humility (2 Chr. 6:13). In the prayer the temple was basically defined as a place of prayer for God's people and for foreigners (vv. 24, 32). God's dwelling place is in heaven, and from there He listens to the prayers of His people made in the earthly temple. Solomon emphasized the divine disposition to listen to prayer and to answer it (see "The Temple in Chronicles," p. 541). The answer came in the form of forgiveness (2 Chr. 6:25, 27), protection (vv. 34–35), and restoration (vv. 36–39). Solomon recognized that the heaven of heavens cannot contain God (v. 18; 2:5), yet he prayed that His presence might come to dwell in the new temple (v. 41). The prayer closed with two statements: first, the temple is God's resting place, and, second, a request for God to be always with His Anointed (vv. 41–42). The king and the temple stood closely together. God's glorious presence, visible to the entire congregation (since the "dark cloud" inside the building, 5:11—6:2, was visible only to priests) came directly in response to this invocation (see 7:1–10). God manifested His approval of the new worship facilities in a spectacular way by sending fire from heaven (v. 1) as He had done during the inauguration of the sanctuary (Lev. 9:23–24) and when choosing the environs of Jerusalem as the new altar site (1 Chr. 21:26). In addition to the regular burnt offering already prepared on the altar (7:1), an astounding number of sacrificial victims were used to celebrate the dedication of the temple (vv. 4–5, 7). This celebration was shared by priests and the people in a sacred fellowship meal made possible through the peace offerings (v. 7). The celebration was enhanced by the music and liturgy performed by the priests, the Levites, and the congregation (vv. 3, 6) and lasted for the seven days of the Festival of Tabernacles (vv. 8–10). The temple was a place where sacrifices were offered to the Lord (see 2:4) and where the people rejoiced in His presence.

7:11–22. God's Response in a Night Vision. The signs of the cloud of glory in the temple and the fire lighted miraculously on the altar (5:3–14; 7:1) had been spectacular, but inarticulate. Miracles need to be complemented by God's revealed word. Hence, the Lord appeared again to Solomon in a night vision (as in 1:7) to deliver promises for obedience and a warning against disobedience. Here the Chronicler adds (cf. 1 Kin. 9:1–9) the famous words: "If my people... will humble themselves, and pray and seek my face... then I will hear from heaven" (2 Chr. 7:14). This is in keeping with the emphasis of Chronicles on immediate retribution (see 1 Chronicles: Introduction).

8:1—9:31

Grandeur of Solomon

In accordance with the general purpose of Chronicles, a backward look to the glorious reigns of David and Solomon was intended to instill a sense of national pride, much needed at the time. In this section we read about Solomon's achievements in the fortification of some cities (8:1–6), the wise use of human labor (vv. 7–11), his support of the temple (vv. 12–16), search for gold (vv. 17–18), the visit of the Queen of Sheba (9:1–12), and his wealth and death (vv. 13–31).

8:1–11. Urban Improvements. Since this passage begins similarly to 1 Kings 9:10–13, it has been assumed by some that they are describing the same event. If so, a question would arise:

Were these cities given by Hiram of Tyre to Solomon (2 Chr. 8:2), or was it the other way around (1 Kin. 9:10-12)? According to 1 Kings 9:12-13, Hiram was not pleased with the cities which Solomon "gave" him and called them "the land of Cabul." This word is related to a verb meaning "bound" or "restricted," but it could also be related to the Hebrew phrase "like nothing"—which would thus show his disdain for the cities. Nonetheless, the king of Tyre sent 120 talents (9,000 lb) of gold to Solomon (2 Chr. 8:14). Clearly, this gesture of Hiram went beyond the initial contract for cedar wood and qualified labor that Solomon was to pay for with agricultural products (2 Chr. 2). Solomon did not sell those cities to Hiram, so all that gold needed to be repaid. One logical explanation to harmonize the two accounts, if they are referring to related events, is that Solomon borrowed those 120 talents of gold by using the twenty border towns as collateral. In such a case, the precise value of those cities did not need to be ascertained immediately, even if they left a poor impression. According to this explanation, when Solomon repaid the loan (perhaps from the gold which Hiram's servants helped collect [see 1 Kin. 9:26-28]), he would have recovered the collateral from Hiram and then, as this account says, beautified those underestimated cities (2 Chr. 8:2).

He first fortified northern cities (8:3-4). The Syrian city of Zobah, which in the times of the Chronicler belonged to the Persian province of Hamath, had provided Ammon with mercenaries in the times of David (2 Sam. 10:6). Apparently it had also recently refused to pay the tribute due Israel (2 Sam. 8:9-10), so Solomon defeated and captured it (2 Chr. 8:3). Tadmor is Palmyra, an oasis in the desert of Syria, fortified by Solomon in connection with a chain of storage cities, or military units related to chariot warfare (v. 4; cf. v. 6). Solomon also fortified some cities. He fortified cities with walls, gates, and bars, and he outfitted all the cities such as Megiddo and Gezer with chariots and cavalry (1 Kin. 9:15-16), a fact that archaeology has documented (see commentary on 2 Chr. 9:13-31). Beth Horon and Baalath are in western Israel and were strengthened against a possible Philistine resurgence. For such an ambitious construction program, Solomon resorted to the conscription of forced labor among non-Israelites (2 Chr. 8:7-8). Ethnic Israelites served only as soldiers or overseers (vv. 9-10). He also took care to maintain his foreign queen and her retinue away from the holy city (v. 11; this detail is found only in this passage.).

8:12-16. Support of Temple Worship. The king not only fulfilled the instructions of David, his father, regarding the organization of temple worship (v. 14), but he also himself provided an abundance of sacrifices for the required daily, weekly, and yearly rituals (v. 12). In this way his duty to the temple was completed (v. 16). First Kings 9:25 mentions a detail that the Chronicler does not, that is, that Solomon burned incense in the temple three times a year. This ritual, while legitimate in the temple area, was later moved to the unauthorized "high places" with schismatic and/or pagan worship (1 Kin. 13:2; 2 Kin. 16:2-4; 2 Chr. 34:25).

8:17-18. The Expeditions to Ophir. In addition to a conscripted labor force, Solomon's constructions required cash. A possible explanation for Solomon's interest in Elath is that it was an important port in the heavy trade of copper out of Edom. Since there was a glut of bronze (which used copper) in Israel (4:18), new markets were needed for this metal. Ophir was a good candidate: they were a Semitic people (1 Chr. 1:23) whose land was rich in gold (1 Chr. 29:4; Job 22:24; Ps. 45:9; Is. 13:12), and they were possibly located in Arabia or East Africa. In Africa, copper has always been used for personal adornment, so its rate of exchange for gold was more favorable than in the Mediterranean world. Solomon's agents were thus able to acquire 450 talents (15,309 lb) of gold from there (2 Chr. 8:18). Perhaps he used some of this to redeem the cities he had given as collateral to Phoenicia (see commentary on 8:1-11). Such trade required a port on the Red Sea close to the Edomite copper mines. Ezion Geber and Elath (v. 17) fit the description, located at the end of the Gulf of Aqaba. As in the case of the temple, the Phoenician friends of Solomon provided both equipment and technical skill (v. 18). They were at the time the foremost naval power of the Mediterranean world, and their ships dominated the metal trade from tin refineries in Spain and other distant lands.

9:1-12. The Praise of the Queen of Sheba. After David, a new star was rising in the commercial sky of the Middle East. Not only was Israel, the new power, controlling the land bridge between the continents (see commentary on 1:7-17), but it was also beginning to bypass the traditional Sabeian spice route by using the Red Sea (see 8:16-17). As descendants of Sheba, the Sabeans were a Semitic people (Gen. 10:28) in the southwest of the Arabian Peninsula (Yemen), which receives some rain (this is the “happy Arabia,” Arabia felix, of classical authors); they also built large dams and irrigation systems. In addition, their caravans of camels carried spices, incense, and other luxury products, both from their land and from other coasts of the Indian Ocean, to the Mediterranean world via Syria and Phoenicia.

The visit of their queen to Solomon, using one of those caravans over more than 1,500 miles (2,414 km), no doubt aimed to assess not only the new king but also Israel as a whole. She was very much impressed (2 Chr. 9:5–8), especially with Solomon’s wisdom (v. 5), which she could appreciate in the areas of administration and organization (vv. 3–4). The Chronicler records her conveying the concept that God had made of Israel His throne: the king reigned there by divine election (v. 8; 1 Kin. 10:9). The exchange of gifts (2 Chr. 9:9, 12) implies some kind of trade agreement.

9:13–31. Solomon’s Wealth and Death. More than twenty tons of gold (18 metric tons) entered annually the coffers of Solomon (v. 13), not counting the toll paid by merchants or local taxes raised by the governors of the land, here designated with a Persian word pekhhah for the benefit of postexilic readers (v. 14; the term is the source of English word pasha). The shields of gold were made in two sizes and were treasury reserves under the close custody of one soldier each. The House (or Palace) of the forest of Lebanon refers to the palace of Solomon, which took him thirteen years to build, using a large amount of cedar from the Forest of Lebanon. Then there was the throne of the king (vv. 17–19). This was a large throne (which was white, as remembered in Rev. 20:11)—a great throne of ivory overlaid with pure gold—aimed at impressing foreign dignitaries. Its carved animal figures included lions (2 Chr. 9:17–19). Solomon’s gold may have come from other sources besides Ophir (see 8:17–18). It was transported in tarshish ships (strong ships able to travel into the deep sea; cf. 1 Kin. 10:22; the term can also refer to a destination; 2 Chr. 9:21). The return trip brought silver, ivory, apes, and monkeys (some translations render the final term as “peacocks,” some as “monkeys,” and others as “baboons”; v. 21). “All the kings of the earth” (v. 23) who sought Solomon were those within Israel’s sphere of influence (v. 26); the present (Heb. minkhah) that was brought every year (vv. 23–24) was a vassal due. Military bases (the chariot cities; vv. 25–28), which included ample facilities that have left traces for the archaeologists today

(esp. in Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer), reminded subject peoples (see vv. 23–24) that they could not easily throw off the yoke that Israel had imposed on them in the form of tribute and trade restrictions. In this way Israel enjoyed its heyday of splendor (vv. 26–28).

In accordance with its purpose, 2 Chronicles refrains from relating the apostasy of Solomon in the latter part of his life and the consequent divine displeasure (1 Kin. 11:1–25). The Chronicler is more interested in the public life of the king than in his private life. However, it does refer the reader interested in these aspects to other sources that detail them: the prophetic history of Israel composed by Nathan the prophet, Ahijah the Shilonite, and Iddo the seer (2 Chr. 9:29). These prophets are also mentioned as sources in the book of Kings, so this bibliographical reference in 2 Chronicles is either to our present book of Kings or to a common source of both.

10:1—36:23

KINGS OF JUDAH: VICISSITUDES OF GOD’S PEOPLE

The reigns of David and Solomon should have made the original readers justly proud. Those readers were also very much aware that disaster eventually struck the nation, but not before a series of ups and downs which, as 2 Chronicles shows next, are directly related to obedience or disobedience to God’s covenant and in particular to how the temple was treated (see 1 Chronicles: Introduction). The life of the kings is analyzed beginning with Rehoboam and the division of the kingdom (chaps. 10–12). The other kings are Abijah (chap. 13), Asa (chaps. 14–16), Jehoshaphat (17:1–21:3), Jehoram and Ahaziah (21:4–22:9), Joash (22:10–24:27), Amaziah (chap. 25), Uzziah (chap. 26), Jotham (chap. 27), Ahaz (chap. 28), Hezekiah (chaps. 29–32), Manasseh and Amon (chap. 33), Josiah (chaps. 34–35), and the successors of Josiah and the Exile (chap. 36).

10:1—12:16

The Secession of the North

The division of the monarchy of Israel into a northern kingdom (which retained the name of Israel for ten of the tribes) and a southern one in Judah (together with part of the tribe of Benjamin) eventually, though unnecessarily, resulted in the fall of the nation. The story makes it clear that the division was the result of political intrigues motivated by pride and the human thirst for power. But even in such a case the Lord's hand was mysteriously at work to accomplish His ultimate design for His people through judgment and salvation. Not only did those kingdoms fight each other, but they also fell into the temptation of seeking foreign help to shore up their internecine war effort. The outsiders were very much happy to oblige out of self-interest. In 1 Kings 11:29–39 the Prophet Ahijah pointed out that the division of the kingdom was the result of the apostasy of Solomon later in life. But since the Chronicler chose not to dwell on the apostasy of Solomon, he only alludes to such divine judgment indirectly by reminding the reader of the prophecy of Ahijah (2 Chr. 9:29).

10:1–19. Revolt against Rehoboam (931–913 B.C.). Apparently at first there was no interest in a revolt but sincere interest in pressuring Rehoboam to deal with the common people in a fair way. The unity of the kingdom was still fragile. Even though David was a native prince of Judah, he was only an elected king for the rest of Israel, requiring a double coronation (in Hebron and in Jerusalem). Such double process was not necessary in the case of Solomon since David had him sitting on the throne while he still reigned (1 Chr. 23:1; 29:23). For Rehoboam it was important to be recognized or elected by the “elders” of the other tribes as king (2 Sam. 5:3). This took place in Shechem (2 Chr. 10:1) in the territory of Ephraim. The situation required tact: if Rehoboam gave away too much, he might lose too much authority, perhaps becoming a reigning, but not ruling, king. Hence the hot-headed young people (actually in their forties; 10:10; 12:13) were all for an iron fist (10:10–11). On the other hand, as the more experienced advisors perceived (vv. 6–7), an impolitic answer could make the situation explode. People knew the prophecy of Ahijah of Shiloh about Jeroboam (1 Kin. 11; 2 Chr. 9:29). Singling out Jeroboam as the spokesman of the tribal elders (10:2–3) was a not-too-subtle means of applying strong pressure on Rehoboam.

The rift happened (vv. 12–19) as the experienced advisors had foreseen. The heartfelt cry of the people (v. 16) had already been sounded in David's times by Sheba, who could not reconcile himself to the loss of the power his tribe had enjoyed under their fellow Benjamite king, Saul, and saw an opportunity in the civil war between David and his son Absalom (2 Sam. 20:1). The attempt of Sheba was aborted (2 Sam. 20:4–22), but it did expose strong undercurrents against the Davidic dynasty outside Judah (2 Sam. 20:2), no doubt still present in Rehoboam's time. The Chronicler states that Israel “has been in rebellion against the house of David to this day” (2 Chr. 10:19).

11:1—12:16. The Reign of Rehoboam and the Apostasy of Israel. In Kings the reign of each king of Judah is reported in relation to a contemporary king of Israel, the Northern Kingdom. The Chronicler reports only on Judah (see commentary on 13:1), but the Kings narrative on Israel still influences 2 Chronicles. Prophets had great influence on Israel; just as Ahijah's prophecy boosted the rebellion against Rehoboam among the ten northern tribes, so Shemaiah prevented Judah from embarking on a bloody civil war to suppress the rebellion (vv. 1–5) even though the forces of Rehoboam seemed adequate—180,000 men (cf. 14:8; 25:5; but see commentary on 1 Chr. 12:23–40). Barred by the reluctance of the people from engaging in an all-out war against the north (2 Chr. 11:2–4), Rehoboam used his resources in fortifying fifteen sites (vv. 5–12). But they were not aligned along the northern border of Judah: the king did not want to consolidate the division of the Hebrew monarchy. They rather presupposed a conflict with Egypt. Since fortifications in so many places must have taken quite a number of years to complete, this section should be seen from a thematic, not chronological, viewpoint. Rehoboam was right to fear Egypt, as later events would prove (see chap. 12).

The ungodliness of Jeroboam, recorded also in 1 Kings 12:28–33, is here emphasized (2 Chr. 11:13–14). He not only installed priests from tribes other than Levi, but he had in fact rejected the latter from serving as priests, thus openly opposing the law of Moses which gave them exclusive rights to the ministry (vv. 13–14). The picture of apostasy is reinforced by noting that the illegitimate priests of Jeroboam served in schismatic high places where the God of Israel was worshiped with the help of images of calves (v. 15) as in Sinai at the time of Aaron. In reality, these high places were openly pagan shrines for the sa'ir (“goats,” “demons,” or “goat-demons”), a symbol of masculine potency in nature worship, and so a general term for pagan religion (Lev. 17:7; cf. 1 Cor. 10:20). The calves or young bulls, a symbol of force, may have represented the mount or footstool of God or an abstract icon for Deity itself, as the highest Force.

While priests and Levites left the north for good, other Israelites came as pilgrims to sacrifice in Jerusalem—presumably at least during the annual festivals—thus rejecting the sanctuaries of Jeroboam in their own tribal lands (2 Chr. 11:16–17). This strengthened Rehoboam, for the kingdom enjoyed the blessings promised for faithfulness, which unfortunately only lasted three years (v. 17). This fidelity, referred to as the way of “David and Solomon,” refers to David’s lifelong commitment, while in the case of Solomon it can be applied only to his early reign (contrast 1 Kin. 11:1–8).

At this point in the narrative, information is provided about Rehoboam’s family (2 Chr. 11:18–22). This account about his family is likely not tied to this particular point in time; it probably covers all seventeen years of the reign of Rehoboam, not just the interval between his third (v. 17) and fifth years (12:2). For an empire such as Solomon’s (see commentary on 9:13–31), a large royal harem (vv. 18–21) might have been a political necessity for both foreign and domestic affairs since covenants and pacts were often sealed through marriages. For Rehoboam, it was a case of keeping up appearances after the glory of the kingdom had already disappeared (cf. 12:9–11). The Chronicler recognizes that he acted wisely in dispersing some of his twenty-eight sons, the royal princes, throughout all the regions of Judah and Benjamin (v. 23). The palatial intrigues of his uncles Absalom and Adonijah in their attempt to succeed his grandfather David must have provided him with a lesson.

The sins of Rehoboam are not ignored by the Chronicler (12:1). The invasion by Shishak, founder of the Twenty-Second Egyptian Dynasty, is directly connected by 2 Chronicles to the backsliding of Judah. It happened because God’s people had been unfaithful to Him and rebelled against Him (v. 2). The language of v. 1 suggests that the kingdom of Rehoboam (Judah) was still considered “Israel” or, at any rate, Israel’s faithful remnant (v.1; see 11:16). But this remnant joined the rebellion against God. The nation abandoned God’s law—His torah (v. 1). The use of torah here implies the existence of a canonical Scripture. The Pentateuch had been long in existence and in force (Josh. 1:7–8; 1 Kin. 2:3; 2 Kin. 10:31); it was not an innovation of the postexilic community. Though the transgressions are not specified in Chronicles, they refer to idolatry (1 Kin. 14:22). This idolatry may have had something to do with the presence of a large harem of pagan women (see 2 Chr. 11:18–22), as was the case of Solomon (1 Kin. 11:1–8).

Shishak, an energetic pharaoh, wanted to reassert Egyptian control over a large part of the Middle East, not only the Holy Land. He left in a temple of Karnak the record of 150 towns captured in that campaign. But he would not have dared to attack Israel in the times of Solomon, when he contented himself with harboring Israelite rebels and promoting discontent against that monarch (1 Kin. 11:14–40). The strength of the united Israelite army no doubt dissuaded him (1 Chr. 21:5). Now, with ten of the twelve tribes under a king who had been his protégé and probably remained his vassal (1 Kin. 11:26–40), success against the southern remainder of the Hebrew nation was entirely possible and even likely. The forces of the pharaoh included not only native Egyptians, but also auxiliary troops, Ethiopians, Lybians (Lubim), and Sukkiim (Sukkites; v. 3). The latter, a people from the oasis of western Lybia, are not mentioned in the account of 1 Kings, but they appear as tjukten in the Egyptian records, showing once again the access of the Chronicler to other reliable ancient records.

In spite of all these forces, Shishak was not to include Jerusalem in his Karnak record of destroyed cities. Repentance and confession, prompted by the prophetic message of Shemaiah, earned Rehoboam a commuted sentence in God’s historical judgment (vv. 5–7). The Israelites would again be subject to the pharaoh (the same term often translated “slaves” is used in v. 8). Humility on the part of Rehoboam turned away the Lord’s anger, and conditions improved in Judah (v. 12). But Rehoboam had to relinquish the royal treasury, including the gold shields (v. 9; see 9:15–16), as part of his new vassal status though he would continue the pomp of his visits to the temple (v. 11), keeping up appearances with less expensive bronze shields (v. 10). As usual in the biblical history of Hebrew kings, life span, family, and regnal statistics are recorded (vv. 13–16). Second Chronicles adds an assessment of the religious quality of the king: he was evil because he did not determine in his heart to seek the Lord (v. 14). Some bibliographical notes are also added. The wars between Rehoboam and Jeroboam, during all their days (v. 15), refer to low-intensity conflicts; thanks to the intervention of Shemaiah (11:2–4) they did not turn into a major civil war.

13:1–22

The Reign of Abijah (913–911 B.C.)

The reign of Abijah was short, lasting only three years, and is characterized as a time of war with the Northern Kingdom. In his battle against Jeroboam, the commitment of Abijah to the Lord and to the temple services is accentuated in a particular way. His image in 2 Chronicles seems to differ in a significant way from what is written in 1 Kings (see below, “Abijah in Kings and Chronicles”).

13:1. Correlation with a Northern King. Statistics of the reigns of Judah are regularly provided by the books of Kings to correlate with a contemporary king of Israel, the Northern Kingdom. Here, for the first and last time, such a synchronic note is recorded in 2 Chronicles: Abijah (“Abijam” in Kings) started his reign in the eighteenth year of King Jeroboam (v. 1). Abijah’s reign was to be marked by conflict with Jeroboam, and that explains the correlation. But beyond this point, the reign of northern kings is largely ignored in 2 Chronicles (cf. the introductory note for chaps. 11–12), due to considerations related to both audience and perspective. The Chronicles were written for the exiles who returned from Babylon, now conceptualized as “all Israel” (see commentary on 11:1–12:16) since they also included some people from all the tribes (1 Chr. 9:3–5; 2 Chr. 11:16), but mainly from Judah. Besides, the Chronicler sees God’s covenant with Israel as being implemented through the promises given to David (1 Chr. 17). Therefore, the secession of the north, a “rebellion against the house of David” (2 Chr. 10:19), was also a rebellion against God. People from the north were welcome in Judah, but only when they worshiped in the temple in Jerusalem (11:16; 30:1–12). Even the reign of the kings of Judah is abridged from the preexilic source in Chronicles, except in the case of the “good” kings (Asa, Joash, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, Josiah), where it is supplemented with material not found in the books of Kings.

13:2. Family Lineage. Here the name of Abijah’s mother is given as Michaiah, but “Maachah” (or Maakah) elsewhere (11:20–21; 1 Kin. 15:2). She was identified in 1 Kings as the daughter or granddaughter of Absalom (translations vary), but here (2 Chr. 13:2) she is the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah. This could be explained by remembering that, just as “son” can sometimes metaphorically mean “grandson” (or other lineal descendant) in the Hebrew Bible, so too “daughter” may mean granddaughter. We know that Absalom had a beautiful daughter, Tamar (2 Sam. 14:27). Tamar, the daughter of Absalom, may have married Uriel of Gibeah, thus becoming the mother of Maachah, who was therefore the “daughter” (actual granddaughter) of Absalom and also the literal daughter of Uriel, as well as the mother of Abijah and grandmother of Asa.

13:3–22. Confrontation with Jeroboam. The 400,000 men of Abijah and the 800,000 of Jeroboam are obviously round numbers. This time the civil war could not be avoided (cf. 2 Chr. 11:1–5). Commanding inferior forces, Abijah tried to discourage the attack of the enemy with a forceful speech (2 Chr. 13:4–12). Its wording may also reflect the viewpoint of the Chronicler: Judah was the kingdom of the Lord (v. 8)—they worshiped in the temple in Jerusalem (vv. 10–11), while the kingdom of the north was in rebellion against God because they worshiped idols, had a center of worship other than Jerusalem, had driven out the true priests (descendants of Aaron), and consecrated as priests anyone who came with a sacrifice. Hence the north could not possibly prosper (v. 12).

In spite of the artful military strategy of Jeroboam (vv. 13–14), God defeated Jeroboam (v. 15), and Judah won the battle because they relied on

Abijah in Kings and Chronicles

When we compare the portrait of Abijah in 2 Chronicles with the one in 1 Kings, we find a major difference. In 1 Kings, Abijah seems to be assessed as an evil monarch (15:3–6). Some have seen Abijah as a hypocrite, preaching one thing and doing another; others think that the bad behavior mentioned in 1 Kings refers to a different period of Abijah’s reign. But it is unclear why Chronicles would echo the words of a notorious hypocrite, or why 1 Kings would not say a word about egregious flip-flops during the three short years of Abijah’s reign. Note, however, that in the Hebrew text the name of Abijah does not actually appear in 1 Kings 15:3–6, while Rehoboam does.

One possible way of solving the problem is by suggesting that perhaps 1 Kings 15:3–6 has been accidentally transposed and should be restored between 1 Kings 14:21 and 22, where they would refer to Rehoboam. In this way the end of the passage, “and there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all the days of his life” (not between Abijah and Jeroboam) would make perfect sense. If restored after 1 Kings 14:21, these verses, together with 21–24, would offer an account of the evil behavior of both Rehoboam and Judah (as in 2 Chr. 12:1), not of Judah alone as 1 Kings 14:21–24 now appear to record. Also, in that connection the explanation of 1 Kings 15:4–5, on why God did not put an end to the Davidic dynasty at that time, would follow immediately the account in v. 3 of a king who walked “in all the sins of his father,” meaning Solomon, instead of being postponed, as in our copies of 1 Kings, for a later and much shorter reign. So, if Abijah was, in fact, a good king, this would also explain why Chronicles deals with his short reign in a rather lengthy way (see commentary on 2 Chr. 13:1), including an account of the blessings of children he enjoyed (see commentary on 13:3–22). This suggestion remains a possibility.

The other option is simply to argue that 2 Chronicles is describing Abijah at a time when he was still fully committed to the Lord in order to indicate that when the kings remained loyal to God and in full support of the temple services (2 Chr. 13:10–12; see “The Temple in Chronicles,” p. 541), He did wonders for them and the people. The evaluation of his reign leaves open the possibility that at some point in his life Abijah may have been unfaithful to the Lord (2 Chr. 13:21–14:1).

the Lord, the God of their ancestors (v. 18). In the absence of any mention of natural resources such as the hail used by God on another occasion (Josh. 10:11) or confusion within the enemy camp (Judg. 7:22), we may suppose that God struck down Israel by means of the sword of Abijah and the people with him in his army (2 Chr. 13:17).

The evaluation of the reign of Abijah is brief (vv. 21–22), emphasizing that he became powerful, married fourteen wives, and had twenty-two sons and sixteen daughters (v. 21). Nothing is said about his constant commitment to the Lord. Though not strictly impossible, there is no need to suppose that those fourteen women bore all thirty-eight children within the three years of the reign of their husband. Hebrew royal family statistics are cumulative for the total life span of the monarch (see commentary on 11:1–12:16).

14:1–16:14

The Reign of Asa (911–870 B.C.)

Asa is described in Chronicles as a good king who did much to purify the Israelite faith by calling the people to the exclusive worship of Yahweh. He gathered the leaders of the people in Jerusalem and offered sacrifices to the Lord in a covenant renewal ceremony. His only weakness was relying on the king of Syria rather than on the Lord in a battle against Baasha, king of Israel.

14:1–8. The Early Years. Abijah’s three-year reign, partly occupied with war, may have been insufficient to erase the remnants of Judah’s idolatrous past under Solomon and Rehoboam. In contrast, Asa had leisure to do it since in his time the land had peace and quiet for ten years (vv. 1, 5). Every city in the realm was purged from the altars of the foreign gods and related stone pillars of Baal (the Father-Sky god) and the wooden pole images of Asherah (the Mother-Earth goddess) of the Canaanite religion (v. 3). These years of peace made defensive preparations possible, both by means of fortifications (vv. 6–7) and a ready army (v. 8). Perhaps Asa anticipated the Egyptian invasion, especially if he was withholding tribute.

14:9–15. The Attack of Zerah. As under Pharaoh Shishak (12:2–3), the Egyptian army continued employing auxiliary troops from subject lands bordering on their country. Here the “Cushites” or “Ethiopians” were from Nubia (modern Sudan) in the south. The Cushite commander, Zerah, had a Semitic name and answered probably to Pharaoh Osorkon I. We are not told what prompted the attack, but we may assume that in the eyes of Osorkon the new occupants of the throne of Judah (Abijah and/or Asa) were not keeping the promise of Rehoboam to behave in a proper subservient manner to Egypt (see commentary on 11:1–12:16). The invading army had the advantage of numbers, a very large army, 'elep 'ala-pim (lit. “a thousand thousands”), translated variously as “a million” or “thousands upon thousands” (see commentary on 1 Chr. 4:24–5:26). In any case it seems that the Chronicler did not have at his disposal precise figures because the invaders are described as a fearsome “vast army” or “multitude” (see 2 Chr. 14:11). The three hundred chariots (v. 9) sound like a reasonable number for such an invasion. But Asa had the advantage of knowing the terrain better, and he decided to wait for the invaders at Mareshah, a southern city fortified by Rehoboam (11:8) in order to guard the road linking Judah with Egypt.

The “Valley of Zephathah” has not been identified, but Mareshah is in the Shephelah, where the invading army had to pass between closely spaced hills. Here the multitudinous camel cavalry would lose its advantage of speed and ability to perform enveloping manoeuvres. The bowmen and slingers of Asa, posted on the steep slopes of the hills, would decimate them continuously until they were forced to retreat (14:12). It is clear, however, that the result was by no means assured beforehand: Asa called out and cried to the Lord his God and was heard (v. 11). In the end, the failure of Zerah’s invasion was to make Judah free from Egypt’s yoke again. In the short run it would also allow treasure to be taken from the Egyptians as war reparations. Asa pursued them to Gerar (v. 13), between the southern Judean town of Beersheba and Gaza, seen at the time as the upper northern reach of the Egyptian army. The spoil included many sheep and camels, once the 'ahole were attacked and taken. This term literally reads “tents of the cattle or livestock” in Hebrew and has been translated as “livestock enclosures”—where the animals were—or alternatively as “the camps of the herders,” a reference to where the shepherds were staying (v. 15).

15:1–19. Asa’s Religious Reform. The seer Azariah is called in v. 1 the son of Oded. In v. 8 there are differences among the ancient versions, and thus differences in the modern translations dependent on them. The Hebrew mentions only “Oded” and not Azariah, but the Syriac and Vulgate have “Azariah the son of Oded,” assuming that v. 8 was referring to the same person mentioned in v. 1. Some translations follow the Hebrew, and others the Syriac and Vulgate. In any case, the message drove home the lesson already taught by the victory at Mareshah: the Lord is with you while you are with Him (v. 2).

Not as clear is the allusion to the long time of v. 3 and the deprivation for Israel, without the true God, without a priest teaching, and without law. Some interpret this verse as referring to the period of the judges, others to a more recent time, such as the apostasy under Solomon or Rehoboam, or to the situation of Israel in the Northern Kingdom. Still others would suggest that it describes what would happen in the future if Judah did not adhere strictly to the covenant. There is no easy solution to this matter, but perhaps it would be better to interpret the time reference as designating the time of the judges, when there was no king in Israel—a situation which motivated Asa to initiate a reform in his kingdom.

The purge of pagan centers of worship had been initiated before the invasion (14:2–5) and was now completed (15:8), even if the high places were not removed from Israel (15:17). This latter statement seems to contradict 14:5. Some explain that paganism was resilient; it sprouted back time and again, and Asa left part of its later regrowth standing (17:6). But in view of vv. 12–13, it is more likely that the statement refers specifically to Israel, that is, to the cities that he had taken in the mountains of Ephraim (15:8).

As part of his religious reform, Asa called a convocation of the leaders on the third month, probably during the Festival of Weeks (Pentecost, shabu'im—Ex. 34:22). While the worship of any god other than Yahweh had been forbidden under pain of death (Deut. 13:6–11), Asa threatened whoever would not seek the Lord God of Israel (2 Chr. 15:13). Asa’s warning was addressed to men and women, thus closing any loophole that might have been exploited in the past by the foreign wives of Solomon or Rehoboam. The latter’s favorite wife, Maachah (11:21), the king’s grandmother, was accordingly deposed from her position as the queen mother or “mistress of the palace” because of her involvement with a detestable and obscene image of Asherah (15:16). This kind of image was wooden (14:3), so none have survived, but if gold earrings and pendants from ancient Israel are any indication, it depicted, in stylized form, female genitalia, as a way to attract good luck ('asherah, “bliss,” “happiness”) and fertility. As a leader who sought to follow the Lord with all his heart, Asa could not afford to retain his grandmother in that position of honor—not when true worship was at stake.

As a good king, Asa supported the temple services. In antiquity, metals taken as spoils (here in Abijah’s war against the north [13:19] and his own raid on Gerar [14:13–15]) were deposited in the temple as an expression of gratitude for the victory and the long peace enjoyed by the nation. War did not come until the thirty-fifth year of the reign of Asa (v. 19), when Baasha attacked (16:1). If this is taken at face value, there is a conflict with 1 Kings (15:33; 16:8), according to which Baasha died in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of Asa. There is no final solution to this problem, but it is possible that the thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth (15:19; 16:1) correspond to an era starting in Judah with Rehoboam, as a kingdom separate from Israel. After ten years of peace (14:1), Asa would have defeated Zerah in the fifteenth year of his reign. He then celebrated his victory with a feast (15:10–17) the following year. The attack of the Northern Kingdom would have come soon after, as a reaction to the intervention of Asa in the northern cities (v. 8).

16:1–14. Asa's Reliance on Foreign Help. The dynasty of Jeroboam came to a violent end at the hands of Baasha (v. 1), an upstart from Issachar (1 Kin. 15:27), who renewed hostilities with Judah. He blocked the road coming into Jerusalem from the north through Ramah in order to prevent visits to the temple of Jerusalem by his people. In a military context, this prevention of people leaving or entering conveys an attack (cf. 2 Chr. 16:1), and Asa accordingly sought ways that would force Baasha to withdraw from him (v. 3). By this time it was clear that the confrontation between the Hebrew kingdoms was more or less at a stalemate. Neither side was willing to stake everything on a great battle, such as the one in Zemaraim (13:13–20). Asa thought that the situation called for a regionalization of the conflict and reached out to Benhadad, king of Aram (or Syria; 16:2–3). The mention here of a treaty between Judah and Syria, and another between Israel and Syria (v. 3), does not necessarily mean overt alliances but the implicit peaceful status quo, or the establishment of “diplomatic relations” as we would say today. What Asa requested, and was granted, was for Syria to apply military pressure on the north of Baasha's kingdom, forcing him to relieve its pressure on Ramah. In the short run, this was successful: Asa liberated Ramah and used the building materials of Baasha for his own fortifications (v. 6). But, in the long run, regionalization attracted the interest of the great empires of that day (Assyria, Egypt, and Babylon) and gave them an excuse to intervene later in the Hebrew kingdoms.

Hanani the seer (v. 7) boldly confronted Asa, stating that, instead of seeking help from Syria, he should have learned the lesson of Maresah and trusted in the Lord (v. 8; 14:10–12): the Lord is always searching throughout the world for those who are wholeheartedly loyal to Him—and He will strengthen them (v. 9; cf. Zech. 1:7–11; 4:10). The prophet minced no words and referred to Asa's actions as foolish (2 Chr. 16: 9). Revolting against the prodding of his conscience, Asa threw the prophet in prison (v. 10), but time would vindicate the words of God's messenger. Together with the usual regnal statistics, we learn that the old king died from a disease in his “feet.” This disease, which lasted for two years, may have been referring to a disease which resulted in symptoms in his feet, such as gout or diabetes, but it could also have been something of a urological nature (vv. 12–13). In Hebrew idiom, the “feet,” conceptualized as the lower limbs from the crotch down, can sometimes stand for private parts (e.g., the Hebrew expressions involving “feet” in Judg. 3:24; 1 Sam. 24:3; Ezek. 16:25). The “water of the feet” is a euphemistic idiom for urine, explicit in the margin of the Hebrew text of 2 Kings 18:27. If it was a urological disease, it may have been treated by means of a flexible catheter made from a feather. There is no evidence that ancient Hebrew physicians used spells or other pagan procedures, as is sometimes suggested. The Chronicler criticizes the king for consulting only physicians (2 Chr. 16:12). Diseases are best dealt with by a combination of human effort and reliance on God, just like other enemies (13:18). In spite of this lapse in Asa's reliance on God, the judgment of 2 Chronicles on his reign is favorable (14:2), as was that of the people (16:14).

17:1—21:1

The Reign of Jehoshaphat (872–848 B.C.)

Jehoshaphat is considered by the Chronicler to have done what was good in the sight of the Lord. He knew that the spiritual and social renewal of the people was directly related to their knowledge of the law of God. Consequently, he sent Levites and priests throughout the land to teach them. He also revamped the legal system. But the Chronicler is also aware of the errors committed by this man of God.

17:1–19. Overview of the Reign. Second Chronicles devotes four chapters to Jehoshaphat's reign because of its favorable judgment on him (20:32; see 17:1–4): the Lord was with Jehoshaphat because he sought the God of his father (17:3–4). Most of the material is not found in the books of Kings. He fortified Judah and the cities and towns of Ephraim recovered by Asa (vv. 1–2), and he had abundant wealth and honor (v. 5). The term yigbah lebo—literally “his heart [mind] was high”—has been translated variously as “his heart took delight in the ways of the Lord,” “his heart was devoted to the ways of the Lord,” “his heart was courageous in the ways of the Lord,” or he “took pride in the Lord’s ways.” This latter option is interesting in light of the description of Uzziah (26:16), whose “heart was high” or proud, not in the Lord’s ways but to his destruction and downfall. Jehoshaphat’s mind or heart took pride in the Lord—not in himself. The king did not content himself with the periodical cleansing of idols necessary even in Judah (17:6); instead, he promoted the religious education of the people by a team of laymen, Levites, and priests. The phrase referring to the laymen, his leading officials and Ben-Hail (v. 7), may also be read “his leaders, outstanding men” as in the LXX. The name “Ben-Hail” is otherwise unknown. The presence of outstanding laypeople is critical in any mass religious education effort since a professional team of ministers alone might be seen by some as self-serving. For this task the team relied not on disjointed oral traditions or brief Pentateuch extracts, as is sometimes suggested today, but on the entire book of the law of the Lord (v. 9). This was a hefty volume which, handwritten on skins, required physical effort to handle, as may be appreciated today in traditional synagogue scrolls.

The result of the teaching of the law was that the fear of the Lord fell on all the kingdoms (v. 10). The reverential obedience of Jehoshaphat was rewarded by God with the respect and submission of neighboring lands (vv. 10–11). He became increasingly powerful in terms of military and economic power (vv. 12–13). The Chronicler had at his disposal detailed information on the Judean and Benjamite regiments based in Jerusalem (vv. 14–18); others were based in the fortified cities throughout all of Judah (v. 19).

18:1—19:3. Improper Alliance with Ahab.

The shrewd king of the northern Hebrew state, Ahab, realized that an alliance with Judah was more advantageous than perpetual war and, as usual, the alliance was sealed by marriage (vv. 1–2): Ahab’s daughter married Jehoshaphat’s son (21:6). Jehoshaphat, in contrast, was foolish in accepting such an uneven yoke. He did not need any alliance, for he had military and economic power in abundance (see 17:1–6). The consequences were quick in coming. When visiting the father-in-law of his son, Jehoshaphat was obligated to honor the alliance with Ahab, and thus he could not refuse Ahab’s invitation to join him in battle against the Syrians. Ramoth Gilead (18:3) was, after all, part of the territories of the promised land, a Levitical city of refuge (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 21:38) and residence of one of Solomon’s governors (1 Kin. 4:13). At some point the Syrians had taken possession of the city, perhaps at the secret prodding of Judah itself (1 Kin. 15:18–20). Ahab had been fighting the Syrians three years earlier, but he missed the opportunity to decimate them (1 Kin. 20).

The request of Jehoshaphat to consult a prophet of the Lord (2 Chr. 18:4–6) before proceeding was quite in character (see chap. 20, esp. 20:20). Four hundred prophets were summoned (v. 5). They enjoyed some kind of official protection and felt that they should support the noble cause of recovering an Israelite city (vv. 5, 11), as Nathan once thought he should support David in building the temple (1 Chr. 17:2). They all forgot that preachers should proclaim God’s word, not the well-meaning ideas of human beings. Jehoshaphat somehow suspected as much since he requested a “second opinion” (2 Chr. 18:6). Micaiah, who had not been summoned before, was able to withstand the tacit and overt pressures of the moment (vv. 12–13). He was willing to repeat the complacent messages of the other prophets, perhaps with a sarcastic tone, if that was what was expected of him (v. 14). But when pressed for what he had really seen in vision, he conveyed the sad consequences of the endeavor of the kings, even hinting at the death of Ahab: Micaiah referred to the Lord’s depiction of Israel after the battle, scattered like sheep without a shepherd—they would then have “no master” and would return home in peace (v. 16; cf. v. 27; for the lying spirit of v. 21, see commentary on 1 Kings 22:1–40). As usual, the prophet of doom was blamed for his message: by his colleagues first, once the emptiness of their message was unmasked (2 Chr. 18: 18–24), then by the main beneficiary of the warning (vv. 25–27).

It may seem strange that such a godly man as Jehoshaphat ignored the warning of Micaiah, thus endangering his life (vv. 30–31). In fact, through that battle God was freeing him from this improper alliance. The account of the death of Ahab is much more detailed in 1 Kings 22:29–40 than here because 2 Chronicles is concerned mainly with Jehoshaphat. But the Lord sent a message to Jehoshaphat through the Prophet Jehu (19:2), perhaps the son of the same Hanani who had rebuked Asa (16:7–10). He reminded the king not to “love those who hate the LORD.” The message recognized, however, that there was some good in the king because of his dedication to God (19:3).

19:4–11. The Reforms of Jehoshaphat. In contrast to Asa, Jehoshaphat seems to have taken the rebuke with humility since he then went out again in a mission to bring the people back to the Lord, the God their ancestors worshiped (v. 4; cf. 17:7–9). At the time of the conquest of Canaan, a rudimentary trial system had been established for capital cases (Num. 35:6–34; Deut. 4:41–43; 19:1–14; Josh. 20:1–9). With the development of state institutions under the united monarchy, a better judiciary was long overdue. Abuse of kingly power such as under Ahab in the north (1 Kin. 21) was not to be the practice in Judah (2 Chr. 19:5–7). The ideal judge was to strive to implement righteous, divine justice throughout all the cities of the land, particularly the fortified ones (v. 5). In addition to the general judiciary, a system was put in place in Jerusalem to adjudicate controversies, settling disputes arising from the interpretation of divine law (v. 8) and as an appellate court (vv. 9–10). At the apex of the system stood the high priest, who settled religious matters, and the prince of the tribe of Judah, who oversaw civil matters (v. 11).

20:1–30. The Moabite War. Moab, just across the thin river Jordan in front of southern Judah, had been subjugated by David (1 Chr. 18:2), but the people of Moab attempted to regain independence after the division of the monarchy. This came in two stages: first by asserting independence from Israel, then from “the house of David” (i.e., Judah). For such an endeavor they enlisted the help of Ammon, also in Transjordan, in front of northern Judah and Samaria, together with others—the ‘mm is vocalized in the Hebrew as ‘ammonim, “Ammonites,” but this term is read by the LXX as Minaion, or Meunites (me‘unim, as in a number of translations; cf. 2 Chr. 26:7) from south Arabia. In the narrative, however, the coalition army comprises Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir (20:10, 22–23), suggesting that the others besides the Ammonites (v. 1) refers to Mount Seir or Edom. With this coalition, in a surprise attack (2 Chr. 20:2), the Moabites expected a victory over the southern half of their former oppressor. There is no mention of the attack in 1 Kings, but it was of interest to the Chronicler, whose community faced conflicts with some of those same people. The vast army, a great multitude (v. 2), sneaking in by the southern end of the Dead Sea, had already reached En Gedi, midway on the Judean side of its shore, before they were detected. Jehoshaphat was alarmed, but he had the right response to fear: he proclaimed a fast and the people gathered together, seeking help from the Lord (vv. 3–4).

The main elements of his prayer were: (a) God rules over all the kingdoms of the nations, not only over Israel (vv. 5–6); (b) He had placed His people on the Holy Land, where they built a temple in order to entreat His help in times of need (vv. 7–9); (c) at the time of the conquest of this land, Moab, Ammon, and Edom were not dispossessed, following God’s instructions, but they now wanted to repay evil for good with this invasion (vv. 10–11); (d) Yahweh should intervene with His righteous judgment (v. 12).

The Chronicler is interested in all manifestations of prophecy but especially in those related to the temple services through a Levite, here Jahaziel, one of the sons of Asaph, a “seer” (29:30; cf. the titles to Pss. 50, 73–83). Judah was to meet the invaders, but instead of fighting, they would only need to stand firm, waiting in stillness for the saving deliverance of the Lord, as at the time of the Exodus (2 Chr. 20:17; Ex. 14:13). Jehoshaphat exhorted the people to receive the message of the Lord with faith, trusting in the messages of His prophets—this is what leads to true success and prosperity (2 Chr. 20:18–20). Faith in the Lord and trust in His prophets will always mean victory for the people of God. Apparently the Moabites and Ammonites held a grudge against the Edomites (Mount Seir; vv. 10, 22) and mistrusted their army, which had not yet openly rebelled against Judah (21:8; 1 Kin. 22:47). Whatever the reason, they attacked each other. The people of Judah, who all the while were singing praises to God (2 Chr. 20:21–22), were soon able to verify that no one had escaped (v. 24) and proceeded to take the spoil (vv. 25). Indeed, the Lord is always faithful to His promises. Here, He fulfilled His promise to fight the battles of His people (Deut. 20:1–4). Heartfelt gratitude rose from God’s people for this deliverance in a special service organized at the temple (2 Chr. 20:26–28). After this they enjoyed peace for the rest of the reign of Jehoshaphat (v. 30).

20:31–21:1. End of Jehoshaphat’s Reign. The statistical and bibliographic information found in 2 Chronicles differs little from that found in 1 Kings 22:41–45, except to note that the people were not fully committed to God (2 Chr. 20:33), in spite of the efforts of the king. It is also indicated that Jehoshaphat made a trade alliance with Israel. This appears here, as in 1 Kings 22, almost as an afterthought. Perhaps Jehoshaphat thought that since God had blessed the cooperative enterprise of Solomon with the Phoenicians, he might obtain the same result with his fellow Hebrews in the north, who were not more pagan than the latter. But the Prophet Eliezer told the Davidic king that God could not bless this alliance (2 Chr. 20:37). There was indeed a difference between an ancestral pagan, who might not know better and was sympathetic toward the religion of David (such as Hiram; chap. 2), and an Israelite in open apostasy against the Lord. The ships were wrecked (v. 37) in the Ezion Geber port itself (1 Kin. 22:48), probably in an awful storm, lacking adequate harbor facilities. The northerners were insistent and proposed joint ventures, but Jehoshaphat had learned his lesson (1 Kin. 22:49). The reference to his death is brief: he rested with his ancestors and was buried in David's city (2 Chr. 21:1).

21:1–20

The Reign of Jehoram (853–841 B.C.)

Jehoram was greatly influenced by his wife, the daughter of Ahab, king of Israel. Jeroham led the people away from worship in the temple of the Lord to worship on the high places. The Lord reacted to this rebellion by weakening his military power and finally by striking him with a deadly disease. God gave him a great privilege, but he chose not to honor the Lord.

21:1–11. Character and Behavior. The account of this reign is brief probably because Jehoram was “evil” (v. 6). Jehoshaphat had followed the wise example of Rehoboam (11:23) in spreading his six younger sons throughout the kingdom as luxury pensioners, in order to prevent them from jockeying for the throne (v. 3). But Jehoram, the firstborn, mistrusted his brothers and had them killed together with other outstanding personalities of the realm (v. 4). By this time reality had surpassed even the worst nightmares of Samuel (1 Sam. 8:4–18): the Hebrews had become “like all the nations” in their pragmatic, opportunistic, and amoral power politics.

21:5–7. Regnal Statistics. The daughter of Ahab mentioned here (v. 6) was Athaliah (22:2), who was just as bad an influence on Jehoram as on their son Ahaziah (21:6; 22:3). Even so, because of the Davidic covenant, the Lord was not willing to destroy the house of David; He had promised to keep a lamp shining for him and his offspring forever (21:7). Data on the king are summarized and supplemented in v. 20.

During his reign, the Edomites, at the time dwelling to the southeast of the Dead Sea, revolted and gained their independence (v. 8; cf. 20:10). The account, whether here or in 2 Kings 8:21, is not entirely clear, but it seems that in attempting to put down the rebellion, Jehoram barely escaped with his life (2 Chr. 21:9). Libnah, a town named for its white (laban) cliffs, had been historically within Israelite territory (Josh. 15:42; 21:13) and returned to it before the time of Hezekiah (Is. 37:8). At the time of Jehoram it may have fallen into the hands of the neighboring Philistines (2 Chr. 21:16).

21:12–20. Elijah's Prophecy. This northern prophet, so prominent in the book of Kings, is only mentioned here in 2 Chronicles, which is focused on Judah. Conversely, the cycle of Elijah stories in Kings does not mention this letter sent to a southern king. The present passage is also the only extant written prophecy of Elijah. He was still in the Holy Land at the time of Jehoram of Israel, an uncle and contemporary of Jehoram of Judah (2 Kin. 1:2–2:1). The exact time of his ascension is not given, nor is the letter dated. Elijah implies that the six brothers of Jehoram of Judah were not as ungodly as their murderous sibling: they were “better” than he (2 Chr. 21:13). As a punishment for impiety and murder, the family of Jehoram and his possessions would be almost completely wiped out, and the king's end would be even more painful: he would be afflicted with a severe illness of his bowels or intestines (v. 15). This all came to pass: Philistines from the west and south Arabians from the east raided Judah and carried away most of Jehoram's family and goods (vv. 16–17). He died as predicted, apparently to no one's sorrow or regret (vv. 18–20).

22:1–9

The Reign of Ahaziah (841 B.C.)

Ahaziah was the only son of Jehoram left alive by his enemies. Under the influence of his mother, Athaliah, he followed the politics of his father. Judah had become, from the religious point of view, an extension of the Northern Kingdom.

22:1–2. The Accession of Ahaziah. The raiders, mentioned in 21:16–17, had taken captive the sons of Jehoram present in the camp of Judah's defenders (v. 1). The king himself might have been too ill to be there (21:19) and Ahaziah, his youngest son, too inexperienced. In the Hebrew text, 2 Chronicles states that he was forty-two years old at the time (v. 2), but a man, in this case, Jehoram, dying at the age of forty (21:20) cannot leave behind a "youngest son" of forty-two. According to 2 Kings 8:26, Ahaziah was twenty-two years old, so the figure "forty-two" might be a transcriptional mistake or, like the years thirty-five and thirty-six in the reign of Asa (see commentary on 2 Chr. 15:1–19; 16:1–14), it might be based on a new era, this time starting not with Rehoboam but with Omri. Ahaziah would have been regarded "son" of Omri through Athaliah and Ahab (22:2).

22:3–9. The End of Ahaziah. The account in 2 Chronicles is much briefer than in 2 Kings 9:27–29 since this was an evil king (see commentary on 11:1–12:16). Ahaziah first tried to flee from Jehu, but he was wounded (2 Kin. 9:27), later captured, and brought before him (2 Chr. 22:8). Jehu was an enemy of the Canaanite religion, though his methods left much to be desired (2 Kin. 9:18–24; cf. Hos. 1:4), and as a northerner he would not, of course, recognize the exclusive rights of the Jerusalem altar (2 Kin. 10:29–31). However, the house of Judah then reigning was related to Ahab and followed in his steps, so it had to be exterminated as per orders of God through Elisha (2 Kin. 9:1, 8). Consequently Ahaziah was finally executed in Samaria (2 Chr. 22:9), but his body was allowed to return to Jerusalem for burial (2 Kin. 9:28). With this execution the reconciliation of the Hebrew royal houses in the north and the south, which had started with Ahab and Jehoshaphat, came to an end.

22:10–12

The Reign of Athaliah (841–835 B.C.)

The queen mother, Athaliah, saw a unique opportunity to grab power once most of the males in the family of Jehoshaphat had been killed by Jehoram (21:4), the raiders (21:16), or Jehu (22:9). She destroyed some more (v. 10), making sure that nobody could dispute her position as the ruling queen (not as the regent queen while Joash was a minor since she tried to kill him too; 2 Kin. 11:2). But Jehoshabeath (called "Jehosheba" in 2 Kin. 11:2), the daughter of King Jehoram and wife of Jehoiada the priest (2 Chr. 22:11), was able to hide her baby nephew within the temple facilities (v. 11). The temple functioned as a place of refuge for the future king. We are told that Athaliah reigned over the land for six years, but not with the usual formula or regnal years.

23:1–24:27

The Reign of Joash (835–796 B.C.)

Here the story follows 2 Kings 11–12 quite closely, but as usual the role of the Levites is highlighted (see 2 Chr. 23:1–2), as is the need for the purity of the temple (vv. 6–7). Joash was an excellent king as long as he was under the influence of Jehoiada, the high priest. Jehoiada was the mentor of the king, highly respected by the people, and very influential. It was under the leadership of these two men that the temple was repaired. Unfortunately, after the death of Jehoiada, the king fell under the influence of spiritually corrupted advisors, and Joash did what was evil in the eyes of the Lord.

23:1–11. The Coup of Jehoiada. In order to return the kingdom to the dynasty of David, Jehoiada first contacted the captains, probably the leaders of the royal bodyguards (cf. v. 13), and showed them the royal child (2 Kin. 11:4). They in turn gathered the Levites of the realm for additional manpower, as well as clan elders for political support (2 Chr. 23:2). As noted previously, the tribe of Levi was peculiarly warlike (see 1 Chr. 26:1–19). A gathering of soldiers in Jerusalem would have looked suspicious to Athaliah, but a Levitical assembly was easier to justify because of their concern for the temple—and just as effective from a military viewpoint. Jehoiada reminded the assembly that the covenant of God with David required that his descendant, not the daughter of Ahab, be on the throne (2 Chr. 23:3).

The operative instructions were simple: the change of priestly and Levitical divisions came on the Sabbath, and both those who should be leaving the temple area and those who should be entering it would remain together with weapons in hand, but laymen had to remain in their proper place. The seven-year-old king, Joash, was anointed by Jehoiada and his sons (v. 11; not specified in 2 Kin.) and received, in addition to the crown, the Testimony (in the sense of "document") or covenant, which normally refers to the Law; here it may be some kind of coronation deed or a pledge of the people's loyalty (2 Chr. 23:11; cf. Ps. 2:7).

23:12–21. The Purge of Baalists. This account differs little from that of 2 Kings 11:13–17, though the Chronicler emphasizes again the role of the Levitical music (here in 2 Chr. 23:13). Also, here Jehoiada took care not to pollute the temple area with a corpse (v. 14)—Athaliah was killed outside (v. 15). At this point there was a renewal of the covenant in which the people pledged to be the Lord's people (v. 16). This implies several things. First the pagan religion had to be stamped out (v. 17). Here we learn that at that time there was a temple of Baal in Jerusalem, presided over by the pagan priest Mattan ("gift"). Since this is a typically Phoenician name, he must have entered the city hand in hand with Athaliah during the reign of Jehoram (21:6). Second, the temple service returned to the proper procedures established under David, with singing (23:18–19). The triumphal enthronement ceremony required the presence of all the notable persons in the realm (v. 20), while all the people of the land rejoiced (v. 21).

24:1–14. Virtual Regency of Jehoiada. Since the king was only seven years old, the real power behind the throne was his rescuer, the elderly Jehoiada, more than ninety years old at the time (v. 15; cf. v. 1). Not surprisingly, the king decided to (lit. "was with a heart to") repair the temple, the house of the Lord (v. 4). Chronicles adds the note that much of the disrepair was due to vandalism and theft on the part of the sons of Athaliah (v. 7), presumably the older brothers of Ahaziah killed by the Philistine/south Arabian raiders (21:16–17). The virtual regency of Jehoiada was recognized by the people, who buried him among the kings (v. 16; note that the name "Israel" is applied here to Judah alone).

24:15–18. Apostasy of Joash. Soon after Jehoiada's death, the leaders or officials of Judah (v. 17)—no doubt contaminated by paganism under the reigns of Jehoram, Ahaziah, and Athaliah—demanded a return to idolatry, which brought God's wrath (anger) upon the nation (v. 18). This was not merely an emotional reaction on the part of God but the consequence of the clash of His holiness with the wanton transgression of those who suppress the truth in unrighteousness or wickedness (Rom. 1:18). As on all former occasions, starting with the reign of Solomon, paganism entered Israel from the higher classes, which were subject to foreign influences, but eventually trickled down to the common people.

24:19–22. Testimony of Prophets. God forewarned the leaders about His coming wrath through prophets who testified against idolatry (v. 19). A foremost example is that of Zechariah, here called the son of Jehoiada the priest (vv. 20–22). Since Jehoiada had been born more than 130 years earlier (v. 15), we should understand the term "son" in its frequent Hebrew sense of "grandson." His actual father was Berechiah, as mentioned by Jesus in Matthew 23:35, when alluding to Bible history from the beginning of Genesis to near the end of Chronicles, which closes the Hebrew Scriptures. This, said Jesus, is the Zechariah who was stoned "between the temple and the altar." Indeed the murder took place in the courtyard of the temple (2 Chr. 24:21). The ingratitude of Joash is appalling (v. 22) and reveals a weak character. He decided to chart his own course of action independent of the principles taught him by the high priest. He chose death rather than life.

24:23–27. The Aramaean Raid and the End of Joash. Spring was the season of the year when kings went to battle in war (2 Sam. 11:1; the lull in farm work after planting the crops made more men available). In this particular spring (lit. in Hebrew—"the turn of the year"—some translations have "the end of the year"—the Hebrew year began in the spring; 2 Chr. 24:23), a small company of men from Syria was able to successfully raid Judah because they had forsaken the Lord God (v. 24). When God's people forsake Him, He may not only forsake them but also deliver them into the hands of the enemy (vv. 20, 24). But Syria did not aim at conquering Jerusalem. This would have required major war preparations that could not have been kept secret and would certainly have been matched in Judah. Instead, the raid, carried out by a small force based far away from Damascus (v. 23), was able to maintain pressure on the Hebrews, probably in order to protect Syrian interests in Gilead (see 18:1–3). If so, the promotion of religious pluralism on the part of the "leaders" of Judah (2 Chr. 24:17) may have been fueled by ulterior motives. The Canaanite religion had not only vulgar appeal but also traditional status among the mixed population of Gilead. Its toleration along with the religion of the God of Israel seemed to provide a better chance of gaining their support for the Hebrew recovery of control. Religion was also a handy excuse for murder, here perpetrated to avenge the blood of Jehoiada's son (or grandson), whom Joash had murdered (v. 25). One may wonder, however, what the sons of Ammonite and Moabite women, respectively, were doing among the officials or servants of the king in Jerusalem (vv. 25–26). The answer is probably to be found in the royal harem, where foreign women were routinely imported. In that case, the murder may have also had obscure political motives.

25:1–28

The Reign of Amaziah (796–767 B.C.)

Amaziah was an ambivalent character with double loyalties. He tried to do what was pleasing to the Lord but not with a loyal heart. He clearly gave priority to his own interest rather than to the Lord's. Consequently, God's prophets condemned his conduct, and his life ended in failure.

25:1–13. Initial Righteousness of Amaziah.

Whatever led to the murder of Joash (see 24:25–27), Amaziah does not seem to have had a hand in it. He started his reign with respect for the law of God above political expediency (25:3–4). The text notes, however, that he did what was right in the sight of the Lord but not with a shalem (Heb.) heart (v. 2). This term literally means “whole,” and is variously translated as “perfect,” “loyal,” “wholeheartedly.” This description is in contrast to that of David (2 Kin. 14:3). The narratives that follow illustrate this strange phenomenon.

The first is the campaign in Edom (2 Chr. 25:5–13). Edom was important to Judah mainly because of its copper mines, which provided such an important part of Solomon's wealth (8:17–18). The territory had been lost under Jehoram (21:8–11), but the campaign of Amaziah was able to reconquer it (25:11–12). This provided the foundation for renewed shipping trade from the Elath port under his son Uzziah (26:2; cf. 2 Kin. 14:7). The capital of Edom, Sela (“rock”) or Petra (the Greek equivalent), was probably the site of the massacre of the Edomites (2 Chr. 25:11–12; 2 Kin. 14:7). They were thrown down from the high vertical sandstone cliffs for which the place is named.

25:14–16. The Idolatry of Amaziah. The next actions of Amaziah are hard to understand, let alone explain or justify: he brought back the gods of the people of Seir (Edom) after defeating them, and he worshiped them (v. 14). Assyria and Babylon would carry away and honor the idols together with the intelligentsia of conquered nations, so that the intellectual and religious capital of their subjects was physically moved to the central capital of the empire, as a further instrument of domination. Amaziah may have attempted something similar with Edom. After the massacre of Edomite combatants, perhaps Amaziah tried to ingratiate himself to the remainder of the population by honoring this image. But even in his day and age the king's actions were seen as absurd. The Lord sent an unnamed prophet with a message: he asked the king why he would seek the gods who could not rescue their own people from his hands. When the king told the prophet to stop speaking on pain of death, the prophet responded by telling the king that God was determined to destroy him as a result of his rebellion and recalcitrance (vv. 15–16). The king would soon learn that God has power to save and to overthrow (v. 8).

25:17–28. Israel Defeats Amaziah, and His Death.

Full of self-importance after his victory in Edom, Amaziah reacted to the raid of the northern mercenaries (v. 13) with a punitive expedition against their country, Israel. King Joash of Israel tried in vain to warn Amaziah about the folly of this action (vv. 18–19) and finally inflicted upon him a sound defeat (vv. 20–22). Joash did not try to eliminate the Davidic dynasty, however, which was native of Judah and enjoyed there too much popular support, but instead he made Jerusalem defenseless and took hostages as a warning against further military ventures (vv. 23–24). He also plundered the temple treasury, which had been in the care of the family of Obed-Edom since David's times (see 1 Chr. 13:13). The Chronicler's account differs from that of 2 Kings 14 (which does not mention the idolatry of Amaziah) mainly by emphasizing that the defeat of Judah was accomplished by the providence of God—He was punishing Amaziah and Judah because they were worshiping the gods of Edom (2 Chr. 25:20). The biographical information here is not entirely clear, but it seems that when Amaziah was brought to Jerusalem in disgrace (v. 23), the people of Judah immediately conspired against him (v. 27). They decided to place his son Uzziah on the throne (26:1), which was a logical reaction to the national humiliation. Amaziah was able to maintain himself in the Lachish fortress for fifteen years, hoping for a restoration of his power, but he was eventually murdered. Nevertheless, he was given military honors at his burial (he was brought in by horses; 2 Chr.

25:28). This information implies that there was a coregency of fifteen years between Amaziah and his son Uzziah, though in fact Uzziah was the only ruler in Judah.

26:1-23

The Reign of Uzziah (792-740 B.C.)

Uzziah was a king who was unquestionably committed to the Lord but who was not totally willing to recognize the limits of his power. In Israel the three centers of power were the king, the high priest, and the prophet. Uzziah tried to usurp priestly powers, and this resulted in his downfall (see "The Temple in Chronicles," p. 541).

26:1-15. The Power of Uzziah. It is clear that Uzziah was for a time faithful to the covenant and willing to listen to the Prophet Zechariah (perhaps the "son of Jeberekiah" of Is. 8:2). He was given understanding by God (2 Chr. 26:5). There are differing manuscript traditions in regard to this verse's description of what Zechariah understood: some Hebrew manuscripts, the LXX, Vulgate, and Syriac have "fear of God," while others have "visions of God"; thus some Bible translations follow one or the other of the text traditions. Either way, Zechariah had special understanding and used this to support and instruct King Uzziah. Though after the death of Amaziah Judah had been virtually reduced to the status of a tribal principedom (25:23), obviously Uzziah came to an understanding with Samaria because he was able to fortify the wall again (26:9, 15). Though we do not know the details, such arrangements precluded further warfare between the Hebrew kingdoms. In this way both the success of Amaziah in Edom and his folly in confronting Israel ultimately resulted in peace, wealth, and military might for a largely restored Israel (2 Kin. 14:25-27). As sole monarch, Uzziah reestablished the refinery trade from Elath (2 Chr. 26:2) and no doubt used the proceeds to reestablish the authority of Jerusalem over the peoples made subject by David (vv. 6-8). In this he was aided by a standing army of 2,600 officers (v. 12) and a reserve of 307,500 soldiers who were issued standard offensive and defensive weapons (vv. 13-14), a novelty for the times. His progressive outlook was also manifested in his love for the soil (v. 10). In Judah, where there is a long dry season, this implied sinking many wells (cisterns) in the watertight limestone underlying most of the country. Plants fended for themselves in such an environment and fed the abundant royal livestock (v. 10), but those animals could not survive without a continuous supply of drinking water, which those cisterns provided. During his reign Uzziah became very strong and powerful (v. 8).

26:16-23. Pride and Punishment of Uzziah.

This passage expands the statement found in 2 Kings 15:5 regarding Uzziah's divinely inflicted leprosy. Uzziah acted unfaithfully and transgressed by rebelliously entering the temple and attempting to burn incense on the altar in front of the Most Holy Place (2 Chr. 26:16). This was the result of his inordinate pride and also perhaps because of a desire to impress all those nations recently dominated militarily. In Mesopotamia and Egypt the kings were high priests. Uzziah may have envisioned a similar role for himself, on the basis of the priesthood of kings in Salem/Jerusalem (Gen. 14:18; Ps. 110:4). The eighty courageous and valiant priests of the Lord commanded by the high priest to expel the king from the temple (2 Chr. 26:17) were necessary because the king otherwise could have resisted the expulsion (v. 18) with the help of his bodyguards. The leprosy (v. 19) was most probably Hansen's disease. The king was able to observe the outbreak in his own skin and hurried to leave the temple. While nothing prevented him, from that time on, from continuing to make important decisions of government, he could not, as an unclean leper (v. 23), attend the temple or court of judgment, kingly functions he had to delegate to his son Jotham (v. 21). After he died, he was accordingly buried in a special cemetery (v. 23).

27:1-9

The Reign of Jotham (750-732 B.C.)

Nothing bad is reported about Jotham. As a king he did what was right in the eyes of the Lord. Unfortunately, the people did not follow his example. But the Lord blessed him and gave him victories over his enemies.

27:1-2. Regnal Statistics and Evaluation.

A careful study of the sometimes confusing chronological data of the Hebrew kings has led to the conclusion that Jotham reigned as coregent with Uzziah for about twelve years (see 26:21), plus four years as sole king (thus making the sixteen years—vv. 1, 8). He also reigned four years in another coregency, this time with his son Ahaz (thus explaining the "twentieth year of Jotham the son of Uzziah” in 2 Kin. 15:30). The brevity of his period as sole king may account for the paucity of items reported about him. He did what was right in the Lord’s estimation (2 Chr. 27: 2), but the people acted corruptly by offering illicit sacrifices outside the temple (cf. 2 Kin. 15:35).

27:3–9. The Deeds of Jotham. The Upper Gate of the temple was probably the northern one, where it opened to an upward slope. The Ophel was a landfill in the south of the city, dominating the Kidron valley (v. 3). Jotham also continued the defensive construction plan of his father, with cities (fortresses) in the hill country of Judah, which were connected visually by a chain of observation towers (v. 4). He was also able to obtain a handsome tribute from the Ammonites, after a punitive expedition probably made to recover the tribute that was past due (v. 5). Because Jotham established and ordered his ways according to the Lord his God, he became very strong and powerful (v. 6).

28:1–27

The Reign of Ahaz (735–716 B.C.)

Ahaz was one of the most Caananized kings of Judah. During his reign he followed the ways of the rebellious kings of Israel, the Northern Kingdom. He even offered his children as human sacrifices. This was a dark period in the history of the kingdom of Judah.

28:1–4. Regnal Statistics and Evaluation. In spite of the efforts of the Prophet Isaiah to provide divine guidance for Ahaz, he turned into one of the worst kings of Judah. He lived (or “walked”) in the same ways as the kings of Israel (v. 2). As noted previously, paganism entered Hebrew lands usually through the royal court (see 24:15–18). Worship of common deities seems to have been a precondition either for alliances, such as that of Ahab with Phoenicia (eventually resulting in the temple of Baal in Jerusalem; see 23:16–19), or for the annexation of other lands, such as Edom (see 25:14–16). However, the horrendous abominations here mentioned, such as child sacrifice in the Valley of the Son of Hinnom (Heb. “Ben Hinnom”; 28:3), do not seem motivated by diplomatic needs but by utter lack of faith in the God of his fathers. We do not know the conditions under which Ahaz committed such abominations, but he must have acted out of political or personal desperation (cf. 2 Kin. 3:27).

28:5–15. The Syro-Ephraimite War. The north was not completely devoid of prophets of the Lord, such as Oded (v. 9), who reminded Israel of the prohibition against enslaving fellow Hebrews (v. 11; Lev. 25:39). The captives gained the support of the tribal leaders or heads (2 Chr. 28:12–13), and they were finally returned via Jericho, well fed, clothed, and in some cases even helped to ride on donkeys (v. 15).

28:16–21. Treaty of Ahaz with Assyria. Completely surrounded by enemies in the area, Ahaz then resorted to an alliance further afield with Assyria, which did alleviate the pressure of Syria and Israel upon Judah (2 Kin. 16:7–9). However, there was a religious price to pay: Ahaz reformed the altar of sacrifice in the temple of Jerusalem in order to please the king of Assyria (2 Kin. 16:10–18). It soon became clear that Assyria had come to the Levant only for its own purposes. When its aid was requested against renewed Edomite and Philistine raids, the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser demanded further payments from Ahaz but did not help (2 Chr. 28:20). Judah had been brought low in humility on account of Ahaz, a king who had encouraged moral decline, wickedness, and lack of restraint (the Heb. para’ can and has been translated as all these), as well as unfaithfulness to the living God (v. 19).

28:22–27. Further Apostasy and Death of Ahaz. Instead of repenting and seeking refuge in the Lord amid the alarming circumstances, Ahaz only deepened his unfaithfulness, experimenting with the worship of foreign idols (vv. 22–23). He actively promoted religious pluralism in every corner in Jerusalem (v. 24) and closed the doors to the temple. The dwelling place of the God who redeemed Israel from Egypt became irrelevant and unnecessary. The temple, where atonement took place, was rejected and shut up. At his death, the judgment of the people on his reign was revealed by the fact that he was not buried in the tombs of the kings of Israel (v. 27).

29:1—32:33

The Reign of Hezekiah (716–687 B.C.)

Hezekiah was one of the greatest kings of Judah. Everything he did for the Lord and the people he did with all his heart—with undivided loyalty. He repaired and cleansed the temple, reorganized its services, and celebrated the Passover. He was an effective religious, military, and administrative leader. Unfortunately, his pride cast a shadow on his character, but it was not powerful enough to permanently damage his relationship with the Lord.

29:1–36. Restoration of the Temple. At the beginning of the sanctuary ritual year, in the first month of spring, the new king opened the doors of the temple (v. 3), gathered the priests and Levites (vv. 4–5), and apprised them of his intentions to make a covenant with the God of Israel (v. 10). In order to accomplish this latter purpose it was necessary to clean up the temple that had been shut up by his father. The Levites and the temple were to be sanctified (vv. 1–17). Everything was ready by the sixteenth day of the month, theoretically in time for the Festival of Unleavened Bread (vv. 18–19; but see commentary on 30:1–27). Proper sanctuary service was then restored, with appropriate sacrifices, contributed by the representatives of the nation (vv. 20–24, 31–36), and the sacred music of the Levites (vv. 25–30). God was once more at the center of the life of His people. Here we learn that David's instruction regarding the orchestra was based on the Lord's instruction through His prophets (v. 25).

30:1–27. The Passover of Hezekiah. The Passover victim had to be sacrificed on the evening of the fourteenth day of the lunar month. But since the temple was not yet ready, the festival was postponed for the next lunar cycle (which was permitted under the law; Num. 9:6–11), giving everybody time to prepare, even northern believers (2 Chr. 30:1–9). By this time, the latter were a minority in Israel, but some did accept the invitation of their southern brethren and came (vv. 10–12). On this occasion the Levites acted as intermediaries of the people and slaughtered the Passover victims (vv. 13–17). Those who came from the Northern Kingdom had not had time to cleanse themselves and yet ate the Passover. The king interceded for them, asking the Lord to atone for and pardon anyone who had sincerely sought Him, even if they had not been cleansed according to the sanctuary guidelines (vv. 18–20). The Lord listened to the king (v. 20). Moreover, by common consent, they kept the festival for fourteen days, instead of the seven prescribed, so as to give time for the Levites to instruct them on the finer points of the law (vv. 21–22). The king provided victuals for the multitude in view of this unexpected prolongation of the festival (vv. 23–26), reminding people of the bountiful times of Solomon (v. 26; cf. 7:7). Notice that the real holy dwelling place of God is not the earthly but the heavenly sanctuary (v. 27), just as the heart of religion is found not in cold ritual correctness but in atonement and spontaneous confession, praise (v. 22), and joy (v. 26).

31:1–21. The Reforms of Hezekiah. Revival of faith should always be followed by reformation and changes in behavior. All the Israelites who had been present at the festival participated in the removal of cultic images and illicit altars from Judah and from some parts of Israel (v. 1). Obviously in the north this would not have enjoyed official support. The priestly and Levitical divisions were restored (v. 2), provision was made for the regular support of the sacrificial worship from the royal lands (v. 3), as well as support for the Levites dwelling in Jerusalem, so that they could devote themselves to the law (v. 4). The people resumed the delivery of tithes and firstfruits to the temple (vv. 5–10) and to special storehouses, and proper accounting procedures were added (vv. 11–15). From these financial resources a stipend was paid to everybody in Levitical and Aaronite genealogy (vv. 16–19). Hezekiah sought God in everything he did, and he did it all with diligence—with all his heart (v. 21).

32:1–23. The Defeat of Sennacherib. Second Chronicles is mainly interested in the prosperity of Hezekiah, not in his problems, which may be supplied from other sources. The alliance with Judah had given Assyria an excuse to extend its dominion in the Levant; the Northern Kingdom fell to Assyria in 722 B.C. As a vassal of Assyria, Hezekiah was not disturbed for some time, but around 701 B.C. the Egyptians began encouraging nations within their traditional sphere of influence to rebel against Assyria. Hezekiah participated in an Egyptian-led anti-Assyrian league with Sidon (Phoenicia), Ascalon, and Ekron (Philistia; cf. 2 Kin. 18:7), cities which fell to Sennacherib once he defeated the supporting Egyptian army. He then marched into Judah and took forty-six of its towns, including the fortress of Lachish. Hezekiah bought him off with heavy tribute (2 Kin. 18:13–16), but later, still worried about the pro-Egyptian party in Judah (2 Kin. 19:8–13), Sennacherib returned. This return probably took place years later (note the time-consuming intervening preparations in Jerusalem; 2 Chr. 32:2–8). A division of the Assyrian army besieged Jerusalem under the command of the chief military officers or servants of the empire while Sennacherib himself remained in Lachish (v. 9). The Assyrians realized that the morale of the people of Judah was held high because of their religion, so they tried to discourage them by deriding Hezekiah's command to worship on one altar only (v. 12) and, for that matter, his trust in Yahweh (v. 11). As well, Sennacherib's officials touted the record of Assyria's conquests—no god of any nation or kingdom had been able to protect their people from Sennacherib or those before him (v. 15). The propaganda went as far as to revile and ridicule the Lord (v. 17). Hezekiah and Isaiah pled with the Lord (v. 20) in the temple (2 Kin. 19:14–19) to vindicate His holy name. Isaiah had accurately predicted that other military needs would soon remove Sennacherib from Judah (2 Kin. 19:7).

As for the soldiers besieging Jerusalem, the Lord sent an angel who destroyed all the warriors, captains, and officers of the army (2 Chr. 32:21). We are not told how this happened, but Herodotus records that the army of Sennacherib, near the Egyptian border, was plagued by mice who had infested their supplies. Mice are well-known vectors of bubonic plague, some forms of which kill in just twenty-four hours. In any case, Sennacherib returned in disgrace to his own land, having shamefully learned the hard way that Yahweh was able to deliver His people (cf. v. 15). Although Sennacherib boasted in the Assyrian records that he “shut Hezekiah in as a bird in a cage,” in fact the Lord saved Hezekiah and Jerusalem (v. 22). But Hezekiah had more to fear from the Assyrians, who were no doubt bent on a regime change. Vassals who betrayed their trust were routinely executed and replaced by pro-Assyrian relatives on the throne.

32:24–26. Illness and Recovery of Hezekiah.

The root of Hezekiah's trials, including the Assyrian attack and his illness, was that he did not respond appropriately to the Lord according to the favor and kindness shown to him (32:25) during the years in which “he prospered” (31:21), or after God's healing him from his illness. While he did offer a prayer of thanksgiving for his recovery (2 Kin. 20:1–11; Is. 38), he neglected to emphasize God's greatness when the Babylonians came, for his heart was lifted up in pride (2 Chr. 32:25). Both Isaiah and Kings provide further detail regarding Hezekiah's illness and recovery. After a message of Isaiah warning of impending death (2 Kin. 20:1; Is. 38:1), Hezekiah humbled himself (2 Chr. 32:26) and “wept bitterly” (2 Kin. 20:2–3; Is. 38:2–3). The sign and recovery then followed, fifteen years before the end of his twenty-nine-year-long reign (2 Chr. 29:1; 2 Kin. 20:6; Is. 38:5), and therefore very close to the Assyrian attack on his fourteenth year (2 Kin. 18:13). His illness is diagnosed in 2 Kings 20:7 and Isaiah 38:21 as “a boil” or ulcer (cf. the plagues in Ex. 9:9; Rev. 16:2). Perhaps this was the result of diabetes. The very high sugar content of a lump of dried figs (2 Kin. 20:7; Is. 38:21) is an effective treatment that may prevent infection in such ulcers, and the subsequent deadly gangrene. As for the sign (2 Chr. 32:24), the Chronicler assumes that readers remember it well: the Lord moved the shadow backward (2 Kin. 20:11). Though some type of natural explanation could be conjectured for this phenomenon, the biblical text records it as divine intervention.

32:27–33. Final Evaluation and Death of Hezekiah.

As in the times of Uzziah, Judah's control of the southern lands brought riches (vv. 27–29) and engineering feats (v. 30). However, foolish pride is a more stubborn disease than diabetic ulcers or whatever it was that ailed Hezekiah (see vv. 24–26). When God put him to the test regarding all that was in his heart, Hezekiah failed (v. 31). The ambassadors from Babylon claimed to have humanitarian (2 Kin. 20:12) and scientific aims (2 Chr. 32:31), but in fact their main purpose was political. Babylon was, at the time, organizing its own anti-Assyrian league, which was to bring the downfall of Nineveh in 612 B.C., so they may have been sounding out Hezekiah. But no matter what the foreign powers claimed, their only constant compass was self-interest. Childish pride led Hezekiah to forget this reality and to show this “friendly” power the wealth of his realm (Is. 39), thereby exciting covetousness on the part of his visitors. Even so, the Chronicler recognizes Hezekiah's life overall as one of khesed—the rich Hebrew word rendered variously as “devotion,” “love,” “kindness,” “loyalty,” and “goodness” (2 Chr. 32:32). The mention of Isaiah in his bibliography shows that this prophet also had a hand in composing the sources on which the books of Kings drew.

33:1–25

The Reigns of Manasseh (697–643 B.C.) and Amon (643–641 B.C.)

The case of Manasseh will remain forever one of the most moving stories of divine forgiveness in the OT. He was a totally corrupt king who, while under oppression, repented of his sins and asked for forgiveness, and the Lord forgave him and restored his kingdom to him. Not so with his son, Amon, who decided to imitate his father in sin and rebellion but not in repentance. From the divine perspective, personal history is always open to God's love and mercy.

33:1–9. The Awful Sins of Manasseh. As seen previously, the purpose of the Assyrian invasion was probably to produce a regime change with a new king favorable to its own interests (32:22). This implied, to a certain extent, a demand of recognition for the suzerain's religion, which they must have expected from a pliable twelve-year-old such as Manasseh. Indeed, the idolatry of Manasseh (the worship of the stars—all the host of heaven; 33:3, 5) is typical of Mesopotamian religion, and the building of additional altars in the temple, the house of the Lord, clearly indicates acts of idolatry (v. 4). But the total devotion of this king to unfettered idolatry surpassed all political concerns. A carved image in the temple itself (v. 7), a blatant violation of the second commandment of the Decalogue (Ex. 20:4), only emphasized his complete denial of the covenant. The shocking evil practice of child sacrifice (2 Chr. 33:6; see 28:1–4) seems to be a residue of ancestral Canaanite practices for which the Lord had expelled such nations (2 Chr. 33:2). The Canaanites themselves resorted to such horrors only in the most extreme circumstances, and then not as a sacrifice to their chief gods, such as Father Sky Hadad (Baal), but to dark underground deities of death. These were always maligned and had to be appeased by those means in order to bring to an end an inexplicable spate of bad luck. We are not told how many sons of Manasseh suffered this fate, but his heir, Amon, was not born until Manasseh was forty-five years old. In the same order of abominations we learn of divination (fortune-telling—sometimes called “sooth-saying”) as well as witchcraft and sorcery. He also consulted mediums and necromancers (or “spiritists”; v. 6). The long reign of Manasseh (fifty-five years) probably includes ten years as coregent of Hezekiah plus another forty-five as sole king, during which he apostatized.

33:10–20. Punishment and Repentance of Manasseh. While 2 Kings does not mention the repentance and restoration of Manasseh, the Chronicler records this story that stands forever as a sign and testimony of God's unbounded forgiveness. We are not told on what occasion the army of the king of Assyria swooped down on Manasseh and took him to Babylon (2 Chr. 33:11). One possibility is the induction of Asshurbanipal (“Osnapper”; Ezra 4:10) as the apparent heir of Esarhaddon in 672 B.C. Vassal princes, such as Pharaoh Necho I, were made to attend and swear loyalty to the prince as future king of Assyria. Though the capital of Assyria was Nineveh, Babylon, the ancient religious capital of the Akkadians (i.e., Assyrians and Babylonians), was used for some ceremonies (it may also stand here as a general term for the Mesopotamian region). Asshurbanipal was the last of the great Assyrian kings. The empire suffered from overexpansion, and after his death in 627 B.C., it descended into chaos. Nineveh was destroyed by an alliance between the Babylonians and the Medes in 612 B.C. It may be that the difficulties of Asshurbanipal with the Medes kept him occupied in the north, facilitating the return of Manasseh to God.

The fact is that the Lord received his plea, listened to his petition, and brought him back to Jerusalem and his kingdom (2 Chr. 33:13). Idolatry was quietly eliminated (vv. 14–19), as recorded in the book of khozay. This word is sometimes taken as a proper name, “Hozai,” and translated as such in some versions. However, it is also sometimes translated as “the seers” (from the Heb. word khezu—“vision”), as it is rendered in the LXX. This could be a reference to a succession of literary prophets from which the book of Kings was able to draw.

33:21–25. Amon's Reign and Death. The return of Manasseh to the Lord was not accompanied by a high-profile festival, such as Hezekiah's, which the Assyrians would have taken as an intolerable snub. Amon only continued the pagan practices of the first part of his father's reign or was too much corrupted by them to return to the living God. Thus, he did as his father Manasseh had done at first (v. 22). The people that put an end to his life (v. 24) may have invoked religious concerns, as in the case of Joash (see 24:25–27), or nationalistic, anti-Assyrian ones, or even a mixture of both, since Egyptians, in contrast to Assyrians, did not try to impose their religion on anybody else. The gods of the Egyptians were for them alone. In any case, the population of Judah did not condone the murder of Amon (33:25) since he was “the anointed of the LORD” (1 Sam. 24:6).

34:1—35:27

The Reign of Josiah (641–609 B.C.)

Josiah did not follow the example of his father Amon but decided to restore the true Israelite faith. He initiated an energetic reform movement that included the restoration of the temple, the eradication of idolatry, and the instruction of the people about what God expected from them. Unfortunately, his reform did not take root due to the fact that he died young while trying to intercept an Egyptian army heading to help the Assyrians against the Babylonians. By then the fate of the kingdom of Judah was cast (see “The Temple in Chronicles,” p. 541).

34:1–8a. Regnal Statistics and Overview.

Both the Chronicler and the writer of 2 Kings evaluate the reign of Josiah positively. Second Kings 22 highlights the finding of the book (or one of the five books) of the law, displaying it as a motor of reform; the Chronicler also recounts this event as well as other episodes in the process (2 Chr. 34:15–21). The Pentateuch was by this time well known and had already been in force for a long time (see 12:1). Josiah went gradually about his reforms. At the age of sixteen he was already totally committed to the living God (2 Chr. 34:3), but since he was probably still under some form of regency, he had to tread carefully. His successive campaigns, first in the south (vv. 3–5), then in the north of the country (vv. 6–7), purified the religion of the country. The term khereb in v. 6, taken from the margin of the Hebrew text, may be translated literally “swords,” which could have been used to hack at the idols. It could also mean “ruins” (the general sense is “wasters”) and would then be understood “as far as Naphthali, with their ruins all about it.” We should keep in mind that much of the territory of the Northern Kingdom lay in ruins after the Assyrian invasion. Josiah’s twelfth year (v. 3; 627 B.C.) coincided with the death of Asshurbanipal and the call of Jeremiah the prophet. The rapid dissolution of Assyrian power afforded the twenty-year-old monarch an opportunity to safely purge Judah and Jerusalem of idolatry (v. 8a), whether in the form of remnants from the early reign of Manasseh or from the pagan revival of Amon. The momentous discovery of a book of the law in the temple took place later, in his eighteenth year.

34:8b–21. Rediscovery of the Book of the Law.

Historical-critical reconstructions of biblical history point out that many of the reforms of Josiah seem inspired by Deuteronomy (34:2; see Deut. 7:25–26; 27:3, 26; 28:58–61; 29:9, 21–27). Then they conclude that the book had recently been composed in the north of the country under the name of Moses, in order to purify its religion and that at this point in history it reached Judah. But the purging of the idolatry took place before the discovery of the book (see 2 Chr. 34:1–8a), so the role of the latter was to reinforce, not to initiate, reform. Though passages from Deuteronomy could be and were eventually used as ammunition against a sanctuary in Jerusalem, they are not the center of its powerful message (note its effect in vv. 19–22). A better reconstruction, from a conservative viewpoint, is that Deuteronomy had been for a long time neglected in the south, even during times of faithfulness to the covenant. Now, a century after the fall of Samaria, any potential arguments against Jerusalem based on Deuteronomy were largely moot and could be forgotten, so the book was given its rightful place (vv. 19–22). Josiah sought then to have the people of Judah fully comply with the instructions of the Lord as found in this book of the law.

34:22–28. Prophecy of Huldah. Some readers may find it strange that while Manasseh was personally forgiven by God (33:13), the prophetess announced that Judah was still to suffer for his sins (2 Kin. 21:10–15; 22:15–20; cf. 2 Chr. 34:24–25). Those who violate the covenant may be forgiven through sincere repentance and restored to God’s favor, but the effects of their sin on the affairs of this life often cannot be avoided. Also, the evil influence of the sins of Manasseh and Amon reverberated among the people, who committed sins of their own (33:9; 34:25).

34:29–33. Public Reading of the Law. Firmly established on his throne, Josiah gathered all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem as representatives of the nation who could pass on to their families and clans the religious education provided by him (v. 29). The venue was the temple (v. 30), and the instructors were the “priests and the prophets” (2 Kin. 23:2) or, with the characteristic emphasis of 2 Chronicles, “the priests and the Levites” (2 Chr. 34:30). Since the latter regularly addressed the people in the temple, the Chronicler may have considered them to be prophets too, and they also taught Israel (35:3). The textbook of this public education effort, the book of the covenant (34:30), is normally interpreted as a section of Exodus, which presupposes the Decalogue (Ex. 20) and extends it in the immediately following chapters (Ex. 21–23), as suggested by Exodus 24:7. Such passages of the Pentateuch might be alluded to here (2 Chr. 34:31) through the mention of commandments as well as the testimonies (or “decrees”) and statutes which follow the Decalogue in Exodus, either directly or by means of the parallel passages in Deuteronomy (e.g., chaps. 5, 10–26). The covenant with the God of Israel was renewed by the king and the representatives of the whole nation (2 Chr. 34:31–32). This commitment was integral to the effort to inspire all who were present in Israel to diligently serve the Lord their God (v. 33).

35:1–19. Josiah's Passover. Much of the language of this section echoes other famous sacred occasions, such as Hezekiah's Passover (chap. 30) or the inaugural festival of Solomon (chap. 7). In contrast to the Passover of Hezekiah, however, this celebration was held at the proper time, on the fourteenth day of the first month (35:1), and at the proper venue for Israel under the Davidic dynasty, the temple. Sacrificing Passover lambs in the central sanctuary alone is commanded in Deuteronomy 16:15–16. Hezekiah, however, had organized the festival in the same way, even for the people of the north (2 Chr. 30:11, 18). Josiah's instruction to the Levites, to put the ark in the temple (v. 3), seems to imply that it was no longer there, but nothing is known about it leaving the temple at a prior time. It could be that the ark was removed from the temple by one of the evil kings. The parallel words of David in 1 Chronicles 23:26 clearly refer to the recent transfer from Gibeon (1 Chr. 15–16). The text here is probably to be read as in the LXX: “they have [already] put the holy ark” (in the temple), referring to David's times. This made it unnecessary for the Levites to occasionally carry the ark (2 Chr. 35:3). Josiah also expected the Levites to teach all Israel (vv. 3–6).

35:20–27. Death of Josiah. The new power on the horizon, since the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C., was Babylon. Pharaoh Necho, who had sworn allegiance to the Assyrians, was as good as his word and came to their aid against the Babylonians in Carchemish by the Euphrates (v. 20). On his way there, in the valley or plain of Megiddo (v. 22), he was intercepted by Josiah, who probably thought he should help give a final shove to the tottering, hated Assyrian Empire that year (609 B.C.). Necho, on his part, felt he was on a divine mission (v. 21). The invocation of God by Necho (even if tainted by Egyptian conceptions) should have given Josiah pause for reflection (as noted in v. 22), but he stubbornly forged ahead and was fatally wounded in the battle (vv. 23–24). The book of Laments here mentioned, however, is not the biblical book of Lamentations. Jeremiah, whose ministry prospered during Josiah's reign, wept until God specifically instructed him to stop weeping for Josiah (Jer. 22:10). The Egyptians were able to maintain themselves in Carchemish until 605 B.C., “the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah” (Jer. 46:2), when the Assyrian army was definitively defeated.

36:1–23

The End of the Kingdom of Judah

The death of Josiah was a significant spiritual and political blow to the nation. The religious reform was soon forgotten, and the political independence of the nation was lost. From this moment on, the kings of Judah would be vassals either to Egypt or to Babylon.

36:1–8. The Loss of Political Independence.

Returning from Carchemish, Necho felt that a regime change was indispensable in Jerusalem, so he deposed and carried away the recently inaugurated Jehoahaz (609 B.C.), substituting an older brother, Eliakim, in his stead, with the throne name Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.). We are not told in what ways he did evil in the sight of the Lord his God (v. 5). This phrase usually refers to idolatry, but 2 Kings 24:4 mentions the unjust killing of his own subjects, which may be related to struggles between pro-Egyptian and pro-Babylonian parties in Jerusalem. Egyptians, as noted previously, gave ample freedom of worship, but they taxed the land heavily (2 Chr. 36:3). Jehoiakim began his reign as an Egyptian vassal, but in 605 B.C., after the final defeat of Assyria, he swore loyalty to Babylon, only to renege three years later when the Egyptians managed to temporarily contain Babylonian power (2 Kin. 24:1). But the latter was merely strengthening its army, which invaded Judah in 597 B.C. and took Jehoiakim as a prisoner. Then Jehoiachin his son took his place on the throne (2 Chr. 36:8).

36:9–14. Jehoiachin (598–597 B.C.) and Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.).

As is indicated in most translations, “eight years old” (v. 9) should probably be corrected to “eighteen.” Cuneiform records in Babylon show that five years later, as a prisoner in Babylon, Jehoiachin already had five sons. Zedekiah, a son of Josiah (v. 10), was a weak monarch and changed sides constantly. He ignored the warnings of Jeremiah, who sought to maintain his submission to Babylon (v. 12), and rebelled together with Judah one time too many (vv. 13, 15–23). By this time political passions and evil precedents from the time of Manasseh, or even earlier, combined to make idolatry rampant again (v. 14).

36:15–23. Destruction and Desolation of Judah. By 586 B.C., Babylon had lost patience with the country; so, following the methods of Assyria in Israel (2 Kin. 17:5–6), all the urban population of Judah was taken captive, and the city and its temple were plundered (2 Chr. 36:17–20; 2 Kin. 25:1–21). For seventy years, as predicted by Jeremiah (v. 21; Jer. 25:11–12; 29:10), the land would lie unplowed. The text suggests that for about 420 years of prior existence as an independent and politically organized nation, the Hebrews had essentially ignored the sabbatical-year regulation (Lev. 25:1–7). The default now had to be made up with seventy years of desolation until 539 B.C., when Cyrus, king of Persia, gave them freedom to return and recover their ancestral possessions (2 Chr. 36:22–23). Special mention is made of the articles from the temple, the house of God (v. 18), taken to Babylon and of the destruction of the temple itself. In this way, the marvelous history of the people of God in the promised land, worshiping Him in His holy temple, which was carefully detailed in 1 and 2 Chronicles, seems to have come to a tragic end.

But then, in the midst of this bleak panorama, just as a pine seedling might sprout up after a fearsome fire that has consumed the forest, the new king Cyrus reported in his decree that the God of heaven had appointed and commanded him to build a temple (house) for Him in Jerusalem in Judah. He then invited all among God's people to go up to Jerusalem and even proclaimed a promised blessing for all who would go, saying that the Lord their God would be with them (v. 23). Hope was ignited, and the possibility of a new future began to take shape. The Bible is, indeed, the book of hope and new beginnings (see "The Temple in Chronicles," p. 541).

EZRA

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book bearing the name of its main protagonist is situated historically in the second half of the fifth century B.C., during the postexilic period. Jewish scholars throughout the centuries have considered Nehemiah to be a continuation of the book of Ezra and treated them as a single unit, even though the opening caption of Nehemiah (1:1) seems to indicate that they originally were separate works. Nehemiah 3:22 was marked by the Masoretes in the seventh through tenth centuries A.D. as the center of this unified book (Ezra-Nehemiah) and included a final summary note only after Nehemiah 13:31 but did not include one at the end of Ezra. Ezra and Nehemiah have appeared as separate books since A.D. 1448 in Hebrew manuscripts and still appear that way today in modern versions of the OT. Regardless, there are very good reasons to suspect that they were indeed originally one book.

Ezra's influence during the formative period of Judaism should not be underestimated, since it was his leadership that facilitated the reestablishment of worship in Jerusalem following the rebuilding of the temple. Later the rebuilding of the wall was successfully accomplished under Nehemiah's leadership. Because the last few verses of 2 Chronicles (36:22–23) and the first few verses of Ezra (1:1–3) are nearly identical, some scholars have argued that Ezra was also the author of Chronicles. It seems highly likely that the author of, at minimum, the closing portion of 2 Chronicles could have been Ezra. Repetition is common in ancient writing when a scroll (or tablet) was not long enough and the scribe had to continue on a new scroll (or tablet). The modern term for this technique is “catch-lines” (see 2 Chronicles: Introduction). What is also clear is that both books share common terminology and a significant number of theological themes. The same is true for Nehemiah. While it is true that the two men (Ezra and Nehemiah) were contemporaries (Neh. 8:9; 12:26, 36), which may explain the similarities, it is likely that the two books were originally one.

Date. The seven official documents found in Ezra were all written in Aramaic except for the first one, which was written in Hebrew. These documents correspond both in writing style and language used to non-biblical official documents from the Persian period, which is strong evidence that this book was written sometime during that era. According to Ezra 7:1, 8, Ezra was in Jerusalem in the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes I, which was 457 B.C. It took Ezra about four months to travel from Babylon to Jerusalem (7:9). While the events in the first six chapters took place before Ezra arrived in Jerusalem, the last four chapters took place after 457 B.C. Nehemiah is not mentioned in the book of Ezra (see commentary on Ezra 2:1–35). Nehemiah began his ministry in 444 B.C. (Neh. 2:1). Thus, the date for the composition of this book in its final version would have been after 457 B.C., but likely most of it was written before 444 B.C. (see Nehemiah: Introduction”).

Backgrounds. Artaxerxes was the third son of Xerxes I (the Ahasuerus of Esther). The Greeks called him “long-handed” (Lat. longimanus). His father was murdered by the royal bodyguard Artabanus. Artaxerxes then killed Artabanus, but it is unclear who killed the older brothers of Artaxerxes. In the end, Artaxerxes ended up with the throne. It seems that shortly after taking the throne, Artaxerxes gave asylum to Themistocles, the Greek who had beaten his father at the Battle of Marathon and again in the naval battle of Salamis years before. He advised Artaxerxes in matters dealing with the Greeks until his death in 459 B.C. A few years before Ezra traveled to Jerusalem (in 457 B.C.), the Persians were drawn into a fight with an Egyptian-Greek alliance seeking to gain control of Egypt. In 454 B.C. the Persians won that war. A few years later (450 B.C.) Persia was at war with Greece again at Cyprus. A year later, in 449 B.C., the Persians reached a peace with the Athenians. Thus, the world that Ezra entered was one with war on its borders both before and after his arrival in Jerusalem. It was a troubled and uncertain time.

Two major sections of Ezra (4:8–6:18; 7:12–26) containing references to official letters were written in Aramaic. Aramaic (as well as the closely related Syriac) functioned as the language of choice in literature and communication at least starting in the Babylonian Empire, which is why portions of Daniel (2:4–7:28) also were written in Aramaic. These passages in Aramaic represent the only major sections of the Bible written in what was the primary international language of the second half of the first millennium B.C., even though a few Aramaic phrases occur also in Genesis (31:47) and Jeremiah (10:11). It was not uncommon to find texts written in multiple languages in the ancient world, all written by the same person. Thus, this characteristic in Ezra is not an argument that the same scribe could not have written the entire book. In fact, it supports the underlying historicity of the book as being written in the time of its assumed historical context.

Theology and Purpose. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah describe times of struggles and victories for God's people. From the vantage point of these biblical books, these struggles were God's struggles too since it was God who ultimately returned a remnant to Jerusalem and oversaw the reconstruction of the temple and the reestablishment of its sacrificial service. God's commitment to His people is easily observable in Ezra and Nehemiah—in spite of moments of disobedience, twisted priorities, or subversive rebellion. While we cannot fathom God's commitment to a sinful world, we can accept His sustaining and amazing grace and learn from the theological themes that crisscross the book.

1. A Biblical Philosophy of History. Human history in Ezra and Nehemiah is clearly the arena of God's activities. This account challenges readers living in the twenty-first century to look beyond the often simplistic link between cause and effect that characterizes a secular outlook on life—there is more to humanity than we can see and measure.

The two books describe three historical returns from exile for the remnant of Judah. In 537 B.C. Sheshbazzar led a group that returned and began rebuilding the temple under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Jeshua (or Joshua) (Ezra 3:8–13) in fulfillment of God's prophecy through Jeremiah that the land would be empty for seventy years (Jer. 25:11–12; 29:10; cf. Ezra 1:1; Dan. 9:2). In 457 B.C. (Ezra 7:6–9), Ezra led another group of exiles in a return to the Holy Land and began teaching them the law (Ezra 7:10), in keeping with the command of Artaxerxes I that Jerusalem and its religious system should be rebuilt and restored (Ezra 7:11–26). This command fulfilled the starting point for the seventy weeks of years (Dan. 9:25), exactly 483 years before the baptism and beginning of the Messiah's ministry (Luke 3:1–22) in A.D. 27, even though the actual building did not start for another thirteen years. Then in 444 B.C. (Neh. 2:1–10) Nehemiah led a third group and, in spite of strong opposition, began rebuilding the wall around the city (Neh. 2:17–6:16), fulfilling the prophecy that the wall would be built during times of trouble (Dan. 9:25). Each of these historic events is clearly attributed in the text to the direct intervention of God working through willing humans. And each shows the foreknowledge of God in predicting the precise time and circumstance in which each event would take place.

2. God Is Sovereign. God, as portrayed in the book of Ezra, is not a local or regional deity. Ezra depicts God as bigger than Jerusalem—even though He had chosen Jerusalem (and postexilic Israel) as His manifested dwelling place and base camp to fulfill His mission of saving a lost world (see John 1:14; 3:16). In this sense, Ezra and Nehemiah continue to anticipate the fulfillment of innumerable messianic promises that ultimately point to the completion of salvation history in Jesus Christ. The sovereignty of God is highlighted in the text (Ezra 1:1–5; 7:6, 9) as He is credited with moving the hearts of rulers. This sovereignty is also manifested in the fulfillment of prophecy, something that the gods of the surrounding nations clearly could not do.

3. God's Remnant Will Prevail. The concept of a remnant as God's instrument in the fulfillment of His saving purpose in a fallen world (Ezra 9:8) is explicitly stated in this book. Another topic is God's activity in filling the hearts of His worshiping remnant with joy (6:22) regardless of the hardships of life. This echoes Israel's wilderness experience following the

C O M M E N T A R Y

1:1—6:22

FIRST RETURN FROM EXILE AND REBUILDING OF THE TEMPLE

Ezra 1:1—6:22 describes the first return from exile under Sheshbazzar (1:1–11), a list of the returnees (2:1–70), the initiation of temple worship (3:1–13), the opposition to Jerusalem (4:1–24), and the completion of the temple (5:1—6:22). It provides the template for the later returns led by Ezra and Nehemiah and introduces the struggles of the returnees.

1:1–11

Edict and Return

The introductory chapter establishes the historical and narrative framework of the entire book. The exiles, God's remnant, lived in a world where kings and princes determined the destinies of peoples, families, and individuals. Yet, as becomes evident, in spite of kingly powers and imperial grandeur, it was really God stirring and moving hearts and minds.

1:1–4. The Edict of Cyrus. The author locates this chapter in the first year of the Medo-Persian king Cyrus, circa 538/537 B.C. Several key themes are introduced in the first four verses of the book. The word of the Lord (v. 1) emphasizes the continued presence of divine revelation or the prophetic gift. The reference to Jeremiah underlines Ezra's rootedness in Scripture (Jer. 25:11–12; 29:1–23) and refers to the prophecy of the seventy years in Jeremiah 29:10. The seventy-year countdown started in 605 B.C. when Nebuchadnezzar conquered Jerusalem for the first time and took hostages to Babylon (including also Daniel, cf. Dan. 1:1–4). The exiles returned to Jerusalem in 537 B.C. The reference to God influencing Cyrus directly (lit. "raised or stirred his spirit") to issue his decree reveals an important philosophy of history also reflected in other biblical books (Dan. 1:2; cf. Is. 44:28; 45:1). Earlier, Isaiah had prophesied this divine stirring of Cyrus, eventual founder of the Achaemenid Dynasty in his bid to conquer Babylon (Is. 44:28—45:25). Ultimately, God moved hearts and governed the great affairs of history regarding His people (Ezra 1:5) and their relationship with foreign leaders (1:1). The first part of the edict itself (vv. 2–4) contains near-identical wording as the last verse of 2 Chronicles. This represents a conscious link to Exodus. The hope of salvation was embodied in the life of the remnant and in the promises God gave them.

4. Holiness Is Intrinsic to the Covenant. Ezra highlights the flawed perspectives of the remnant, who, even so, were courageous and faithful enough to make the journey back to the Holy Land to undertake the rebuilding of God's temple. When Ezra arrived, regardless of what they had accomplished with God's clear guidance, they still needed purification through changes in their lifestyle in accordance with God's law. The people already living in the land before the remnant arrived had a distorted concept of God (doubtless introduced by Assyrians brought in to repopulate the Northern Kingdom [2 Kin. 17:28], who came to be called Samaritans). The remnant needed to emphasize separation to maintain purity in those early, fragile years of resettlement. Ezra's description of these struggles echoes on a corporate level Jacob's personal struggle with God at Jabbok (Gen. 32:22–31). The reader is left with uncertainty as to whether God's people would hang on to God as Jacob did and be blessed and transformed nationally. This transformation needed to take place on an individual level so it could be reflected on a corporate scale. Eventually it resulted in factions (e.g., Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, Zealots, Yakhads) as groups (sects) responded to the change.

5. Centrality of God's Word and Worship. God's word moved the people to action (Ezra 9:4; 10:3). Particularly it was His law (9:6–15) that, when they heard it, brought about their desire to change their actions and repent of their errors. Ezra had studied God's law in earnest (7:6, 10) and was ideally suited to reveal it to the people. This again underscores the centrality of the revealed word of God.

Word and worship are two concepts that are inseparably connected in Ezra and Nehemiah. Worship is expressed in words and deeds. Worship had been the natural result after the successful laying of the foundation for the new temple (3:10–13). And worship remains the natural activity upon its completion (6:16–22). A saved and restored community acknowledged their God through worship. This reminds us that worship is intimately linked to our response to the experience of salvation, the recognition of who we really are, and the realization of how God has led us through trials and tribulations. Ezra keeps us looking at the bigger picture of salvation history and into a future where God's kingdom will finally break into human history with glory and power, leading to the eternal worship of the Lord.

a volume providing an overview of Israel's earlier history. However, there are significant additions in the second part which detail the order to rebuild God's temple in Jerusalem (Ezra 1:3b) as well as the call to financially support those staying behind (v. 4). The edict contains typical Achaemenid phrasing that locates the city and its temple in space, such as Jerusalem in Judah (v. 2) or the temple of God in Jerusalem (v. 4). Similarly, Cyrus's reference to the God of heaven (v. 2) is typical Persian parlance, appearing only three times outside postexilic books (Gen. 24:3, 7; Jon. 1:9).

1:5–11. Preparation for the Return to Jerusalem. Following the reproduction of the royal edict, the text includes the description of Jewish compliance. Verse 5 in the Hebrew refers to the "heads of the fathers/ancestors," which is a short version of a well-known phrase describing an important subunit of Israelite society (cf. Ex. 6:14; Num. 7:2; 1 Chr. 7:40). The phrase describes generally the extended family (or clan), yet the unit is smaller than a tribe. Both religious and civil leadership of Judah and Benjamin (Ezra 1:5) responded to the royal decree. The main purpose of the return was to rebuild the temple of the Lord in order to offer sacrifices (both individually and communally) for atonement. The goodwill provision to the Jews of gold, silver, and other goods strongly echoes the Exodus experience (Ex. 12:35–36). In the mind of the author of the book, this is Israel's second exodus.

The reference to the articles of the temple (Ezra 1:7) links Ezra to Daniel. Following the final fall of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar, a pagan king, had carried off the temple vessels (2 Kin. 24:12–13; 2 Chr. 36:18; Jer. 52:17–19; Dan. 1:2); yet another pagan king, Cyrus, returned them to their rightful location. The Hebrew term usually translated as "treasurer" (Ezra 1:8) is a word borrowed from Old Persian and is also used in the Aramaic section in 7:21. Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah (v. 8), was most likely the Babylonian name for "Zerubbabel" (see 1:8; 2:1, 2; 3:2–8; 5:16; Hag. 1:14–15). Sheshbazzar's designation as nashi' (usually translated as "prince") does not necessarily suggest royalty (cf. Ex. 16:22; Num. 1:16, 44), but may only point to leadership.

2:1–70

List of Those Going Home

For a modern reader this chapter represents tedious repetition and dozens of difficult-to-pronounce names of people and places. However, the list plays an important role in the overall structure of the book. Similar to the census list of Numbers, it gives names, places, and, ultimately, faces to those who were willing to take the risk to return home. In a sense, beyond its administrative function, it represents a veritable list of faith, comparable to Hebrews 11 in the NT.

2:1–35. The Lay Members That Returned Home.

This list also appears in Nehemiah 7:2–72. The variations between the lists could have been the result of copying mistakes that confused some of the numbers and names. Verses 1 and 2 represent the heading of the section. Ezra has only eleven names here, while Nehemiah 7:7 includes twelve. It is possible that the missing name in Ezra was dropped due to a scribal error. The number twelve is significant in Israelite history and represents the totality of Israel and thus represents another link to Israel's past. The list of returnees places particular emphasis on the priests and Levites to assure that those serving at the temple were properly qualified.

The section opens with a reference to the people of the province (lit. "the sons of the province"). The plural Hebrew form bene—lit. "sons," which is sometimes translated as "children" or "people"—often takes on a collective

Ezra and the Cyrus Cylinder

The purpose of Cyrus's edict allowing Jews living in exile in Babylon to return to Jerusalem and rebuild Yahweh's temple is in line with other historical documents. The well-known Cyrus Cylinder, discovered in Babylon in 1879, provides a helpful window into Persian imperial policy toward people groups who had been exiled during the Neo-Babylonian Empire. In it, Cyrus issued a decree calling for the restoration of temples in and around Babylon and is portrayed as a gracious and considerate master. While the document was undoubtedly intended to communicate royal propaganda and ideology, the similar edict in Scripture suggests its historicity. Other examples of Persian sponsorship of temple constructions in occupied territories are known from the ANE (e.g., the Syrian city of Neirab) and were part of a larger political strategy. Prayer for the royal family was part of why the Persian ruler did this (6:10) as well as generating goodwill for the new empire.

meaning in the OT referring to descendants (2 Chr. 13:10). This is the usage found throughout the entire section. The “province” most likely refers to the Persian province of Yehud, the administrative Persian unit surrounding Jerusalem. The first mention of Israel in Ezra 2:2 is important. Israel appears numerous times in Ezra and Nehemiah. While most returnees were apparently descendants of Judah and Benjamin (1:5), they understood themselves as God’s Israel and were thus linked to the glorious past of the divine promises involving Israel.

It is possible that this first section refers to families who had been exiled from Jerusalem, while the second section, which focuses upon locations (2:21–35), involves lay members who had come from cities in Judah. Both groups were lay members of the community and represent approximately 80 percent of the total returnees listed, while the temple personnel represent the remaining 20 percent. People were at the heart of Israel’s return. Their struggles, falls, and victories are highlighted in Ezra and Nehemiah against the backdrop of the reconstruction of the temple and city.

2:36–63. The Religious Leadership That Returned Home. Priests, Levites, temple servants, and servants of Solomon, as well as those families who could not prove their priestly descent, are included in this section. The order of the list represents the Torah order of proximity to the holy of holies (or Most Holy Place) and underlines different grades of holiness. Priests (v. 36) generally served at the altar and could enter the temple proper in order to accomplish the blood manipulations needed in the Israelite sacrificial system. Once a year, the high priest entered the holy of holies during Yom Kippur (Lev. 16:32–34; cf. Heb. 9:7). The role of Levites (Ezra 2:40) involved supportive activities (including the transport of the ark prior to the construction of the temple, gatekeeping, choir work, and instruction), and they usually did not participate in the priestly duties associated with the altar and offerings. However, under specific circumstances, namely, when an insufficient number of priests were available, they could help with the sacrifices, as happened during Hezekiah’s reform (2 Chr. 29:34; 30:3, 15).

Temple servants (Ezra 2:43–54) represent a lesser-known group of religious personnel. The term natin (“servants”) appears only once outside Ezra and Nehemiah (1 Chr. 9:2) and is based on the common verb natan, “to give,” highlighting David’s appointment (and dedication) of this order of temple personnel (Ezra 8:20). Nehemiah 3:26, 31 suggest that they received special quarters in Jerusalem’s Ophel. They were distinguished from the descendants of Solomon’s servants (Ezra 2:55–58; Neh. 10:28). The exact nature of their service in the temple is unclear, but considering the clear hierarchical structure of the current list, they may have taken care of the menial labor needed in the temple.

The descendants of Solomon’s servants (Ezra 2:55–58) are considered part of the temple servants as suggested by v. 58, which lists the total for both groups. While the Levites were “given” to the priests (Num. 3:9; 8:19), the temple servants and Solomon’s servants were given to the Levites (Ezra 8:20), underlining a clear tripartite hierarchical structure. Scholars have noted the surprising fact that many names in this group are foreign, suggesting that originally the temple servants may have come to Israel as prisoners of war or resident aliens who escaped natural disaster in their home region (cf. Ruth 1). Their separate listing here, however, underlines their significance for the temple and the worshiping community. They are also a good reminder of the fact that the portrayal of God in the OT is as inclusive and transcendent, crossing ethnic and national boundaries, as the portrayal of God in the NT (Gal. 3:26–29; Eph. 2:14–22).

The last group in this section involves those whose priestly origins could not be ascertained (Ezra 2:59–63). Purity was a major concern in the community of the returnees. Since both the destruction of Jerusalem and the Exile in Babylon had been connected to the lack of obedience to God’s commandments (Jer. 6:6–15; 7:1–11; 10:1–16), special attention was paid to these issues by the political leadership of the Yehud community. The governor (Ezra 2:63; possibly Zerubbabel/Sheshbazzar), designated by an official Persian title (rendered as tirshata’ in the Hebrew), issued a decree that the missing genealogical information required the use of Urim and Thummim, or sacred lots, that had been used to know God’s will prior to the Exile (Num. 27:21; 1 Sam. 14:37–42). This decree highlights the importance of political leadership in questions of religious matters.

2:64–70. The Final Tally. The total given sum of 42,360 for the entire group (v. 64) is significantly higher than the mathematical total of the list (29,818 for Ezra 2; 31,089 for Neh. 7). It is highly unlikely that scribal errors are responsible for the different numbers. The number listed here in Ezra may have included other people that did not originally live in the former Southern Kingdom of Judah. The term qahal, “assembly” or “company,” generally includes everyone, not just the male descendants (Ezra 10:1; Neh. 8:2). The listing of servants or slaves and animals underlines prosperity. Note particularly the relatively high number of mules (Ezra 2:66), animals that had been closely associated with royalty before the Exile (2 Sam. 13:29; 18:9; 1 Kin. 1:33). Due to their hybrid nature (i.e., crossbreeding of horses and donkeys), the breeding of mules was extremely difficult, and forbidden in Israel (Lev. 19:19). They thus represented a significant monetary value.

Another important echo of the Exodus experience of Israel in the return from Babylon is the list of the special freewill offerings for the temple by Israelite leadership (cf. Ex. 25:1–9; 35:4–9; Num. 7). The translation of the currency darkemin in Ezra 2:69 is tentative. Some versions translate here “darics,” a Persian gold coin, weighing about 8.4 grams (0.3 oz.) and equaling a soldier’s monthly pay. Other versions have “drachmas.” Greek drachmas were generally made of silver and less valuable. The final verse of Ezra 2 represents a concluding summary that forms a frame with 2:1. The settling of the Israelites in their own towns and cities was a tacit reminder of the fulfillment of God’s promises. Israel was home again, the faithful had been listed publicly, and the second exodus generation was in place to build the new temple.

3:1–13

Reestablishment of Temple Worship

Once the returnees had settled in their cities, the focus shifted to the reconstruction of the temple and the reestablishment of temple worship. Both required the right location, utensils, and personnel—elements all introduced in chapters 1 and 2. Nothing could stop this movement, it seems, and yet more conflict and struggles lay ahead.

3:1–7. Let’s Worship. The movement to reestablish temple worship began in the seventh month (v. 1), corresponding to Tishri (September/October), the most sacred month of the Israelite cultic calendar (Lev. 23:23–43; Num. 29). Israel’s festival calendar included the celebration of the Festival of Trumpets (Lev. 23:23–25), the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), and the Festival of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:34–43; Num. 29:12–38) during the seventh month. The time reference signals the important themes of worship and cultic celebrations, even though it is not entirely clear if it refers to the calendar month or to the time since the arrival of the exiles from Babylon. The gathering of the people “as one” (Ezra 3:1) highlights the unity of the people (see Judg. 20:1; 1 Sam. 11:7). Jerusalem’s central role is further emphasized by the move from the cities to Jerusalem. Interestingly, Ezra does not include any information regarding the driving force of this movement. The work was done under the leadership of Jeshua (or Joshua) and Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:2), yet the people appear to have been self-motivated.

In the building of the altar of burnt offerings, the spiritual (Jeshua) and civil (Zerubbabel) leaders acted together following the instructions given by Moses (v. 2). If Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel are the same person, the use of the Hebrew name underlines the rejection of Babylonian influence—the Exile had ended. The concept of building with focused activity occurs repeatedly in Ezra and Nehemiah with verbal pairs of qum—“rise,” “stand,” or (in some translations) “begin”—and banah, “to build” (Ezra 1:5; 3:2; Neh. 2:20; cf. 1 Chr. 22:19). The work was undertaken in accordance with the requirements of the law of Moses (Ezra 3:2; Ex. 20:24–26). The presence of fear (Ezra 3:3) in the hearts of the people anticipated conflicts between them and those residing on the land. Yet, in spite of their fear, the altar was set on its foundation. The definitive article reminds the readers that this is not any altar but the altar in the courtyard of the temple, the only authorized location for offering a sacrifice. The reason for the construction of the altar was simple: without the altar, no regular morning and evening offerings could be made on behalf of Israel.

The next verses (vv. 4–6) offer a glimpse into the reestablished life of worship of the returnees. The list includes the Festival of Tabernacles that reminded the Israelites of their wilderness wanderings (Lev. 23:43) en route to the promised land. Note the absence of a reference to the Day of Atonement, which required the presence of a temple. Compliance with the requirements of the law is noted at every turn by referencing the fact that they were following the written instructions in the law (Ezra 3:2, 4). The community of the returnees took great pains at avoiding discrepancies with the law, as this had been one of the reasons for the Exile. However, this attention to the law did not necessarily include personal commitment to the Lawgiver, as later episodes involving mixed marriages (chaps. 9–10; Neh. 13:23–28), misplaced personal priorities (cf. Hag. 1), and inappropriate Sabbath activities (Neh. 13:15–22) demonstrate. We cannot love and keep the law without knowing and loving the Lawgiver.

3:8–13. Restoration of the Temple. The description of the preparations made for building the temple are to some extent similar to those made by David and Solomon (Ezra 3:7; 1 Chr. 22:4, 15; 2 Chr. 2:10, 15–16). The reference to the cedars from Sidon and Tyre (including also the specific note that the wood had to be shipped along the coast via Joppa) links this temple to the first temple built when Israel was independent. The activities of David and Solomon associated with the construction of the first temple represent the backdrop of Ezra 3. The work on the foundation began seven months after the construction of the altar (3:8), which again mimicked Solomon who also began construction of the first temple in the second month (1 Kin. 6:1). Since this building had significant spiritual ramifications, the supervision of its construction was entrusted to the Levites. The Hebrew text does not include here a specific term for “foundation” but rather a verbal form meaning “to lay a foundation” (Ezra 3:6, 10). The emphasis is on the “founding” activity of the second temple community.

The unity of the community is highlighted in the list of participants of the founding activities (including Zerrubbabel [the civic, political leader], Je[o]shua [the high priest], the priests, the Levites, and all those who had returned from captivity; v. 8). Levites age twenty years and older (v. 8) were to supervise the construction. The Mosaic regulations indicated that Levites would only serve between the ages of thirty and fifty (Num. 4:2–3; 1 Chr. 23:2–3). However, their scarcity and the literary and thematic link to David’s and Solomon’s activities related to the temple apparently required this adjustment. First Chronicles 23:24–28 credits David with having lowered the age of service for Levites.

The laying of the foundations was celebrated with singing and worship, as well as an acknowledgment that the Lord is good and that His khesed—a rich Hebrew word variously rendered as “love,” “covenant faithfulness,” “mercy,” “loving-kindness”—rests upon Israel forever. This word appears also in Jeremiah 33:10–11 and thus creates a link between the beginning of temple worship and God’s prophetic timetable referenced in Ezra 1:1 (cf. the same refrain in 2 Chr. 7:6 during the inauguration of the first temple). We are here because of God’s stirring and moving (cf. John 6:44). We can sing because of His promises and protection.

Yet, the chapter concludes on an ambiguous note. While all the people rejoiced with a great shout (Ezra 3:11), others wept loudly (v. 12). The mixture of joy and sorrow illustrates the increasingly difficult balance between the glories of the past and the possibilities of the future. This was not the glorious temple built by an Israelite king in a time of independence and freedom (cf. Hag. 2:3). At the same time, God opened new vistas for a future following the Exile. The ambiguity of the weeping is reflected in Ezra 3:13—the people could not tell the difference between the sound of the shouts of joy and that of the loud weeping. However, the loud noise was from far away. The next chapter will take the reader to those listening and watching from afar.

4:1–24

Opposition to Jerusalem

This chapter provides a nonchronological summary of the opposition the people faced under several Persian kings (Cyrus [559–530 B.C.], Darius I [522–486 B.C.], Xerxes I [486–465 B.C.], and Artaxerxes I [465–424 B.C.]).

4:1–5. Anatomy of Opposition. The transition from the celebration of the foundation-laying ceremony to the confrontation with Jerusalem’s enemies (Ezra 4:1) is stark and shocking. These people were most likely identical to the people causing fear in 3:3. The issue of contention involves participation in the rebuilding of the temple.

The offer to help with building may have seemed generous at first (4:2). The additional information provided by the enemies, however, put this seemingly generous offer in a different light. Their declaration that they were seeking Judah’s God and had sacrificed to Him (v. 2) provides a window into the possible identity of these people (v. 4). While seeking God could be done in any location, legitimate sacrifices could only happen on the altar of Jerusalem’s temple. Thus, the sacrifices offered by the people of the land represented idolatrous offerings. The ancestry of these people went back to the time after the fall of Samaria when Esarhaddon brought them to live on the land (2 Kin. 17:24–41). The result was a faith that mixed their pagan religious ideas with some of the Israelite beliefs. The returnees rejected their help probably because they were not sure of the intentions of these people but more likely because this was the work that God had entrusted into the hands of the returnees (Ezra 4:3).

The reaction of the surrounding people seems to confirm the strong reaction of the returnees. The intent to discourage and frighten (v. 4) suggests needle-like irritation and opposition. Literally, the Hebrew reads here “the people of the land kept making the hands of the people of Judah hang limp” (v. 4). Constant low-level opposition can often be more disheartening than major roadblocks. Jerusalem’s opposition hired counselors or officials to work against them (v. 5). This suggests an organized, coordinated commitment against the city, similar to the modern practice of hiring consultants or lobbyists to achieve a desired political end. The Aramaic form of the term appears in 7:14–15, 28 and again in Hebrew in 8:25.

4:6–24. Opposition under Xerxes I and Artaxerxes I. The nature of the accusation by the enemies is not clearly stated. The Hebrew term for “opposition” occurs only here and is related to satan, “accuser,” “adversary,” which is also at times used as a personal designation of Satan. During the time of Artaxerxes I (465–424 B.C.), Jerusalem’s opposition was associated with the local leadership of the Persian administration in Samaria. Verse 7 functions as an introduction and historical anchoring of the following Aramaic letters crisscrossing the Persian Empire between the Holy Land and the Persian court. The text does not make it entirely clear whether the letter written by Bishlam and his companions (v. 7) was the same as the one introduced in v. 8 and written by Rehum and Shimshai. If it was the same letter, v. 7 functions as a heading, perhaps suggesting that Bishlam and his companions were the superiors of Rehum, the commanding official, and Shimshai, the scribe or secretary (v. 8). Persian governors of the satrap beyond the River Euphrates (v. 10) by the name bēlšunu (a similar name to Bishlam) are known from other fifth century B.C. documents. The Aramaic term te’em (v. 9) used in regard to Rehum does not necessarily indicate a military office as some translations suggest, but it can refer also to a high civilian official.

Beginning in v. 8, the language of Ezra changes to Aramaic. The letter follows the general format of an ancient letter, including the names of the senders, a formal greeting, and the content, but lacks a final greeting, which suggests that the biblical author only included the relevant sections of the original document. The list of the people in v. 9 refers to groups that were resettled in the province of Samaria by the Neo-Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (Heb. ’osnappar; 669–631 B.C.). While there are no biblical references for these relocations during Ashurbanipal’s reign, other Assyrian kings followed this practice (2 Kin. 17:24–41). The description of this king as great and honorable is a rhetorical device set in contrast with the supposed rebellious and evil city of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:12). The heading in v. 11, referring to a copy (also 4:23; 5:6; 7:11), may just indicate the content of the letter.

The essence of the accusations in Ezra 4:12–16 is this: if Jerusalem were allowed to rebuild its walls, it would again rebel against the great king and refuse to pay taxes to the Persian treasury. This carefully crafted message insinuated rebellion without providing direct evidence, and it had the desired effect. During the first years of the reign of Artaxerxes I (465–464 B.C.), the new king had to deal with an Egyptian rebellion, and he was not willing to face even a potential one. The king’s answer was not only based on the information provided by Rehum and Shimshai but also included a search of the royal archives about the history of Jerusalem (vv. 19–20). This letter is important because it makes clear that Artaxerxes originally authorized Ezra to rebuild the city (see “The Decree of Artaxerxes I as Fulfillment of Daniel 9:25,” p. 584). However, in spite of the unequivocal order to cease work, the king indicated that a further decree could allow for the rebuilding to resume (v. 21). This anticipates the narrative of Nehemiah 2:4–8.

The building stop was immediately implemented by the Samarian provincial government, using military force (Ezra 4:23). Rehum, Shimshai, and their cohorts went immediately to Jerusalem to carry out the king’s order. The military force may have involved actual destruction (cf. Neh. 1:3–4). Verse 24 serves to introduce the conflict during the time of Darius (which is developed in chapter 5), but at the same time it returns to the concern for the temple mentioned in 4:1–5.

5:1–6:22

Prophecy Fulfilled: The Temple Completed

Following the topical list of opposition to Jerusalem in Ezra 4, covering a period of about one hundred years, the author returns to his main concern: the rebuilding of the temple, which had not been completed by the second year of Darius I (520 B.C.; cf. 4:24). The section focuses on this crucial topic and concludes with the completion of the Lord’s temple.

5:1–2. God Is on the Move Again. Prophecy was not dead after the Exile. God was still speaking to His people. Haggai and Zechariah (v. 1) had been divinely called. The fact that they “prophesied to the Jews” underlines an important function of biblical prophets. While they communicated God’s perspective on the future, more often than not they spoke to a particular situation currently affecting God’s people. Haggai’s ministry was focused on moving God’s people to complete the construction of the second temple and lasted less than four months in 520 B.C. (Hag. 1:1 [Aug. 29, 520 B.C.] and Hag. 2:1, 10, 20 [Dec. 18, 520 B.C.]). Haggai’s critique of the Yehud community reveals that the construction stop was not only due to external pressures but also the result of selfish priorities (Hag. 1:4). Selfishness made it impossible to receive God’s blessings (Hag. 1:6, 9). Both prophets remind their audience that God was still watching “over them” (Ezra 5:1). The recognition of divine presence in the midst of severe struggles has been known to ignite hope. Again, the sequence of names, that is, Zerubbabel and Je[o]shua (v. 2), combines civil and religious leadership (see 2:2; 3:8; 4:3) working together. The biblical text explicitly states that God’s prophets were supporting the temple construction work (5:2).

5:3–5. Another Challenge. Tattenai, the Persian governor of Trans-Euphrates, challenged the authorization for the reconstruction of the temple when he visited Jerusalem (v. 3). The report to the Persian king listed the names of those responsible for the reconstruction. The concern involved the rebuilding of the temple and the ’ushsharna’ (vv. 3, 9). This rare Aramaic term has been translated as “wall,” but its exact meaning is uncertain, and some translators suggest that it refers to “material,” “wooden structure,” “paneling,” or “roof scaffolding.” Note that Tattenai’s visit happened during the early reign of King Darius I, who had only recently overcome a rebellion led by Gaumata and was not of the royal line of Cyrus. Officials tended to be very cautious when a new king was on the throne. However, as the text indicates, God was watching over the Jewish elders. This reality underlines an important biblical motif. God is looking out for the interests of His people (see Deut. 11:12; Job 36:7; Pss. 32:8; 33:18; 34:15). One can note a curious contrast: while Tattenai and his associates functioned as the “eye” of the Persian king, God’s watching “eye” (and providence) was upon His people.

5:6–17. Tattenai’s Letter to Darius I. Tattenai’s credentials as Persian governor are corroborated by a Babylonian document naming a certain Tattannu as governor of the Trans-Euphrates province during the reign of Darius I. The letter describes the visit to Jerusalem and the temple building activities of the Jews (vv. 7–10). It then quotes the justification of the Jewish leadership verbatim (vv. 11–16). The anonymous builders described themselves as “servants of the God of heaven and earth” (v. 11). This seems to contrast with the legitimate title of the “great God,” which in the mouth of a Persian administrator could have implied that this God was one among others (5:8; cf. Neh. 8:6; Ps. 95:3; Titus 2:13). However, in Daniel 2:45 the phrase “great God” is used to describe God’s foreknowledge of the future. It also is linked to God’s creative acts (Ps. 95:3–6). The phrase appears in the Persepolis fortification tablets as well.

The reference to “a great king of Israel” (Ezra 5:11) implies Solomon. The response of the builders appealed to the ANE custom of respecting traditions and established sacred spaces. The reference to God having given His people into Nebuchadnezzar’s hands in v. 12 is a good reminder of Scripture’s philosophy of history: God moves people (1:1, 5), God gives His people into the hand of their enemies (Dan. 1:2), and God appoints and demotes kings and empires (Dan. 2). Following this confession, reference is made to the decree of Cyrus (Ezra 5:13; cf. 1:2–4), as well as to the return of the cultic vessels of the Jerusalem temple (v. 14; cf. 1:7–11). The order to rebuild the temple and to return the vessels is couched in a verbatim quote of the Persian king (5:15). This links the current building activity to the storied founder of the Medo-Persian Empire. Verse 16 suggests continued construction has followed the laying of the temple’s foundation.

The final verse of chapter 5 includes the phrase “if it seems good to [or “if it pleases”] the king.” This represents a conventional feature of official Aramaic letter writing also known from the papyri found at Elephantine in Egypt. The search of the king’s bayit nenzaya’—Aramaic for “house of treasure”—reflects already known Persian administrative procedure (4:15, 19; 6:1). The reference to the archives (lit. “scrolls”) in 6:1 clarifies the fact that there were also scrolls (Aram. sipherayya’) in the same place where the treasures of Babylon were stored. Accordingly, some translations render “treasure house” as “royal archives” in 5:17.

6:1–12. Decree of Darius I. Following the record of the search, the important decree of Darius is reported at length (albeit missing typical letter elements such as superscription, sender, recipient, and greeting). This vindicated the loyalty, faith, and commitment of the builders. Even a powerful Medo-Persian king was ultimately moved and used by the unseen God who is heavily invested in this world. Following an extensive search, the original decree of Cyrus was located in Achmeta (or Ectabana), one of the four capitals of the Persian Empire (together with Babylon, Persepolis, and Susa). Achmeta corresponds to the modern-day Iranian city of Hamadan. Archaeological research in the city of Persepolis has verified the close physical link between the treasury and the archives, as the previous discussion of 5:17 and 6:1 also suggests. The Aramaic dikhron (v. 2) is a technical term denoting an official document. Verses 3 to 5 quote Cyrus's decree in a condensed form with a few added details. It is difficult to establish the specific dimensions of the temple because the length is not provided. This temple was smaller and inferior with respect to quality, and this suggests that the reference to sixty cubits (cf. 1 Kin. 6:2) may have been a scribal mistake.

Note the important additional information involving the costs of the temple construction (Ezra 6:4), payment of which was to come from the king's treasury. This is clarified in 6:8, which indicates that the payment was to come from the taxes of the province. The decree may be emphasizing the importance of the traditional location of the temple reconstruction, the place where they offered sacrifices (v. 3), though some translations render the Aramaic in such a way as to emphasize that the sacrifices were an essential part of the function of the temple ("a place to present sacrifices" or "the place where sacrifices are offered"), rather than its location.

The royal instructions (vv. 6–12) were addressed directly to Tattenai and his colleagues, introduced by a typical "now therefore" or "now then," which marks a new section. King Darius I ratified the previous royal decree and thus suggested a political continuity (which in reality was absent since he was not a descendent of Cyrus). Furthermore, the financial arrangements of the construction as well as the costs of the daily sacrifices were clarified (vv. 8–10). Royal sponsorship of local cults is well established as having occurred during the Medo-Persian Empire and can be found in many texts of that period. The reference in Jeremiah 29:7 to pray for political leadership of a city (or a country) could be understood in this way (Ezra 6:10). The final verses of this section (vv. 11–12) describe vividly the dire consequences that would befall anyone opposing this decree (cf. Dan. 2:5; 3:29). The command to Tattenai and his associates to stay away from the temple (Ezra 6:6) clearly set the tone and transferred the responsibility of this project to the governor of the Jews and the elders (v. 7).

6:13–22. Temple Finished. The governor's response was immediate. A theme of acting diligently (v. 13) and following orders is repeatedly apparent in the Aramaic section of Ezra, often in official communication (5:8; 6:8, 12; 7:17, 21, 26)—and they denote an obedient and timely response. The description of the progress is headed by reference to the elders of the Jews (6:14). This reference would remind readers of the importance of that leadership group, which worked together with the prophets Haggai and Zechariah. In their work they honored God above the kings of Persia, as the sequence of the commands in v. 14 suggests. The construction of the temple was finished in the sixth year of the reign of King Darius (around March of 515 B.C.).

The completion of the temple was celebrated joyously by the people of Israel (6:16–18) with celebratory sacrifices. The emphasis on twelve male goats for the twelve tribes of Israel in the sin offering (v. 17) underlines the fact that this was God's Israel—even though most of the returnees belonged to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. The temple was the residence of the Lord and the center of holiness and life for Israel. The work performed there foreshadowed the high priestly ministry of the Messiah, and as such the temple was a center of hope. The mention of the celebration of the Passover reminds us of the first Passover of the Israelites after they were liberated from Egypt. Then later, after their liberation from Babylon and the completion of the rebuilding of the temple, the people celebrated the Passover.

The biblical text highlights the fact that the Levites purified themselves and were thus ritually clean (Ezra 6:20). Ritual purity is set in opposition to the tum'ah—"uncleanness" or "impurity" of the nations—the practices of their Gentile neighbors (v. 21). The term is repeatedly used in cultic contexts and denotes animals or people who could not be presented to a Holy God (e.g., Lev. 5:3; 7:20; 14:19). Ritual purification was often connected to major religious celebrations (cf. Neh. 12:30), involving washing rites (of clothing and people), ritual sprinkling of water, special offerings, and possibly also sexual abstinence (Ex. 19:10, 14–15; Lev. 16:28; 22:4–7; Num. 8:5–8). The celebration of the Passover happened on the fourteenth day of the first month (Ezra 6:19), in harmony with established pentateuchal laws (Ex. 12:1–6).

Ezra 6:21 emphasizes fellowship between those who had returned from exile and those who had separated themselves from the impurity of the nations around them. Those who truly sought the Lord God of Israel were welcome in the new Israel. This represented another echo of the original Passover celebration (cf. Ex. 12:44, 48). Earnest heart searching and commitment transcend ethnic boundaries. The celebration of the Festival of Unleavened Bread is characterized by joyfulness, a topic common in Ezra and Nehemiah (e.g., Ezra 3:12–13; Neh. 8:12; 12:43).

The surprising reference to “the king of Assyria” rather than the king of Persia (Ezra 6:22) has a deliberate literary purpose. It points to the quintessential enemy of God’s people (cf. Ezra 4:2; Neh. 9:32). The Assyrians first exiled Israel and Judah, followed by the Babylonians and Medo-Persians who “inherited” and often increased the empire. Then God changed the thinking (lit. “turned the heart”) of the prototype of Israel’s enemy. Thus, this reference to Assyria is not a scribal error or a mistaken historical reference. Rather, it is a metaphorical device underlining the fact that what had been the beginning of Israel’s end God wondrously transformed into a new beginning.

7:1–10:44

SECOND RETURN UNDER EZRA AND EZRA’S REFORMS

Ezra 7:1–10:44 finally introduces the protagonist whose name functions as the title of the biblical book. Following the description of the historical backstory involving the first return under Sheshbazzar and the rebuilding of the temple, the text then moves on to discuss the rebuilding, as it were, of the people. The second return under Ezra was not so much characterized by mortar, stones, and buildings (even though they do appear!), but by a focus upon the quality of the remnant living in Jerusalem and Yehud.

7:1–8:36

Going Home—Again

This section introduces to us Ezra and his mission (7:1–8:36), but the emphasis is on God’s power that brought the people back to the promised land and made them prosperous. This is followed by the consecration and purification of the people (9:1–10:44).

7:1–10. Ezra’s Arrival in Jerusalem. Nearly sixty years lie between 6:22 and 7:1. The fifth month of the seventh year of Artaxerxes I (v. 8) corresponds to 457 B.C. (7:8). However, the section does not begin with time but with a person. Ezra’s genealogy is detailed and includes sixteen generations, finally concluding with Aaron, the chief priest (v. 5). The Aaronic genealogy in 1 Chronicles 6:3–15 includes six more names, which suggests that Ezra used an abbreviated version of the list. The list sought to establish, beyond any doubt, Ezra’s priestly credentials. Priestly leadership in the second return illustrates the increasingly important role of religious leadership in the postexilic period, as the whole book demonstrates.

Ezra is described as a soper mahir betorat moshe—an expert teacher or scribe of the law of Moses (Ezra 7:6). The Hebrew phrase referring to an expert teacher or scribe (soper mahir) is also found in Psalm 45:1. The reference to the king’s granting of Ezra’s request suggests that it is probable that Ezra had some influence in the Persian court. What was most important, however, was that the hand of the Lord his God was upon him (Ezra 7:6). The reference to the law of Moses emphasizes Ezra’s role in establishing a special people. This reference to God’s “hand” (cf. v. 9) highlights God’s protection over His people.

The journey of four months was taken during the seventh year of Artaxerxes I (457 B.C.). Ezra did not travel alone, even though no specific numbers are supplied. However, the biblical text mentions predominantly religious personnel that accompany Ezra (v. 7). The explanatory note introducing v. 10 links God’s blessings to Ezra’s desire to study (lit. “seek”) “the Law of the LORD” and to observe and teach God’s rules and principles. This is the only place in the OT that links the verb darash (“to seek”) to the torah—the law. There are, however, many references to seeking God (e.g., Ezra 4:2; 6:21; Deut. 4:29; Is. 55:6; Hos. 10:12). Isaiah 34:16 invites readers to search (Heb. darash) from the book (lit. “scroll”) of the Lord (cf. Acts 17:11). The importance of Scripture as the revealed will of God was increasing in times of change and transition. If we want to meet the God of Scripture, we need to spend time with His revealed word.

7:11–28. Artaxerxes I's Decree Authorizing Ezra's Return and Mission. Ezra includes a copy of the royal decree containing two main elements. First, it authorizes Ezra's return (7:12–16); second, it confirms Ezra's supervisory role in Jerusalem and the Persian province of Yehud (7:17–26). The copy of the letter was given by the king to the emissary (7:11). In line with Ezra's reform efforts, his expertise in God's commands and statutes or decrees (shorthand for Scripture) are emphasized. The letter, in Aramaic, includes the name of the sender, position, and the customary greeting. The final exhortation to disseminate the royal order and comply with it includes also the customary penalty clause (7:25–26; cf. 6:12).

The opening lines of Artaxerxes's I decree are similar to Cyrus's first decree and provide an important historical anchor. Among those willing to return, priests and Levites in particular are named (7:13). Historical evidence suggests that a majority of Jews remained in the region around Babylon even after the first and second return. The seven counselors or advisors (7:14) are mentioned in Esther 1:14 and in extrabiblical literature as well and seem to have reflected fifth century B.C. realities at the Persian court. Ezra was being sent to beqar ("seek" or "inquire") concerning Judah and Jerusalem (Ezra 7:14). It is possible, as some translators have recognized, to render beqar as referring to evaluation or oversight. This is not only possible linguistically but also seems to fit better in the overall context. Ezra's supervisory function was based on the law of his God in his hand. Both contextual translations make better sense and are solidly based on appropriate translations of the two prepositional phrases. An important part of Ezra's mission was to establish that the Jews in Jerusalem were living in accordance with the law of Moses. Furthermore, he had to convey the financial gift of the Persian court to the temple of the Lord (vv. 15–16).

Artaxerxes I considered Ezra's God another local deity, as suggested by the phrase "whose dwelling is in Jerusalem" (v. 15). The reference to the "God of heaven and earth" (5:11) reflects the Jewish understanding of a universal God by highlighting the sovereignty of the Lord who transcends all local deities, but it probably does not reflect the king's personal belief. Ezra 7:17 allows for the use of royal funds to purchase sacrificial animals for the temple. However, v. 18 indicates that there was significant financial freedom for Ezra and opens the possibility that some of the resources were later used to rebuild the city wall.

The Decree of Artaxerxes I as Fulfillment of Daniel 9:25

The fulfillment of the prophecy of the seventy weeks, registered in Daniel 9:25, was to start during the Medo-Persian Empire and would be initiated by a decree to restore and rebuild Jerusalem (see Dan. 9). This prophecy was fulfilled through the decree of Artaxerxes I recorded in Ezra 7.

1. Restoration of the City. The decree included several important elements: (1) it granted permission to the exiles to return to Jerusalem; (2) funds were assigned for the support of the temple; (3) the temple and temple personnel were tax exempted; (4) and it established a Jewish legal system based on the Torah, which included magistrates and judges to enforce the law (Ezra 7:25–26). The Persian king made the Mosaic law part of the imperial law. The Jews could now use it freely to regulate their lives and to administrate justice in Jerusalem. The Jews were to govern themselves on the basis of the law of God. Daniel 9:25 was referring to this type of restoration. The authorization to rebuild the city was implicit in the authorization to set up a judicial system, based on the law of God, at a central place. Besides, we find clear evidence in Ezra and Nehemiah to the effect that the Jews were authorized to rebuild the city.

2. Nehemiah and the Wall. The first line of evidence is found in Nehemiah 1. About thirteen years after Ezra arrived at Jerusalem, Nehemiah was informed that those who returned had great misery and shame and that the wall of Jerusalem was broken down and the gates destroyed by fire (1:3). Nehemiah was obviously referring to a recent event and indicates that the rebuilding of the city had been in progress until it was stopped and much of the work done had been damaged and/or destroyed. This rebuilding project took place before 444 B.C.

but was unfinished. The question is, when did the rebuilding of the wall begin? The biblical text provides a clear answer. According to Ezra 4:7–23, it took place during the reign of Artaxerxes.

3. The Building of the Wall Stopped. Ezra 4:7–23 states that a group of Persian officers wrote a letter to Artaxerxes recording their opposition to the rebuilding of Jerusalem by the Jews. In the letter they mentioned, first, that the city was being rebuilt, the walls were being finished, and the foundations were being repaired. Second, this rebuilding was being done by the Jews who had returned to Jerusalem (4:12). The reference to the people coming from Artaxerxes indicates that the rebuilding was being done by a group of exiles who had been recently authorized by Artaxerxes to return to Jerusalem. According to Ezra 7, the king authorized Ezra and the exiles in 457 B.C. to return to Jerusalem.

The Persian officers were trying to persuade the king to stop the project by arguing that Jerusalem had consistently been a rebellious city (Ezra 4:13, 15), that if the Jews were permitted to finish their project they would take control of the Trans-Euphrates province, and that consequently they would stop paying taxes and tribute to the king (vv. 13, 16). This may have been based on the fact that Artaxerxes authorized Ezra to teach and to enforce the law of God throughout the province and not just in Jerusalem (7:25–26). Notice that the letter does not suggest in any way that the rebuilding of the city and its walls was being done without royal consent. Had the Jews begun to rebuild the city illegally their enemies would have charged them with rebellion against the king. The arguments they used presupposed that the rebuilding was authorized by the king. They wanted the project stopped, not because it was not supported by Artaxerxes but because of the potential danger of insurrection.

A careful reading of the answer of the king suggests that the Jews had, indeed, been authorized by Artaxerxes to rebuild the city. Once the complaint was received, the king ordered an investigation and found that the only reason he had to stop the rebuilding project was that the possibility of a rebellion appeared to him to be real. Otherwise the charges against the Jews would have been much more serious. In other words, he could only stop the project on the basis of a potential insurrection—a suspicion supported by the fact that Jerusalem had been a rebellious city (4:19). The decree allowing for the rebuilding of the city was not canceled, but its execution was postponed by the king to a future time determined by him (and which in fact occurred during the time of Nehemiah, as indicated in Neh. 2).

The Persian officers took the letter of the king and went back to Jerusalem to forcibly stop the project (Ezra 4:23). This phrase certainly indicates that the officers employed military force to stop the project and that at least some sections of the wall were destroyed. This explains why it took Nehemiah only fifty-two days to rebuild the wall of the city (Neh. 6:15). It is to this attack on the Jews and the city that Nehemiah 1 refers.

4. A Wall in Jerusalem. The next line of evidence is found in Ezra 9:9. In one of his prayers, Ezra states that God authorized the people through the Persian kings to repair God's house, restore its ruins, and give them a wall in Judah and Jerusalem. Some scholars interpret the reference to the wall in Judah and Jerusalem to be metaphorical. They argue that there was never a literal wall around Judea and consequently the wall is to be interpreted as a symbol of divine protection. But this is not a persuasive argument. First, the phrase could simply mean that a wall in Jerusalem (cf. Ezra 4:12) was a wall in Judah because Jerusalem was located there. Second, since the same verse mentions the literal house of God, the temple, it follows that the wall is also literal. Third, although the word gader is not the common word used to designate a city wall, it is also used in the OT to designate such a wall (Mic. 7:11). The metaphorical interpretation is difficult to support.

The beginning of the fulfillment of the prophecy of the seventy weeks (Dan. 9:25) was initiated in 457 B.C. when Artaxerxes authorized Ezra through a royal decree to go to Jerusalem accompanied by a group of exiles to restore and rebuild the city. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah show clearly that this was exactly what took place and that the rebuilding of the city was finished under the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The king's promise of up to one hundred talents of silver (Ezra 7:22), that is, nearly 7,500 pounds (approximately 3,400 kg), was referring to a huge number. The total amount of yearly tribute of the Trans-Euphrates satrapy was only 350 talents. Instead of arguing for a textual error, this should be understood in light of the wide freedoms (vv. 18, 25) that the royal order gave to Ezra. The quantities of wheat (about 650 bushels or 22,900 liters), wine (about 600 gallons or 2,300 liters), oil (about 600 gallons or 2,300 liters), and unlimited salt showcase Artaxerxes I's commitment to this project. The command to proceed diligently emphasizes the importance of the financial element of the decree and was set in the king's letter in direct relation to possible (divine) wrath against the royal house (v. 23).

The final three verses of the decree cover administrative issues. Tax exception for temple personnel is also known from other sources from the Medo-Persian Empire (v. 24). According to the Gadatas inscription of Darius I, the priests of Apollo were exempt from paying tax. The mention of tax, tribute, and custom/duty represent different types of officially levied payments. The reforms to be undertaken by Ezra were not only religious in nature but also involved political structures. The authority to appoint magistrates and judges (v. 25) fits the particular historical context. The appointment of judges links Ezra to Moses (Ex. 18). Both the law of God and the Persian law were to be fully enforced (Ezra 7:26).

Ezra's doxology (vv. 27–28), written in Hebrew, concludes this important chapter. Written in first-person singular, it reflects a very intimate and personal expression of praise for divine guidance and blessings. God's khesed ("mercy," "love," "covenant faithfulness") was extended before kings, counselors, and princes. In this sense it became a testimony of divine grace pointing to the King of kings and encouraging frail human beings. Only when we recognize God's amazing grace and mercy in our own lives can we become faithful leaders.

8:1–32. List of Returnees and the Journey.

The list of returnees traveling with Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem includes priestly families (8:2a), the royal line (8:2b–3a; cf. 1 Chr. 3:22), and, finally, lay members (Ezra 8:3b–14). Beginning with the sons of Parosh, there are twelve families listed. The list of returnees indicated that 5,000 to 6,000 returned to the land. The prospective returnees were assembled by the river that flows to Ahava (v. 15). The exact location is unclear but presumably was close to Babylon (7:9). Scholars have suggested that the reference is to a canal, not a river, since the Mesopotamian heartland was full of irrigation canals (similarly referenced in Ezek. 1:3) and was large enough to provide space for such a large group of travelers. In reviewing the assembled group Ezra realized that no Levites and temple servants could be found in the group and sent an invitation to Iddo and his brethren in Casiphia (Ezra 8:16–17). God's good and gracious hand (see commentary on 6:1–12) finally led thirty-eight Levites to join the returnees, together with 220 temple servants (8:18–20). The fact that all of them were identified by name (v. 20) would mark the precise registration in bona fide priestly lists and assure future eligibility to serve in the temple. The full list is not included in the book of Ezra.

The returning group's fasting and prayer underlines the religious character of this journey (8:21–23). The reference to their humbling themselves before God was a more comprehensive way of referring to fasting (also in Lev. 16:29, 31; cf. Acts 27:9 where the Day of Atonement is called "the Fast"). Ezra's purpose was to seek a literal "straight way" from God, and, considering Ezra 8:22, refers most likely to a safe journey (cf. Is. 40:3; 52:12). Ezra's decision not to ask for an escort of soldiers and horsemen to protect them may be explained by the important cultural value of shame: Ezra had testified before the king about the Lord's protection of His people, and so armed guards would have suggested a lack of faith.

Ezra needed the priests and Levites in order to carry the offering and donated articles for the temple (Ezra 8:24–27, 30). Pentateuchal legislation divided the work of carrying different parts of the sanctuary between priests and Levites (Num. 3–4). While Ezra's group did not return temple vessels, the successful collaboration between priests and Levites provided the matrix for another exodus. Furthermore, the link to the temple made the offerings as well as the priests and Levites holy (Ezra 8:28). Holiness and purity are important concerns in the rest of the book, and they emphasize the religious nature of Ezra's mission. Another reference to God's hand (v. 31) reminds the reader of previous references to this motif (vv. 18, 22; see 7:6). It was because of His presence with them, as in the original Exodus from Egypt, that no military escort was needed.

The safe arrival notice contains references to deliverance and ambushes (8:31). The journey took about four months (7:8–9) and covered the roughly 900 miles (1,450 km) between Babylon and Jerusalem. They used the major road system that connected Mesopotamia and the Holy Land. The three-day rest following their arrival (8:32) may suggest that they arrived on Friday and then delivered the precious articles on Monday. Another list documents the delivered articles and offerings. Twelve bulls were offered for all Israel (v. 35) as a burnt offering, another reminder of the self-perception of the returnees as being Israel. The sacrificial list abounds with multiples of twelve. We need to remember the emotions involved in offering a sacrifice in the temple, considering the fact that the Jews in Babylon were unable to offer sacrifices. The religious celebrations were similar to the two festivals recorded in chapters 3 and 6. The concluding verse indicates that the king's orders had been delivered to the king's satraps and the governors of Trans-Euphrates. This probably occurred late in the summer or early in the fall of 457 B.C. (see 9:1–5). In turn these leaders gave support to the people and the temple. Ezra's meticulous planning and his complete reliance on God showcase the delicate balance of God's children living in a world that often challenges faith. While we rely absolutely and completely on God's good hand, at the same time we are called to give our best for the glory of God.

9:1–10:44

Consecration and Purification

Prayers are important in Ezra and Nehemiah (e.g., Ezra 8:21–23; 9; Neh. 1:5–11; 2:4; 9:5–37), and in chapter 9 Ezra prays with respect to his role as teacher of the law. Following the prayer, we are informed about the people's resolution and commitment to make things right (chap. 10). Prayer without consequences is cheap talk.

9:1–5. Diagnosis: No Difference. Once Ezra had turned over the silver and gold that had been donated by the royal court and the remaining Jewish community in Babylon (7:15–16), he was ready to confront Jerusalem's real problems. Ezra 7:9 (first day of fifth month) suggests that Ezra's group arrived in Jerusalem late in July of 457 B.C., after they had begun the journey in the spring. The fact that long journeys were usually initiated in spring further supports this chronology. The events narrated in Ezra chapters 9 and 10 seem to have occurred about four months later (cf. 10:6–9), in November/December of the same year, soon after the events mentioned in 8:36 (see 9:1). In line with Ezra's characterization in 7:10 as one who was dedicated to studying, observing, and teaching God's law, it was now time for a diagnosis. Local leadership informed Ezra that the Jews (including also priests and Levites) had not remained separate from the surrounding nations (9:1). The list of nations reflects earlier lists before the period of the conquest (Ex. 3:8; 33:2; Deut. 7:1) but also includes new groups (e.g., Ammonites, Moabites, and Egyptians), whose wrong practices the Hebrews had adopted (even if some of these people groups may not have remained as clearly defined ethnic groups by this period). Postexilic Jerusalem and the Persian province of Yehud faced challenges similar to those of Israel during the original Exodus and conquest. The abominations or detestable practices of the nations probably refer to religious and moral aberrations. The Hebrew term appears also in Genesis 43:32, where it describes the Egyptian's abhorrence of eating with Hebrews because they worked in close proximity with livestock (cf. Gen. 46:34). Leviticus 18:30 uses this word in describing sexual perversions of the Canaanites. In Malachi 2:11 it describes idolatry in terms of a perverted marriage.

The concern of the leaders involved separation. The verb is often used in cultic and ritual contexts (e.g., Ex. 26:33; Lev. 1:17; 5:8; 10:10; 11:47) to emphasize the separation between holy and profane and between pure and impure. The term also appears in the context of Creation (Gen. 1:4, 6–7, 14, 18). This lack of separation found its expression in mixed marriages, including also the leaders and rulers who had been the most egregious offenders in this matter (Ezra 9:2). The danger was that the holy people were being mixed with the peoples of those lands. The reference to the holy people (lit. "holy seed") echoes Isaiah 6:13 and is a description of the remnant. Holiness, part and parcel of Israel's DNA (Ex. 19:6; 1 Pet. 2:9), involves commitment to the Lord in life and in mission.

Ezra's reaction to this situation was very strong and involved mourning rites (2 Sam. 13:19; 2 Kin. 19:1; Job 1:20; 2:12–13). The word shamem in Ezra 9:3 means "astonished," "appalled," or "in severe shock." The crowd that saw their leader sitting on the ground, his hair in upheaval, and his clothes torn, was a sympathetic crowd since they trembled at the words of God. This indicated a high regard for divine revelation (Is. 66:2, 5; cf. Ezra 10:3). Finally, at the time of the evening sacrifice, silence turned to confession and prayer. The language was intimate, Ezra referring to God as “my God” (Ezra 9:5). Prayer challenges us individually to relate to our Creator and Savior personally and corporately.

9:6–15. The Prayer: “Here We Are.” Ezra’s prayer is a wonderful example of intercessory prayer (cf. Neh. 1; Dan. 9). It contains confession of past sins (Ezra 9: 6–7), a historical review (vv. 8–9), confession of present sins (vv. 10–12), and a heartfelt plea for God’s incomparable grace (vv. 13–15). Ezra’s reflection that he was “ashamed” (v. 6) underlines the importance of shame and honor in biblical times. Sin affronts God and disrupts human relationships. Ezra also described graphically a history of overwhelming guilt—it was higher than their heads and higher than the heavens (an echo of the Tower of Babel narrative; cf. Gen. 11:4). Israel’s sin and guilt had reached heaven and God’s presence. Ezra’s point was that due to the flagrant nature of Israel’s sin, he needed to respond unequivocally. The Exile represented that response.

The Hebrew of Ezra 9:8 utilizes a unique metaphor. The text refers to a yated—a pin or tent peg—in the sanctuary or “holy place.” A tent peg provides strength and anchors a larger structure and gives it a firm hold. God’s holy place could refer to either the earthly sanctuary or the heavenly sanctuary. God’s provisions are not only sufficient but also secure and encompass a location and a means of communication between God and His people (Is. 33:20; 54:2).

Ezra admitted that they did not know what to say (Ezra 9:10). This was a clear recognition and confession of guilt. Following Ezra’s logic, Israel had forgotten God’s commandments regarding intermarriage. The reference to the unclean or polluted land (v. 11) echoes conceptually Leviticus 18:25–28 and utilizes terminology that is elsewhere linked to menstrual bleeding (Lev. 18:19) or bodily discharges (Lev. 15:19–33). The lack of ritual purity prohibited the affected person from appearing before the Lord in the temple. Due to its nonchalance regarding mixed marriages, the Yehud community was threatened by the same fate. The emphasis on purity in marriage relations does not suggest ethnic superiority but rather obedience to God’s law. As was the case in Solomon’s life, a spouse was either a strong help in maintaining loyalty to God or a great hindrance. Thus, religious loyalty ultimately superseded ethnic relations. This religious commitment lies at the heart of the concern about mixed marriages.

However, Ezra’s prayer reminds us of God’s radical grace, highlighting the fact that God did not punish Israel as much as their sins deserved (Ezra 9:13) and had given deliverance (see 2 Tim. 2:13). The prayer ends with confession of sin and a recognition of the righteousness of God. Ezra was functioning as a true mediator between the people and God, identifying himself with the condition of the people (cf. Ex. 32:10–13, 30).

10:1–4. The People’s Response. Ezra’s prayer and dynamic display of emotions helped to move the people to confession and led to covenant renewal. In this chapter there is a change from first to third person, which makes it easier to distinguish the I’s in Ezra’s autobiographical section in Ezra 9 and Nehemiah’s memoirs in Nehemiah 1. The people’s admission of their sin and guilt opened the possibility of a covenant renewal, which would also include the dissolution of the unlawful marriages with the foreign women and separation from their children. Shechaniah (Ezra 10:2; his name means “Yahweh dwells [near]”) belonged to Elam’s family that had returned with Sheshbazzar (2:7). Based on the list in 10:26, it may be possible that even his father had married outside Israel. Since the mixed marriage problem involved descendants of the earlier returnees, Shechaniah was well qualified to respond as a representative of the local community. He also recognized Ezra’s leadership and authority (10:4), particularly considering Ezra’s job description given by the Persian king (7:23, 25).

10:5–17. Covenant Renewal. The covenant renewal ritual included calling an assembly (vv. 7–8), confession (vv. 9–12), and forming a tribunal to investigate specific cases (vv. 13–17). Although only four persons publicly opposed the decision, there were possibly others who did as well without indicating it because ten years later Nehemiah would have to face the same problem (though it is also possible that the later opposition was unrelated; Neh. 13:23–29).

Ezra’s inclusion of Yehud leadership in this reform effort, which involved priests and Levites (10:5), is highly significant. True and lasting change can only be accomplished in unity and not by coercion. Ezra’s mourning rites (including fasting; Ezra 9:3) were not necessarily a public relations stunt. Even following the commitment of Yehud’s leadership in 10:5, when Ezra entered Jehohanan’s room, he continued his fast privately (v. 6). The identity of Jehohanan is not entirely clear since no title is included. Some have linked the name to Nehemiah 12:22–23, which contains an (abbreviated) list of high priests, especially considering the fact that the same name is referred to as a high priest in the extrabiblical Elephantine papyri from Egypt dated to 408 B.C. However, this identification is not very convincing—especially in light of the fact that both Jehohanan (and its variant Johanan) and his father's name, Eliashib, were common in the postexilic community.

The mandatory gathering assembled three days after the announcement in the open square near or in the house of God (Ezra 10:9). Commentators and translators differ in regard to whether this place was the court of the temple or a place near it. The location of the covenant renewal is significant. This was not just a matter of decrees and quick paperwork. It happened “before God” and reminded the participants of other important meetings “before God” in Israel's history. The trembling and distress of the people was because of the sad situation and because of the heavy rain. The ninth month (or Kislev) of the Hebrew calendar falls into December. Due to Jerusalem's altitude of nearly 2,600 feet (or ca. 800 m) above sea level and average highs of only about fifty degrees Fahrenheit (or ca. ten degrees Celsius) during this time of year, the meeting was not a pleasant picnic-style gathering. Ezra indicted the people directly and affirmed their sinfulness (Ezra 10:10; cf. 9:2). The Hebrew verb is in an emphatic verbal form, which emphasized the element of personal responsibility. This could not rightly be blamed on the ancestors. Ezra's priestly credentials are referred to twice here (vv. 10, 16; see Mal. 1:6–2:16). Prophetic and priestly leadership were to work in harmony. The reference to the guilt of Israel picks up an earlier motif (Ezra 9:6, 13, 15; cf. Josh. 7:1 using the same Hebrew term). Conscious (and even unconscious) sin results in guilt requiring confession and commitment to change. The people were called upon to confess (lit. “give thanks to”) to the Lord. Our confessions are part of showing God's justice and mercy within the context of the Great Controversy, as we publicly recognize our sin and throw ourselves upon our Redeemer's grace.

The people's affirmative response (Ezra 10:12) is, however, balanced by the inclusion of a list of four men (v. 15) who did not support this initiative. The text is not entirely clear if the opposition involved the procedure or the actual recognition of guilt of mixed marriages. The agreed-upon process delegated the review of individual cases to the leadership (v. 14). Verses 16 and 17 suggest that the process took three months.

10:18–44. The Final Report. The final verses of Ezra lists those implicated in mixed marriages. The sequence of implicated families follows the earlier lists in Ezra, detailing first religious leadership (priests [10:18b–22], Levites [10:23], musicians [10:24a], and gatekeepers [10:24b]), followed by others—literally “from Israel” (10:25–43). A total of 113 men are mentioned, a number which corresponds to 0.38 percent of the 29,818 returnees that are listed in Ezra 2. While less than half a percent appears to be a low incident number, God was not interested primarily in quantity but quality. The existence of mixed marriages at different levels put into question Israel's commitment to the Lawgiver. Verse 19 includes a unique reference for the important resolution of the communal guilt. The implicated priestly leaders first gave their promise (lit. “gave their hand”; cf. 1 Chr. 29:24; Ezek. 17:18) to divorce their wives, followed by a reference to a ram as their trespass or guilt offering. The reference to the special sacrificial ritual underlines the importance and responsibility of spiritual leadership and the seriousness of the trespass (or “unfaithfulness”) that required divine atonement.

Contemporary Bible readers will understandably ask important questions regarding the ethics of 113 named men, many of high standing in the community, sending away their foreign wives, and the implications for any children born to those marriages. It seems evident from the text that these marriages were not viewed as legitimate; thus these were essentially dissolutions of unlawful marriages rather than divorces. It is also quite likely that the children and women who were sent away were cared for in some way, though the text does not indicate what specifically happened to them. According to the law, foreigners, widows, and the fatherless (the women and children were in an essentially analogous situation in Ezra) were to be loved and cared for (Lev. 19:34; Deut. 10:18; 14:29; 24:19–21; 26:12–13). We have suggested, based on the text, that Ezra was not driven by ancient racism or religious bigotry. Ezra focused on Israel's (or Jerusalem's) relation to the God who broke the chains of their slavery, returned them from exile, and manifested love for the orphan, the widow, and the foreigner. Religious identity and commitment lay at the heart of the issue of mixed marriages—not racial superiority or nationalistic ideas. The God of Scripture is the God who searches for the lost and calls a people (or church) to obedient commitment and faithful service as they look forward in hope to a new city.

NEHEMIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Nehemiah 1:1 indicates that the words that follow are from Nehemiah himself. However, for linguistic and thematic reasons, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were combined for the greater part of history, leading some to suggest that Ezra penned both. Not until A.D. 1448 did the two books appear in the Hebrew Bible separately. These books were so much considered a single volume that the Septuagint (LXX) calls this book “Second Ezra.” The Latin Vulgate follows this title.

Since Ezra was a scribe, scholars have suggested that he (who lived contemporaneously with Nehemiah; 8:9; 12:26, 36) had a hand in the final version of this book and (very likely) in the composition of 1 and 2 Chronicles (see 2 Chronicles: Introduction). The similarities in vocabulary and style between the books of Ezra and Nehemiah may be due to them having been written in roughly the same time period by two men in roughly the same social class, or by one scribe (i.e., Ezra himself).

The so-called Ezra and Nehemiah memoirs (a modern label) are offered as an additional argument for the original intended unity of the two books (see Ezra: Introduction). The term “memoir” refers to a text that is written in an autobiographic style, using the first person singular or plural (“I” or “we”). We would expect that Ezra would contain the Ezra memoirs, while Nehemiah would include his memoirs. However, the locations of the memoirs are used to suggest a more integrated literary plan. Ezra’s memoir, part I (Ezra 7–10), is followed by Nehemiah’s memoir, part I (Neh. 1:11–7:73a), which in turn is followed by what scholars call the second part of the Ezra memoir (Neh. 7:73b–10:39) and the second part of the Nehemiah memoir (Neh. 11–13). Some are not comfortable with identifying these as memoirs or convinced that the second part of the Ezra memoir is actually that at all since the use of the personal pronoun when referring to Ezra is directly absent. When referring to Ezra, the third person pronoun “he” (i.e., Neh. 8:3, ff.) is used with the antecedent name “Ezra” (i.e., Neh. 8:2, ff.) as if someone other than Ezra is writing.

Date. The book of Nehemiah begins in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I (Neh. 1:1; 2:1), which was 444 B.C. The book could not have been written before this date. Nehemiah was appointed governor for twelve years, ending in 432 B.C. (5:14), at which point he returned to Babylon (13:6). Sometime after this, he traveled again to Jerusalem following what amounted to a visit to Babylon. It is not known if he ever returned to Babylon again. As a result, the final portions of the book had to have been written sometime after 432 B.C. If Darius II is the Darius mentioned in the book (Neh. 12:22), then that portion could not have been written before 423 B.C. (since Darius II reigned from 423–404 B.C.).

Backgrounds. Esther’s husband, Xerxes I (also called Ahasuerus), was murdered by the royal bodyguard. Although not the eldest son, Artaxerxes, after a short period of turmoil, ended up on the throne. He was probably born during his grandfather’s reign (Darius I), when his father was just a prince, making it unlikely that he would have been related by blood to Esther. About five years before Nehemiah went to Jerusalem to rebuild the walls (in 444 B.C.), Persia entered into peace with Greece (449 B.C.). Thus, the Holy Land had relative peace with local rulers jockeying for position in the new, more stable political environment when Nehemiah entered it. This is reflected in the story.

Archaeological evidence for the wall built by Nehemiah is sparse, primarily because the city has been built and rebuilt many times since. However, portions of it have been identified and are still visible for visitors today. In fact, one portion (part of the Northern Tower and its city wall) has been dated (from pottery and burials associated with it) to almost immediately after the mid-fifth century B.C. (ca. 444 B.C.)—the same year that Nehemiah arrived in Jerusalem.

Theology and Purpose. A number of theological themes appearing in both Ezra and Nehemiah have already been discussed in the introduction to Ezra. The following themes have particular significance for the book of Nehemiah:

1. Covenant Thinking. The covenant is an important topic in Nehemiah. The scattered remnant's only hope for restoration could be found in the Lord as the keeper of the covenant (9:32). This covenant depended entirely upon God's gracious covenant love (9:17; Ezra 7:28; 9:9), a concept also echoed in contemporary postexilic prophets (Zech. 1:3; Mal. 1:2). Ezra and Nehemiah mark the end of the OT period and anticipate already important NT developments. Nehemiah also emphasizes the renewal of the covenant, anticipating the ultimate renewal of God's covenant with humanity in Jesus. This covenant, originally made in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:15) and later renewed with Abraham (Gen. 12:1–3; cf. Gal. 3:16–18), had been prophesied through a vision to Daniel (Dan. 9:25–7) and was later recognized as being fulfilled in Jesus (Heb. 13:20).

2. From King to Community. Kings or prophets played only a limited role in events chronicled by Nehemiah, with individual leadership replaced by a focus on the community as the center of shared authority. Both Ezra and Nehemiah received help from the elders and family leaders who took up the leadership role in the community. As a result of the absence of rulers, the priests filled the vacuum, in a way, returning to the model of the early Israelites. The Messiah would combine these roles by being both King and Priest. This hopeful expectation undergirds the book.

3. The Importance of the Written Word. Just as in Ezra, the book of Nehemiah emphasizes the role of God's word as authority (Neh. 8:1–8; 9:3; 10:29). The oral reading of the law before the people moved them to repent. This reminds us of the importance of hearing God's word read as authority over His people and the positive response that is possible as a result.

COMMENTARY

1:1—7:72

THIRD RETURN FROM EXILE AND REBUILDING OF THE WALL

The first seven chapters of Nehemiah echo Ezra 1–6 and focus on Israel's third return from exile, this time to rebuild the wall under Nehemiah's leadership. The wall became a rallying point, a contentious issue, and a symbol of God's watch and care over His covenant people. The wall project, however, could not be completed without first filling Jerusalem (Neh. 7:4–5). Similar to the Creation account of Genesis 1, in the book of Nehemiah filling follows forming. Nehemiah's inclusion of the list of the original returnees under Sheshbazzar (cf. Ezra 2) demonstrates a straight line from liberation and return to filling and securing a safe future for God's people in Jerusalem.

1:1–11

Jerusalem in Crisis: Nehemiah's Prayer

God's remnant was in crisis and one man, Nehemiah, responded to the disheartening news of destruction and disdain. His response, however, did not involve feverish activity and politically expedient strategizing. Just as prayer is the foundation of every true change and reform, prayer is also foundational in Nehemiah's account (cf. 1:5–11; 2:4; 4:4–5; 5:19; 6:9, 14; 11:17).

1:1–4. Bad News from Jerusalem. Several important details are provided for us in these few verses. The chief human character of the book is introduced—Nehemiah, who worked at the royal palace in Shushan (or Susa). The year was 445/444 B.C. Artaxerxes I is mentioned as the king, as indicated by the reference to Sanballat and Hanani (cf. 7:2), the latter of whom was probably a relative (lit. a "brother") of Nehemiah. Hanani and his group brought news to Nehemiah that concerned Jerusalem and the current state of affairs in the province. The people were described as being in a state of bera'ah ("misery," "distress") and kherpah ("disgrace," "reproach"). These terms describe the inner and social condition of the people in Jerusalem as a result of the broken-down walls and burned gates of the city (1:3). The reference to the condition of the city and its walls supports the view that in Ezra 7:18 the king had authorized them to do whatever seemed good to them, which naturally included rebuilding the city.

Nehemiah's reaction ("he sat down and wept") reflects typical OT mourning rites, often associated with bad news or distressing and shameful situations (Gen. 21:16; Deut. 21:13; Judg. 20:26; Ezra 9:3–5). When confronted with difficulties and existential challenges, biblical characters often reacted with fasting and praying (Neh. 1:4). The text indicates that Nehemiah wept and mourned for "days." It appears that this situation must have been a matter of prayer for Nehemiah for at least four months since Chislew (December/January) in Nehemiah 1:1 and Nisan (April/May) in 2:1 are given as key time markers in the book. These passages also suggest that Nehemiah used a fall-to-fall calendar.

1:5–11. Prayer of Nehemiah. This prayer is an excellent example of a penitential prayer in which the mediator identifies with the sins of the community (cf. Ezra 9; Neh. 9; Dan. 9). In the Bible we often find personal and communal prayers, something that may appear strange in societies that emphasize individuality over collectivity. There are five important elements in this specific prayer in Nehemiah 1: the addressee (v. 5), a request for a hearing (v. 6a), confession (vv. 6b–7), recalling God's promises (vv. 8–9), and supplication (vv. 10–11a). Nehemiah 1:6 in Hebrew contains a unique expression in which Nehemiah requests that God's ears be attentive and His eyes open. This is a metaphorical way of asking God to see the condition of the city and to hear the prayer by acting on behalf of His people. God was being asked to perform a new act of creation. The word "remember" in Nehemiah 1:8 introduces previous divine promises and is in line with the reference to Moses, God's servant. God's remembering leads to divine action (cf. Gen. 8:1)—often in favor of His covenant people.

"Unfaithful" in Nehemiah 1:8 appears elsewhere in Ezra and Nehemiah's account to describe the problem of mixed marriages (Ezra 9:2, 6; 10:2, 6, 10; Neh. 13:27). The language of this section echoes the covenant language found in Deuteronomy 30:1–4. Nehemiah realized that the only way forward for God's people, identified simply in 1:10 as those whom God had redeemed, involved recognition and commitment to God's covenant established long ago. Ultimately, however, it was only God's great power and strong hand that would result in deliverance (v. 10). The language used reminds us of the Exodus (cf. Ex. 6:1; 32:11).

2:1–20

Return to Jerusalem: Let's Build a Wall

The chapter describes Nehemiah's audience with the king, his return to Jerusalem, and his clandestine inspection of Jerusalem's walls. The narrative moves from dialogue to action and then returns to dialogue, resulting in the united decision to build (Neh. 2:18).

2:1–9. Nehemiah Is Appointed by the Persian King.

Four months after having received the devastating news about Jerusalem, Nehemiah did not continue his business as usual. Prayer was followed by a time of expectant waiting—and then action. Timing is always crucial when dealing with royalty (cf. Esth. 5:1–8), so the urgency should not always involve haste. We often struggle with God's timing that is not always easily understandable but is always right on target (Dan. 9:24–27). Nehemiah's strong fear upon hearing the king's question highlights the difficulty of relating to an absolute monarch whose word could have meant life or death. Nehemiah's quick prayer is a testimony of his close walk with God.

The king's question regarding how long he would be away contained tacit approval of Nehemiah's request (Neh. 2:6). The approval was recognized by Nehemiah as the good and gracious hand of his God upon him (cf. Ezra 7:6). The description of the journey is very brief. The text says only that the king sent captains of the army and horsemen with Nehemiah. Unlike Ezra (Neh. 8:22), Nehemiah did not refuse an armed guard—most likely due to the fact that he was the official governor of the Persian province and thus also commanded military personnel.

Nehemiah and the Pentateuch

Part of Nehemiah's prayer (Neh. 1:8–9) is rooted in the Pentateuch, especially Deuteronomy. "If you are unfaithful" echoes Leviticus 26:40. "I will scatter you among the nations" reflects Deuteronomy 4:27, while "but if you return" is most likely based on Deuteronomy 30:2. The mention of those exiled in distant regions is a reference to Deuteronomy 30:4. Finally, Nehemiah's reference to the place God chose as a dwelling for His name repeats Deuteronomy 12:11 and 12:5.

2:10. Introduction of the Opposition. Two individuals who appear to have been in constant opposition to Jerusalem are specifically mentioned right from the outset: Sanballat and Tobiah (v. 10). Sanballat the Horonite was the governor of Samaria (4:1–2). His name appears in a fifth century B.C. papyrus from Elephantine, Egypt. The name also appears in the later Samaritan Wadi ed-Daliyeh papyri from the fourth century B.C., probably referring to his descendant. The name “Tobiah” means “the Lord is good.” It is possible that he worshiped God. His son Jehohanan (“the Lord is gracious”) also had a Hebrew name. Based on Ezra 2:60–62, some scholars have theorized that Tobiah belonged to a family of the same name whose Israelite origins could not be clearly established and in consequence was rejected. If this were the case, it would explain his severe antagonism. Geshem the Arab was another enemy of the people (Neh. 2:19). He was probably a leader of Arab groups perhaps operating almost independently of the Medo-Persian Empire. The situation of Jerusalem was quite precarious since it was surrounded by enemies: Sanballat/Samaria to the north, Tobiah/Ammon to the east, and Geshem/Arabs to the south. Nehemiah’s arrival deeply disturbed Judah’s enemies.

2:11–18. It’s Time to Move. Nehemiah’s inspection of the wall occurred three days after his arrival (v. 11). The third day is often a decisive moment in biblical narratives (e.g., Gen. 22:4; 31:22; Ex. 19:11; Judg. 20:30; Esth. 5:1). Nehemiah made it very clear that this operation was God driven since it was God who had put it into Nehemiah’s heart (Neh. 2:12). Nehemiah’s covert operation aimed at obtaining information needed to establish and develop his plan. The Valley Gate (v. 13) was probably located on the western side of the city. The description of Jerusalem’s walls confirms the original report (1:3). The situation on the ground was as catastrophic as had been anticipated in the earlier report. The reference to the unsuspecting officials (2:16) may indicate local Persian-appointed leadership. The Hebrew term (sagan) refers to a “ruler” or “prefect” and appears mostly in exilic or postexilic literature.

After verification of the exact condition of Jerusalem’s defenses, it was time to become active. Action, however, begins with leadership buy-in. But prior to action comes recognition. Verse 17 uses again the keyword “to see” (see 1:5–11). The first-person plural pronoun (“us”) highlights the inclusive nature of the action. He presented himself as a visionary leader capable of communicating his vision and involving others in the action. Nehemiah gave a personal testimony of God’s gracious hand in all aspects of his mission (2:18). The response of the people of Jerusalem was a unanimous commitment to engage in the building project. We can learn from Nehemiah’s example: people around us will better relate to personal testimonies than to argumentation or sermonizing.

2:19–20. Reaction of the Opposition. Similar to Nehemiah’s hearing in 1:4, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem listened to what he had to say, but then they ridiculed him. Instead of shedding tears and initiating mourning rites, Jerusalem’s enemies taunted the postexilic community and disdained them. The Hebrew term (bazah) for “despised” or “ridiculed” appears repeatedly in contexts where divine precepts have been consciously ignored (Num. 15:31; 2 Sam. 12:9; Prov. 14:2). This provides a hint to the reader that this conflict concerned more than two groups fervently disagreeing about a particular point. It echoed the larger cosmic conflict involving God and Satan.

The rhetorical questions of Nehemiah’s opponents suggest rebellion against the king (Neh. 2:19)—a serious accusation already hinted at in Ezra 4:12–16. Nehemiah told the enemies that they had no kheleq (“heritage,” “share”). This meant that they had no legal right over Jerusalem and no zikkaron (“memorial,” “historic right”) there either. This latter term often has cultic connotations (Ex. 12:14; 13:9; 28:29) and underlines the fact that neither Sanballat nor Tobiah shared in the authentic worship of the Lord.

3:1–32

The List of Wall Builders

The chapter details those who did have a “heritage” or “share” (cf. 2:20) in Jerusalem. The list of wall builders is divided into forty different sections. It seems to begin in the northern section of Jerusalem with the Sheep Gate (3:1), moving southward down the western side and then describing the work on the eastern side of the wall, ultimately returning to the Sheep Gate (v. 32).

Each section was built by its own work crew, even though some groups did work on more than one section (cf. the men of Tekoa; 3:5, 27). The importance of the religious leadership in the postexilic community is highlighted by the place of Eliashib, the high priest, at the head of the list (v. 1). The key verbal form of the entire chapter is khaziq (occurring 34 times in the chapter; e.g., vv. 4–6), a causative form of a verb meaning “to be strong.” The rendering given in most translations, “made repairs,” is an appropriate rendering and emphasizes the restoration of something to its previous condition. This is an important indication that Nehemiah’s construction project presupposes an earlier wall-building project (see “The Decree of Artaxerxes I as Fulfillment of Daniel 9:25,” p. 584).

There is a close connection between chapters 3 and 4. While chapter 3 delineates the result of the project, chapters 4 and 6 emphasize the process itself, which includes the opposition faced by the builders during the reconstruction process. In this sense, the list reflects typical Hebrew thinking, in which the outcome is considered and presented before the process of achieving it. The first entry of the list includes a reference to consecration. Eliashib and the priests consecrated the Sheep Gate and put its doors in place (3:1). The use of the important verb denoting consecration (qadash) underlines the fact that the work of reconstructing the walls and gates was related to the Lord, the Holy One.

The reconstruction of the wall was a communal project. However, it was not a forced or obligatory project; as a result, some leaders did not support it (3:5, 27). Commentators have suggested that due to Tekoa’s southeastern location, abutting the region controlled by Geshem the Arab, the town’s leaders were possibly unwilling to antagonize their closest neighbor. The voluntary nature of the project highlights a character trait of God, who offers freedom to His creation and prefers willing submission to forced compliance. Verse 10 (cf. v. 23) suggests that some sections were assigned to those living closest to the particular wall section, providing significant motivation for finishing the project.

The majority of names and families listed in chapter 3 identify male participants, reflecting the common practice of biblical times. Families were known by the father’s (or grandfather’s) name. However, v. 12 specifically mentions the daughters of Shallum. Shallum was probably a person who did not have sons to help him. The whole community was dedicated to this important project, which eventually came to the place where it started by the Sheep Gate (v. 32). Chapter 4 shows that the work was done under great challenges.

4:1–23

External Opposition to the Building of the Wall

The chapter echoes previous references to opposition (2:10, 19) and describes the reconstruction of the walls and gates of Jerusalem. The opposition, led by Sanballat and Tobiah, mocked Jerusalem and the Yehud community with a barrage of rhetorical questions that aimed at pointing to the futility of the effort (4:2). Sanballat and Tobiah mounted a propaganda campaign that sought to intimidate the builders in Jerusalem. Sanballat’s five questions are followed (v. 3) by Tobiah’s ironic statement, suggesting that even a light fox could climb up the wall and break it down. Some interpreters have suggested that the reference to the fox may actually be a reference to an ancient siege machine, transforming an ironic or sarcastic statement into a plainly threatening one.

As is always the case in crucial moments in the book, Nehemiah prayed first before responding to the external challenges (v. 4; cf. Is. 37:14–35). The belligerency of Sanballat and Tobiah was not simply an opposition to Nehemiah but also an affront to the Lord.

Nehemiah and the builders continued their efforts tirelessly. Nehemiah 4:6 introduces two important facts: the entire wall had been joined and been built to half its height. This was due to the fact that the people were highly motivated (lit. “the heart of the people was to work”). However, what was good news to Nehemiah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem had a different significance for their opponents who heard and became very angry (including here, for the first time, Ashdodites, who were most likely the inhabitants of Ashdod, located on the Mediterranean coast of Israel; v. 7). In turn, the members of the opposition conspired together and plotted serious action, involving military options (v. 8). Another prayer (v. 9) was accompanied by active guard duty. The one did not exclude the other.

Disinformation and rumors are often more damaging than concrete military action. The people began to feel their strength failing as they saw an overabundance of rubble—they began to feel weak (v. 10). Nehemiah’s response to this dilemma involved careful military planning while continuing relentlessly with his rebuilding effort. The call to not be afraid (v. 14) is a formula of comfort and a call to trust in the Lord. The next call to remember the great and awesome Lord reminds readers of Deuteronomy 7:21, when Israel faced powerful cities with numerous people in Canaan. These calls to courage and remembering God’s power preceded a quintessential characteristic of the theocracy: God would fight for them (Neh. 4:20).

Nehemiah’s leadership involved the example of his own household. The reference to half of his workers in 4:16 (also in v. 23) uses a Hebrew term often denoting “young men” (see 5:10, 16; 13:19). This group may have included members of Nehemiah’s own household or his bodyguard (cf. 2:9). Half of this group was consigned to military duties while the other half worked at construction. The next verses (4:17–18) provide a visual glimpse of military preparedness: workers, building on the wall, kept their arms and shields close by to respond to enemy action communicated by the one who, shadowing Nehemiah, sounded the trumpet. However, in spite of human preparedness and contingency plans, Nehemiah tells us that it was ultimately God who would fight for them (v. 20). The final indication of extreme caution and alertness is expressed in v. 23. There is a suggestion of ever-increasing circles of inclusion starting with Nehemiah and his brothers (possibly members of Nehemiah’s clan or “father’s house”), his workers (lit. “young men”), and the guards, who remained fully dressed as they slept. The NT echoes this theme of preparedness for spiritual warfare in many places (Rom. 13:12; 2 Cor. 10:4; Eph. 6:10–18).

5:1–19

Internal Tension Threatening the Building of the Wall

At first glance this chapter appears to be out of place since it does not overtly continue the story of the building of Jerusalem’s walls and gates. However, looking more carefully, the narrative shows that conflict is not always external. Internal tension involving social injustice impacts not only individuals and groups but also challenges the larger building effort. Justice thus becomes an extension of unity.

The great outcry of 5:1 is a cry of protest that involved great financial difficulties. The Hebrew term appears in legal contexts when justice needs to be administered (e.g., 1 Kin. 20:39; 2 Kin. 6:26; 8:3, 5; Is. 5:7). It seems that this great outcry involved debt slavery following a famine (or other calamity) where people had to mortgage even their children in order to get grain for food (Neh. 5:2), seed (v. 3), and to pay the king’s tax (v. 4). The reference to the famine (v. 3) suggests a reality that must have been well known in the region. This was not just a famine but the famine. Greek sources tell us that the satrapy that included Yehud had a tax burden of 350 talents annually, which represented a significant financial burden for the local population.

The lament-like outcry paints a dismal picture: the cycle of increasing debt resulted in the enslavement of the sons and daughters of those lamenting. Since land represents the foundation of prosperity in any agricultural-based society, the great outcry is fully understandable. The social fabric of society was at stake. Without land, the men and their wives (v. 1) stated that they were powerless to help their family members (v. 5). Some translations insert “to redeem them” in order to clarify a difficult Hebrew expression that is possibly referring to the powerlessness of the people to redeem their family members by paying their debts.

Nehemiah’s angry reaction echoes earlier prophetic critiques of the abuse of debt slavery (Amos 2:6; 8:4, 6). His anger was expressed in rebuke only after careful thinking and analysis (Neh. 5:6–7). The first step to resolve this issue was to call a large meeting since the solution to problems affecting a community can only be found by working in community. Nehemiah’s rebuke of the leadership of Yehud refers to usury, or charging interest (v. 7). Following the unsuccessful private rebuke of Yehud’s leadership, Nehemiah addressed the entire assembly, which had been called for the purpose of dealing with these creditors, and he exhorted them that because their fellow Israelites (lit. their “brothers”) had been redeemed from the nations, they should not be returned to debt slavery. Nehemiah’s admonition to “walk in the fear of our God” (5:9; cf. v. 15) emphasizes an important biblical concept prevalent in the wisdom literature of the OT. Fear can be an emotional response. However, in most cases it suggests reverence and a personal relationship. We “fear” (or respect) someone whom we know as trustworthy and strive to please her or him (cf. Prov. 8:13). Nehemiah puts the fear of God in an even more compelling context. Walking in the fear of God, he suggests, involves the larger issue of theodicy, that is, God’s justice before the nations and the reproach of Jerusalem before the nations (Neh. 5:9).

Verse 10 again underlines Nehemiah’s selfless service that involved lending grain and money (lit. “silver”) to the needy. This indicates that lending was not the problem but the usury (or interest) that ultimately led to debt slavery. The next verse, while not explicitly employing the technical term, represents a Jubilee call (Lev. 25:8–17). In the Mosaic law every fiftieth year was considered a Jubilee, which involved the return of land, property, and the liberation of slaves. The creditors’ response was unanimous: they would restore the possessions and money that they had been extracting (Neh. 5:12). The issue of debt slavery and the proclamation of liberty were well anchored in Judah's memory. In fact, it was disobedience to a divinely established covenant involving God, Jerusalem's leadership, and Jewish debt slaves that had led to divine judgment during the time of Judah's last king, Zedekiah, prior to the final destruction of the city (Jer. 34:8–22).

By symbolically shaking the fold of his garment, Nehemiah indicated that the violators of the pledge would be shaken out of their possessions by the Lord (Neh. 5:13). The assembly's "amen" suggests unanimity and is further emphasized by the indication that they did what they had promised.

The following section (vv. 14–19) highlights Nehemiah's leadership during his tenure as governor, which covered twelve years. During this time, he did not use tax income to support his household or levy other tariffs on the local population (vv. 14–15). Nehemiah's commitment to the well-being of Jerusalem and its inhabitants was also marked by his hospitality and refusal to enter the lucrative real-estate market (v. 16). The final verse of this section is the first of a series of "remember me" interjections (13:14, 22, 31). These statements highlight the fact that when God remembers, He acts on behalf of His people (Gen. 8:1; 19:29; Ex. 2:24).

6:1–19

Further Intimidation

Chapter 6 is about intimidation and single-mindedness. In the midst of conflict, we find a praying leader (Neh. 6:9, 14) who refused to be distracted from his God-given task. Nehemiah allowed God to do what He had placed in his heart. Finally, following three chapters detailing obstacles, intimidation, and distraction, God came through again. The One who had given the land to Israel blessed the wall reconstruction project with success, and consequently all the nations surrounding Yehud recognized that it was God who had prospered the work (v. 16).

Nehemiah 6:1 seems to continue seamlessly the narrative of chapter 4—a fact that is underlined by the use of the autobiographic "I." The first fourteen verses of the chapter are rife with dialogue and written communications but lack specific action. Verse 4 highlights the fact that Yehud's enemies had sent a threatening personal message to Nehemiah four times. This reminds the reader that important action always originates with ideas and words. Nehemiah's response is highly significant. He affirmed that he was working on a major enterprise and could not go down to them (v. 3). This was both courteous and definitive. Distraction would not work.

After realizing that direct threats were ineffective, Nehemiah's enemies tried to attack his moral integrity by spreading the false rumor that the Jews were planning a rebellion and Nehemiah was planning to make himself king (v. 6). The reference to the open or unsealed letter in v. 5 underlines the public nature of these accusations. Sanballat's messenger possibly read the letter aloud as he traveled toward Jerusalem. Verse 7 clearly implies blackmail, yet Nehemiah did not succumb to the increasing pressure. Rather, he attempted to clear his name (v. 8) and decided to pray (v. 9).

The next section (vv. 10–14) focuses on internal challenges. The Hebrew participle 'atsar used in v. 10 is sometimes translated as "secret informer." The basic meaning of the word is "restrain," so other translations have "shut in at his home" or "confined at home." This was perhaps suggesting that Shemaiah's confinement represented what was coming to Nehemiah. The prophecy of Shemaiah was not from the Lord, which suggests that he may have been a hired prophet (cf. Num. 22–24; Deut. 13:1–5; Jer. 23:9–32; Ezek. 13; 1 John 4:1). Other prophets were also involved in the attack against Nehemiah (Neh. 6:14). The section concludes with another call for God to remember (v. 14), used here in a negative way to express divine judgment (cf. 5:19).

Finally, and in spite of constant threats, distraction, and internal challenges, the reconstruction of the wall was finished in fifty-two days (6:15). This limited time window strongly indicates that the walls had been previously reconstructed, in keeping with the broad limits of the instruction, in the time of Ezra (see Ezra 7:18). The month of Elul (Neh. 6:15) is the beginning of October. The Hebrew term for work is used in Genesis 2:2–3 for the divine work of creation and in Exodus 40:33 for the construction of the sanctuary. The implication is that the work performed in Jerusalem was a divine act of creation. The biblical author makes two important explicit statements that support this idea. First, all of Yehud's enemies lost their confidence (lit. "fell greatly in their own eyes"; Neh. 6:16). Second, they somehow knew that it was God who had prospered the work. Similar to the conquest narrative in Joshua, nations surrounding the covenant people heard and understood (cf. Josh. 9). The focus of the last few verses of this chapter moves from Sanballat to Tobiah (cf. Neh. 2:10). This is evidenced in the many letters that named leaders of the city (cf. also 13:4 which states that Tobiah was related by marriage to a priest named Eliashib).

7:1–72

An Empty City: The List of Returnees

The chapter is divided into two main sections. Nehemiah 7:1–3 contains a description of the reorganization of religious and civic life in postexilic Jerusalem, while vv. 4–72 contains a copy of the list of original returnees, already known from Ezra 2. The key reason for including a second copy of this long list can be found in 7:4: there were few people in the city. Following the reconstruction effort (or the “forming,” if using creation language; cf. Gen. 1:2), the city needed to be filled.

7:1–3. Reorganization. Nehemiah’s efforts did not end with the reconstruction of the wall. Verse 1 refers to the building of the wall, which was a point in the recent past. This reference serves to move the narrative forward. The appointment of gatekeepers and singers was presupposed and happened earlier (cf. Ezra 6:18). Nehemiah needed leadership that required administrative skills and interpersonal acumen, but ultimately he needed faithfulness in those appointed and for them to have a true understanding of their standing before God. Following the appointment of leaders, Nehemiah established basic guard duties, suggesting that he still considered Jerusalem to be at risk (Neh. 7:3).

7:4–5. The Empty City. The two verses introducing the already known list of the returnees (cf. Ezra 2) point to the real crux of the problem: Jerusalem was only sparsely populated and thus difficult to defend. This comment underlines the temple-city nature of Jerusalem. Archaeological research has suggested that Ramat Rahel, located about three and a half miles (6 km) south of Jerusalem, could have functioned as the de facto administrative center of Yehud. The site boasts an elaborate palace with a very complex water system. Hundreds of stamped storage jars, which had been used as containers for agricultural produce tax payments from the eighth century B.C. through the Persian period, have been found there. Furthermore, the site was never destroyed during the final Babylonian conquest of Judah.

Nehemiah’s solution was God driven (Neh. 7:5). This highlights the divine initiative in the following census, which had caused divine indignation on another occasion (2 Sam. 24; 1 Chr. 21; cf. Ex. 30:11–16). Many, however, have wondered why Nehemiah included a register of the genealogy of those who had first returned from exile (Neh. 7:5). Possibly Nehemiah wanted to ascertain ancestral roots in the city; furthermore, the original register included many of the locations outside Jerusalem where the original returnees had settled.

7:6–72. The Register. For the differences in the totals (29,818 for Ezra 2 and 31,089 for Neh. 7), see commentary on Ezra 2:1–35, 65–70. The final catalogue of donations in Nehemiah 7:70–72 also contains numbers distinct from those found in Ezra 2. While the object of the donations referred to in Ezra 2:68 was the house of the Lord, Nehemiah 7:70–72 refers to “the work” and the treasury for the work. It is thus possible that Nehemiah employed a similar structure (i.e., list, followed by a registry of donations) but focused rather upon the specific needs of the postexilic community in his time, including the wall and the gates of the city, which had been described in 6:16 as “this work.” This would also explain the distinct numbers included in the list and the reference to “the governor” in v. 70.

7:73—13:31

COVENANT, REVIVAL, AND THE COVENANT COMMUNITY

Beginning with the important topic of “filling” Jerusalem in 7:73, the second half of Nehemiah—echoing the second half of Ezra—focuses upon another important aspect of Jerusalem’s revival: lasting growth can only be achieved by considering the spiritual dimensions of new beginnings. However, new beginnings are not always clean-cut and easy; the reality of God’s postexilic covenant community was characterized by continued neglect of divine orders, including Sabbath observance (13:15–22), tithing (13:10–13), and intermarriages (13:23–28).

7:73—8:18

Between Word and Worship

Following the final verse of chapter 7 and introducing the important theme of empty Jerusalem, chapter 8 focuses upon two key elements of communal worship: the recognition of the power of the word and the response of God-inspired worship.

The summary statement in the first half of 7:73 connects to 7:4–5 and anticipates 11:1–3 and the problem of an “empty” city. The observation that the people of Israel settled into their own towns and cities was a recognition of God’s blessings (i.e., God had returned the exiles to their ancestral lands; cf. Jer. 16:15; 30:3), but it was also a description of the problem, namely, too few people lived within the city limits, thus making Jerusalem less viable as Yehud’s de-facto capital and difficult to defend. The seventh month (Neh. 7:73b) is a very important month in the Jewish religious system (see Ezra 3:1). The reference to “all the people” (Neh. 8:1) echoes what is described in Hebrew as “all Israel” in 7:73, and this description included men and women (8:2–3). The religious assembly focused on the law of Moses and appears to have been a grassroots movement since no specific convener of the assembly is mentioned; rather, the people gathered together as one. Unity and worshipful activities were two key ingredients of this revival, highlighted by the fact that the people asked Ezra to bring the law of Moses. The importance of this “back to basics” approach has already been noted several times in Ezra. The reference to the first day of the seventh month (8:2) suggests the Festival of Trumpets (Lev. 23:24).

The clear liturgical elements involved in the description of the public reading of the law in Nehemiah 8:4–8 should be noted: the people stood when Ezra began his reading (v. 5), responded in unison with a resounding and repeated “amen,” raised their hands, and fell to the ground in worship (v. 6). The twofold “amen” occurs elsewhere in Scripture and marks complete agreement and commitment (Pss. 41:13; 72:19). Ezra, surrounded by members of the priestly leadership, however, was not leading out alone. He read (Neh. 8:3), he blessed or praised the Lord (v. 6), and then, together with other Levites, he helped the people to understand (vv. 7–8). The divine epithet “the great God” (8:6; cf. 1:5; 9:32) is used in other parts of the Bible (e.g., Deut. 10:17; Jer. 32:18; Dan. 9:4). Nehemiah 8:8 includes a verbal form that means “to break up” and has been understood as providing a running translation, considering the reality that most returnees coming from Mesopotamia (or Babylon) would have spoken Aramaic, the language of international commerce and diplomacy of the Persian period, and not Hebrew. However, Ezra and the Levites did not only translate but they also provided meaning and helped the audience to understand the law of Moses. This is a good reminder of the fact that translation (and proclamation) always involves interpretation. Later Targums, Aramaic paraphrases of the Hebrew text of the OT, further illustrated this process.

As the people were listening to the reading of the law, they were moved and wept, but the leaders encouraged them to rejoice (vv. 9–10). The narrative provides an important piece of historical information by placing Ezra and Nehemiah together in the same event (v. 9). The Persian title “governor” is found only in Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65, 70; 10:1) and helps to anchor the historical context. The reference in Nehemiah 8:10 to “the joy of the LORD” as the source of strength (or, “refuge,” “fortress,” “stronghold,” or “protection”; cf. Is. 17:10; Nah. 1:7) echoes Ezra 6:22. The motivation for personal and collective joy is that God is the Lawgiver and Savior.

The following section describes the celebration of the Festival of Tabernacles (Neh. 8:13–18). The reference to the lack of celebration of this festival since the days of the settlement period in 8:17 refers to the particular motivation, worshipful spirit, and possibly the important element of remembering the “wilderness” experience (instead of only the harvest connotations), and not to the actual celebration, since Ezra 3:4 already recorded an instance of celebration prior to Neh. 8:17 (cf. also 2 Chr. 8:13; 31:3; 35:18). Hence some translations imply that they had not celebrated this festival “like this” since the days of Joshua. The actual construction of shelters (or tents) from tree branches (Neh. 8:15–16) is not mentioned in Ezra 3:4. These shelters were vivid reminders of Israel’s past—both the distant past during the wilderness experience and the more recent past of the Babylonian Exile—and were built on roofs, in courtyards, in the temple court, and in public open spaces (v. 16). The link between obedience to God’s explicit commands and abundant joy (v. 8:17) echoes Deuteronomy 16:13–15, which concludes with a reference to rejoicing. The continuous reading of the law of God represented a significant component of the worship experience (Neh. 8:18; cf. Deut. 31:12–13). Familiarity with Scripture leads to familiarity with the living Word. Israel’s experience described in Nehemiah 8 highlights the deep hunger for the word, community, and the joy that came from obedient recognition of a personal Savior. The same is true today.

9:1–38

God’s Past Acts and the People’s Present Confession

Some days after the celebration of the Festival of Tabernacles, on the twenty-fourth day of the same month, the postexilic community was assembled once again. No reason is given for the assembly, yet the basic tone of confession and mourning connects to the earlier response to the reading of the word (cf. 8:9). The separation from foreigners underlines the sense of shared history—and failure. The participants stood and read (or perhaps, “heard the reading”) from the law for about three hours (a fourth of a day), followed by another fourth of the day spent confessing and worshiping (9:3). The public prayer was led by eight Levites (v. 5). Perhaps they took turns leading the confessional prayer—this is the longest prayer in Ezra or Nehemiah. The text mentions two groups of eight named religious leaders, with five names overlapping (vv. 4–5). The first group cried out strongly (v. 4), echoing the lament of those who had seen the earlier temple (Ezra 3:12) and the confession of the people in Ezra 10:12, while the second led the actual prayer (Neh. 9:5).

The prayer is steeped in language from the Psalms and echoes or quotes numerous texts. The introduction in Nehemiah 9:5 echoes Psalms 41:13 and 106:48. Nevertheless, the phrase “exalted above all blessing and praise” is unique to this prayer. This situation is a reminder that each generation needs to find “new” words that communicate the essence of worship. The prayer contains a review of the relationship between God and Israel to demonstrate the pattern of divine blessings and the people’s rebellion against God (cf. Pss. 105, 106, 135). It begins with Creation (Neh. 9:6), moves to God’s covenant (vv. 7–8), includes the experience of Israel in Egypt and the Exodus (vv. 9–12), and climaxes with Sinai and the giving of the Law (9:13–14). There is a special reference to God’s holy Sabbath (9:14), which was not introduced at Sinai (Gen. 2:1–3; Ex. 16) but declared again at that time.

The next section in Nehemiah—and one of the longest—deals with Israel’s wilderness experience (9:16–21) and includes references to God’s bread from heaven (or manna; cf. Ex. 16:4–5) and water out of the rock (9:15; Ex. 17:1–7). The antithetical “but” of Nehemiah 9:16, however, introduces the reality of wilderness living, which involved repeated rebellions (the Hebrew states that they “hardened their necks”). Yet the God of the wilderness—similar to the God of the second exodus—is the same yesterday, today, and tomorrow (Heb. 13:8 applies these characteristics to Christ). God’s attributes in Nehemiah 9:17 are clear echoes of Exodus 34:6; Numbers 14:18–20; and Daniel 9:9. God’s compassion and grace are the basis of the covenant (Neh. 9:19, 31–32), completely unmerited and utterly transforming. Following the canonical sequence, Nehemiah 9:22–25 captures Israel’s conquest of the promised land and then leads straight into the period of the judges (vv. 26–31) or deliverers (v. 27; cf. Judg. 3:9, 15). The Hebrew term used here is theologically significant, coming from the root yasha’, which is also the root of the Hebrew name “Joshua” or “Jesus” in Greek. Also, the “rest” of Nehemiah 9:28, literally, “as they rested,” echoes God’s rest in the Sabbath commandment (Ex. 20:11). Since Israel did not really enter God’s final Sabbath rest, it remained a future expectation (Heb. 4:1–10).

Nehemiah 9:32 marks an important theological change introduced by “now therefore,” which was used to bridge the distance between the past and its application to the present. They were at this time the rebellious people. The great, mighty, and awesome God (cf. Deut. 10:17) was not just the God of the past. He, keeper of His covenant of khesed—“mercy,” “love,” “kindness” (Deut. 7:9; 1 Kin. 8:23)—and He who had been faithful (Neh. 9:33) with Israel in the past was once again called upon to intervene on behalf of His people. The people’s prayer in v. 36—which called upon God to consider them—echoes Isaiah’s prayer (Is. 6:8) and indicates covenant commitment (officially ratified in Nehemiah chap. 10 and already introduced in 9:38), which some translations render as a “binding agreement.” This term appears only here and in 11:23 where it is related to the king’s command.

Nehemiah 9:25 and the Conquest of Canaan

The intriguing reference to possessing houses full of goods, wells already dug, vineyards, olive groves, and fruit trees (v. 25) sheds light on the historicity of the conquest that has been challenged repeatedly in modern scholarship: a close reading of the biblical text of Joshua highlights the important fact that Israel completely destroyed only three cities in Canaan (i.e., Jericho [Josh. 6]; Ai [Josh. 8]; and Hazor [Josh. 11]) and took most other city-states in less destructive ways. This was God’s means of providing for His people and explains the lack of radical changes in the archaeology of Late Bronze Age Canaan.

10:1–39*Covenant Commitment

The first part of the chapter contains a list of the names of those who committed themselves to God's covenant law. It was basically a covenant renewal that included attaching to the document the seals with their names. They were the religious and civil leaders of the people and, as such, represented all of them. The specific description of the covenant stipulations can be found in vv. 28–39. These shared a common characteristic with other ANE covenant rituals, in that they included blessings and curses (cf. Deut. 28:1–14; 27:11–26) and specific covenant stipulations. Some of these appear explicitly in Nehemiah 10:30–39, such as (1) a law against mixed marriages (10:30); (2) a reminder of proper Sabbath observance (10:31a; cf. Ex. 20:8–11; 34:21; Deut. 5:12–15); (3) the cancellation of debt and celebrating a Sabbath year (Neh. 10:31b; cf. Deut. 15:1–3); (4) the temple tax (cf. Neh. 10:32–33; cf. Ex. 30:13, where half a shekel was required, while here a third of a shekel is mentioned, perhaps because the Persian monetary system was different); (5) firewood for use in the temple (Neh. 10:34); (6) firstfruit offerings and tithes (Neh. 10:35–39; cf. Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 26:1–11).

11:1–36*The Filling of Jerusalem

The list found in this chapter contains the names of people who freely offered to live in Jerusalem, and it provides a direct link to 7:4, 73. In 11:1, the use of “lots” echoes earlier uses. For example, following the conquest of Canaan, lots were cast to determine tribal lands (Josh. 14:2; see also 1 Sam. 14:41–42; Jon. 1:7; Acts 1:24–26). Lots presuppose God's active engagement in human history—a notion that is omnipresent in Ezra and Nehemiah. Those who were selected by lot to live in Jerusalem comprised only 10 percent of those who lived in the surrounding area (a trend quite different from the exploding urbanization of the twenty-first century). This number is based on the biblical tithing principle and is accompanied by sacrificial/worship language that is usually reserved for temple- or altar-related activities. Expressions such as the “holy city” (also in Neh. 11:18; Is. 48:2; 52:1; Dan. 9:24; cf. the “holy people” [lit. “holy seed/offspring,” “race”] in Ezra 9:2) and the references to barak (“blessing,” “praise,” “commendation”) and freely offering (Neh. 11:2; cf. 1 Chr. 29:5–6; 2 Chr. 17:16; Ezra 2:68; 3:5) point to the religious nature of Jerusalem's “filling” or repopulation (Neh. 11:1–2). The sequence of consecration and offerings in Ezra and Nehemiah begins at the altar (Ezra 3:2) and proceeds via the temple (Ezra 6:13–18), the walls (Neh. 6:15–19; 12:27–43), and finally to the people, resulting in “the holy city” (v. 1).

The list includes priests and Levites (11:10–18), gatekeepers (11:19), and tribal groups from Judah (11:4–6) and Benjamin (11:7–9). Finally, the chapter concludes with another list of people dwelling outside Jerusalem (11:25–30). The many geographic references echo lists in the tribal division following the conquest. For example, the mention of Kiriath (Kirjath) Arba in 11:25 is a clear reference to Joshua 15:13–14 since the name used during the monarchy and later periods was “Hebron.” In this sense geography becomes part of theology. God not only extended Israel's grip on the land during the conquest but also during the return from Babylon. The reference to Dibon is difficult since elsewhere in Scripture it represents a city in Moab (Num. 21:30; Is. 15:9; Dimon, which is assumed to be the same place). Here it may refer to another town located in what was formerly Judah's territory.

12:1–26*Those Who Serve

This section includes another list of priests and Levites, beginning with Zerubbabel's return and ending with Nehemiah's. Since worship is a major theme in chapter 12, it is important to retrace the genealogy of worship leaders. The first part (vv. 1–7) lists in greater detail those who returned with Zerubbabel (cf. Ezra 2:36–40), followed by a list of Levites (Neh. 12: 8–10) and of high priests beginning with Jeshua/Joshua (vv. 10–11). Verse 12 offers more details of the priestly lines (vv. 12–21) beginning with Joiakim, the son of Jeshua/Joshua who had been high priest during the return under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; 3:2). Twenty-one priestly clans in total are listed.

The reference to the reign of Darius the Persian in Nehemiah 12:22 is not entirely clear since we know of at least three Persian kings with the name “Darius.” Both Darius II (423–405 B.C.) and Darius III (335–331 B.C.) are possible candidates, though Darius II fits better the chronology of Nehemiah. The inclusion of an additional list of Levites and priests during the time of this Darius (vv. 22–23) underlines the importance of these lists for the priesthood and Judaism in general. Finally, the list of the leaders (lit. “heads”) of the Levites in vv. 24–25 includes additional information regarding antiphonic choirs and singing, thus anticipating the processions that would be held during the dedication of the wall (vv. 27–43).

12:27–47

The Dedication of the Wall

What had been anticipated for a long time finally became a reality. The long-overdue dedication of the wall represented the grand finale of Nehemiah’s ministry—yet more was to come. The dedication of the wall of Jerusalem was marked by a huge celebration. The Hebrew term used in 12:27, khanukkah, is also used to describe the dedication of the temple (Ezra 6:16–17). Centuries later, following the desecration of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, it became the name of the Jewish festival of reconsecration of the temple. The sacred significance of this ritual activity is emphasized by the purification of priests and Levites, the people, the gates, and the wall (Neh. 12:30). Purification prior to major religious festivals was commonplace in the OT (Ex. 19:10, 14–15; Lev. 8:6; 16:28; Num. 8:5–8; 19:12, 19), highlighting the fact that holiness is a major component of God’s character. When we want to approach a holy God, we need to allow Him to cleanse us first.

The choreography of the event involved a lot of planning, which included two large thanksgiving choirs (Neh. 12:31) accompanied by instruments (v. 27) that moved procession-like around Jerusalem, either close to the wall or on top of the wall. One group was led by Ezra, the scribe, the teacher of the law (v. 36), while the “I” in v. 38 must refer to Nehemiah himself. This would put both leaders once again in the same location at the same time. Following the entrance of these two groups into the temple precinct, great sacrifices (which possibly refers to “many” of them) were offered (v. 43). The presence and participation of rejoicing women and children underlined the secure status of the city. Joy, once again, filled the postexilic community (Ezra 3:13) and could be heard from a distance.

Chapter 12 concludes with a description of how the offerings, firstfruits, and tithe were collected and stored in the temple for distribution to Levites and priests. There was unity and order because the leaders and the people were obeying the law of the Lord. The Levites primarily benefitted from the tithe of the people and the priests from the tithe of the Levites (see “Covenant Renewal and Tithing,” p. 602).

13:1–31

Nehemiah’s Second Administration: Problems and Reforms

The final chapter of Nehemiah underlines the fact that unrealistically blissful endings on this side of Eden are mostly artificial, wishful thinking. While we wish for an “and they lived faithfully ever after,” we know that our hearts are “deceitful above all things” (Jer. 17:9).

The beginning of chapter 13 marks a new section that is not directly linked to the previous narrative. The text describes another moment of the reading from the book of Moses, an event that was perhaps linked to a regular festival that involved the reading of God’s word (cf. Deut. 31:10–13). The “assembly of God” (sometimes translated as “congregation” or “community,” esp. in other passages) is shorthand for God’s covenant people in the Pentateuch (e.g., Ex. 12:6; 16:3; Lev. 4:13; Num. 10:7; Deut. 23:1–3, 8). The most likely reference alluded to here is Deuteronomy 23:4–5. Ammonites and Moabites, while related to Israel (Gen. 19:36–38), often represented the prototype of Israel’s enemy (Num. 22–24). As on previous occasions, the critical issue involved mixed marriages (Ezra 9:2, 6; 10:2, 6). The people’s hearing of the word moved them, once again, to action, and they separated all the foreigners (Heb. ‘ereb—lit. “the mixed company”) from Israel (Neh. 13:3). The verb badal used here can mean “separate” or “divide.” It is used in Genesis 1 when God separated things that could not go together (cf. Gen. 1:4, 6–7, 18). Here it refers to the exclusion of the pagan foreigners. Boundaries also played an important role in the sanctuary/temple involving different levels of holiness. The ‘ereb, on the other hand, echoes the Exodus (Ex. 12:38), where the same Hebrew word is used). Both the Creation and the Exodus remind us of boundaries. God called a people (that is still called “Israel” here) to attract the world around them by their unique relationship with Him. Israel was supposed to be different from the world—and yet they seldom were.

The reform initiated by Nehemiah included ousting Tobiah from the temple room (Neh. 13:7–9) and calling the people to spiritual renewal by returning their tithe and offerings to the Lord (see “Covenant Renewal and Tithing,” p. 602).

Covenant Renewal and Tithing

The renewal of the covenant by those who returned from Babylon included faithfulness to the laws pertaining to tithe.

1. Sources of Tithe: The Israelites committed themselves to giving a tithe from the crops (10:39). Although the tithe from herds and flocks (Lev. 27:32–33) is not specifically mentioned, it was most probably included because the people were apparently familiar with and diligent regarding what was required by the law (Neh. 12:44).

2. The System: The system set in place by Nehemiah required that those living around Jerusalem would bring the tithe to the storehouse in the temple and those outside Jerusalem would take it to the Levites in their Levitical cities (10:37). A priest would accompany the Levites when receiving the tithe from the people in order to preserve the integrity of the system (10:38). From the cities, the Levites would send the tithe of the tithe for the priests to the storehouse in the temple and the tithe left after they received their portion of the tithe for other Levites (12:44). Following the laws related to the collection and distribution of tithe, the system was centralized in order to benefit the totality of Levites and priests serving the Lord.

3. Nature of Tithe: When Nehemiah returned to Persia, the priesthood and the people became corrupt. Eliashib, who was the priest in charge of the storerooms in the temple, allowed Tobiah, an Ammonite, to reside in one of the storerooms of the temple. Influenced by the corruption of the priesthood, the people stopped tithing. When Nehemiah returned, he dealt with the corruption of the priesthood (13:6–9). He also spoke strongly to the people for not giving their tithe. It was their responsibility to return the tithe to the Lord and not to use the corruption of the priesthood as an excuse for not tithing (13:10–12). The tithe legislation in Nehemiah assumes the holiness of tithe, its ownership by the Lord (Lev. 27:30), and that He gave it to the Levites and priests (Num. 18:21, 26–28). Consequently, the people were expected to return it to Him in fulfillment of the covenant law.

This section concludes again with a “remember me” plea (Neh. 13:14). This plea—not a self-serving request for special treatment, divine favor, or recognition of impressive accomplishments—represents the conviction of God’s people throughout the ages that God knows and remembers. It clearly recognizes that God is intricately involved in all aspects of human life. Finally, Nehemiah restored true Sabbath worship, which included the Sabbath rest for foreigners (Ex. 20:10).

The issue of mixed marriages (Neh. 13:23–29) has appeared repeatedly in Ezra and Nehemiah. Apparently, Nehemiah had to tackle it once again. The reference to the inability of half of the children of these marriages to speak “the language of Judah” (v. 24) is noteworthy. The verbal and physical reactions of Nehemiah to the language limitations of the people are only intelligible if we keep in mind that a mother tongue is directly connected to the identity and culture of a people and of great assistance in the transmission of religious values. He saw in this problem a threat to the faith of Israel.

The inclusion of Solomon as a negative example of mixed marriages (v. 26; cf. 1 Kin. 11:1–13) is astonishing since Solomon was of the Davidic line and the builder of the first temple. Yet Nehemiah was willing to put the matter clearly, even if it reflected poorly on Solomon. The gist of Nehemiah’s argument was that mixed marriages lead to sin! Nehemiah recognized the model function of leadership—even the high priestly family had married outside Israel and had aligned itself with Sanballat, the archetype of opposition in Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 13:28).

The book concludes with a summary of Nehemiah’s reforms (vv. 30–31), once again using ritual terminology and contrasting two types of remembrance: “remember them” (v. 29) is pointing to divine judgment, while Nehemiah’s plea for God to remember him favorably (“for good”; v. 31) represents his complete reliance on God’s grace (cf. v. 22). The God who saw (and heard) Nehemiah’s initial prayer (1:5–11) and opened doors at the royal court would remember—nothing more and nothing less. The request for remembrance is here connected with hope.

ESTHER

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book of Esther is named after the female protagonist Esther (whose name is likely derived from the Babylonian goddess Ishtar; could also mean “star”), but it could have as easily been titled “Mordecai” since the two cousins worked as a team to save the Jewish people from utter annihilation. The unknown author of Esther was clearly familiar with Persian customs, laws, history, and even palace decorations in Susa during the reign of Xerxes I (Ahasuerus in Hebrew). Although unknown, the author may have even personally viewed these items, given that the details of the account suggest the recording of an eyewitness (perhaps Esther herself, or Mordecai)—one whose descriptions reflect the opulence of the royal court described by other historians.

Date. In Hebrew, the first words match the introduction to Joshua, Judges, and other historical books. In addition, the Hebrew verb “to write” is used seventeen times in Esther, implying that Esther was not only intended to be read as a book of historical records but that it also describes the recording of historical records and was likely written by someone with access to such records. The book was most likely written in the Persian period, as suggested by the many Persian loan words and a few Greek words found in it. The Hebrew is similar to that of 1 and 2 Chronicles. The third year of Xerxes I (1:3) corresponded with the great war council of Persia in 483 B.C., before the invasion of Greece, and this date could have also coincided with the 180-day banquet described in Esther 1. Given the presence and accuracy of these chronological details, the book was apparently written after this date.

Backgrounds. Xerxes I was the son of Darius I, who gave the decree for the exiled Jews to return to Jerusalem. Described by other historical sources as a king of excess, Xerxes’s focus on wealth and sensual pleasures is confirmed by the book of Esther. The Persian Empire consisted of various satrapies, with smaller provinces making up each satrapy. The author of Esther uses the number of the latter to emphasize opulence and prosperity.

Esther and Mordecai lived in Persia after many of the exiles had returned to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple. On first glance, it appears that there is no mention of Esther or Vashti outside the Bible, but careful analysis by several scholars of the details of Xerxes’s harem do not rule out equating Vashti with Amestris (even linguistically), the main queen mentioned by Herodotus. Even if this is not the case, the book of Esther does not necessitate Esther being the queen that bore the heir to the throne, so Amestris could have remained the queen mother of Xerxes’s heir, Artaxerxes. Clearly, Persian kings had multitudes of women in their harem and probably several queens as well. This may explain why the search for this queen (Esther) took about four years; she may not have been replacing the only queen (2:16–17).

Haman is called an Agagite, identifying him as a descendant of the Amalekite king Agag (1 Sam. 15:8) who represents the ultimate enemy of God’s people. If Mordecai’s ancestor Kish can be equated to or even related to Saul’s father, the rivalry between Haman and Mordecai becomes more than petty and personal, with each standing instead for an entire nation and a continuing feud. In addition to heightening the tension of the story, this connection makes the miraculous deliverance of the Jews even more meaningful.

The entire book of Esther is written in chiasmic form, with the last half of the book paralleling in reverse order (and in reversal of roles) the events and situations in the first half of the book. The center hinge is in chapter 6, where the seemingly insignificant event of the king’s insomnia brings about the monumental shift in the narrative. In addition, the irony, satire, and humor in Esther showcase the incredible literary skill of the author. Esther is well worth reading slowly, carefully, and repeatedly in order to fully appreciate the drama and the comedy and to saturate the mind's eye with the colorful and sensual descriptions of excess, pomp, and posterity.

Theology and Purpose. The most unique characteristic of the book of Esther is the complete lack of the mention of God's name or even anything overtly religious beyond the act of fasting (not praying) during a time of crisis. While some might see this as a reason to discount any theological message of this book, God's hiddenness is actually the foundation of its theology. God is powerfully though silently active in the narrative.

1. Divine Providence. Woven deeply into this superficially secular book is a passionate and decisive theology of the providence of God: He acted through apparently unrelated and chaotic events to carry out His ultimate purpose. God definitely works through mighty and awesome miracles like that of the Exodus, but these are rare and unusual. Most of the time, God works through circumstances, providentially ordering and orchestrating events and lives to bring people closer to Him and execute His ultimate plan. God is everywhere when we look for Him, and the book of Esther reminds us that seemingly ordinary life events are actually tools in the hands of our sovereign and gracious God, who delivers us out of impossible situations for His glory. Apparent coincidences abound in Esther, but in such dramatic fashion and with such spectacular results as to almost force the reader to consider them miraculous. In addition, total reversals dominate the book, as well as a focus on the overall end result, even by relatively obscure characters like Haman's wife, Zeresh. The book portrays the pride and arrogance of Haman as well as his downfall, especially since he seems to set himself up as a god-like figure. Similarities to the stories of Joseph and Ruth abound, where God's providence is clear and all-powerful. Various allusions to other narratives by word clusters or phrases connect many portions of Esther with religious and God-oriented themes. Thus, as many scholars have noted, upon a careful comparison with the rest of Scripture, and a close reading of the narrative, God's presence shines out of the book of Esther from almost every angle in a veiled form.

For us today, God's presence may also seem far away at times, and yet when we open our eyes, we begin to see God's providence everywhere, through events that initially seem coincidental and random. Unlike the prophets, through whom God spoke all the time, Esther portrays a time more like today, when God does not always seem to give clear direction and humans make choices that seem to range from bad to worse. Instead, we can trust that God is working behind the scenes to care for His people, even in the darkest times.

2. God's Special Care for His People. The book of Esther contains remarkable links to the book of Exodus. In both biblical books God's people face annihilation; in both narratives God sends a human intercessor who intervenes on behalf of God's people; in both instances, the delivery is celebrated by the establishment of a new festival (Passover and Purim) that is closely associated with Israel's identity. The God who is working through human agents behind the scenes of history is committed to care for "the apple of his eye" (Zech. 2:8).

3. God's Instruments. The book of Esther portrays a battle between good and evil, which is a microcosm of the Great Controversy between Christ and Satan. God desires to save everyone who is willing, and salvation was always available (cf. Josh. 2). Sometimes, especially in cases in which the lex talionis, or law of retribution, applied, God allowed the people to defend themselves against attack by their enemies, as was the case with Esther. The book of Esther recounts many opportunities for the enemies of the Jews to repent and avoid death, but some still did not. God respects the choice of those who turn away from Him.

Many have noted that the actions of Mordecai and Esther suggested a set of moral values that may in some respects seem questionable, especially when compared to those of Joseph and Daniel in foreign lands, even though the narrative does not draw attention to the problem. Thus, it does not follow that the biblical description of these actions indicates that they should be considered morally acceptable (there are many similar examples in Scripture). Indeed, for both Esther and Mordecai, as they took increasingly risky stands for God in identifying more fully with His people, their concept of right and wrong became more visible and in line with the people of God. Ultimately, God is able to use fallen and faulty people to His glory.

For readers today, this should be very comforting. God is able to use imperfect human agents. If Christians are willing, God will use them right where they are, fallen and faulty. And yet He will also continue to change them into His image, to live more and more faithful lives, as He did for Esther and Mordecai.

4. A Message of Hope. Hope abounds in the book of Esther, as well as reminders that God delivers His people even when it seems impossible. Esther is a great book for those who need hope because there is salvation in the midst of hopelessness. It often seems that history itself is under the control of humans and that their own plans for the future will become reality. Esther tells us that, ultimately, it is God who maps out a future for His people—a future of peace and harmony. In Esther the idea of reversal as the manifestation or actualization of hope is very important and may even point to the cosmic reversal at the close of the cosmic conflict. The book of Revelation portrays a similar attempt to exterminate God's people at the end of time (Rev. 13:15), and yet God will work again in a mighty way to bring ultimate deliverance. The great cosmic controversy between Christ and Satan will conclude with a mighty and awesome deliverance of God's people from certain death and a final destruction of sin and the enemies of God and His people (Rev. 19–22).

COMMENTARY

1:1–2:23

Setting the Stage for Change

The first two chapters of Esther move from exaltation to humiliation and back to exaltation. The king was being humiliated by Vashti, the queen, who was soon deposed. This decision resulted in the loss of respect of the king in the eyes of his people. But the scene also moves to the exaltation of Esther, who is selected as queen.

1:1–9. Setting the Scene. The book of Esther opens with a rich and descriptive look into the Persian court, particularly the opulence that characterized a lengthy royal banquet. The king showed the attendees the significant wealth of his glorious kingdom and the splendor and honor of his greatness (1:4). The long strings of nouns in 1:6–7 echo the incredible amount of wealth belonging to Xerxes I and serve almost as a video panorama around the palace. This first feast was all for show in order to bring honor and glory to the king as a result of the awe and speechless wonder engendered by the ridiculous amount of splendor. This sets up the reader to expect a reversal or downfall, especially when compared with other drunken feasts preceding downfalls in Scripture, like that of Belshazzar in Daniel 5. In addition, although Vashti's name means "best" in Persian, the paucity of description concerning her feast in comparison to Xerxes's (Esth. 1:9) hints at the insignificance to which she, as a person, would soon be relegated.

1:10–22. Vashti's Disobedience and the Aftermath.

The language used to describe the king's command for the appearance of the queen classifies her as a subset of the king's honor rather than as her own person (1:10–11). However, highlighting sexism is not the point here. Xerxes is really the one who is portrayed in a negative light. He appears more and more excessive, more and more superficial and petty, and more and more weak as the chapter progresses. Many scholars note his quick changes of mood, his seeming inability to have any clue as to how to deal with his own wife, and his willingness to go along with anything suggested by his officials. This sets the pattern for his characterization as a pushover throughout the rest of the book. He may appear to have been in control, but he was really only reacting to events as they came upon him. It is almost as if the narrator is inviting and expecting the reader to make a mental shift, to see between the lines and discern the divine purpose working through the erratic and unpredictable actions and reactions of the king. Similarly, God is at work today, even in the corrupt and unpredictable actions of current political leaders in the world. What seem to be coincidences are actually God's providences.

The aftereffects of Vashti's refusal to come before Xerxes end up increasing the comical impotence of this initially powerful king. The resulting law was supposed to provide security for the empire, but it actually reflected chaos, revealing the king's impulsive and irrational reactions based on the counsel of his paranoid officials (1:16–20). Almost impossible to enforce, the law universalized the Vashti incident so that it encompassed all wives (1:20), serving to foreshadow what Haman would decree for all Jews out of spite for one Jew, Mordecai. The multilingual character of the decree also set the stage for future issues regarding ethnicity and ancestry. In addition, this decree was intended to hush up the Vashti incident, but instead her deed became known to everyone. The king began by showing his power but ended by being played a fool, both by his wife and his own officials.

2:1–18. Choosing a New Queen. After the king remembered Vashti (2:1), the description of the gathering of the virgins is ambiguous in regard to whether they were brought or came of their own volition. However, one of the primary criteria was beauty, with a focus on what pleased the king (2:4). The description of the virgins as beautiful (2:3) is also used for Vashti in 1:11. We should keep in mind that in the Bible beauty is not only external but that it also includes the qualities of a character that corresponds with the function given to the person. A beautiful queen was one who was attractive but who also embodied the demeanor that was expected of such a person. Even if the virgins were gathered and did not come voluntarily, it was, nevertheless, essentially a beauty contest; although sex was involved, the king probably was not looking primarily for a sexual partner, since he had many, but for a person with the qualities expected from a queen—most importantly, the ability to command the respect and admiration of the court (2:15). Even if this situation was not something that Esther could have avoided, one wishes that she could have been more like Daniel. But the biblical text does not pass any judgment on her; it simply describes what happened and explains how God used imperfect human beings to His glory and finally brought them to a higher spiritual plane. In the same way, God is willing to use us while still working to transform us into His likeness.

Mordecai's ancestry from the tribe of Benjamin may have been intended to hint at his connection to King Saul (2:5). Scholars debate whether it was Mordecai himself or his ancestor Kish who came to Jerusalem. If it were Mordecai, he would be 110 at the beginning of this narrative, so it seems that it must have been his Benjamite ancestor who had the same name as the father of King Saul. However, the connection to Saul's line nevertheless seems intended by the author (cf. 1 Sam. 9:1) since Haman is connected to Agag's line (cf. Deut. 25:17–19; 1 Sam. 15:8). According to 2 Chronicles 36:22–23, Mordecai and his family should have returned with the other exiles rather than staying in the luxury of Persia. In addition, it seems that though they should have publicly identified with God's covenant people, they initially did not (Esth. 2:10). Their names give further evidence of backsliding. Esther's name is very similar to that of the Mesopotamian goddess of love, Ishtar, who supposedly had great sexual powers, and Mordecai's name is related to Marduk, the supreme deity of Babylon.

And yet, Esther received favor (2:15; “grace” in Hebrew), similar to Joseph in Genesis 39:4 (also in a foreign land). Esther sought to do everything she could to make herself a suitable match for the king, asking advice from Hegai, the king's eunuch, who was in charge of the women (Esth. 2:15). Esther became associated with loyalty, obedience, restraint, compliance, and receptiveness. Nothing is said about whether or not she observed Jewish dietary laws. Neither is it clear whether not identifying herself as a Jew was good or not. Clearly, she and Mordecai were concerned about anti-Semitic prejudice.

The comment that Xerxes loved Esther more than all the other women (2:17) refers to the royal selection process—the search for a new queen. However, she also obtained khen, meaning “grace” or “favor,” and khesed, an important word in the OT, variously translated as “mercy,” “kindness,” “love” from the king—words which imply an emotional bond as well. Even though Esther ended up marrying a pagan, a Gentile, God would work through her disobedience to the law in order to preserve His people.

This took place four years after Vashti was ousted (v. 17)—this is one of the important reversals in the book. The narrator provides no vindication or condemnation of Mordecai and Esther because the point is not to focus on their shortcomings but on the miraculous power of God to deliver His people.

2:19–23. Salvation of the King. Verse 19 does not describe a second gathering of virgins. Instead it notes the time when Mordecai began to sit at the king's gate in an administrative position and saved the king from assassination (2:21). After this, more commands are promulgated by Mordecai and Esther than by the king. The book of Esther is really about Mordecai just as much as Esther. At this point, Esther still did not openly identify with God's people, and she still followed orders (2:20, 22). And yet God was already able to use her to save others—in this case, saving the king by informing him of the assassination attempt. Esther could have taken the credit here, but she was honest and identified Mordecai as her source of information. This incident becomes a key detail in the narrative because the king was negligent to reward Mordecai (2:23). All these events were written in the book of the chronicles or annals of the Persian kingdom.

3:1—5:14*A Plot against the Jews

The story moves to a new level, placing the emphasis on developments within the palace and their impact on the Jews and the nation. At this point there is a strong element of suspense in the plot of the story as evil plans were developed against God's people.

3:1–15. Haman's Ascendancy and Plot. The reader would expect Mordecai to be rewarded, but instead it was Haman, a new character in the story, who received the king's favor, and we are not told how or why. The narrator makes clear Haman's connection with Agag the Amalekite king (cf. Ex. 17:8–16; Num. 24:7; Deut. 25:17–19; 1 Sam. 15:8). Israel was to utterly destroy Amalek because of their horrific slaughter of the vulnerable and weak. Indeed, according to 1 Chronicles 4:42–43 many Amalekites were killed, so perhaps the remnant represented here by Haman was a result of a diaspora similar to the Jews in Persia. Often today, the wicked and evil are promoted unfairly, in contrast to the righteous, and we are not usually allowed to know why. However, God works even through these uncertainties and difficulties to bring about His purpose and plan.

While each word can be used to refer to respect given to humans, the combination of the Hebrew words kara' and khawah—both meaning “to bow down” or “to do obeisance” (Esth. 3:2) is otherwise used only for God (2 Chr. 7:3; 29:29; Pss. 22:29; 95:6). So this action was not about Mordecai disrespecting Haman's authority but implies that Haman was asking for more than the mere respect that the king commanded. The text does not portray Mordecai as arrogant, given to tribal enmity, caring only for monotheism, or even caring for God's dignity. Even today, respect for authority is appropriate, unless that authority is commanding the deference due only to God. Although those who worked with Mordecai knew that he was a Jew, implying that his noncompliance had other motives than disrespect (Esth. 3:4), they were nevertheless bothered by his disobedience and finally reported him to Haman.

Haman's furious response (3:13–14) was similar to the king's (1:20), in that it went beyond what would be reasonable and extended to all the people (similar to how the king went beyond simply shaming Vashti and deposing her). Haman made plans even before he talked to the king and cast lots, which ironically involved some sort of divination, a belief in divine providence (3:7). The Hebrew word “fall” (usually translated as “cast”) for the selection of the day is also used for what ultimately happened to Haman in 6:13. The pur (“lot”) introduced fate and chance (3:7), as well as links to the Passover and Exodus, which were also in the month of Nisan. The center of divine hiddenness is found in the omission of God's name and the invisible yet powerful providences of God.

Haman's speech to the king was carefully constructed rhetoric, beginning with truth, then proceeding to half lies, and finally ending with flat-out lies. He was full of slanderous and shaming insinuations that would feed into the king's paranoia about rebellious uprisings, as well as his desperate need for money. The king had suffered a major defeat at the hands of the Greeks and was near bankruptcy; therefore the amount of the bribe, corresponding to two-thirds of Persia's total annual income, was attractive to him. Perhaps it would come from the plunder of the Jews. There are many similarities between the speeches of Memucan (1:16–20) and Haman. Both based their arguments on the misappropriation of what belonged to a single other, even though Persians usually loved and encouraged ethnic diversity (see 3:12). This was ironic since Haman was also an outsider, a minority, so he had to create prejudice, using generalities and abstractions such as suggesting that it would be inappropriate and not in the king's best interest to allow the Jews' presence to continue to be tolerated (3:8).

The plot gave no sense of respite until the solution had begun, just like in chapter 1. And yet, in contrast to the previous public decree and banquet of the king, this decree was adopted privately and ended with a private banquet; all the while the city was perplexed and in uproar, confusion, and chaos (3:15). Perhaps the irony of the law (3:12) to all nations was a large part of the confusion. Each person may have been wondering if he or she would be next.

The king carried on his tradition of never rejecting a proposal from one of his advisors. Many connections to Genesis 41:42 can be noted: Pharaoh gave his signet ring to Joseph; also in the Joseph story were false accusations, a decree against the innocent, the rescue of endangered people, and the exaltation of a Jew to prime minister. While this initially may seem to have represented the king's desire to refuse to be responsible for the genocide, he clearly sold the Jews to Haman because he would receive payment (Esth. 7:4). He used his signet ring

(3:10), his scribes or royal secretaries (3:12), and his name (3:12). In addition, the decree was ratified in his presence. Xerxes shows that an uncontrolled need for honor and respect, coupled with absolute power, leads to oppression and injustice.

4:1-17. Esther and Mordecai's Counterplot.

This chapter consists of a series of exchanges between Mordecai and Esther. Until this chapter, Esther acted as a proper woman and queen. Once Mordecai asked her to reveal her Jewish identity, her first reaction was to hide it. This stemmed from the reality that Mordecai was commanding Esther to go against the king's direct orders and against the law (4:16). While Vashti was unwilling to appear before the king, Esther had to be ready to appear before him without being requested to come. As a result of Mordecai's pleas, Esther shifted into a new and commanding role as queen, and Mordecai did what she said (4:17). One wonders if the king had lost interest in Esther, which would have heightened the drama and danger since he had not called for her for thirty days (4:11). Esther had already once communicated with the king against the law (2:22), but that was for his protection, whereas this was her own request. Medo-Persian law was very clear that this would mean death for her since it could be considered a threat to the life of the king.

And yet Esther was really part of the solution to the king's dilemma regarding the Jews because she was both a Jew and in power. She wondered whether she would be able to hold to both her heritage and her position. Yet it became clear that God had chosen her for a moment like this and at the same time enabled her to fulfill her role. The story shows that she was ready to fulfill God's purpose at the risk of her life. Verses 9-10 record a short and concise dialogue, showing the speed and intensity of the communication, as well as how ignorant those in the palace were of what was happening in the outside world and how Mordecai knew nothing of what was happening in the palace. Hatach traveled back and forth between Esther and Mordecai, reporting their messages to each other (4:9).

Mordecai had faith that God would take care of His people because he told Esther that if she did not disclose her identity and bring deliverance, relief and deliverance would arise for the Jews from another place (4:14). The presence of God and His plan for deliverance is so clear here that some rabbis call Him "the Place," implying that God would deliver the Jews another way, no matter what. The text introduces in a veiled form the need for prayer to God. "Fasting, weeping, and wailing" (4:3) are the same words used elsewhere for grief over sin (e.g., Joel 2:12). Even the non-Jews referred to in the book of Esther were religious, so the narrative seems to assume it here. The phrase "who knows" (Esth. 4:14) is used elsewhere by sinners to call upon God for help (2 Sam. 12:22; Joel 2:14; Jon. 3:9), and implies that God may relent as He has in the other cases. Mordecai's genuine grief and agitation make clear that expressing our fears and concerns is sometimes necessary and good.

Esther also called for a fast, which is associated with prayer as well as mourning in Scripture (Esth. 4:16). She continued to remain loyal to the king in how she appeared, even as she prepared to break a law, which could cause her personal harm and complete loss of status and identity. Esther did not hear a word from God, so how did she know what to do? We often think that we must ask for a specific sign or have clear direction from God before proceeding. But although we should seek wisdom from God before acting, God does not always tell us exactly what to do. Many times, He asks us to make a choice, to exercise our free will, use our reasoning powers, and reflect His image. Whatever we choose, we can continue to follow Him in our hearts even when other things are not clear, and He will make His ultimate will happen. God would have made a way for the Jews to be delivered if Esther had not chosen to go before the king, similar to how He raised up David when Saul chose to turn away from God. But Esther did choose to follow the advice of Mordecai, to risk her life for her people, even though we have no record that God told her to do so. Ultimately, God worked mightily through her because of her faith and choice to serve others.

Esther could not avoid disobedience to the king. Yet she did not do at all what Mordecai suggested or the law demanded. As a result, she ended up commanding both the king and Mordecai. This was where she really stepped into her role as queen—and into her place in God's plan of salvation. She initially obeyed Mordecai, but then she took matters into her own hands, identifying with God's people in her own time and way.

5:1-14. Esther's Invitation. The time of Esther's approach was during Passover, which was significant for it recalled God's overlooking the sins of His people, as well as sparing them from judgment and giving it instead to their enemies. Once again the king was pleased with her, and she obtained his favor (5:2). This was another possible implication of God's action behind the scenes (cf. Ex. 12:36). Esther's clothes are mentioned to compare her royalty to that of the king. She stood before him to show royal status, but she waited for the king to invite her to approach out of the inner court of the king's palace (Esth. 5:1). The king realized she must be very troubled to risk her life.

At the feast while drinking wine, Xerxes renewed his request since he realized her invitation to eat did not reveal what she really wanted (5:6). The king made an excessive promise, showing his impulsive and naive nature yet again—or perhaps his respect for the queen. Esther then acted to create a situation that would enable her to ask without having to rely on the king's promise, noting how the banquet was for him, and played on his arrogance by not mentioning Haman at that point. Esther's actions here were politically shrewd and even calculating. God enabled her to exercise the power He gave her. After this moment she is always referred to as "queen" in the book of Esther.

Esther's actions here build tension and suspense, which is further heightened by the lack of windows into her motives. In contrast to the readers' ability to see into Haman's thoughts and insecurities, Esther is portrayed as mysterious and confident, implying that she would win out in the end. She also likely waited because Xerxes was malleable and erratic, and Haman might try to change the mind of the king once again. She chose to set a trap for Haman so she could defeat him quickly and not risk his colluding with the king behind her back. She was also trying to arouse suspicion in the king, illustrating that there is nothing wrong per se with shrewdness and political awareness—they are tools that can be used to accomplish good or evil ends.

This scene plays on the irony of the king's proclamation that all men should rule their homes (1:22) because Esther was in control here, feeding them and getting them drunk. And yet the narrator clues in the readers to the emotions of Haman so that he appears needy and unstable. It becomes clear that his lack of self-control would ultimately be his downfall. Zeresh undermined Haman's role at home as well by talking of deterministic actions, just as Esther did. Haman had boasted about being honored, promoted, and lifted up (Heb. nasa') above others by the king (Esth. 5:11), but in the end he would only be lifted up on a stake. Pride and greed were more important than human life in Persia, as they often are today. But God does not forget His promises, and He can overrule human pride and greed to deliver His people when they seek Him.

6:1—7:10

The Fall of the Enemy

The resolution of the plot of the narrative is filled with suspense. The powerful appeared to have in his hand the future of God's people, and there was no majestic and visible manifestation of the power of God to save them. But the Lord was working from within the narrative as the main protagonist in charge of its course and ending.

6:1–14. The King's Insomnia and Mordecai's Ascendancy. This chapter documents events emphasizing how it was on that very night when God intervened and the reversal began (6:1). The Hebrew verb in the phrase referring to the king's insomnia (lit. "sleep fled the king") shows that the king was not the one acting—this again hints at divine involvement. This is especially true when considering the accumulation of circumstances: no sleep for the king (6:1), nothing had been done to honor Mordecai (6:3), the records of the chronicles that were read to the king (6:1), and the fact that Haman happened to be outside in the outer court (6:4). The juxtaposition of all of these events further confirms that the insomnia had some cause other than the king. Even the reference to the account of Mordecai being found suggests a search was ordered, perhaps a recollection of unrewarded action or a divine appointment (6:2).

God works through ordinary events, even through things that are full of humor and irony, with a motif of concealment. In the book of Esther, chapter 6 is the narrative center, apparently Mordecai's lowest point, but also Haman's because of his pride. This exhibits a connection with eschatology, a reversal of fortunes, when all seems to be lost for God's people. At the last possible moment, when there seems to be no other way of escape, and when destruction is certain, God intervenes and brings a mighty deliverance. In v. 6, the king asked for advice, his impulsivity characteristic of one who was easily moved to honor others. It appears that Haman was standing in the court like Esther had been, coming to make a request, highlighting his vulnerability, insecurity, and egocentric nature. Haman's response should have been perceived as odd, even signaling a coup attempt with designs on the throne (see 1 Kin. 1:33–40).

The ensuing scene in Esther 6:8–9 is almost ludicrous, with a massive reversal between Mordecai and Haman, as well as between Mordecai and the king. The narrator does not give clues as to whether the king had forgotten he had decreed Jewish destruction, and the silence heightens the dramatic tension. Haman's hurried return to his house was another sign of the reversal of his decree, with which the couriers had hurried (6:12; cf. 3:15). Zeresh and Haman's friends seem to have known of commands and promises that predicted the fall of Amalek and Israel's triumph (v. 13; cf. Ex. 17:16; Num. 24:15–20; Deut. 25:17–19; 1 Sam. 15); even seeing Haman's humiliation as the first step. Indeed, Haman was hastened again (Esth. 6:14), this time to face ultimate humiliation, while Mordecai now looked more like the king than the king.

7:1–10. Haman's Fall. Both Esther and Haman pled for their lives, but ultimately Haman fell before the Persian queen, a Jew, though she triumphed over him with her shrewdness and not a sword. She began by hosting another banquet with the drinking of wine (7:2), implying security, victory, and the opposite of fasting, and the narrative is more gripping since her request has still not been made. Esther had the very delicate task of accusing Haman, but not the king (v. 3), since in a way the king was equally responsible for the planned genocide of the Jews. To do this, she used the phrase, "If I have found favor with you" (lit. "in your eyes"), which suggests intimacy and personal favor (v. 3). She also used the king's own terms—she'elah, meaning "petition," and baqqashah, meaning "request"—and reconnected with her people (v. 3). Esther's rhetorical skill matched that of Haman's masterful speeches. She intimated that to kill her people was to kill her because she realized that the king would show less vigor to save others than to save her. She may also have hinted (v. 4) at the king's decree. She used the same words as he did (3:13; cf. Judg. 2:14, 3:8). The queen tried to persuade the king that she had his best interests at heart, using the same words as Haman in Esther 3:8, 13 in regard to the destruction of the Jews.

This chapter is full of irony. Esther implied that the king was so important that the queen would rather be sold as a slave than bring this matter to his attention (7:4), and yet Esther's pose as a weak and helpless woman does not fool the reader. Esther also hinted at the money involved with her reference to her people being sold as male and female slaves. She may have been arguing (at least according to some translations of the last part of the verse) that Haman was not actually interested in the king's welfare or Haman would have sold the Jews (v. 4). She realized that the king's convenience was the primary factor in his decisions, and he would lose labor if he lost the Jews. Likely, Esther's meekness and caution here were tactical, not manifestations of her personality, similar to Nathan's waiting to give David's name in his accusatory parable in 2 Samuel 12. In Esther 7:6 she used the balanced and resonant Hebrew sentence "haman hara' hazzeh" (meaning "this wicked/vile Haman"), which parallels the king's question in structure and gives the sense of a couple verbally dancing back and forth. The accusation came with force like Nathan's to David.

The king then redrew lines of personal allegiance according to criteria of royalty even though it seems it took the king a while to realize what had happened because his selling of the Jews had been so offhand. The king and queen were now working together against a common enemy. Haman was startled and disturbed, terrified before the king and queen because Esther's wit and charm effectively disassociated the king from the evil deed (7:6). Haman's panic led to misconduct that the king would use to justify his condemnation. The rage of the king followed a similar pattern as in previous incidents: instigation, rage, recommendation, implementation, return of pleasure.

Haman violated royal Persian protocol: only the king could be alone with any of his wives, so Haman should have left. Nevertheless, his departure would have suggested guilt or invited pursuit, so he was left in a very difficult position. Verse 8 contains a play on words, truly a humorous scene, as the king could now misinterpret Haman's intention: Haman is portrayed as falling on the couch, upon Esther, or both (the Hebrew is rather ambiguous). While this can also be interpreted as supplication (cf. 8:3; 1 Sam. 25:24), the ambiguity appears intentional. Haman was rendered speechless for once, and the word "fall" sealed his fate—while others cast (lit. "caused to fall") the lot before him in Esther 3:7, he began to "fall" before Mordecai in 6:13.

The king looked for a convenient excuse to eliminate Haman, being now more concerned with the royal dignity (yet wives were easier to come by than prime ministers). In 7:9, it becomes clear that the palace staff favored Esther, and the king could not even formulate a coherent response. Esther did not show mercy here because Haman was an Amalekite and was not contrite. It was also not hers to offer; his fate had been devised by his own handiwork. In v. 10, the king's anger subsided when Haman suffered a fate planned for another, but for a crime he did not commit, and yet he deserved the punishment (cf. Ps. 7:16; Prov. 26:27). This turn of events shows how God's deliverance reverses impossible situations. Believers must ask for open eyes to see how God is working in their lives, especially when He seems most hidden.

8:1–10:3

The Triumph of God's People

The threat of extinction caused anguish to the people of God because the threat was universal. It moved from the palace to the whole kingdom. God was going to be left without a witness on earth, and this was not acceptable to Him. He would give wisdom and power to His human instruments to overcome and, at the end, to joyfully celebrate the victory.

8:1–17. The Salvation of the Jews and the Choosing of a New Prime Minister. This chapter begins with the comment that the events in the previous verses took place on that very day (cf. 3:13). The reversal was complete. Esther assumed Haman's position and took his wealth to give to the Jews. Mordecai received the signet ring from the king, and Esther put him in charge of Haman's house—that is, his estate (8:2). However, Esther had one more request for the king, and the scenario proceeds in a very similar way as in chapter 5 when she came before the king. Esther fell down before the king, but in this instance, she sought her own good and that of her people (8:3). The graphic description of her begging with tears (8:3) connotes intensity and importunity often used only for God.

Esther was clearly unsure of her reception since this exceeded her original petition, and so she used four elements of deference: she expressed her request in terms of whether it pleased the king, if she was regarded with favor by him, if her request seemed right to him, and if she was pleasing to him (8:5). Her request bundled approval and love together so Xerxes would find it difficult to separate the two. To the king, Esther was queen first, Jewish second, so she concluded with a lament aimed to avert destruction (v. 6; cf. Lam. 2:11; Esth. 4:1). This was not a mere request but a challenge against the administration, legal axioms, and kingdom organization that were so convoluted and bureaucratic. Esther appealed to the king's pity, knowing she would be overcome with anguish if her people were to suffer.

Verse 8 notes a quirk of Persian law: even the king could not withdraw the first set of documents because decrees made in the king's name and set with his seal could not be revoked. So the king, in a sense, appears to have abdicated the throne—he allowed Esther to write a counter decree. The decree closely mimics Esther 3:12–15: written with the king's name (8:10), sealed with his signet ring (v. 10), and sent to all provinces and in their own language (v. 9). This underscored the new safety and security accorded Jews. Even their language was given official status.

Verse 11 uses the same three verbs that were used to describe Haman's attempted genocide. According to some translations, the decree specifically mentioned the protection of the Jewish women and children; according to others, it mentioned the right of the Jews to destroy any women and children of the people involved in an assault against them. The main point in the latter case would be primarily to mirror the original decree (cf. 3:13). In confirmation of this, the Jews actually did not take spoil, but they were given permission to do so if they wished. The decree emphasized the defensive counteraction that Jews could take, in the reversal of national fortune through a preemptive strike. The allowance for avenging (8:13) does not refer to personal vengeance but to a punitive action based on the law, assuming a prior wrong (Haman's edict) and a guaranteed right to defend themselves.

The mood in the citadel was very different from that of 3:15. The city was joyful at this decree (8:15) rather than being in turmoil. Mordecai departed from the king clothed in royal robes (8:15), in contrast to Haman in chapter 3, who was inside the palace and oblivious to what was happening in the city. These garments of Mordecai symbolized the highest degree of royal recognition. These same materials are all mentioned in Xerxes's feast in chapter 1. The reference to light (or happiness), gladness, joy, and honor (8:16) reverses the fasting, weeping, and wailing of 4:3. Gladness and joy are often used to describe delight in response to divine presence and deliverance (8:16).

In light of this, many non-Jews became Jews (8:17). A similar situation is recorded in Nehemiah 10:29, where Gentiles separated from the nations to follow God's law. Even though the change was ethnic, it also involved religious awe.

Similarly, Genesis 31:53 notes that God is the “Fear of Isaac,” so there could be a veiled reference to God here in the phrase “fear of the Jews,” showcasing God’s presence or intervention in history (Esth. 8:17). Similarly, 2 Chronicles 17:10 states that the “fear of Yahweh fell on the nations” and resulted in the protection of Israel from her enemies.

The resolution was a complete reversal: Mordecai came with royal garb, Jews experienced joy and gladness, and others became Jews. While some argue that this was not a heartfelt conversion, when Esther 8:17 is connected with 9:27, the conversion was clearly genuine. Fear or awe that leads to conversion is the work of God. No one was forced to convert because the decree only allowed self-defense by the Jews. But Haman and his gods were defeated, so this revelation of the work of the Jewish God moved their hearts. For us today, when decisions are made to live for God, others are moved, especially those who are searching for more than materialistic goods and fleeting pleasures. It may seem that there are very few souls ripe for the harvest, but a choice to follow God under great duress can lead many others to follow Him as well.

9:1–10:3. The Last Feasts and Purim. This last section is very different in narration, style, vocabulary, and content, with less story and more history and legal counsel. Mordecai is portrayed as similar to Moses. The fear of the Jews (v. 2) and the fear of Mordecai (v. 3) are noted even though the fear of God would fit perfectly, designating God’s presence and intervention in history (cf. Ex. 15:14–16; Josh. 2:8–11). All gave honor to Mordecai, showing Jewish attainment of complete political mastery. Mordecai became more famous, prominent, and powerful (Esth. 9:4) than Haman had been (3:1). Mordecai’s standing at court prompted government officials to help the Jews (9:3), who were now in a similar situation as Esther had been when she gained favor in the eyes of the king. The focus here is on dominion and honor, not slaughter.

The names of the ten sons of Haman are ancient Persian names associated with demonic powers (9:10). It seems probable that they organized active hostility during the months following the issuing of the decree. In contrast, the Jews followed the rules of Deuteronomy 13:6–18, and they took no plunder even though Mordecai’s decree allowed them to take spoil. This reprisal was necessary because their enemies gloated and the king seemed indifferent to their suffering (Esth. 3:11, 15). However, the Festival of Purim celebrated getting rest or relief from their enemies (9:16), which implied that the ultimate victory over enemies is due to a transcendental power, not human strength. The people responded collectively to establish the days of Purim (9:26), a spontaneous response to God’s faithfulness. And in yet another play on words, the reference to the presents that the people were to send to each other uses the same Hebrew word that is used for Esther’s portion in 2:9. This word also refers to the gifts or choice food morsels that are given to the poor to celebrate God giving them a portion (9:22).

Purim thus celebrated relief (not killing), with an emphasis on deliverance (not overpowering or domination). Anyone was free to join them, including future converts (cf. Is. 14:1; 56:3, 6). It was a religious celebration that sought no political advantage. In the edict to inaugurate the Festival of Purim, Esther wrote with full authority, and Mordecai sent letters to the Jews (Esth. 9:29–30), continuing to integrate their Persian and Jewish identities (vv. 31–32). Mordecai was respected and well loved by all, and he sought their good and their welfare (10:3)—the literal Hebrew here refers to speaking peace. This was an action that is otherwise attributed only to God and His speaking promises to His people (cf. Ps. 85:8). Throughout Scripture, the secular roles of God’s people are significant, but they give us a challenge to act in the face of oppression, even when risks seem imminent. The hope of God’s deliverance will not be frustrated because He is the ultimate Deliverer, yet He works behind the scenes through faulty yet courageous humans to bring about His sovereign and providential plan.

POETRY AND WISDOM BOOKS

INTRODUCTION TO HEBREW POETRY AND WISDOM BOOKS

The beauty of poetry and its characteristics are difficult to transfer from an unfamiliar original language to a second one. The fullness of the beauty of Hebrew poetry can be totally enjoyed only through the original Hebrew language. Yet there is much that we can learn about it and its function through the study of the English translations of the Bible. These translations have done all that is possible to preserve the nature of Hebrew poetry.

POETIC BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Traditionally Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, and Lamentations are considered to be the poetic books of the OT. The Hebrew Bible locates these poetic books among the ketubim (Writings), the third section within the threefold division of the Hebrew canon (Law, Prophets, and Writings). The first three books (Job, Psalms, and Proverbs) are grouped together as the sipre 'emet (books of truth), or just poetic books, whereas the second three books (Ecclesiastes, Songs of Songs, and Lamentations) form part of the megillot—the five scrolls (including also the books of Ruth and Esther) that are traditionally read during the Jewish holidays. In addition to the poetic books and the megillot, the ketubim also include a short list of historical books, namely, Daniel (placed among the prophets in the Protestant canon), Ezra and Nehemiah (originally combined into a single book in the Hebrew Bible), and both Chronicles (also originally a single book). The Protestant canon includes these books in the section of the poetic books except for Lamentations, which is placed with Jeremiah among the prophetic books of the OT.

POETRY VERSUS PROSE

Thinking of Hebrew poetry, one usually focuses on the six books mentioned above that are composed entirely or mostly of verse. Nevertheless, within the remainder of the Hebrew Bible, poetry appears so frequently that scholars have asked how much of the OT is poetry and how much is prose. Suggestions range from the traditional one third to the assertion that most of the OT was written as poetry. Furthermore, the claim of an artificial distinction between prose and poetry has become a widely discussed topic in the literary study of the OT and has been examined within narrative criticism. Beyond the six poetic books, the central role of poetry in the prophetic literature of the OT and even within the Pentateuch (which contains several highly significant poetic passages) has been recognized.

Beginning in the 1980s, the study of Hebrew poetry has undergone a revival that has to be understood within the context of literary criticism, which, in turn, was an expression of the growing discontent with the results—or lack of results—of historical criticism. While earlier introductions to Hebrew poetry focused on technique and style, more recent studies have addressed poetic theory, namely, the questions of how to distinguish between poetry and prose and if such a distinction can be made anyway. It became clear that it is not possible to apply modern literary notions about poetry and prose to ancient Hebrew poetry and prose. One important issue in the debate is the question of the parallelism of poetic phrases, a feature that the Anglican Bishop Robert Lowth identified in 1753 as the foremost principle of Hebrew poetry.

Moving far beyond Lowth's early and somewhat mechanistic definitions of parallelism, scholars have now recognized the linguistic complexities of parallelism and its sophisticated workings on grammatical, lexical, semantic, and phonological levels. Thus, scholars have been able to move toward a list of characteristics that, through their relative frequency, distinguish poetry from prose in the Hebrew Bible: (1) terseness or conciseness; (2) ellipses or omission of verbal forms; (3) parallelism; (4) word pairs; (5) imagery; (6) less predictable tense sequence and word order; (7) lack of syntactical markers; (8) fronting (i.e., placing elements before the main verb); and (9) decontextualization (i.e., isolating poetic discourse from its context). This list is by no means comprehensive, and other scholars have approached the subject from a linguistic, statistical perspective, indicating that the three prose particles (i.e., the definite article he ["the"], the relative pronoun 'asher ["that," "which," "whom"], and the marker of the definite object 'et [not translated into English]) are conspicuously absent in Hebrew poetry, so that a count lower than five would indicate poetry, while those above fifteen would point toward prose. For the middle range (five to fifteen), they propose a new category—prophetic discourse, which mixes prose and poetry. The general tendency appears to be that the difference between prose and poetry is more a matter of degree than one of kind, and scholars are looking for methods that will make the distinction more objectively.

Variations of prose and poetry are not only a matter of different books containing primarily poetry or primarily prose, but the variations are also to be found throughout the entire Hebrew Bible. Generally, the Pentateuch has not been the preferred terrain for the study of Hebrew poetry since its style is mainly descriptive and prescriptive narrative with some personal discourse. However, there are four major poems in the Pentateuch (Gen. 49; Ex. 15; Num. 23–24; Deut. 32–33) that are found at theologically important places, aside from numerous other smaller poetic units (beginning with Gen. 2:23; 3:14–19). This trend continues throughout the remainder of the Hebrew Bible so that scholars have started to speak of inset poetry (i.e., poetry that has been deliberately and strategically placed within prose to underline or highlight an important theological point).

Another good example, outside of the Pentateuch, is Jonah 2, also known as Jonah's psalm, which some scholars in the past identified as a later addition. It has now become apparent that this inset poem serves an important role in the narrative structure of the whole prophetic book.

There are two chapters in the OT (Judg. 4–5) that illustrate the subtle differences between Hebrew poetry and prose in a fascinating way because they reference the same event, once in prose (Judg. 4) and then again in poetry (Judg. 5). The story is the courageous killing of Sisera, commander of the Canaanite army of Jabin, king of Hazor, by Jael, the wife of Heber. For the sake of this discussion, only one verse from each chapter is selected to highlight these differences:

Judges 4:19

Then he said to her, “Please give me some water. I am thirsty.” So she opened a container of milk, gave him a drink, and covered him. (author’s translation)

Judges 5:25

For water he asked,
Milk she gave;
In a bowl fit for lords,
She brought curdled milk. (author’s translation)

The original Hebrew counts fourteen words in prose versus eight words in poetry. The prose version tells a linear story, giving heightened attention to what Jael provided to Sisera when he entered her tent, in order to lure him into a false sense of safety (he asked for a bit of water, but she gave him milk and then covered him with a blanket). The poetic account of the same moment works with parallel and simultaneous contrasts, juxtaposing “water” and “milk” and placing (fronting) them before the two contrastive verbs (“ask” and “give”). The third and fourth lines (called cola) then intensify the initial contrast by describing the bowl as a special vessel designed for lords and the milk as curdled, probably a type of rich, creamy yogurt that is fit for nobles. While both texts complement each other, there is no feeling of redundancy, and the poetry even tells a slightly different and more profound story with significantly fewer words. Consequently, Hebrew poetry is not a literary embellishment or poetic reformulation of narrative content.

CHARACTERISTICS OF HEBREW POETRY

The reader must recognize the limitations of understanding Hebrew poetry through the lens of modern Bible versions. However, modern translators have an increasing understanding of the workings of Hebrew poetry so that the complexities of the original language are not lost altogether. While it is difficult to translate assonances, the most important aspect of Hebrew poetry—the usage of parallelism—is usually well preserved in modern translations. The following characteristics of Hebrew poetry are mostly based on the modern English translations and provide an adequate panorama to the modern reader of the richness of God’s word in its original language.

Layout in Poetic Lines (Colography)

The oldest complete Hebrew manuscripts of the OT, dated to the tenth century A.D., set the poetic sections into lines of poetry, called cola (plural of colon), by either punctuation or spacing (or both), thus differentiating it from prose. This is called colography. When the text of the Hebrew Bible was vocalized (vowels were added to the words, because written Hebrew originally consisted of only consonants) between the sixth and eleventh centuries A.D. by generations of Jewish scholars called the Masoretes, they used a system of disjunctive accents that mark the boundary of a colon (i.e., a poetic line). However, the accents were not primarily made to differentiate between prose and poetry but to facilitate recitation, and thus, colography serves as only one criterion for determining poetry. Furthermore, the Talmud indicates that in the manuscripts the delimitations of a bicolon (i.e., a verse in poetry consisting of two lines or cola) are indicated by aligning one colon to the right and the other to the left margin of the text, leaving a blank space in between. Most ancient manuscripts follow this layout, and colographic layouts are found in the oldest complete manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible. Ancient translations like the LXX follow this colographic layout of the Hebrew manuscripts, and most modern versions indicate the difference between prose and poetry based on ancient manuscript colography by changing between a justified layout and indented, broken-up lines.

Meter

Meter in Hebrew poetry arranges phonological events in a pattern that repeat themselves in successive lines. The question of meter in Hebrew verse has been a major point of contention among scholars throughout history. The biggest hindrance in determining Hebrew poetic meter is modern ignorance of the original pronunciation of ancient Hebrew, as only consonants were used. Modern theories of meter put emphasis on the similarities between lines, instead of superimposing a metric system that is derived from non-Semitic or modern languages. That does not mean that Hebrew poetry lacks rhythm; parallelism produces a certain rhythm because each colon usually consists of three words and each poetic line usually has two (bicolon), sometimes three (tricolon), and rarely four cola (quadrocolon).

Syntax

The sentence structure of Hebrew poetry is different from that of prose, and it shows a certain terseness or compactness. Poetic lines are shorter and more concise than sentences in prose. Furthermore, poems in the OT outside the Psalms rarely exceed thirty verses, and there are no epic poems in the Hebrew Bible. Transitions between poetic lines often are not expressed and connecting words (conjunctions) are missing. Often there is omission of the verb (i.e., there is no verb in the second line and the action of the verb in the first line is implied). Psalm 49:3 offers a good illustration:

My mouth shall speak wisdom,
And the meditation of my heart shall be understanding. (ESV)

The verb speak from the first line is omitted in the second line but really constitutes the implied action of both parallel lines. Nevertheless, meditation in English does not speak, so translators opt to provide alternatives—in the case above, “shall be.” In Hebrew, however, it does speak because the noun hagut (“meditation”) refers to the audible recitation or uttering of God’s word and thus references “speaking” as well (cf. Pss. 1:2; 143:5).

Parallelism

As mentioned before, the most important feature of Hebrew poetry is parallelism, first identified by Robert Lowth in 1753 in his Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews. His classic definition in his Isaiah: A New Translation with a Preliminary Dissertation and Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory still holds: “The correspondence of one verse, or line with another, I call parallelism.” Lowth initially established three categories for parallelism in Hebrew poetry, which, however, have proven to be limited in scope and somewhat mechanistic.

1. Synonymous parallelism: The second line provides a restatement of the first:

Praise the LORD, all you Gentiles!
Laud Him, all you peoples! (Ps. 117:1; NKJV)

2. Antithetical parallelism: The second line is the opposite of the first:

A wise son makes a glad father,
But a foolish son is the grief of his mother. (Prov. 10:1; NKJV)

3. Synthetic parallelism: The second line completes, complements, or expands the first:

Let him lead me to the banquet hall, and let his banner over me be love. (Song 2:4; NIV)

From this first definition, the concept of parallelism has constantly evolved, and it has become apparent that parallelism in Hebrew poetry is much more complex and can occur on various levels. The result is a more current definition: parallelism is the recurrence of grammatical, lexical, semantic, and phonological aspects in two adjacent lines. Rarely, the recurrence is identical and the correspondence between lines serves not only to equate two lines of Hebrew text but also to enhance, support, or intensify line A through line B. Thus, in the following examples, a range of linguistic features and aspects that constitute parallelism in Hebrew poetry is considered.

4. Word pairs: These are terms that are frequently grouped together. The discovery of Ugaritic poetry (Ugarit or Ras Shamra was an ancient port city in Northern Syria boasting an alphabetic Semitic language containing many similarities to biblical Hebrew) has promoted the study of word pairs in Hebrew poetry, which primarily takes place on a lexical level. Isaiah 1:2 (NIV) says:

Hear me, you heavens!
Listen, earth!

The word pair heavens-earth is used throughout the OT as the predominant descriptor of the created world. It is used to denote either the totality of the created cosmos or the contrasted parts of the cosmos. Word pairs also occur outside of poetic texts, as in Genesis 1 where heaven-earth is used as a merism (two contrasting words referring to a totality) pointing to the cosmological dimension of the Creation account.

5. Grammatical parallelism: This form of parallelism exhibits corresponding syntactic grammatical structures that are rarely identical. In Psalm 6:5 (NKJV), a declaration is set in parallel to a question:

For in death there is no remembrance of You;
In the grave who will give You thanks?

6. Semantic parallelism: The emphasis here is on the meaning of words and can either be paradigmatic (belonging to a certain class, like man and woman) or syntagmatic (creating similar sequential structures) associations of words. Psalm 111:6 (NKJV) says:

He has declared to His people the power of His works,
In giving them the heritage of the nations.

The correspondence between people and nations is paradigmatic in that they belong to the same semantic domain of groups and classes of persons. Nevertheless, the terms are also syntagmatically related, as there is a sequential progression from “His people” (Israel) to the nations, underlining the special election of Israel among the other nations in this verse.

7. Phonetic parallelism: Alliteration (repetition of same or similar consonantal sounds) and assonance (repetition of same or similar vocalic sounds) are the two most common phonetic parallelisms, which, unfortunately, are largely lost in any translation from one language to another. For example, the Hebrew text of Isaiah 22:5a uses a phrase that is full of alliteration and assonance: mehumah—mebusah—mebukah. In an attempt to preserve the original phonetic parallelism, this has been translated as “a day of tumult and trampling and terror” (NIV).

It is evident that there are many ways to activate linguistic equivalence and, with that, parallelism. The concentration or density of these phenomena indicates the presence of a parallelism and, thus, of Hebrew poetry.

Repetition and Recurrence

This poetic device points specifically to the repeated use of words and phrases that can be employed in a variety of ways that go beyond the parallelism of two (bicolon) or three (tricolon) lines. Psalm 122 serves as a good example, as it includes a number of poetic devices that are based on repetition and recurrence.

1. Keywords: The recurrence of the same word or words in the original Hebrew creates a focus on the message of the poem. In Psalm 122, three times “Jerusalem” is mentioned (Ps. 122:2, 3, 6; Heb. yerushalaim) and three times the word “peace” (Ps. 122:6, 7, 8; Heb. shalom), which in Hebrew are both derived from the same root (shlm). This immediately brings the message of Psalm 122 to the forefront, namely, the peace of Jerusalem, which emanates from the temple.

2. Inclusio: A correspondence between the beginning and end of the poem creates a framing device or bookend, which often serves as a thematic framework. The “house of the LORD” in v. 1 and v. 9 frames Psalm 122 and points to its thematic focus.

3. Anaphora: Sequential lines begin with the same word or phrase. Verses 4 and 5 begin with the same Hebrew adverb of place (sham), which creates a movement toward the temple as the pilgrims ascend to Jerusalem, whereas vv. 8 and 9 begin with the conjunction lema'an, which points to the results of what has taken place in the sanctuary.

4. Anadiplosis: This is a rhetorical device in which the last word of the line is repeated as the first word in the next line. Verse 2 ends and verse 3 begins with “Jerusalem”; v. 4a ends and v. 4b begins with “tribes.”

5. Cataphora: These are sequential lines that end with the same word or phrase—e.g., Isaiah 40:13–14, where both verses end with yodi'enu (“he made known to Him”).

6. Immediate repetition: In Isaiah 40:1 the word “comfort” is repeated twice in order to introduce the consolation of Zion in the second part of the book.

7. Refrain: A phrase is repeated at the end of each subdivision. In Psalm 136, the phrase “for His mercy/love [Heb. khesed] endures forever” is repeated twenty-six times at the end of each verse as a liturgically composed antiphonal refrain, most probably sung as a response from the congregation when this psalm was performed.

8. Chiasm: This device involves lines being arranged in a cross-like pattern (ABB'A' or ABCB'A') with correspondence between the outer lines by which a focus on the center is created. A chiasmic structure can even go beyond the boundaries of an individual poem; for example, Psalms 15–24 create a chiasm around the second torah psalm, Psalm 19. This points to the composition of the Psalms as a whole book with complex interconnections between its 150 poems. Chiastic structures are not limited to poetic texts only.

9. Acrostic: In an acrostic poem, each sequential line or stanza begins with the next letter of the Hebrew alphabet. In the most famous acrostic poem, Psalm 119, each stanza consists of eight verses, which each begin with the same letter of the Hebrew alphabet, followed by the next stanza of eight lines with the next letter of the Hebrew alphabet.

Imagery

An integral part of Hebrew poetry is the usage of imagery. In employing imagery, the poet creates a picture in the hearer's (or reader's) mind using a variety of devices, of which simile and metaphor are the most widely represented.

1. Simile: A simile compares one thing to another, and it makes the comparison explicit by using the formula like or as. An example appears in Proverbs 25:25, which states that “cold water to a weary soul” is like good news received from far away.

2. Metaphor: Metaphor is a deliberate form of figurative speech that works on both word and sentence level. A simplified definition of metaphor describes it as an implied comparison.

Hebrew poetry lends itself to imagery because its most prevalent literary device, parallelism, implies comparison between two lines. Psalm 23 describes God as a Shepherd in the first part of the poem and as a royal Host in the second part, whereas v. 4 creates a seam between both metaphors, overlapping both images in adjacent poetic lines in the center of the poem. It is interesting to note that language about God is often metaphorical in nature, pointing to the fact that the unknown reality of the divine is best expressed by way of known and familiar imagery.

POETRY AND WISDOM

Within the body of poetic texts in the OT, wisdom literature takes a prominent place. The principal wisdom books of the Hebrew Bible are Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes. A number of scholars also include Songs of Songs in this group, although there appears to be a lack of explicit concern for wisdom in the poetic book since the word wisdom is not used at all. Beyond these texts, there are a number of wisdom psalms in the Psalms (e.g., Pss. 1; 34; 37; 49; 73; 111; 112) and further passages containing wisdom concepts and ideas throughout the OT (e.g., Gen. 37–50; 1 Sam. 25:2–42; Isa. 26; Amos 3:3–8).

Terminology

The Hebrew word khokmah, which occurs eighteen times in Job, thirty-nine times in Proverbs, and twenty-eight times in Ecclesiastes, represents the lexical term around which wisdom literature is organized in the OT. It can be translated as “wisdom,” “aptitude,” “skill,” “experience,” “good sense,” and a variety of other terms. Further words that relate to wisdom are binah (“understanding”; e.g., Prov. 1:2) and tushiyah (“sound wisdom” or “success”; e.g., Prov. 2:7). Semantically, khokmah does not belong to the realm of theoretical knowledge or philosophy but rather refers to a proper understanding of the basic realities of life and of God’s dealings with humanity and the human role as moral agents. It is often found through observation and analysis and by drawing conclusions that help to understand the social, spiritual, and natural order of the world.

Themes

There is a close connection between “the fear of the LORD” and wisdom as epitomized in Proverbs 1:7: “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge” (cf. Job 28:28; Ps. 111:10; Prov. 9:10; 15:33). Thus, a relationship with Yahweh is the thematic point of departure for wisdom, as much as He is also wisdom’s destination. The intimate correlation between God and wisdom is indicative of its mystery as well as the importance of its pursuit as a lifelong endeavor, in which choices are governed by divine perspectives. However, further themes of wisdom touch on all spheres of life.

Prosperity and suffering constitute a second grand theme of wisdom literature, touching on the question of theodicy (i.e., divine goodness and the existence of evil) and the fallacies of a rigid and unnuanced retribution theology (Job; cf. Ps. 73; Eccl. 7:15).

A third major theme of wisdom poetry can be found in the evaluation of human conduct and moral action. The first chapters of Proverbs lay out the ideals of human conduct by means of an instructional father-son conversation (Prov. 1–9), culminating with the personification of wisdom in Proverbs 8 where it is related to Creation (Prov. 8:22–31).

Historical and Social Context

Considering the date and authorship of the three principal wisdom books, it becomes apparent that wisdom sayings constituted an early element in the oral and literary traditions of the ANE and Israel itself. Moses's authorship of the book of Job can be established on various grounds, and Ellen White connects its writing to the forty years that Moses spent in the Midian desert during the first half of the fifteenth century B.C., before leading the Israelites out of Egypt (ST, February 19, 1880, Art. A, par. 14). His early education in Egypt brought him into close contact with Egyptian wisdom literature and concepts of wisdom (e.g., the cosmological principle of ma'at—representing truth and world order), which date as far back as the third millennium B.C. Furthermore, wisdom literature in Egypt was closely connected to the royal court, which is also reflected in the Solomonic authorship of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. A major portion of the Instruction of Amenemopet, an Egyptian wisdom text with didactic features dating to 1150 B.C., has parallels in Proverbs 22:17–24:34 (see Proverbs: Introduction), and Solomon's connections to Egypt through his marriage to a daughter of the pharaoh (1 Kin. 3:1) are evident in literature and history. A number of Mesopotamian wisdom works have been connected to the theme of theodicy in Job, like the Old Babylonian Poem of the Righteous Sufferer, dated 1500–1200 B.C. However, as in all matters of comparison, one has to carefully evaluate similarities and differences and not assume immediately that the biblical documents were influenced by the extrabiblical ones. In Hebrew culture, wisdom was used to instruct royalty (Dan. 1:4), judges (1 Kin. 3:28), teachers/sages (Jer. 18:18), and children (Prov. 1:8), moving far beyond the royal court.

Literary Forms

Wisdom poetry in the OT employs a variety of literary forms to communicate its instructions.

1. Sayings: The Hebrew term mashal (“saying”) is the technical term for a proverb or wisdom saying.

2. Admonition: An admonition can appear as a command (Prov. 16:3) or as a prohibition (Prov. 30:10).

3. Numerical saying: This usually follows a numerical pattern (Prov. 30:18–19) reminiscent of a riddle that, once resolved, provides a benefit to the person who solved it (cf. Judg. 14:14). The numerical saying seems to suggest that there are more cases than those listed, motivating the reader to look for them.

4. Rhetorical question: Such a question has an implied and obvious answer (Prov. 30:4).

5. Exhortation: This occurs often in the context of parental instruction and tends to be more extensive (Prov. 1:8–19).

6. Personification: Wisdom is personified as in the woman Wisdom and woman Folly of Proverbs 1–9.

7. Dialogue: A dialogue states and counterstates the human conceptions of wisdom and theodicy, eventually with correction by the wisdom of God Himself (Job 3–41).

8. Parable, fable, allegory: These literary devices often take on narrative forms to communicate wisdom truths (2 Sam. 12; Prov. 7:6–27).

THEOLOGICAL DIMENSION OF HEBREW POETRY

Hebrew poetry, in both its distribution and preeminence throughout the OT, represents more than an artistic embellishment of prose. The four major poems of the Pentateuch may be taken as an example: Genesis 49 (Jacob's blessing), Exodus 15 (Song of the Sea), Numbers 23–24 (Balaam's oracles), and Deuteronomy 32–33 (Song of Moses). The intriguing change from prose to poetry in these four sections has been noted and often interpreted from a critical perspective, identifying the poetic passages as interpolations, glosses, or later additions. However, an increasing number of interpreters recognize the strategic position of these poetic passages and their linguistic integration into the overall literary macrostructure of the Pentateuch. It can be shown that they form an essential building block in the microstructure of their respective books and the macrostructure of the overall Pentateuch. (For a more detailed discussion of the role of these passages in the overall structure of the Pentateuch, see "Introduction to the Pentateuch," p. 120.)

Scholars have noted that holiness and solemnity are often expressed through poetry. What is particularly holy and solemn in the OT is expressed in poetry. The Psalms, which, like the Pentateuch, are structured into five books, continuously recount God's actions in history (Creation, Exodus, and conquest), again with eschatological and messianic overtones throughout. Hebrew poetry, through parallelism and all its other literary devices, accomplishes what prose at times is not able to achieve: a heightening of the message. Thus, some of the most important themes in the OT are written in Hebrew poetry.

The fact that the central messages were preserved in poetry also point to the divine concern for the wide distribution of the message. It was shared with the people through the reading of the poetic portions of the OT. The terseness or compactness of poetry as well as the repetition of ideas, sounds, and words made it easier for the listeners to memorize the divine instruction and to pass it on to their children. Poetry facilitated the didactic role of priests, prophets, teachers, and parents as they made sure that the new generations would never forget God's wondrous acts of love toward His people.

JOB

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Though the book of Job pays no specific attention to authorial claims, many students of the book have long claimed that it is the work of Moses, considered to be author of the Bible's founding documents. There is ample reason to associate the book with Moses, as it seems to belong to the earliest stages of biblical composition. That Job names no author is normal rather than exceptional since many nonprophetic books have no explicitly named author. Only three of them (Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon) are identified as a specific writer's work. Whether in the Hebrew Bible (MT), the LXX, or the modern versions, the book of Job is named after its great protagonist whose name occurs fifty-six times in the book, from the story's very first verse to its very last (1:1; 42:17).

Date. Proposed dates of composition range across a span of more than a millennium, from the second millennium B.C. to the times of the postexilic temple. Despite competing recommendations, internal evidence supports an early date for the setting of the story: the fact that Job offered his own sacrifices implies that the priesthood had not yet been established and the temple/tabernacle had not been built (1:5); his possessions were measured in terms of sheep, camels, oxen, donkeys, and servants (1:3), similar to what we find in the case of Abraham (Gen. 12:16); and Job's life span of 140 years fits very well with what was common during the patriarchal period (42:16). The story was a very old one. It may have been transmitted in oral form for many years before it was written down.

Backgrounds. Job's backstory is the long-standing human discomfort with suffering in general, but particularly, with the suffering of the innocent—innocent oxen, donkeys, sheep, camels, servants, children, but particularly, the righteous innocent, the servant of Yahweh named Job. The book rolls back a veil to grant to humans some insight into the workings of the Great Controversy between good and evil. Geographically speaking, the events took place in the land of Uz. In the Bible, this term is used five times as a personal name and three times as a territorial location. Jeremiah's Uz, like the land of the Philistines, was a place of foreign people (Jer. 25:20), the Edomites, according to Lamentations 4:21. The Bible's first Uz was Semitic (Gen. 10:23). Another, Uz the son of Dishan, resided in Seir (Gen. 36:28), which the Edomites later took over from the Horites. The land of Uz may have been named after him, just as the land of Israel came to be named after a man named Israel.

Theology and Purpose. Integrity is the book's major focus, whether the speakers are young or old, male or female, human or supernatural, Machiavellian or benevolent. Despite its clear focus on one individual named Job, the book really discusses the integrity of all of God's intelligent creation. In it, God's adversary argues that the relationship between God and His people is not based on disinterested love and that, therefore, it lacks integrity. The adversary's role is highly significant both to the book of Job and to the scriptural theme of the cosmic war between good and evil. The book of Job is one of the Bible's most explicit exposés of the adversary's character and role.

1. Relationship between God and the Adversary. Some have claimed that the prologue, specifically Job 1:6—2:7, shows God cooperating with the adversary, Satan, rather than being hostile toward him. Satan (satan), they say, was actually God's employee, His prosecuting attorney, and should not be thought of as the origin or cause of evil. The subject of Satan as God's adversary, particularly in early OT times, continues to require the attention of Bible students.

Those who think that Israel was influenced by Zoroastrianism, the Persian religion, point to the difference between 1 Chronicles 21:1 and 2 Samuel 24:1. The difference, they say, proves that dualism—the conflict between two powers—became part of Jewish thinking in the sixth century B.C. after the Persians conquered the Babylonian Empire. First Chronicles, accepted as postexilic, shows Satan doing what preexilic 2 Samuel attributes to God. In 1 Chronicles, Satan tempts David to do what God is said to push him to do in 2 Samuel. Certain scholars claim that this is evidence that before the Exile Israel knew of no conflict between Yahweh and a personal archenemy called Satan (see “Satan and David,” p. 536).

Sixth and fifth century B.C. biblical books, however, provide the strongest challenge to the theory of Zoroastrian influence because the ones expected to show the most influence are the ones that lack evidence of any such influence. Postexilic historical works like Nehemiah, Ezra, and Esther do not exhibit dualistic sentiments. Zechariah’s third chapter is the only postexilic prophetic material that makes any reference to Satan. Even intertestamental Qumran texts depicting a confrontation between sons of light and darkness, between the Prince of Light and the Angel of Darkness, do not use Satan as a personal name.

Extrabiblical texts, even those as old as the oldest Zoroastrian material, may or may not help with dating the book of Job. And comparative linguistics may not help either, because few, if any, cognate occurrences of the Hebrew term satan appear among ancient Semitic languages. This, as much as anything else, shows how distinctive the Bible’s theological insights are in relation to the books and religious ideas of its time and environment. When specifically exposed, in comparison with other biblical adversaries, Satan is seen to be both malicious and secretive, a mystery to many a reader and interpreter.

2. The Role of Satan/Adversary. The book of Job calls the one who opposes God and Job “Satan/the adversary.” While this Hebrew term is used in various places in the OT (e.g., 1 Sam. 29:4; 1 Kin. 11:14, 23), the use of the definite article here (hassatan) makes him “the Satan,” entitling him more than any other being to be called Satan. Four things in Job’s prologue that most promptly identify him are (1) his name hassatan; (2) those whom he opposed, that is, Yahweh and people like Job whom God wanted to protect—such as Joshua the high priest (Zech. 3:1, 2); (3) an account of his viciousness (i.e., his unwarranted and destructive assaults on animals and humans); and (4) his callous presumption in his return to argue that God cheated by protecting Job. But the one who had arbitrarily destroyed Job’s animals, servants, and children seems hardly qualified to discuss fairness. His presence is also found in the speeches of Job’s friends and specifically introduced by Eliphaz during his first speech (4:12–16). He tells about his experience of a supernatural revelation, accepted by his other friends, received through the visit of a spiritual being. The content of this revelation contradicts the content of the voice of God in the prologue and the epilogue and aligns this spirit with the adversary of the prologue (see “The Vision/Dream of Eliphaz,” p. 630).

Passages in the NT, including 1 Peter 5:8, Revelation 12:9, and 20:2, leave little doubt about who Satan is or what he does. He is the devil, the ancient serpent, accuser of God’s people, the beginner and chief agent of trouble in the universe and misery on earth. Job’s Satan is simply the proper name and identification for the trouble-making serpent in Genesis. Zechariah’s Satan is readily recognizable because of Job. And his identification in the NT as the great adversary of heaven (Rev. 12:7–9) makes it more appropriate to wonder how he hides so well in OT times, instead of arguing that he was not present there at all. In short, it may be misleading to speak of Satan as unknown in or absent from either pre- or postexilic OT Scriptures.

3. Origin of the Conflict. The message of Scripture is that Adam and Eve originally lived in a flawless world, which only became subject to corruption through their yielding to temptation and the lie of the serpent. Romans 5:12 teaches that their sin in heeding his invitation brought death to earth, as evidenced in all forms of its material decay. God’s own words directly link earth’s physical and humanity’s spiritual degradation to that same tragic error (Gen. 3:14–24). In passages such as Isaiah 14 and Ezekiel 28, the Bible also gives the backstory on Satan as the force for ill that led humanity into rebellion against God (Gen. 3:1–6; see “Evil and the Fallen Cherub,” p. 1008). It is essential that we recognize the evil one for who God in Scripture tells us he is in order to have a proper understanding of why sin exists, how it came to earth, and why God is doing what He is to rid the universe of it. Moreover, in the context of the book of Job, it is indispensable for a balanced reading of the book and for beginning any biblically based Christian theodicy.

It is very difficult to exaggerate the value of the book of Job's contribution to understanding the Great Controversy between good and evil through its exposé of a personal Satan.

Without proper understanding of Satan's boldness and callous brilliance, great enough to challenge the Lord in His own court and viciously attack His creatures, many people have awkwardly charged God with Satan's actions and developed theologies that justify their thinking. These ideas tend to obscure the biblical truth that Satan is specifically responsible for all the pain and suffering in God's universe. God's punishments, Jesus's death, the sacrificial system that points to it, the process of sanctification and character development—none of this would ever have been necessary without Satan's rebellion against divine government and all the moral and physical dislocation that it introduced.

4. God's Victory and Job's Vindication. By exposing the truth about Satan, and the consequence of his way of thinking, the book of Job leaves the believer in no doubt as to the outcome of the conflict between the Lord and His enemy. At no point in the drama is God ever sympathetic to Satan's evil scheme for depriving an innocent man of life and limb. He knew from the beginning of the trial that Satan's aim with regard to Job was to have Job curse God (1:11; 2:4–5). He was not beguiled by Satan's claim to be searching for integrity. At the end of Job's trial, a God of love and fairness could do no less than restore all things to their divine order of blessedness. Job's experience wonderfully pictures the final triumph of the saints of the Most High who will receive the kingdom, dominion, and greatness of all the kingdoms in the world at the end of their trial, humiliation, and abuse at the hands of the little horn power (Dan. 7:27). There may be no cross of Calvary or lake of fire in the book of Job. But Satan's head is still crushed through the defeat of his ideas and the silencing of his arguments. And just as God will crown His saints at the end, so it is right for Him to acknowledge the faithfulness of His good and faithful servant.

Job certainly defends his integrity and loyalty to God in the midst of his trial and even speaks strong words concerning the way he perceived God was treating him. For a man who knows God very well, his deep suffering is not comprehensible unless he postulates that God is now, for reasons unknown to him, treating him like an enemy. While his friends speak about who God is and how he governs His creation, Job speaks not about God in Himself but about how God is relating to Job in his present situation. Just as Job's material possessions were not at first a divine bribe, so his material restoration in the end is not represented as a reward for piety though it may also be rewarding. It was, in the first instance, simply evidence that his trial was over. Job's restoration was simple evidence of God's mercy and justice. He was finally and completely vindicated and restored. Any reward element in God's final affirmation of Job was no less or more a function of divine grace than it will be for all the saints at the end of time (Rev. 22:12). James refers to the blessedness of those who endure testing; they will receive the "crown of life" that the Lord has promised to those who love Him (James 1:12). Job's complete vindication and restoration at the end of the story is an appropriate metaphor for the final reward of the saints who, having come through great tribulation and gained victory over the beast and his image, will be crowned with glory and honor. For them as well as for Job serving God is determined by their experience of God's grace that moves them to love Him without regard for their present trials.

5. Suffering and Hope. By appreciating God's sustaining grace, we may better appreciate the critical theological purpose of the book of Job, the book of books on suffering. That purpose would be to (a) demonstrate the utter injustice of some suffering; (b) expose the malevolent supernatural agent behind such pain; (c) highlight God's categorical opposition to the person and activities of that agent; (d) show the complexity of the issues involved, to counter inaccurate theological presuppositions; and (e) point forward to the triumph guaranteed even to those unjustly tormented and tortured because the God they insist on trusting will prove Himself worthy of their trust.

Job's existence is framed within a state of constant hope. It is clear that for him hope did not come from human sources; his friends did not offer it to him but instead gave him hopelessness in the form of guilt. And the Lord would remind him that he should never hope to defeat Leviathan by himself (41:9). Although losing everything brought Job close to losing hope, he never got to that point. Instead he fell to the ground and worshiped (1:20). When the misery of his life of sickness was intense, he wished to not have been born and simply waited for death (3:21); there was no attempt on his part to bring his life to an end. He resisted death as a final solution because to embrace it was to abandon hope (17:15). He knew very well that suffering could destroy hope in the Lord (14:19) and agreed with his friends that there was no hope for the wicked (27:7–8). But Job's emphasis on his integrity was nurtured by hope. Eliphaz understood this and tried to destroy hope when he asked Job whether his fear of God was his confidence and his honesty his hope (4:6). These provided grounds for his hope. While his friends would continue to tell Job that his only hope was in confessing his sin (8:13; 11:18, 20), Job would insist on his integrity even though he recognized that there was no immediate hope of healing for him (7:6).

For Job, hope was certainly stronger than his sufferings, though he did not deny the intensity of his pain. When he concluded that God was treating him like His enemy, he confessed that there was no hope for him (19:10). He was persuaded that God was somehow involved in what he was going through and anxiously looked forward to his vindication. He firmly stated that even if God were to kill him, he would still trust (i.e., wait, hope for) Him (13:15). He knew the Lord, and therefore he could trust Him and wait for His intervention (14:14–15). This was a strong affirmation of hope in the Lord in the midst of intense suffering. But he would go further than that. His hope for restoration looked beyond the grave to the resurrection (19:25–27). Job may have concluded that his condition would take him to the grave, but he was ready to take his hope with him, anticipating with great yearning that his body would be restored and he would see his Redeemer. He would then vindicate him. In a book where human pain is extremely intense, we find a hope that holds on to God and looks forward to a final restoration beyond the grave through the resurrecting power of the Redeemer.

COMMENTARY

1:1–2:13

THE PROLOGUE: JOB'S INITIAL TESTING

Job 1:1–2:13 introduces the patriarch Job as well as all principal characters of the book except Elihu. The material is organized in scenes that took place on earth (1:1–5, 13–22; 2:7–13) and scenes that occurred in the heavenly realm (1:6–12; 2:1–6). There is a historical setting at the beginning of the prologue (1:1–5) and one at its end (2:11–13), and we find sandwiched between the two dialogues that contribute to the development of the narrative. The prologue basically consists of two trials.

1:1–22

Job's First Trial

The prologue consists of a double challenge from Satan against God's character and against the integrity of Job. These challenges set the stage for what follows in the book. Chapter 1 introduces the first trial, about which Job did not know anything, and concludes with Job's first response to his experience of pain.

1:1–5. Job Introduced. Verses 1–3 provide a description of the character and social status of Job. The introduction includes four elements that will be reprised in reverse order at the end of the book: character, children, possessions, and status. Job is introduced as a wealthy person, listing first his spiritual wealth, followed by the richness of having a family, and finally, a list of all his material possessions. Job feared God and shunned evil. He was tam and yashar. The term tam—rendered variously as “blameless,” “complete,” or “perfect”—highlights his reliance on God for his righteousness. It expresses the ideas of completeness and flawlessness and is used to describe the paschal lamb (Ex. 12:5) and every burnt offering, peace or fellowship offering, and sin offering brought to the Lord (e.g., Lev. 1:3; 3:6; 4:23). These offerings were a type of Jesus, the spotless Lamb of God “who takes away sin of the world” (John 1:29). Only through His perfectly flawless offering on our behalf can we ever be made right with God. Job was also a yashar—“right” or “upright”—person, meaning that he acted according to moral principles when dealing with others. He feared the Lord in the sense of respecting and reverencing Him, greatly valuing his relationship with Him. Consequently, he avoided sin by not exposing himself to it—rather, he walked away from it.

His piety found expression in his concern for the spiritual life of his children (vv. 4–5). The incident demonstrates that the description of his character is not without foundation. His intercession and solicitude for his children's spiritual state was as customary as their parties. Verse 5 comments on the integrity of v. 1 and shows that Job's righteousness was a commitment to the salvation of others, not a holier-than-thou self-centeredness. Also, Job's humble, obedient offering of sacrifice expressed his faith in a substitutionary atonement.

1:6–12. God's Court and Cosmic Conflict.

This new scene took place in the divine assembly. Other OT divine council scenes include Micaiah's vision in 1 Kings 22:19 and Psalm 82:1. In v. 6, it is indicated that Satan joined them (lit. "the Satan also came"). The use of the definite article identifies him as the archetypal adversary, as is also the case in Zechariah 3. The text gives triple markers on Satan as an intruder through the conjunction "and," the adverb "also," and the prepositional phrase "among them" or "with them" as follows: the court assembled, and Satan also came among them. His place of activity and concern was the earth, where he was apparently observing how God interacted with humans, in this case with Job. No reason is given for Satan's presence in the heavenly assembly, but he was not there to speak on behalf of human beings or to testify on behalf of God's integrity.

When given the opportunity to speak, Satan accused God of feeding selfishness in his creatures by rewarding good behavior—or rather by paying for it. Satan was suggesting that God's way of governing simply bought the services of humans. God's people knew that as long as they served Him, God would keep providing for them. Therefore, their love for Him was not pure but motivated by greed that was fed by God Himself. For Satan, God and Job were not honorable but self-serving. Each reinforced the other's pretense of goodness by paying for it. God paid Job with extravagant bounties, and Job paid Him back with apparent piety. If God would stop buying human service, the true character of humans would be manifested by rejecting Him (when the text mentions "curse," it literally says that "he will surely bless you," which is a delicate and codified way of saying "curse" [see 1 Kin. 21:10, 13]). In the mouth of Satan, the demand that God stretch out His hand (v. 11) implied that havoc and chaos would come from the Lord since "hand" refers to power. Though it was never humanly apparent, and though one reporting servant spoke of destruction by the "fire of God" from heaven (v. 16), God's words showed that it was Satan, not God, who was the source and means of Job's torture.

1:13–22. Satan's First Blows: Four Disasters and Job's Response. Horror built up to its climax. Job was not allowed to recover as the rhythm went from lesser to greater, from lesser sorrow to most unbearable grief. The pattern was up, down, up, seesaw—first oxen and donkeys, numbered in the hundreds (vv. 14–15), then sheep (7,000; v. 16), followed by camels (3,000; v. 17). The rhythm also comments on the fluctuation and instability of Job's emotions and his total devastation at the climax. Reports that began with loss of oxen and donkeys, creating an element of suspense, reached their climax of pain with the death of all of Job's children (v. 19). Job prostrated himself but did not curse God. He knew that God was sovereign and transcendent, and he granted Him the freedom to do as He willed (vv. 20–22). No human is capable of knowing on his or her own the difference between Satan's direct initiatives and God's; neither was Job. The narrator's comment addresses Satan's claim: Satan's view was found wanting.

2:1–12

Job's Second Trial

The first trial was introduced by an earthly scene (1:1–5); the second trial began after an earthly scene (1:13–22) and would conclude with occurrences on earth (2:7–10). Job was victorious in both trials.

2:1–6. The Heavenly Court: Presumption's Persistence. This time the Lord rebuked Satan (vv. 1–3), whose charge was baseless. Whereupon Satan relaunched his challenge (vv. 4–5), wishing this time to damage Job's body ("skin for skin"). People will give everything they have to stay alive. Satan sought to make the case that grave sickness, perhaps perceived as a mortal threat, would be sufficient to expose Job's insincerity and separate him from his God. This presented God with a dilemma: if He denied the evil one access to His faithful children, they and He might be easily accused of collusion in bribery, with saints being paid off to be good. Providence is the natural function of His love, as well as His paternal duty. Allowing the adversary to torment His children would require Him to take the blame for whatever cruelties would result from the adversary's aggression. Nevertheless, God made clear that Job's pain was inflicted by a hand other than His.

2:7–10. Satan's Second Series: Sores and Spouse. Satan is plainly named as the agent of the cruelty inflicted on Job. The humiliating and painful condition of the patriarch is such that it provoked in Mrs. Job an outburst (v. 9), a comprehensible frustration, from one who had at this point lost as much as her husband had and was ready to give vent to her feelings, unaware of the cosmic import of her words. Her cry and its moral echoes bring to mind James's comment that whoever does not stumble in speech is perfect in being able to control his or her whole body (James 3:2). Her words came unquestionably from a heart that loved much.

Job's reaction (v. 10a, b) was not because he was any more aware than his wife of the supernatural goings on. Rather, as much as anything else, it was a shaming of the accuser and a vindication of God's confidence in His servant. Mrs. Job apparently reasoned that life with God should consist of nothing but prosperity. Her husband judged her comment as born of folly rather than wisdom. Job spoke here according to the value system of biblical wisdom that ranges mostly from what is wise to what is foolish. Job's wife echoed Satan's taunts, and they were decried as folly. The fact that Job referred to her comment as being one that was like the "foolish" women, not that she was a foolish woman, implies that she was speaking out of character. Her silence suggests that she received Job's rebuke well.

2:10c–12. Verdict on Job and the Arrival of His Friends. As with 1:22, the narrator's comment reflects negatively on Satan's claim that Job would sin with his lips if God removed His hedge. Job was willing to administer for the Lord not only the good things He gave him but also the pain and suffering that had come his way. His relationship with the Lord was based on disinterested love. Then friends arrived. Their names and places of origin showed that the friends were true friends. Their coming was a statement of emotional connection with and affection for Job. Their first reactions demonstrated this emotional connection: their mourning rituals expressed more than mere cultural conformity. They expressed shock. And it was not merely disfigurement that made Job unrecognizable. It was because the greatest of the men of the east who had once lived like a king among his troops (29:25) now sat on an ash heap.

3:1—37:24

DIALOGUE: JOB AND HIS COUNSELORS

The main portion of the book is a dialogue or debate that seeks to explore the significance of Job's experience. It is introduced by Job's soliloquy (3:1–26) and then followed by three cycles of speeches (4:1–14:22; 15:1–21:34; 22:1–27:23). At the end of the dialogue there is a hymn to wisdom (28:1–28), after which we listen to Job's final speech (29:1–31:40). Then we encounter the final human speech, that of Elihu (32:1–37:24). In the book, the human dialogue ultimately sets the stage for God's intervention.

3:1–26

Job's Opening Soliloquy

In this personal reflection Job opened up his heart to his friends (and to the readers), sharing with us the intensity of his physical and emotional pain. He longed for oblivion (vv. 1–10) and saw death at birth as better than his present sufferings (vv. 11–26).

3:1–10. Longing for Oblivion. Job's speech began with a curse, not upon the God who gives and takes away but against the day he was born. Job sighed for the day of his birth to disappear into its original nothingness—to be erased from the calendar. His unrealistic longing for reversal (v. 7) indicates the depth of his frustration with existence. If his birthdate could not be erased from the calendar, then it should be a night of no deliveries; if none of its births count, Job would never have been—and he would not now be suffering. In Job's speaking of the night as mother of the day, we see an echo of the Genesis order in which evening preceded morning.

3:11–26. Death Idealized. Job lamented that he was not stillborn (vv. 11–12), and he coveted death's serenity. He knew that it is an oblivion where there are no varying levels of human status: the righteous, wicked, slave, free, wealthy rulers, and weary laborers are all equal. By contrast with the peace of death, life in the midst of suffering is both burdensome and inexorable (vv. 20–26). Although Job would have welcomed death, there is no indication that he ever considered ending his life by his own hand.

4:1—14:22

First Cycle of Speeches

The first cycle is formed by the speeches of the friends and Job's response to each one of them: Eliphaz (4:1–5:27) and Job (6:1–7:21); Bildad (8:1–22) and Job (9:1–10:22); Zophar (11:1–22) and Job (12:1–14:22).

4:1—5:27. Eliphaz's Logic and Deceptive Revelation. Eliphaz's opening (4:1–5) was cautious but accusing. He seemed conflicted—apparently sensitive to Job's distress but uncomfortable about what he labeled Job's impatience. Since Job had helped others through such times as this, he should have been able to handle it himself. Verses 6–11 already betray his critical spirit. The implicit answer to his rhetorical questions (4:7) is “no one.” For Eliphaz, Job may not necessarily have been doomed, but if he were, he had earned it. The revelatory experience of Eliphaz (4:12–21) appears to play an important role in the views of Job's friends (see below, “The Vision/Dream of Eliphaz”). The account never clarifies whether Eliphaz received a dream or a vision, nor from whence or when it came. The message of the spirit who communicated with him began with a rhetorical question about the possibility of humans being more righteous than God. The question can also be translated “be righteous before” or be considered righteous “by God.” The translation “more” righteous than God makes no sense in the context because Job never argued for such a view. The spirit was not speaking about a mortal being ('enosh, “man,” “human being”), for in the following part of the verse geber (“man”) is used—a term that usually refers to a person who is in a proper relationship with God. Job claimed to be such a geber/man or righteous person (3:23; 16:21), and God also affirmed it (40:7), but the friends rejected Job's claim (15:7–10; 34:7). The question is not about sinful human beings but about a radical divine transcendence and the human condition. In this passage the verb “to be righteous” (tsadaq) stands in parallel with the verb taher (“to be regarded as clean, pure”) and expresses the idea of moral purity. The spirit argued that all creatures are by divine design imperfect and unable to be blameless before God. This contradicts what God indicated in the prologue to the book. Besides, it is difficult to see how Eliphaz could reconcile 4:7–8 with a God who distrusts His angels (4:18) and particularly despises His human creation—those who dwell in houses of clay (4:19). While his account of the revelation is meant to urge Job to humble himself before God (5:8), it is difficult to see where he would situate himself within such a characterization of all humanity.

The Vision/Dream of Eliphaz

From Job 4:12 onward, the entire dialogue between Job and his friends hinges on, circles around, and eventually climaxes—at least for the three friends—on the story of Eliphaz's numinous experience narrated in 4:12–21. A discussion of the impact and nature of this experience will be helpful.

1. A Personal Revelatory Experience. There are a couple of important aspects in the experience of Eliphaz that we should notice. First, he argued that the trustworthiness of his wisdom is unquestionable because it was grounded on a personal supernatural experience he had with a spiritual being who spoke to him. The revelation given to Eliphaz came from a spiritual being. Second, the identity of the spirit whose voice he heard is never stated; it remains shrouded in mystery. He heard a voice from someone that remained faceless, nameless. Elijah also heard a voice but he identified it as the voice of the Lord (1 Kin. 19:12–15). The content of the revelation will establish the identity of this being.

2. The Question. The message the spirit delivered to Eliphaz was introduced by a rhetorical question: Can a man ['enosh; not “a mortal”] be more righteous [tsadaq] before/by/than God? Can a man [geber] be more pure [taher] before/than his Maker? The expected answer is no. To be righteous (tsadaq) here means to be blameless or pure, for it is in parallel to taher (“to be regarded as pure”), suggesting that this is about being perfect or morally pure before God (see 9:2). The Creator and the creature are being contrasted: Can a human be considered to be righteous/pure and morally upright before/by the Lord? According to the spirit that spoke to Eliphaz, the natural distance between God and humans is such that this is impossible. The spirit applied this judgment even to heavenly beings: God does not even trust His heavenly messengers, the angels, and considers them to be imperfect (v. 18). This is the natural condition of their existence and of humans in particular, for they were made of clay—fragile and ephemeral beings who are here today and gone tomorrow and no one seems to notice. Consequently, suffering is the natural condition of humans as created by God. All humans suffer, and Job is no exception. The discussion is not about the need for justification by faith.

3. The Identity of the Spirit. Based on the previous discussion, we suggest that Eliphaz is echoing the voice of the adversary from the prologue. First, while Satan claimed there that it was impossible for a human being to be righteous before the Lord unless prompted by selfish motives (1:9), God identified for him a human being who was blameless and upright and who feared Him—Job (v. 8). The spirit that spoke to Eliphaz was contradicting what God revealed to the reader in the prologue to the book concerning Job. Second, it also contradicted God by arguing that humans suffer by divine design. The prologue demonstrates that human suffering finds its origin not in the Creator but in the adversary/Satan. Third, it is clear that the message of the spirit projects a low view of humanity before God that contrasts with other biblical pictures of humanity as created in the image of God for dominion over all creation (Gen. 1:26–29), a view that is still highly esteemed even after Eden’s moral fall (Ps. 8). Although Eliphaz did not say anything about the nature of the spirit that spoke to him, we can now ascertain without doubt that it was a messenger of the adversary.

4. Influence of the Revelation and God’s Reaction. Continuing the dialogue, Eliphaz’s second speech insisted on the truthfulness of the content of his revelatory experience (15:14–16), an insistence that appears again at the start of his final intervention (22:2–3). Zophar’s first speech alluded to this revelation (11:2–3). Bildad, the second friend, never accepted this perspective until his brief third speech, which is a total surrender to the revelation that Eliphaz first reported (25:4–6). There he virtually repeated the falsehood, signaling the dialogue’s total collapse, and the cycles end. Whether under strong delusion or, in Bildad’s case, having apparently given up on rational argument, all three friends end up subscribing to and advocating a word about God that is false and allegedly based on revelation. But the voice of God that initiated the book will also be heard at the end, addressing the false revelation introduced in the dialogue. The epilogue shows that this sustained distortion of God’s character left Him angry—not merely concerned, or disturbed, or offended, but furiously angry (42:7). God revealed that only their penitence and Job’s intercession stood between them and unseemly treatment from God Himself (v. 8).

5. Job’s Resoluteness. Initial attacks on Job’s material wealth of herds, flocks, and servants, and even the unthinkable loss of all his children in a single blow, all failed to reduce him to blasphemy. Disease that made Job repugnant to family (19:17), as well as scorned and loathed by acquaintances (19:13–19; 30:9–10), also failed to accomplish the enemy’s purpose. The dialogue then reveals the enemy reverting to the tactic of obscurity employed in chapter 1. There the mischief of an unseen but lethal hand led servants to blame God’s fire for destruction of thousands of sheep and servants (1:16). Eliphaz’s statement shows that the adversary, though unseen, continues to be present and to prosecute his goal of pressing Job to curse God. Eliphaz’s revelation devalued humans and advanced a slander of God calculated to move Job to abandon his claim of integrity. But the strategy of a lying spirit is no more successful than that of widespread havoc in convincing faithful Job that God is not worth his confidence. Lying spirits work with those who choose to be deceived. Job does not so choose.

The verses that frame Eliphaz’s fantastic revelation (4:7; 5:1) each include an imperative and a rhetorical question whose implied answer is “no one.” Job 5:1 records an imperative, designed to point out Job’s desperate need of repentance; but initially, at least, it was a command of somewhat harsh import. Just as Eliphaz had asserted that there was no innocent suffering, so now there was no “holy one” (probably angel) who could help Job in his physical or moral distress, perhaps emphasizing that only God could help (5:8). Verses 2–7 emphasize his point regarding human inadequacy. Note that labels for the culpable one, such as foolish and simple (5:2), are typical of wisdom literature. Observe as well the vigor of Eliphaz's opposition to those he labeled. At least eighteen verses of this speech depend on his subjective authority versus only three (vv. 2, 6, 7) where the truth of his words did not depend on the speaker.

Eliphaz was in a sense correct in affirming that human beings were "born to trouble" (v. 7); but if the natural lot of humanity were trouble, how could he argue that Job's trouble was the proof of specific wickedness? But then in 5:8–16, Eliphaz proffered an exceptional change in tone after his categorical denunciations. Job might yet have hope. He should turn to God because God is powerful beyond human understanding. He rules nature and is able to reverse anyone's circumstances. In an opening speech that had included reproof, revelation, and harsh contempt, Eliphaz moved on to soothing consolation in 5:17–27. Problematic for the whole was not the general truth of divine chastening but his specific judgment that God was punishing Job (5:13–14, 17–19).

6:1—7:21. Job: Pity for Himself, Dismay at His Friends. Frequently through the dialogue, Job longed to know he was appreciated. Though he could refuse unpalatable food, going through his recent experience was like being forced to consume a totally unsavory meal. Living in uninterrupted agony, Job insisted that he had been faithful to God. But Job was not superhuman (6:11–13). He saw no sense in going on; staying alive was to suffer. Here (6:14) is the only occurrence of the expression "the fear of the Almighty" in Job, paralleled by "the fear of the Lord" in 28:28, itself unique. Job believed the loyalty of friends should survive spiritual crises.

The reference to the brooks and streams (6:15) expresses Job's dismay at the treachery of his friends (6:14–21). In the spring, wadis in the Middle East were flooded with water from periodic rains. They dried up in the heat of summer. Desert travelers made hopeful by the evidence of waterways were disappointed to find the gullies entirely dry (vv. 16–19). Job's friends had treacherously disappointed him in their pretense of refreshing his spirit. Verse 20 is evidently descriptive of Job's own feelings as a parallel to those of the travelers; Job refers to his friends' attitude with the similar verbs bosh—"to be ashamed" or "distress" or "disappoint"—and khaper—"to be ashamed" or "to be confounded." The first phrase of v. 21 has been rendered variously as "you are nothing," "you are it," or (interpretively) "you have proved to be no help" (i.e., you are just like those dried up wadis whose water evaporates in the heat; you cower before a challenge).

Job dared them to silence him if they could (6:22–30), becoming more assertive in his challenge to his friends to show him his wrong. They should simply speak the truth rather than try to cajole or coerce. They could not constrain him to make any deals since he owed none of them anything. By referring to the words of desperate people such as himself as "wind" (v. 26), Job preempted any rebuke for irresponsible language, justifying whatever came from his lips as he vented his frustrations. He would welcome no reprimand on that account. The friends also lacked integrity; they were willing to cause the fatherless to nepal—a word which has the basic meaning of "fall." Accordingly, some translations refer to the attack, overwhelming, or fall of the fatherless. The word can also mean "cast lots"—"cause the lot to fall" (i.e., "roll dice" or gamble)—for society's most helpless (v. 27). Job accused them of mercenary and exploitative conduct, a readiness to do the same to a friend, to one they should, instead, loyally support.

Chapter 7 introduces the theme of Job's burdensome life. Job longed for some respite from days of stress and nights of tossing (7:1–6). But he had to confront the finality of the grave (7:7–10), anticipated though not idealized as in chapter 3. While vv. 9–10 might seem to imply that Job did not believe in a resurrection, this is not demonstrable from the text, especially in light of his later affirmation (19:23–27). He was simply affirming in poetically evocative language that the dead would not go back to their former earthly lives, for example, their homes (v. 10). He would not hold back (7:11–15). Given the immanence of death, he would speak his mind. He preferred death to his current 'etsem—variously translated as "body," "bones," or "pains" (v. 15); moreover, given the torments of life, Job preferred death. "Let me alone" is the initial line of a unit (vv. 16–21) that pled for the peace of abandonment. Satan contended (1:10) that God had a hedge of protection all around Job. But God now felt to Job more like a vigilante than a watchful Father. Verse 21 suggests that Job recognized his need for forgiveness of sin, but he was unaware of any specific sin (v. 20) that would have caused God to punish him so severely. He wished to die in peace knowing he was right with God.

8:1–22. Bildad: Typical and Limited Wisdom.

Bildad believed that fate showed a reasonable God (vv. 1–7). Of the three friends he is most faithful to radical wisdom traditions and most loyal to an orthodox theology (i.e., reward for good and retribution for evil). The human condition is one or the other—a radical view of retribution that Job rejects or questions. Bildad also seems most disposed to believe that there was hope for a repentant Job. Bildad's speeches were not characterized by Zophar's cruelty or Eliphaz's self-centeredness; he held to the tenets of wisdom. He argued that Job, like a stiff wind (v. 2), had been spouting verbiage—which Job himself had tacitly conceded, using the same metaphor of wind (6:26). He took the argument to the level of the family and suggested that God killed Job's children because of their sin (v. 4; cf. Deut. 24:16). Unlike Eliphaz, Bildad is grounded in reason rather than revelation, using the principle of retribution to establish that each one pays for his or her own sins, and this includes children paying for their own sins (cf. Deut. 24:16; Jer. 31:29–30).

Bildad suggested that God would restore Job if he was or became “pure and upright” (Job 8:6). He used further conditional expressions (vv. 4–5) to appeal to him with the promise of restoration. He emphasized the wisdom of previous generations (v. 8). Bildad's appeal to the elders would lead Eliphaz also to appeal to their authority (15:7–10), though he would also rely on his vision-dream. The idea that we were “born yesterday” is a hyperbolic way of stating that we are indebted to ancient wisdom (v. 9).

Bildad employed (vv. 11–19) multiple metaphors, including papyrus, a spider's web, and a plant. As papyrus reeds perish without moisture, so the impious perish without God (vv. 11–13). What they trust will not last because they rely on things that are as fragile as spider webs (v. 14): Job would use Bildad's own terms for confidence and reliance (kesel, mibtakh) to argue that his security had never been his wealth (31:24). The spider's web was the “spider's house,” which would not stand up to anyone's weight—another image of fragility (v. 15).

This is followed by another analogy of fragility and instability: plants rooted in good soil are much harder to uproot than those that hold on to rocks (v. 18). The roots of the large plant torn from a rock heap leave a much lighter footprint than those sunk in the soil; plants holding on to rocks for support will not even be missed when removed. The first part of v. 19 has been interpreted as either referring to a new section describing God's joy or (quite differently) as the fleeting pleasure of the poorly planted and uprooted plants that were described in the previous section—symbolic of those “who forget God” (v. 13). A godless life has little profit. Verses 20–22 conclude Bildad's speech. He suggested that God does not reject (or cast away) the tam—a word variously translated as “blameless,” “perfect,” or “person/man of integrity” (v. 20; cf. 1:1, 8). He was correct in the assertion that since God does not cast away the tam, He would not cast away Job.

9:1—10:22. Job: Awe of God, Frustration with Him.

Job highlighted God's unmatched prowess in nature in the opening lines of this second speech (9:1–12). The question of how a person could be righteous before God (9:2) is similar to the one raised by Eliphaz's vision-dream (4:17), but the concern is a different one. Job is using a different preposition, not “before God” but “with God”; that is to say, Job is asking whether it is possible for anyone to engage God in a legal dispute and win the case (i.e., be declared righteous; v. 3). The implication is that in such a legal controversy, Job would lose the case even though he was righteous (9:15, 20). Verses 13–19 describe Job's sense of inadequacy before the divine assaults. The final part of v. 13 can be rendered as “allies of the proud” or as “Rahab's helpers”—rahab can refer to pride or to a proper name. God's mastery over nature is sometimes personified in ANE mythology as His victory over chaos monsters with names such as Rahab and Leviathan (Ps. 74:13–14; Is. 30:7; 51:9–10). In this case Job portrayed the Lord as victorious over them.

At the end of v. 18, the word saba' is used. This has been rendered as “fill” or “saturate” or “overwhelm.” The literal sense is that of “satisfy” or “sate.” God was feeding Job until he was stuffed full—with bitterness. Job found no evidence that God cared enough to give him a fair hearing. He was the victim of an internal conflict (9:20–24). Intense torment made him susceptible to accusations of guilt, though conscience recalled no errant deed. To him, when it came to suffering, there was no difference between guilty and innocent (v. 22). This was a momentous statement containing truth to which Job was not necessarily committed, particularly because it was only a half-truth. It was half true because destruction had befallen Job who knew he was tam (“blameless”). It was only half true because the “He” Job blamed (vv. 22–24) for that destruction was God. In his pain he spoke to God freely, as a friend, sharing with Him his confusion. He even concluded that he would never again live without pain and suffering (vv. 27–28).

Job was fearful of his sufferings (v. 28)—he feared to be optimistic lest he be proved wrong by suffering. By saying that God was not human like he was (v. 32), Job was acknowledging the great distance separating him and all humans from God. He doubted that God would even listen to his voice (9:16) or that his condition could be arbitrated because he lacked a mediator (9:33). But there was a possible solution (vv. 34–35): the withdrawal of His rod. The rod, the agent of discipline, may have stood for the discipline itself. If God would relent in His aggression, Job would find the courage to speak up and to make his case before Him.

But Job chose to complain and express how he felt as he continued to speak to God (10:1–7). He was not describing how God is but seeking to understand why he was experiencing so much pain. Hence, Job challenged God to justify what he was experiencing (10:2) and accused Him, through a series of rhetorical questions, of seemingly behaving like a flawed human (10:3–5), finding guilt where there was none (10:6–7). Then Job contrasted God's previous protection and support with what appeared to Job as wrath and condemnation (vv. 8–17). God, who formed his embryo (10:10), brought it to maturity (10:11), and providentially cared for him (10:12), seems to Job to have harbored ill intent against him all along (10:13–17).

Job asked whether God was trying to destroy him (v. 8). The Hebrew word used here (bala'—"swallow up") echoes 2:3 where Satan had been inciting the Lord to do this to Job. Job said that God was marking, watching, or guarding him (Heb. shamar; v. 14), another echo of the prologue. There the Lord commanded Satan to preserve Job's life (shamar; 2:6). Job had just celebrated God's care that had preserved (shamar) his spirit (10:12), but now it seemed as though the purpose of God's shamar was for the sake of finding fault. Job spoke of being full of shame or disgrace (v. 15), stating that God was overwhelming him (cf. 9:18) with bitterness. Job now listed manifestations of that bitterness, such as disgrace and misery, with which he was full.

The end of v. 17 has been translated variously as "changes and war," "wave upon wave" of "forces," "fresh troops," or "hardship after hardship." The Hebrew word tsaba' can be taken literally as "army," "warfare," or metaphorically as hardship. These terms are also employed in 14:14, where tsaba' is sometimes translated as "hard service." In v. 17 Job seemed to be saying that he was constantly being called upon to render more hard service. His guard duty would not end. He renewed his old lament (10:18–22). He sighed, longing to be stillborn (10:18–19)! But while he emphasized the rest that comes with death (recorded in chap. 3), he underscored here the disorder of pitch blackness (10:21–22) and again referred to the grave as a place from which he would not return—in the sense of returning to life as it had been previously.

11:1–20. Zophar: Apparent Grace. Zophar was the least sensitive of the friends and least deferential to Job. He launched a brutal attack on Job (vv. 1–6) and returned to the question of 4:17 and 9:2: Can a human being be righteous? Zophar argued that a revelation from God would condemn Job (v. 5), for when God passes by (khalap) He imprisons humans and condemns them (v. 10). The verb khalap was used by Eliphaz to refer to the apparition of the spirit that spoke to him (4:15), and now it is used by Zophar to state that when God approaches humans He brings a message of condemnation. God, for Zophar, can only condemn humans as Eliphaz's spirit argued. Zophar had continued insisting that empty talk would not vindicate anybody. He said that Job had mocked, but it is not clear when such a thing took place. Other speakers had leveled no such accusation. Since Bildad, Job had spoken of God's power and Job's impotence before it, lamented his life, and longed again for death. The book of Job also does not support Zophar's accusation that Job had claimed that his teaching was pure. It seems improbable that Job had made such an assertion. Misattribution on Zophar's part seems more likely since someone had spoken, hypothetically, of Job being pure (Bildad, in 8:6).

In contrast with Zophar's claim, the reader may consider Job's recent attitude of humility before God (10:15). Zophar's accusation, significantly uncharacteristic of Job's language, mood, and tone, is more illustrative of the passion and blunder of human arguments in the name of God. In the first part of v. 6, the Hebrew word kepel—"the double"—has been variously rendered in context as "they would double your prudence," "true wisdom has two sides," or "He is manifold in understanding." The last part of the verse literally refers to the idea that God had forgotten some of Job's iniquity and has been rendered as Zophar saying that Job had received less punishment than he deserved from God. Zophar claimed that God might properly be punishing Job more severely. In vv. 7–12 he expounded on God's greatness and also the wickedness and deceit of some humans. His language soared as he extolled God. He used a proverb to describe the difficulty of those who were foolish to become wise—it was less likely than a donkey's colt being born as a human (v. 12).

Zophar spoke of hope in repentance in his final segment (vv. 13–20). Like Eliphaz and Bildad, he assured Job that repentance would bring him deliverance from his present suffering. His guilt had brought him divine wrath, but his case was not hopeless. The admonition that Job should stretch out his hands toward God described an act of adoration and supplication and is a frequent OT expression (e.g., Pss. 44:20; 143:6). Wickedness or evil (v. 14) is here personified as a conscious being that should not be a welcome occupant in Job's home.

Zophar then suggested that Job could return to his former life if he were humble and repentant (vv. 14–15). Then Job would be able to forget his troubles—they would be like water that had passed by (v. 16). Zophar sought to make a positive application of Job's pessimistic simile of vanishing water (6:15–21). He suggested that Job's misery would disappear as completely as water does when a wadi dries up. He would then be able to khapar—"dig" or "search"—followed by rest in safety. This suggests searching or checking and finding everything in order—this would mean the end of Job's tormented nights (see 3:26; 7:13–14). Failing eyes (v. 20) are listed among the curses of Deuteronomy (28:65) that would befall God's unfaithful people.

12:1—14:22. Job: Divine Power, Creaturally Finitude. This final speech of the first cycle opens on a note of indignation at Job's friends (12:1–6). Job's sarcastic answer revealed his irritation at their doctrinaire condemnation of his character. Job was scornful of the idea that his friends' point of view was the only one that mattered (v. 2). Job seems to have emphasized (v. 5) the friends' self-righteous attitude of complacency because danger can only befall people who are doomed to trouble anyway. Job continued to be preoccupied by life's injustice and observed that criminals prosper undisturbed (v. 6). His friends joined in ridicule of the righteous person, Job himself, missing the fact that wickedness thrives in the world. The wicked thrive on power that comes from the same God whom the wicked defy.

Job's taunt lines (12:7–12) have become famous for extolling the wisdom of God as known through nature. In the context of the book they contrast with what Job had been saying thus far and are introduced with a very strong adversative conjunction ("but"). The friends find it obvious that God blesses the good and punishes the wicked. So obvious, Job now said, that any creature can tell you that "the hand of the LORD [Yahweh] has done this" (12:9). This is the only time the name of Yahweh appears in the dialogue between Job and his friends.

Job suggested that ears evaluate words, palates evaluate foods, and the aged evaluate knowledge (vv. 11–12). Bildad had referred to the wisdom of the aged (8:8–9), and Eliphaz would also seize upon it (15:7–10). Having mocked his friends' naive claim that the wicked always suffer and the righteous always prosper, Job now depicted a God entirely more unpredictable in His power than their reasoning allowed (12:13–25). Job's experience had no specific moral implication because God's power rules over all areas of our lives (v. 16). God also rules over the nations (v. 23).

Beginning with 13:1, Job's refuting of his friends' arguments included a protest that he did have wisdom, that he preferred an audience with God, and that his friends should be silent since God Himself would repudiate their fraudulent characterizations of His person. Job recognized the risks of daring to discuss his case with the Almighty (vv. 14–15). The alternate Hebrew reading "I have no hope" is not supported by vv. 15b, 16: Job viewed God as his salvation—and he was not a hypocrite. Job had certainly not given up God. At this point Job's confidence in God's salvation and his integrity still assured him of vindication before God.

Job then launched into his most extended address to God (13:20—14:22). But his optimism would not remain constant, and gradually he focused less and less on speaking directly to God. His hope of swift physical restoration also seems to have faded. He may have clamored less for God's personal attention because he no longer expected that God would promptly alleviate his suffering. As he lost hope of early physical restoration, there was less direct engagement between him and the God he spoke of but could not find.

He spoke much less to God in the second and third cycles. And though he never abandoned his insistence on personal integrity or his clamor for vindication, he seems obliged to conceive of it in terms that were different both temporally and legally. By the second cycle his hope rested in seeing his Redeemer in the future (19:25). And by his oath at the end of the third cycle, he was apparently resigned to his black and flaking skin and burning body (30:30). No allusion was made to any form of physical restoration. Job was reduced to arguing with himself, his friends having surrendered (32:1), and clinging to the ironclad certitude that acquittal in court would grant him the moral and legal vindication he deserved—and which it seems was the only thing for which he could still hope.

“Hand” here means “oppression” (13:21). Job did not wish to be far from God. In fact, he continued to demand an audience with Him. Job was confused as to why God would pursue a weakling such as he—like a leaf or dry stubble/chaff (v. 25). Job referred to “bitter things” (v. 26; cf. Ex. 15:23), meaning that while God’s accusations were hard to stomach, they reminded Job of his indiscreet youth. The reference to the decay, or wasting away of human beings (Job 13:28), expressed a sentiment more clearly connected with what follows in chapter 14 and should be thought of as introducing a new section that ends at 14:22.

Chapter 14 is the second part of Job’s third address to God, introduced in 13:28, as Job turned from defending his integrity against his friends to reflections on the finality of death. Job’s reference to people’s lives being “full of trouble” (v. 1) takes us back to Eliphaz who said that humans are born to trouble (5:7). Job more than agreed. By saying that human beings are like shadows, Job applied to humanity the fleeting days he applied to his own life (9:25). He wondered why God pays attention to finite humanity (14:3), something that may only increase their stress. He longed for God to let humanity rest (v. 6). Humanity’s fate is almost the most hopeless one within creation. Plants can spring up again, but death is the end for humans (14:10, 12)—at least “till the heavens are no more” (v. 12).

Here in this verse is a hint (confirmed in other parts of Scripture; e.g., 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1) that the righteous dead would live again. The verses that follow (14:13–17) contain further hints of resurrection: Job spoke of being hidden in the grave until God’s anger passed, when he would be remembered (v. 13). He asked whether people would come back to life and then spoke of relief and being called (vv. 14–15). These incipient questions and longing, tentative affirmations would become a strong expression of confidence in 19:23–27. Nevertheless, the metaphors of undoing (14:18–19) show Job returning to poetically sorrowful descriptions of the tragedy and seeming finality of death (14:20–21).

Within the overall argument about Job’s integrity, he and Bildad engaged in the topic of sons. According to Bildad they had paid for their guilt (8:4). Job retorted that the doom he faced made the discussion of sons irrelevant (14:21). But in the next speech Bildad would argue that it was Job’s attitude that would determine his memory and that of his offspring (18:16–19).

15:1—21:34

Second Cycle of Speeches

As in the previous cycle, in this one we listen to conversations between Eliphaz (15:1–35) and Job (16:1–17:16); Bildad (18:1–21) and Job (19:1–29); and Zophar (20:1–29) and Job (21:1–34). His friends continue to press on him their peculiar theology, and Job continues to express his pain and wish for vindication.

15:1–35. Eliphaz: Learning and Not Learning.

Eliphaz was first indignant (15:1–6), then a borrower (vv. 7–10), and a little later an echo of himself (vv. 14–16), and finally he sought again to assert that the wicked always suffer (vv. 17–35). To begin with, he suggested that Job should be silenced rather than increase his guilt by dishonest speech. He even asserted that Job was hindering piety by his words (v. 4). He accused Job of speaking from the perspective of his sinfulness and thus was expressing his lack of integrity. Bildad had used the wisdom of the forefathers (8:8–9). The consolations of God (v. 11) might refer to the counsel of himself and the others. Eliphaz also implied that Job’s show of emotion was misleading and alarming (v. 12).

Eliphaz decided to return to his revelation (vv. 14–16). He reiterated the point that human beings are sinful (v. 14). Verse 16 has been interpreted and translated to mean either that all human beings are ta’ab (“abominable,” “vile,” or “detestable”) and ’alakh (“filthy” or “corrupt”) or that Job himself was a particularly despicable example of human sinfulness. Verse 20 refers to the idea that the wicked or ruthless suffer according to the years appointed “for” them. This happens because they raise a rebellious hand against God (v. 25). The wicked are described as having fat faces (a symbol of prosperity); they appear to be thriving, but it ultimately proves futile.

16:1—17:16. Job: Despair and Appeal. Job expressed his bitter despair, first in addressing the friends (16:2–6), then God (vv. 7–14). He protested that he actually had prostrated himself (v. 15). His cry to the earth (v. 18) suggests his imminent demise, borrowing the terms dam (“blood”) and za’aq (“cry out”) from the murder of Abel narrative (Gen. 4:10). This cry lifts us up to the summit of this speech (Job 16:19) in which the God who was Abel’s witness was necessarily to be Job’s own. The similar words ‘ed and sahed can mean “witness” and even “advocate.” This was a hopeful peak whose contrasting dark valley concluded the speech (17:13–16). Job still longed for a mediator to arbitrate the case between him and God (16:21). The mention of “no return” (v. 22) expressed the seeming finality of death but also made his next speech (chap. 19) all the more poignant, particularly vv. 23–27.

Job longed for God to pledge or put up security for him—an idea criticized in the human sphere for three times in Proverbs (6:1; 17:18; 22:26). Job doubted that God would be surety for him. It was difficult for him to understand the attitude of his friends, and he concluded that it was God, in some sense, who kept them from grasping the true nature of his dilemma (17:4). Therefore, the drama would not conclude with any sense of triumph on their part. Job saw himself as a person whose face people spit at (v. 6), as one rejected and unclean (see Num. 12:14; Deut. 25:9). Later, Job spoke literally, not metaphorically, about people spitting in his face (Job 30:10). He then introduced a note of despair again by saying that his days were passed (17:11). Job repudiated his friends’ exhortations to repent and prosper as a distortion of reality (v. 12).

18:1–21. Bildad: A Graphic Terror Story. In terms of harshness, Bildad’s second speech resembles language we associate with Zophar. But Bildad’s rationale continued to depend on standard wisdom thinking. His focus here continued to be Job’s restoration to the community of sages. Of all the negative consequences to befall the wicked man, Bildad found no physical pain more climactic than the psychological argument of oblivion. Having dramatized the horror of his physical encounters with net, snare, mesh, noose, trap, death’s firstborn, and the king of terrors (vv. 8–14), Bildad sealed his discourse on the fate of the wicked by citing four particular elements: (1) perishing of human memory or remembrance (v. 17a; cf. Eccl. 9:5); (2) the loss of name or fame (v. 17b); (3) being left without children (v. 19a); and (4) having no survivors (v. 19b). For Bildad death was loss of remembrance, fame, son or posterity, and any survivor. In Ecclesiastes it is reward, remembrance, love, hate, envy, portion (Eccl. 9:5–6). But the similar treatment of the subject of death shows Bildad’s interest in wisdom. Since Job had already lost his children, the argument based on childlessness seems at first incongruous as a basis for appeal to Job. But this view ignores that at the end Job was restored, though not on Bildad’s terms, and blessed again with a quiverful of children (42:12–16).

When Bildad asked whether the earth would be deserted and rocks would be moved from their places, he implied that Job’s logic went against creation’s order. Everything would have to be turned upside down for him to be right. The “firstborn” (18:13) is a Semitic superlative of significance equivalent to “the greatest” (Gen. 49:3; Ex. 4:22–23; Ps. 89:20–29). Here Bildad meant “the worst kind of death.” Bildad had already warned that the hope of the godless hypocrite would perish and that what they trusted in (mibtakh) was like a spider’s web (8:13–14). It would not be difficult for the wicked to be torn from the shelter of his tent, that is, “his trust/shelter” (mibtakh). Job was the only other speaker to use the term mibtakh to deny that he had ever oppressed the poor as the wicked do (31:16–23) and put his confidence in gold (31:24). In 18:20, Bildad used two opposite points on the compass to express the total and dramatic collapse of the wicked, astonishing to them.

19:1–29. Job’s Rebuke, Plight, and Vision of Vindication. This chapter records the briefest of Job’s speeches and the spiritual and emotional zenith of the book. From the depths of despair at God’s treatment of him (vv. 6–13), and the abandonment of servants, intimate friends, and family (vv. 14–22), Job would soar to a testimony of confidence in his final vindication (vv. 23–27). “Ten times” (v. 3) probably stood as a superlative of intensity equivalent to “the maximum” or “the ultimate” (Gen. 31:7, 41; Num. 14:22; Neh. 4:12; Dan. 1:20). Job suggested that his error was his own problem, not a basis for his friends’ conceit, gloating, or denunciation (Job 19: 4). In his opening salvo, Bildad, Job’s principal interlocutor, asked whether God “subverts [‘awat, ‘to pervert,’ ‘to wrong’]” judgment or justice (8:3). Eleven chapters later Job counters with explicit usage of the same form of the verb saying that God wronged (‘awat) him (v. 6). He had some idea of what justice should look like but argued that in his case something went wrong.

Job expressed devastation and hopelessness (v. 10). Joshua and David spoke of death as going “the way of all the earth” (Josh. 23:14; 1 Kin. 2:2), and Job was concerned about death’s seeming finality (Job 10:21), like the psalmist (Ps. 39:13). Job referred also to the fact that God’s afflictions of him had caused his family, friends, and acquaintances to be alienated from him (Job 19:13–19). Job’s relatives had “failed” or “gone away” (lit. “my relatives have ceased”)—which makes it sound as though all of Job’s relatives were dead (cf. 3:17; 14:7) and shows how lonely he felt because not even his loved ones supported him. Job said that he had escaped by “the skin of my teeth” (19:20), meaning that he felt like he was barely alive and emotionally desolate. He wanted his friends’ sympathy because he felt struck by God’s hand. He wondered why they were adding to God’s already very difficult treatment (vv. 21–22). Job again refers to God as directly striking him. His soul is very conflicted, for he cannot expect his friends’ sympathy while accusing their God of violence or accusing them of not being satisfied or sated with Job’s flesh (v. 22), a phrase that suggests the idea of animals eating the carcass of another beast. Obviously the usage here was not intended to be taken literally, in the sense of cannibalism, but as suggesting that the attacks of Job’s friends were so intense that Job felt that they were eating him alive. The phrase could then be an idiomatic expression meaning “to slander/abuse,” emphasizing the brutality of the verbal attacks (cf. Dan. 3:8).

Job longed for a permanent record that would in the end vindicate him (Job 19:23). The reference to iron, lead, and engraving (v. 24) may refer to the practice of filling the letters traced into the rock by the iron pen with lead (see Jer. 17:1). The emphasis is here on preserving the record rather than on Job’s vindication. In the Hebrew text of Job 19:25, the “I” is emphatic. Job was certain about his future because he trusted in the faithfulness of his Redeemer. He looked to a time beyond death when he would share a personal encounter with the God who is the First and the Last and who was his Redeemer (see Is. 44:6).

Job’s words here (19:25–27) are one of the book’s great rhetorical and spiritual mysteries. They cannot be explained as following logically or emotionally from what he had been saying thus far. They stand at a crucial point in his dialogue with his friends and are the spiritual climax of his response to Eliphaz’s and Bildad’s false accusations. But according to Job’s inspired answer, God’s loyalty to His faithful children is more powerful than death and physical decay (v. 26). Job’s friends still wanted to fix him, thinking of him as the real problem. He reminded them that God, the righteous Judge, would fix them instead (vv. 28–29).

20:1–29. Zophar: Insistence on Terror. In this speech Zophar tried his hardest to frighten Job into repentance by showing him the horrible fate of the wicked. His reasoning seems to be that Job would experience even more dreadful things than what he had already experienced. In his first speech Zophar suggested that Job was not suffering as much as he might because God was not treating him as he really deserved (11:6). Job’s faith and fervor about his innocence left Zophar agitated (20:2). In order to sound authentic, Zophar spoke like a true sage about ancient wisdom. Bildad, Job, and Eliphaz had already spoken of the ancient wisdom (8:8–10; 12:12) because they represented this wisdom.

Zophar described the arrogance of the wicked well but apparently applied it poorly if he thought it was true of Job (20:6). This verse is a good portrait of proud rebellion (Gen. 11:4; Is. 14:14), but the portrait did not apply to Job. Zophar spoke (Job 20:7–9) of the wicked vanishing, but Job, too, knew he would vanish because of death (7:8–10). Zophar may have been evoking Bildad’s first speech to refer to the evanescence of the wicked (20:7; cf. 8:18). The reference to the sweet taste of evil (20:12), while

The Redeemer

Old Testament redeemers had a comprehensive role. They could salvage a relative’s property (Lev. 25:25) or buy him out of slavery (vv. 47–49). Their duty reached beyond the grave. Even after a relative’s death, the redeemer could avenge his blood by killing the person who murdered his relative (Num. 35:19, 21) or preserve his name and inheritance through a special form of marriage called levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5–6; Ruth 3–4). Jacob’s words about the redeeming angel, who delivered him from all evil (Gen. 48:16), show how all embracing the redeemer’s work could be. In Job’s case, his undoing had been so complete that he needed total redemption, much more than just someone to clear his name.

rue of the wicked in general in many cases, cannot be applied to Job because he had neither partaken of evil nor tasted anything sweet. He had tasted the unpalatable (6:6–7, 30) or bitter misery (9:18), his soul had been bitter (7:11; 10:1), and God had written bitter things against him (13:26). There was no “sweetness” in Job’s life. But after Zophar’s speech Job did speak of sweetness—the sweetness of oblivion at the end of a wicked person’s life (21:33).

Zophar also referred to the evil of oppressing the poor (20:19). If he was attempting to apply this to Job, this would contrast with what Eliphaz first said about Job, namely, that he strengthened the weak (4:3–4). God is right to punish the wicked who purvey social injustice, and he could have been implying that Job was guilty of such (22:6–11). Zophar believed that the wicked cannot escape God’s wrath (20:24). His lesson on divine retribution is vivid. Both Bildad and Zophar concluded using the image of inheritance (v. 29). While Bildad mentioned what people stand to lose by rejecting God (fame, name, survivors), Zophar mentioned what wicked people gain—a graphically horrible end. And its horror, for Zophar, is not by chance. It is what God Himself bequeaths.

21:1–34. Job’s Response to Terror Stories. Job next painted his own very different picture of the life of the wicked as long, prosperous, and secure. He asked rhetorically if his complaint was with other human beings—and a negative answer was implied (v. 4). This offered reassurance to Job’s companions and also clarified his focus. He was attempting to maintain friendship, but they infuriated and mocked him (15:12; 19:3; 21:3); they never called him friend. But he repeatedly identified them as friends—whether directly or implicitly (6:27; 16:20; 19:19, 21), and even brothers (6:15). His question implied that, whether irritated by them or not, his quarrel was ultimately not with humans. For no one but God could answer his questions about the injustice of his experience. Just calling them to mind made him shudder (21:6).

The description that follows about how wicked people live and die goes against everything that seems fair; it contradicted everything about the popular, cause-and-effect doctrine of retribution promoted by his friends. In effect, Job found his thoughts to be frighteningly true. When he stated that their descendants were established (21:8), he indicated the opposite of Bildad’s claim that the wicked have no posterity, progeny, or survivor (18:19). He also observed that their bulls breed (21:10)—this signified high yielding stocks. The wealth of the wicked multiplies. Job’s comment about the death of the wicked in v. 13 implies that they die without suffering. Elsewhere, Deuteronomy 7:4 refers to sudden death as God’s punishment, and Job himself spoke of it as proof that life is fickle (Job 9:23). The prosperity of the wicked is not in their hands (21:16). Some read it as a question: “Behold is not their prosperity in their hand?” This would imply that their success is of their own making. Taken as a negative statement, the sentence means that the wicked are not in charge of their success. Job would then be rejecting the presumption of living so self-centeredly with breath that comes from God.

The rhetorical questions in v. 17 effectively argued against the claim that wickedness automatically brings misery. The translation and interpretation of v. 19 is difficult. According to some translations, Job was saying that instead of children being punished for their parents’ wrongdoing, God should pay back the wicked directly. According to others, Job was refuting what his friends had said—that children are punished for their parents’ wrongdoing. According to yet others, Job was saying that both children and parents should be punished, but that even if the children are, the parents often do not know about it. It appears that Job was saying (as he had throughout this section) that the wicked do not always receive their punishment in this life, even though their children might suffer as a result of their wrongdoing (vv. 20–21; cf. 27:14–15). In other words, Job wondered what difference punishing their children would make to dead people. The rhetorical question “Can anyone teach God knowledge?” suggests that the God who rules the ramim—“the exalted ones,” “those on high,” or “the highest”—surely knows what He is doing with humanity.

Job then observed that some people die in prosperity and others in misery. The first word of 21:24 in the Hebrew is ‘atin—a word that appears only once in Scripture, and its translation is uncertain. It is usually rendered as “breasts” because Job said that it is full of khalab—literally “milk.” The phrase could metaphorically mean “well nourished” or “well fed,” which conveys the basic meaning of the verse. The particular Hebrew word for thoughts or thinking (v. 27) here refers to assessment, and the word for schemes also often refers to evil plans. Job knew that his friends had concluded that he was receiving the punishments of God reserved for the wicked. Job suggested that his friends should learn from the testimony of those who travel and who have experienced life fully (v. 29). They would support Job's position. Some translations have the idea in v. 30 that the wicked are "reserved" for the day of trouble, others that they are "spared" from it. Job argued that the wicked do very well; they are (at least for now) spared from doom and wrath.

22:1—27:23

Third Cycle of Speeches

In this last cycle of speeches we hear only the voice of Eliphaz (22:1–30) and Job's response to him (23:1—24:25) and that of Bildad (25:1–6) followed by Job (26:1—27:23). Eliphaz's use of strong words includes some positive elements. The speech of Bildad was short and reaffirmed the first speech of Eliphaz.

22:1–30. Eliphaz's Final Manipulative Effort.

In this his final speech, Eliphaz spoke both his angriest and his most positive words to Job. His denunciations were fiercer, while his invitation was more promising. He followed the stern criticism of social justice with eleven verses that mostly describe the glowing relationship Job would enjoy with God if he would only return to Him. The irony of Eliphaz's closing exhortation is that the book affirms Job's intimacy with God at its beginning and at the end. With his initial questions (vv. 2–3), Eliphaz alludes to his first speech, where he stated that God considers humans and angels by nature to be unworthy of standing before Him (4:21–21). That supernatural visitation forms the spine of the arguments of the friends in the book, running from Eliphaz's first through Bildad's last intervention. But their repetition does not make it true.

Eliphaz wanted to strip Job of his self-conceit, suggesting that it was his sin, not his fear or reverence for God, that had brought him his hardships (v. 4). In the Hebrew text the phrase regarding the charges brought against Job in the judgment is the same used by Job in 9:32 and 14:3. In the first, Job spoke of the impossibility of going to court together with God. Then in chapter 14 he voiced frustration over God's bringing a feeble mortal into judgment. As the reader knows, Job was wrong, and Eliphaz even more completely so. God was not hauling Job into court or punishing him. It was Satan who was abusing him. And it was precisely because of the devotion that Eliphaz once praised (4:6) and now mocked that Satan poured out his spite upon him. Verses 5–9 in chapter 22 record inventions of Eliphaz's desperation, all false accusations against Job.

Eliphaz accused Job of using brute force to exploit society's vulnerable (vv. 5–7). The powerful, honorable man (v. 8) was the one to whom people deferred. This person is described in a Hebrew idiom as one whose face is lifted up. Job, and later Elihu, used the same idiom in 13:8, 10 and 32:21 to refer to showing partiality. It is difficult to connect the charge in 22:13 to any of Job's previous words. It was a sheer distortion of his words. He now quoted Job (v. 17), citing Job's previous criticism of the wicked (21:14)—and perhaps implying that it applied to Job himself. Then Eliphaz appealed to Job to have a relationship with God that would bring wholeness (22:21). But his twisted judgment on Job made it difficult for Job to draw real hope from his optimistic-sounding language. Verses 21–30 close Eliphaz's body of speeches that began in 4:2–6. His words here included the sympathy absent from the rest of the speech. They reflected a sensitivity that was last heard from Eliphaz in the introductory words of his first speech (4:3–4). They were the enticement of the carrot after the rhetorical beating with the stick. Affirming as they may have been, they did not correct his false statements or undo the damage done to his relationship with his friend or to the character of the God he had claimed to speak for.

23:1—24:25. Job: Longing and Contradiction. This speech may be remembered for three things: (1) Job's dismay at God's inscrutability—he could not understand what He was doing, nor could he locate Him in order to find out (chap. 23); (2) his sense of God's knowledge of his integrity, even through this trial (23:10); and (3) his extended portrayal of the fate of the vulnerable at the hand of their exploiters (chap. 24). At the conclusion he dared anyone to disprove his account of the prosperity and fate of the wicked (24:25).

Job was confident of being acquitted, both because he was innocent and because his judge was fair (23:7). Job averred that he had kept God's ways and not turned away from his loyalty to Him. He treasured His words even more than food (v. 12). Job said that God does as He pleases (v. 13), and He would carry out what He had determined in regard to Job (v. 14). Job had anxiety as well as confidence since he did not know what God would do (vv. 13–17). Though terrified, Job was not silenced by the darkness and gloom that covered his face (v. 17). He posed a question (24:1) concerning the obscurity of God's "times"—His judgment schedule—a reality ignored by the powerful in their abuse of the desperately poor, as Job observed. Job described the wretchedness of the victims of exploitation (vv. 5–8) and narrated the violence of the strong (vv. 2–4, 9–11).

To all appearances the wicked are allowed to act with impunity (v. 12). Job showed (vv. 13–17) how their rejection of light enshrouds them in the darkness of their own criminality until the morning is the same to them as the terrors of deep darkness (v. 17). Some translate v. 18 as Job's expression of what "should be." Other translations consider vv. 18–25 as quoting the words of the friends: "You [the friends] say...." But the idea of a quote from the friends does not fit the context. Job's point was that evildoers do not last forever, that the grave will consume them, and that wickedness not merely "should" but will be broken (vv. 19–20). In other words, the wicked will eventually receive punishment, although that does not happen in all cases in this life, as his friends had claimed.

25:1–6. Bildad: Dialogue's Collapse. This is Bildad's final speech in which he finally surrenders to the lie of Eliphaz's opening speech (4:12–21), which he alone had originally refused to endorse. Scholars worry about Bildad's brevity here and the absence of a third speech by Zophar. But the book of Job is the documentation of a furious quarrel and not simply a theoretical treatise. Indeed, the greater perplexity may well be that Bildad, after long independence, so suddenly surrenders to ideas and language he has thus far not used. His unmodified falling into line with Eliphaz's distortion means that the friends' defense has collapsed, with no more hope of any new or helpful argument. Bildad argued that God is matchlessly great and all humans are simply flawed and as worms before Him (25:5–6). This was an emphatic echo of the sentiments of 4:19–20. There Eliphaz, by revelation, pronounces that if God does not even trust His angels, it is impossible for humans to enjoy His esteem (4:19–20). The friends' arguments concluded on this note regarding God's view of humanity.

26:1—27:23. Job: Emphatic Defense. Job continued to be contemptuous of the friends' elaborate speeches (26:2–4), but his most emphatic arguments in this section combined his familiar avowals of innocence (27:2–6) with arguments that sound very much like those of his friends in regard to the eventual fate of the wicked (27:7–23). The imagery of the trembling dead (26:5) does not contradict the fact that the dead know nothing (Eccl. 9:5). The Hebrew word for the "dead" here is repa'im, sometimes also translated "shades" or even "departed spirits"—a term that might have the unfortunate connotation of "ghosts" and thus contradicts the biblical teaching of sleep in death (cf. Ps. 6:5; 115:17; Dan. 12:2; John 11:11–12; 1 Cor. 15:51; 1 Thess. 4:13–14). This term (repa'im) is found in poetic texts to refer to those who died as totally lacking strength in the depth of the tomb (Sheol), the place of destruction (Job 26:6). The presence of God causes the impossible to happen: the dead react with trembling/deep anguish. Job stated that all things and beings, whether human or other, are subject to the absolute mastery of the God of life and creation (see also Pss. 74:12–17; 89:10; Is. 30:7; 51:9–10).

The reference to the pillars of heaven (Job 26:11) is imagery used to describe the earth as a building having columns supporting the sky. This is probably a reference to the mountains. Job's way of expressing the intensity of his commitment to integrity was by swearing in God's name (27:2). Verse 18 refers to the flimsy constructions of wickedness: the moth's house is its cocoon; the word for "booth" or "hut" (Heb. sukkah) is the term used for temporary shelters constructed for a few days. Stability and permanence are not features of wickedness.

The negations of v. 19 have been translated as referring to the transitoriness of life, but they have also been understood as expressing the transitoriness of human riches. They are there, but when people awaken, when they open their eyes, the riches are no more. Wealth vanishes and so does a person (v. 21). The east wind, known for its ferocity (Ex. 14:21; Ps. 48:7), eliminates the person. Thus, Job's complete rejection of his friends' arguments was a rational and emotional reaction provoked by their assaults on his integrity and not necessarily a rejection of their characterizations of the fate of the wicked. But even this speech, so much in sympathy with arguments they themselves had made, did not move them to change. They remained entrenched in their opposing camps.

28:1–28

Interlude: Ode to Wisdom

Within the dialogues between Job and his friends, this poem stands apart. Though it includes no introductory note to the effect, its dispassionate tone and lack of invective and personal attack mark its singularity within its context. And the unique way that Job's words are reintroduced in the chapter that follows also emphasizes the independence of Job 28 from the flow of personal arguments that makes up the dialogue. Scholars debate whether Job or the author of the book wrote the chapter. Divided into three sections, it focuses on human accomplishment (vv. 1–11), highlights human inadequacy (vv. 12–22), and honors divine omniscience, ending with God's definition of wisdom (vv. 23–28).

Thematically speaking, Job 28 documents a soliloquy on the phenomenon of wisdom that reviews the course of nature and human ingenuity, exploration, and discovery. Job sought for a satisfactory answer on the source, location, and definition of true wisdom. He began his soliloquy by pointing out that people put an end to darkness (v. 3) by exposing and exploring earth's remote regions and depths and bringing light and knowledge where before there were darkness, concealment, and ignorance. Job referred (v. 4) to places (lit. "forgotten by feet"), that is, forgotten in the sense of neglected—some translations have "untouched by human feet" or "unknown to those who walk." The poet described regions as forgotten because they were unfamiliar and rarely, if ever, trodden.

A miner's work can be precarious (v. 4). Job's mention of fire (v. 5) may have referred to the hot conditions in which mining must sometimes be done in contrast to the relative calm on earth's surface. Miners set to work on the flinty rock, accomplishing in the process what Job said God in His anger does, overturning mountains (v. 9; cf. 9:5).

People do not know the value and worth of wisdom (v. 13): value and worth are translations of a Hebrew word, 'erek, that also means order. It is not that humans lack appreciation for wisdom but that it is beyond their control and manipulation (vv. 13–22). This is the point of vv. 13–22. Verses 23–27 indicate that it is a spiritual matter that only the all-knowing God may properly assess. The fear of the "Lord" here (v. 28) is 'adonai, the only appearance of this word in the book of Job. By shunning evil, Job reveals understanding and wisdom (cf. Prov. 9:10). Thus, at the climax of this independent poem, set apart from the hostilities of the argument's partisanship, we learn again of Job's true standing before the God with whom he still longed to have an audience. Through the verse's synonymous parallelism, the reader is told that Job, in God's definition, is a person of wisdom.

29:1—31:40

Job's Final Speech

The seemingly independent character of Job's final speech is detached from the thrust and parry of the friends' sustained confrontation, suggesting that it may not be part of the main dialogue or that there was a break in the discourse for some period of time and Job began again with another thought. The singular phrasing that opens chapter 29, which refers to the resumption of Job's speaking, seems to support such a view. In chapter 29 Job described divine ministrations (vv. 2–6), human reactions to him (vv. 7–12), reasons why he commanded respect (vv. 13–17), his now surrendered expectations of his final days (vv. 18–20), and his earlier days of honor (vv. 21–25).

29:1–25. Reminiscence: Yesterday's Dignity.

In v. 2, "months" is in parallel with "days." This does not in itself tell us how long Job's trial had continued thus far. On balance Job may have fretted much more than savored God's "watching" him (7:12; 10:14; 13:27). But he still longed for such times (v. 2). Verse 4 records one of Job's few and most direct answers to Eliphaz, whose challenge may be recalled from 15:8. Eliphaz asked rhetorically (expecting a negative answer) if Job had access to knowledge from God. The author through narrative and in Job's own sayings repeatedly commented on Job's integrity and godliness. Beyond this, Job's counter to Eliphaz, recalling times when he was close to and sheltered by God's counsel, seems all the more credible because it was far removed from the heat and confrontation of the dialogue recorded in earlier chapters. It is not to be dismissed as the mere look backward through rose-tinted lenses.

Job's mention of his children (v. 5) expressed deep emotion as it related events that the reader knows are directly connected, that is, Job's sense of the loss of intimate fellowship and friendship with God and the tragedy of his lost children. The mention of cream (not really "cream" but a fermented product of milk, similar to yogurt) and oil flowing from the rock (the olive press) provides a metaphor for Job's previous economic standing. These commodities were luxuries in a nomadic life and thus indicated the wealth that Job had enjoyed. They were so available to Job that he could speak of his life being washed with cream and pouring rivers of oil (v. 6).

Job's reference to his going out to the "gate" refers to the gate of the city as the place of political and civil deliberation; the city courts assembled there (Gen. 23:10, 18). Job was a significant personage in these deliberations. The square was an opening in the gate area. Both the deference (lit. "hiding") of the young men and the rising of the old reflected the high regard Job enjoyed (Job 29:8). "Hid" is hyperbole since the youth were not necessarily afraid but simply showing deference, while the act of standing until the great one, Job, took his seat was a precursor to a widely recognizable practice today.

The silence of the princes and nobles emphasized that everyone deferred to his presence and words. The language of the tongue being stuck to the roof of the mouth (v. 10) is graphic language used to conjure up, mainly for his own consolation, the awe in which he remembered being held by society's two categories then acknowledged, that is, age (young, old) and class (princes, nobles).

Verse 11 contains a manner of speaking that attributed to the ear and eye (in the Hebrew) what properly belonged to the person hearing or seeing. Those who saw and heard Job pronounced blessings upon him and approved of his actions. Verse 13 refers to two commendable meanings: Job received blessings from those he delivered from perishing, as well as the blessing of helping people. Verse 16 has been translated and understood as referring to Job looking into unfamiliar issues in order to help those who needed it, investigating matters before making a judicial decision, or to his taking up the cases of strangers.

Job said that he broke the fangs of the wicked and snatched the victims from their teeth (v. 17). Joel 1:6 uses the word "fangs" for lion's teeth, which provides both a frightful depiction of the wicked person in Job 29:17 and an all the more compelling sense of Job's courageous intervention. Bible readers may hear echoes of the David story (1 Sam. 17:34–35) though the second part of Job 29:17 can be understood and translated as "I made him cast prey from his teeth."

Verse 18 indicates that Job was reflecting on the expectations of one who had lived a God-fearing life as he had. He was not in complete disagreement with his friends' thoughts regarding the prosperity of the righteous and the destruction of the wicked—their retribution theology. But he recognized, as they apparently did not, that this is not a formulaic or axiomatic description of how things always work in life.

For having lived a life of care for and service to others, particularly the needy of society, he had expected to enjoy a long life—days like the sand (v. 18), a standard metaphor of multiplicity (Gen. 22:17; 41:49; Josh. 11:4); he also expected to be able to live out his days in peace and die in his (lit.) nest, that is, his home. This line almost defies the truth of death, so snug and cozy is the security of home ("my nest"). This was the prevailing concept across cultures at this time.

In Job 29:19 he employed a metaphor expressing the same idea found in the psalmist's figure of the righteous as a tree planted by the rivers of water (Ps. 1:3). It contrasts with the planting of the wicked, easily removed and not even missed by the ground from which they are uprooted (Job 8:15–18). Job expected to savor the dew (29:19), a major gift of heaven particularly valued in the desert lands of the Middle East. The dew was a constituent of the birthright, one of the OT's most significant blessings. Jacob received it from Isaac (Gen. 27:28), and the outmaneuvered Esau, when he pled for some paternal legacy too, was consoled with the promise of dew (v. 39). The bow (v. 20) reminds us that Jacob's benediction of Joseph celebrates his bow as abiding in physical and spiritual strength (Gen. 49:24; Ps. 127:3–5). Job had expected to be physically, mentally, and spiritually viable for a long time yet.

Job 29:22 refers to the previous effect of his words. The second portion of the verse could be rendered also, "My speech dropped on them"—like the dew. Among other uses, the verb "drop" refers to the preaching of the prophets (Amos 7:16; Mic. 2:6, 11). Job's audiences attached great significance to his words. In v. 24, the word sakhaq can be translated as "mocked," but it may also be rendered as "played," "smiled," or "laughed." Job, while complimenting himself, had already shown the awe in which he was held. In context he may have been saying that people considered it an almost unbelievable honor to be the object of Job's smile. In other words, it was easier to believe he was mocking them than that he was affirming them. Job's approving smile (lit. the light from his countenance/face) was thoroughly appreciated (see Pss. 4:6; 44:3). Job's words here also suggest that no one would do anything to lose his look of approval or to provoke its opposite, a dark countenance ("fallen" or "downcast" [Gen. 4:5, 6]; "sad" [Neh. 2:2, 3]; or "angry"/"horrified" [Prov. 25:23]). Verse 25 refers to Job's decision, which determined what everyone else would do. He was their leader.

30:1–31. Present Reality: Today's Disgrace.

Job proceeded to narrate the dramatic changes his life had undergone through his unexpected trial. He delineated (vv. 1–8) the small view he held of those who were now his tormentors. Their insults and life's torments (vv. 9–18) were possible because God had turned against him (vv. 19–26). Five more verses of personal lament (vv. 27–31) conclude the chapter. Job commented that the people mocking him were younger than he was and that he would not have even allowed their fathers to watch his dogs/sheepdogs (v. 1). Elihu's classic confession is illustrative of the status of youth in Job's traditional society (32:6). Dogs were a popular derogation in most periods of the ancient world—a fact reflected in Scripture (Ex. 11:7; 1 Sam. 17:43; 2 Kin. 8:13; Mark 7:27–28).

The Hebrew of v. 3 is unclear. The basic sense is that the people mocking Job were like hungry scavengers in the wilderness. They gathered mallow, a plant of the salt marshes (v. 4). The end of v. 4 refers to the broom tree or juniper tree, also known as the white broom tree, or white weeping broom tree; it was more a shrub than a tree but had a broad canopy, under which Elijah, for example, could sit in the shade when he fled from Jezebel (see 1 Kin. 19:4). It was used for kindling, but Job's tormentors used to gnaw on its roots for food. Job compared these unfortunate men to wild donkeys (v. 7). Despised and expelled by society, they huddled together for company and protection among the thorns of the desert. The expression of a song that taunts or mocks (v. 9) is later used to describe what Jerusalem had become to everyone after the Babylonian devastation of 586 B.C. (Lam. 3:14). Job described a topsy-turvy world in which the despised had become the despisers, and those who were society's outcasts might now pour scorn on one who had so recently stood at the apex of society.

Spitting in the face (v. 10) describes an action that was usually directed at individuals who refused to perform the levirate duty (see Deut. 25:5–9). But there is no indication that Job was being accused of such failure. He may simply have been the victim of an act that would be contemptuous, vile, in any culture. Jesus's tormentors spat in His face (Matt. 26:67).

The translation of Job 30:11 is problematic because the Hebrew manuscripts are divided between "His" and "my" before "bow" or "bowstring." This latter word can also be rendered as "rope" or "cord." In this reading ("my"), God deprived Job of his viability. The reading "His"

would probably require "His cord," indicating that God unleashed an assault on Job.

Some translations interpret v. 13 to mean that those attacking Job had no helper—they practiced this violence all on their own. Others translate it as their saying "no one can help him." Job sensed that his nobility was under assault and tirdop (from radap), which can mean "pursued" or "driven away" (v. 15). But if Job had lost his dignity, as indeed he had lost his prosperity, he never lost his integrity.

Job expressed his feelings that his end was approaching (v. 16). His assailants had been, in turn, a human rabble (vv. 1–13), impersonal terrors (v. 15), and, from v. 18 onward, God Himself (notice the third person referent of vv. 19, 24 and "You" in vv. 20–23). Verse 24 could refer to either God or a human; the verse's second line is also obscure. If God was the intended subject, the first line implies the idea of hitting one who is already down. If a human being was the intended subject, then the line indicates abject misery: someone pleading from—or even being likened to—a heap of ruins. Job seems to have been wondering how anyone could be so cruel as to strike down a person who in distress cries out to him or her for help. Verse 26 indicates more than just disappointment. It was the profound despair of thwarted expectations. How could God thus deal with one who had lived as conscientiously as he, weeping for those in trouble, grieving for the poor (v. 25)?

The alleged contradiction between hoping for good and fearing evil was more imagined than real. Thus it may be quite inappropriate to set Job's hope of good in contrast to his fear of ill. Jesus instructed His followers to daily pray for deliverance from evil—both the person of the evil one and the disruptions his power inflicts (Matt. 6:13). Job's eschewing evil signifies his consciousness of what to avoid. His hope for good (the Hebrew verb translated "looked for" means "hoped for") rested on his awareness that he had lived a God-fearing life. Based on this he expected to die in his nest/house (29:18). His understanding of a life of faithfulness to God is apparent in the narrative and in the divine comment about him (1:1, 8; 2:3), as well as in his actions on behalf of his children. Those actions revealed his constant awareness of human finitude and sinfulness. They also constantly acknowledged his dependence on substitutionary atonement by an innocent victim. Job showed that he knew that his only hope for forgiveness and cleansing from sin came through the vicarious sacrifice whose virtue he claimed by faith

(1:5). Those who seek for contradictions in the Job story may grant that his condition through the dialogue is itself a grand and inherently traumatic contradiction, as his own words establish (9:20–21). But it is admirable that even through this new and miserable turn of life he may have consistently contended that God knew of his loyalty, faithfulness to His commands, and treasuring of God's words—even more than his daily food (23:10–12). The pathos of Job 30:19–26, most clearly heard against this background, points to Job's strong feelings that now, in his suffering, God appeared to be unfaithful to His unerringly faithful servant.

Verse 28 has been taken to mean that Job was mourning but not “in the sun” or that he was “blackened, but not by the sun.” This is because qadar means “darkened” but is also associated with mourning (Jer. 8:21). Job was reduced to begging from the very ones who once looked up to him as a king (29:25). His pleas were probably unrelated to his sores or lost children. Job's great burden was his besmirched reputation and his inaccessible God whom he longed to have vindicate him.

Verse 29 refers to “ostriches,” also translated “owls.” Job's cries called to mind the shrieks of jackals and owls. Multiple biblical references to their dwelling among ruins, particularly jackals (Is. 34:13; Jer. 9:11; 10:22), show that he may also have equated himself with them in terms of his own status as an outcast. The music of his life had been transposed into grief (v. 31).

31:1–40. Constant Commitment: An Oath of Integrity. In this chapter, Job unleashed his most powerful denunciation of his friends' unwarranted accusations by describing, in detail, the course of life he was known to have followed before unspeakable tragedy struck. He invoked multiple curses on himself for any forthcoming contradiction of any of his declarations about his personal, social, and economic morality. The strength of his avowals lay in more than the fervor he exhibited or the courtroom imagery with God as Judge (see vv. 35–36; also, vv. 14, 28). The moral vindication that Job could not find from the God who continued to be silent, he found in the inability of any human being—neighbor, alien/stranger, orphan, or widow—to speak in opposition to his testimony of personal integrity. Job spoke (vv. 1–12) of the inner workings of his soul to which God alone is privy; addressed (vv. 13–23) his treatment of his slaves and of society's needy (e.g., widow, orphan), conduct for which he would be equally culpable before God but that would be apparent to his fellow humans; spoke (vv. 24–28) of idolatry—whether of the worship of gold or of sun or moon—and declared his freedom from it; extolled (vv. 29–32) his charity to enemy, neighbor, and alien alike; asserted (vv. 33–34) his freedom from hypocrisy—behavior based on what others might say; dared (in the bold invocation of vv. 35–37) God Himself and his enemy—perhaps a parallel reference to God again—to answer him (i.e., to prove him wrong). Surprisingly, his closing appeal was not before God Himself but before the land: he would have it actively demonstrate its disapproval if he had not related responsibly to these elements of his environment (vv. 38–40). With this the narrator announces the conclusion of Job's self-defense.

Job had made a covenant with his eyes to not 'etbonen a young woman (v. 1). This is from the verb bin—“to understand,” “to consider.” Some translators render the verb “to look” or “to look lustfully” in accordance with the reference to the eyes. Job had determined to not even consider committing adultery. The language of Job's morality was as elevated as the principles it described. It is difficult to find a more solemn OT ritual than covenant making (lit. “cutting”). Cutting a covenant, or making an agreement, implied a willingness to be cut asunder if one violated the terms of the agreement. Job's agreement with his eyes was no more stern than Jesus's own words concerning plucking out an eye if it were causing sin (Matt. 5:29). Job had fretted at the obsessive closeness of God's supervision that counted his steps (Job 7:19; 14:16). He knew that God saw him. But he also valued this very guardianship (31:4). It helped him to eschew evil. Also, the fact that God saw him was a solid basis for assurance of vindication. God knew his way (Job 23:10). He was confident that he could be weighed in “honest”—“just” or “righteous”—scales. Subjected to righteous judgment, Job's integrity would shine forth before God.

Job could swear that no blemish defiled his hands (31:7). He vowed that if he had been unfaithful, then it should be that others should eat what he had sown. God predicted this consequence for Israel if they chose the path of rebellion: others would eat what they planted (Deut. 28:30, 33). Verses 9–10 exemplify lex talionis—the law of eye for eye and tooth for tooth—the principle that the punishment must fit the crime (see Ex. 21:23–32). Job's adultery would be an offense against another man (Lev. 18:8, 16); he would have to pay for it by being equivalently shamed.

Job 31:14 indicates the rising up of God the Judge for a decision regarding Job's guilt or innocence (Deut. 19:15–17; Is. 33:10; Dan. 12:1). The word peqad (Job 31:14) literally means “to visit” (Gen. 21:1; 50:25; Ex. 4:31; Ps. 106:4), but this word is also used in the OT to mean “to punish” (e.g., Isa. 26:21; 29:6; Jer. 44:29) or “to care for” or “to come to aid” (Zech. 10:3). Some translators render the word neutrally—that is, “visit” or “examine” or “call me to account”—and others as “punish.” No matter which meaning is meant, Job was probably not thinking of punishment, but he knew that God would show up to scrutinize his conduct and that any divine verdict would be preceded by a divine investigation (e.g., Gen. 3:8–24; 18:20–19:29; Dan. 7:19–22, 23–27).

In Job 31:15, he stated the rationale that framed all his human relationships, a Creation principle that dictated the ethics of both commercial and noncommercial interaction, whether with people accountable to him or among society's poor for whose needs he felt a sense of personal responsibility (vv. 13–20). Job's membership among the ranks of the privileged of his society did not alienate him from the community's poverty stricken. His Creation principle, and the ethics it constrained, always works to remedy societal inequities such as slavery and human exploitation of all sorts that demean children or youth, women or men formed in the image and after the likeness of the Creator God.

Job affirmed that he had not raised his hand against the fatherless (v. 21). In the Bible the gesture of raising the hand generally expresses hostility; here it was something that Job had avoided. The verb nup, often translated as “raised,” could be more explicitly rendered as “waved” or “wielded my hand against.” Isaiah predicted terror to the Egyptians when the Lord of Hosts performed this action (Is. 19:16). Job refrained from hostility against the undefended even when he had support from the politically powerful, those in the gate (see commentary on Job 29:1–25). Based on 31:22, he understood and appreciated the significance of lex talionis; indeed, he considered the punishment of “eye for an eye” to be from God (v. 23).

The end of v. 27 has been rendered variously (“my mouth has kissed my hand,” “my hand offered them a kiss,” “threw a kiss with my hand”). It reads, literally, “my hand has kissed my mouth.” The action would be a gesture of veneration to stellar objects (sun, moon) deified in many ANE cultures and countries. But for Job, neither astral deities nor the temptation to adore material wealth, personal abilities, and success would distract him from worshiping the true God (vv. 24–27). He would have no other gods before the Lord of heaven (v. 28).

Job averred that he did not rejoice at the destruction of his enemies by pridefully gloating over them (v. 29). Having progressed from his focus on inner integrity before God to his relations with society's vulnerable, thence to the issue of false gods, Job now spoke with equal clarity of conscience on the subject of enemies and aliens. They, as surely as his own people, had been the objects of his charity. Job here also denied asking for a curse upon his enemy's “soul/life” (v. 30). He did not rejoice when his enemies received what they deserved. The thought is similar to Jesus's words in the Sermon on the Mount. Job does seem to have been committed to doing good to them, if v. 31 (on providing food for all and sundry) is to be read in the context of v. 30.

Job also denied covering his transgressions as Adam had and as many people still did and do (v. 33): “adam” is the Hebrew term for “man,” “human.” Job was repudiating the charge, so typical of human beings, of concealing guilt to preserve their dignity before others or even resorting to avoiding contact with the public by staying indoors (v. 34). Zophar had implied that Job may have been hiding wickedness under his tongue (20:12), and Eliphaz had accused him of claiming that God could not see through the dark cloud (22:13–14). Job was denying any such behavior but did not, as before (31:6, 8, 10, 22), propose any negative consequence to himself should what he denied actually be true. Instead he passed on to the most daring of all his implied self-imprecations, challenging God or whoever might be his prosecutor to contradict or, in any particular, falsify his testimony. He presented his taw, that is, his “mark,” in this case meaning his “signature” (v. 35). Job had, in effect, volunteered his own affidavit, sworn to and signed off on it, ready to plead his innocence against any indictment.

Job's attitude was the direct opposite of the cowering culprit who hides indoors. Rather, he would decorate himself with the accusations against him, totally confident of vindication. The more conspicuous the charges of the prosecutor, the more glorious would be his exoneration (v. 36). He could not go wrong, for he would be declaring the number of his steps (v. 37) to the very One who had watched over and counted them Himself. He would do it like a prince or ruler (v. 37).

In vv. 38–40 Job expressed his ecological sensitivity. Long before it was in vogue to care about the environment, the voice of Scripture was audible in solicitude for the earth and its produce. Job's inheritance in this regard was bequeathed from earth's first man and woman, and thence from the Creator Himself, to tend and care for the perfect garden (Gen. 2:8, 15). Israel's agrarian economy was to run on rhythms of work and rest for people and for land (Ex. 23:10–11; 25:8–12). Job's sensitivity to the needs of his land led him to invoke once more the law of an eye for an eye, though on this final occasion it was the earth itself that would wreak vengeance on him (Job 31:40).

The narrator's statement of the conclusion of Job's words employs a provocative word-play by resorting to the same root (tamam, "to complete," "to be blameless") that opened, and has fueled, the whole drama of the book. From the opening verse, readers are introduced to Job as blameless (tam). The narrator chose to conclude the interlocation between Job and his three friends by stating that Job's words are completed (tammu). The statement obliquely reminds us of Job's last affirmation before the dialogue's start. There, despite his sudden devastation and personal affliction, and the urging of his wife to do otherwise, he did not misspeak (2:10). Job also spoke (31:30) about not allowing his mouth to sin. At the book's denouement God twice ruled in Job's favor with a startling rebuke of his friends because they had not spoken correctly about Him as Job had (42:7–8). Whatever the human judgment on Job, by his friends and by generations of readers, God and the narrator establish that there is more to his conclusion than simply an end. His words may be said to be complete. His declaration of innocence ended, Job now expected God to show the evidence against him.

32:1–37:24

A New Voice

The next speaker, Elihu, seems unexpected since there was no earlier indication of his presence (2:11–13). His genealogical record is given and also his emotional state (32:1–5). After his own introduction (vv. 6–22), he would, in his speech, attempt to answer Job's arguments addressing divine chastening (33:1–33) and freedom (34:1–37), Job's culpability (35:1–16), and God's justice and power (36:1–37:24).

32:1–5. Righteous Indignation: Introduction of Elihu. The three most significant bits of information that introduce Elihu are his identity, his relative age, and his current feelings. Much of this is stated elaborately. Job and his mature friends who appear in the book of Job's dialogue as its major personalities come to the story with rather basic information—their names and where they lived. By contrast, Elihu is introduced with an elaborate genealogy and an emphatic word on his disturbed emotional state. And all of this is set in the context of his youth, which is given as the reason why he was not worthy to speak before. It is difficult to ignore the irony that the one least established in society and in this conversation is the one with the grander genealogy. Further, the quadruple statement that his anger was aroused (vv. 2–3, 5) helps prepare the reader for the ambitious exposition that is about to follow from a sincere and insecure young man.

As his final declaration of innocence (chap. 31) makes most clear, Job continued to believe that he was an honest, decent person. The Hebrew construction in 32:2 has been rendered as "justified himself rather than God," "justified himself before God," or "justified himself more than God" comes from Eliphaz's visionary experience (4:17) and should not be given a comparative translation ("more than") either here or in 4:17 because Job has not been in competition with God for righteousness. Eliphaz has said, by revelation, that God despises His intelligent creation, even His angels. But God has stated that He is proud of Job. This becomes the issue of the dialogue (see "The Vision/Dream of Eliphaz," p. 630). And on this question, the message that emerges from the book of Job is that Job's consciousness of his failings, finitude, and sinfulness did not disqualify him from the assurance of salvation and security and righteousness by faith. Job was not justified "rather than" God, but he was justified before God on the grounds of his constant dependence on God's grace (cf. 1:5), manifested in his faithfulness to Him.

Elihu showed a sense of justice: it was unsound for the friends to condemn Job while lacking proper arguments (32:3). Elihu himself would follow the social practice of the young deferring to their elders. Not only had he acted properly, but he was anxious to make this clear once he did speak up (vv. 6–7, 11–12, 16).

32:6–22. Elihu's Self-Introduction. In his eagerness to express the urgency of his words being heard, Elihu likened himself to a wind-bag about to burst. The point of his protracted self-introduction was that he had listened, as was proper, for a long time, and now he had a right to speak. Elihu claimed to have felt shy. He thought that “age should speak” (v. 7), literally, “days should speak” (i.e., more experienced people should be given preference). “Days” is sometimes used in place of “years,” as is clear from the second part of the verse, since the focus is on how many of them someone has lived. But God can give wisdom to anyone, not just those who have lived a greater number of days (v. 8). Elihu emphatically states, “I, even I” (v. 10; cf. v. 17), either nervously, arrogantly, or with nervous arrogance. His mention of the wind within him literally means “the wind in my belly.” The idea of words as wind (or windy words) has already been so mocked (8:2; 15:2; 16:2–4) that Elihu only exposes himself to ridicule by speaking thus of himself. But he felt forced to speak, fearing that otherwise God would punish him (32:22).

33:1–33. Elihu’s First Speech: Self-Validation and the Value of Chastening.

This speech combined discussions about Elihu’s appropriateness as speaker and arguments on the spiritual value of chastening. Elihu’s challenge (v. 5) anticipated God’s own to Job in 38:1–3 and 40:1–2, 6–7. Some interpreters find that Elihu spoke for God, while others think that his challenge was a parody of God’s justified demand that Job face up and answer His questions. Elihu was just as insistent as the others that Job had done something specifically to warrant a punishment from God in the form of his afflictions (which could be implied from 34:36–37). It would appear that Elihu was paraphrasing Job’s words insisting on his innocence (33:9; cf. 9:21; 10:7; 16:17), at least his innocence in regard to specific sins for which he was being punished, as his other friends had asserted. Job had been clear (repeatedly) that he knew he was a sinner (7:21; 13:23, 26; 14:17; 31:33). Although Elihu’s words (33:10–11) come from Job (cf. 13:24, 27), Job had not said anywhere in this dialogue the exact words that Elihu claims (33:9) to have heard him say. The basic meaning of v. 12 is that Elihu was saying that Job was incorrect.

Elihu sensed God’s transcendence—God did not have to give an account for His works and made a sympathetic allusion (vv. 14–18) to Eliphaz’s revelatory experience. The reference to “pit” (v. 18) here means death (17:16; Ps. 30:3). Elihu took up a familiar theme and image in 33:21: Job had spoken of the suffering of the bones of his body (4:14; 30:17, 30), in contrast with the prosperity of the bones of the wicked (21:24), yet Zophar for his part had tried to describe the misery of the wicked person’s bones (20:11).

Perhaps Elihu mentioned a messenger/angel, a mediator (33:23), because Job had wished for an arbitrator (9:33). But according to Elihu, who speaks in favor of the question, God’s answer would be a rebuke to both him and Job (40:1–2). The word usually rendered as “ransom” in 33:24 is related to the verb which means “to make atonement.” Though he did not elaborate on the idea, Elihu’s unclear thoughts nevertheless seem to suggest something of deep theological value: that the ransom (or the atonement) may be effected through the mediator he had mentioned. The mention of two or three times (v. 29) means that God tries repeatedly to save His children from disaster, without any specific numeric value. In v. 32, Elihu suggested that he was working hard to persuade Job that he had his best interest at heart. Like Eliphaz (5:27), Elihu spoke as if he were very secure in the role of instructor (33:33).

34:1–37. Elihu’s Second Speech: Job’s Impertinence and God’s Freedom.

Elihu expanded on the theme of God’s freedom to do what He wills. Job had already spoken of the ear (12:11); Elihu describes it as the agent of wisdom, analyzing and critiquing words (34:3). Then, following his alleged quotation of Job’s words (vv. 5–6; cf. 27:2), he rebuked Job for saying that there was no profit to delighting in God. Job had not said this precisely though he said something similar in 9:22. Job had actually attributed the more exact phraseology used by Elihu here to the wicked in 21:15. Perhaps Elihu was saying that Job was sounding too much like the wicked that he himself had denounced (34:8). The thrust of Elihu’s argument, consistent with the theology of Job’s three friends, was that God is too great to be wrong—an idea that Job probably supported but that made his suffering more intense because in his case God did appear to be doing him wrong. Elihu was suggesting that Job, in his questionings, was coming too close to accusing God. All flesh would perish if God took back His breath (vv. 14–15). God would not be governing if He hated justice (v. 17).

Verse 18 has been rendered in different ways. According to some translators, Elihu was using rhetorical questions to show by analogy the lack of wisdom in questioning God too much: “Is it fitting to say to a king, ‘You are worthless?’” According to others, perhaps closer to the meaning of the text, Elihu was saying that God condemns whomever He wills, even if they are kings or nobles: “Is He [God] not the One who says to kings, ‘You are worthless?’”

Elihu finished his explanation of why Job was wrong by pointing out that God sees everything (vv. 21–22) and as a result does not need to have anyone appear before Him for judgement (v. 23). Those who are wicked, He punishes (vv. 24–27), particularly those who oppress others (v. 28). He is in control for the good of the people (v. 30), and no person or nation can stop Him (v. 29). Ultimately Elihu wanted Job to understand that simply denying that he did something wrong did not make it so (vv. 32–33). And saying that he had had enough punishment would not lift the punishment (v. 31). As a result, the words Job said sounded like foolishness (vv. 34–35) and worse, rebellion (v. 37). Job had clapped at his friends. During the time of Jeremiah this was a way to show contempt (Lam. 2:15). Because of this Elihu judged that Job deserved punishment without mercy (34:36).

35:1–16. Elihu’s Third Speech: Job’s Flagrant Culpability. In this speech Elihu was more consistently negative than ever. He drew out the implications of Eliphaz’s revealed message: neither humans’ wickedness nor their goodness makes any difference to or impression on God (vv. 4–8). He quoted Job as saying that his righteousness was more than God’s (v. 2), an idea introduced in the argument by Eliphaz as a revelation from a spirit (4:17). They are both on the wrong side because the revelation is a deception. Elihu was angry that Job’s companions had not been able to silence him (32:3, 5). He now meant to set them all straight. The truth is, Elihu argues, that when evil is overwhelming, people cry out (v. 9). Cries of desperation may be evidence that sufferers still need to learn the lesson God wishes to teach them (v. 12); they are still proud. He concluded that Job’s speeches were useless in that they did not accomplish anything (v. 16). This callous theology most probably infuriated and insulted both Job and God.

36:1—37:24. Elihu’s Fourth Speech: Divine Justice and Power. In this last speech, Elihu argued that the order of the cosmos validates the law of divine retribution according to which doing what is right brings blessings from the Lord and doing wrong results in divine judgement against the wicked. Within such a theology, there is no way to justify Job’s argument. His only way out is to turn away from iniquity (36:21). He spoke of himself as one who had knowledge “from afar” (v. 3) and set out to vindicate God (vv. 2–3). Some suggest that Elihu referred to himself as the one with “perfect knowledge” of what he was about to discuss, while others suggest that the knowledge from “afar” meant knowledge from God (v. 4). When Elihu referred to (in the Hebrew) the opening (or “uncovering”) of the ear (vv. 10, 15), he probably meant that God helps them to hear—listen and learn—sometimes through suffering.

Elihu’s depiction of retribution is preserved in 36:5–12, where he argued that God does not preserve the wicked alive but vindicates the oppressed (v. 6) and greatly blesses the righteous (v. 7). Elihu alluded to the experience of Job when he considered the possibility that a righteous person may experience affliction. But according to him, in such cases God was disciplining the righteous. God wanted them to acknowledge their transgression and pride and to turn from iniquity (vv. 8–10). Were they to return to God, they would prosper; otherwise they would “perish by the sword” (vv. 11–15). Job’s servants had died by the sword (1:15, 17).

Elihu addressed Job directly to apply the results of his previous discussion about God’s power to him. He argued that had Job turned to God, He would have delivered him from his distress. Salvation is often described in the Bible as being placed by the Lord in a broad place (v. 16)—free from emotional or physical confinement. Various translations and scholars differ on the words and meaning of v. 18. Some translations express the idea that Job should beware of God’s wrath and that a large ransom could not help him to escape it. Others suggest that Job should not let wrath lead him to scoffing and that he should not let the greatness of the ransom turn him aside. Still others read the verse as a warning against being enticed by riches. In Job’s case, he received from the Lord the punishment deserved by the wicked (v. 18). It would be impossible for him to provide a ransom that would free him from God’s wrath (vv. 18–20). Since Job did not turn from iniquity, he was being afflicted (v. 21). God had been trying to teach him something, but he chose not to learn.

The last section of Elihu’s speech is a description of God’s power over the natural world, more specifically over meteorological phenomena such as rain, clouds, thunder, and lightning (vv. 27–33). These God uses to judge people, which in context means to give abundant food to some and punish others.

These ideas are further developed in chapter 37, where Elihu speaks again directly to Job (v.

2). The main emphasis was on the lightning and thunder (vv. 3–5), interpreted by him as God’s voice, although the snow is mentioned as well as ice storms. They are all under the power of God, and consequently, they do whatever He commands them to perform (vv. 6–12). The reason for the discussion of God’s power over nature is clearly stated by Elihu: to correct the wicked or to show His mercy to others (v. 13)—the law of radical retribution. He confronted Job with a list of rhetorical questions on the topic of God’s works of creation to demonstrate, as in the previous passages, that God is righteous in whatever He does (vv. 14–22). Elihu felt that because nature spoke so strongly about God’s goodness and wisdom, God could not be questioned regarding the punishment that Job was clearly enduring. Consequently, the real topic was not the natural world but the fact that God is abundant in justice and that He does not oppress the innocent (v. 23), implying that Job was not as innocent as he claimed. God gives to humans what each one deserves because He is absolutely impartial. The only thing expected from Job was to revere God (v. 24).

It is clear that Elihu’s last speech is from beginning to end about his personal understanding of divine retribution. It is particularly interesting that his discussion of God’s power over nature is exclusively about meteorology, in which God is described as a storm god who controls thunder, rain, wind, and lightning. The servants of Job were killed by lightning, and his sons and daughters by a strong wind (1:16, 18–19). The implication is that since God controls storms, He used them to discipline or punish Job. According to Elihu, Job stood condemned before the Lord. But one more voice is about to be heard in the dialogue.

38:1—42:6

THE THEOPHANY: GOD CONFRONTS JOB

The transition between chapters 37 and 38 appears to be a little abrupt. Unlike all other times, here Job did not respond when Elihu finished speaking. The reason is that in his last speech Job presented before God the evidence of his innocence (an oath of integrity) and then waited for the Lord to speak and present evidence against him. However, God cannot be forced to speak whenever a human being wants Him to speak; He is the one who decides when to answer. Meanwhile the time between Job’s last speech and the divine response was filled by the unexpected speech of Elihu. When God finally appeared on the scene to address Job, He ignored Elihu’s speech, given after Job’s dialogue with his friends had ended. The Lord entered in a whirlwind that seemingly brushed aside the speaking Elihu, whom God does not even mention when He later rebuked the three friends (42:6–9). Some have suggested that God seems to have continued the theme of Elihu on God’s power over nature and that, consequently, what Elihu stated was basically right. As we have seen, this is hardly the case because Elihu’s theological agenda was radically different from God’s.

It was from the whirlwind that God delivered two monologues, each followed by short dialogues: first divine monologue (38:1—39:30), dialogue between God and Job (40:1–5), second divine monologue (40:6—41:34), and dialogue between God and Job (42:1–6). Terrifying natural displays (v. 1) are a standard feature of the self-revelations of the God who is Creator and Lord of all nature (Ex. 19:16–20; Ps. 50:3–4; Ezek. 1:4; Nah. 1:3; Hab. 3:3–15; Zech. 9:14).

38:1—39:30

Yahweh’s First Monologue: God’s Omnipotence

In the first divine monologue God appeared and summoned Job to enter into a dialogue with Him (38:1–3), something Job had been asking for (13:22; 23:5). God questioned Job about inanimate objects (38:4–38) and providence and the fauna (38:39—39:30). These were rhetorical questions that God did not expect Job to answer and that, in any case, he would not have been able to answer.

38:1–3. Job’s Surprise: Yahweh’s Appearance and Summons.

Though Job had long clamored for a hearing before God, he was totally unprepared when it took place. He did not even speak when God challenged him to the confrontation. Then God unleashed a torrent of questions upon him. According to God’s initial challenge, Job’s uninformed words obscured the issue (v. 2). Yet God would say at the end that no one had spoken as rightly concerning Him as Job had (42:7, 9). Evidently, neither Job nor any of the other speakers fully grasped the issues at stake—none of them knew of Satan’s cynical demand. Nevertheless, God did find something to honor in both Job’s words and spirit during the stormy dialogue with his friends. Verse 3 reads literally, “Gird up your loins,” which originally referred to pulling up one’s long robe between one’s legs and tucking it into the belt to prepare one to move more freely—or to be ready to perform a difficult task (1 Kin. 18:46; Jer. 1:17).

38:4—39:30. Yahweh's Transcendence: Rhetorical Questions to Job. God next subjected Job to a series of questions that first covered inanimate elements (38:4–38) and the fauna (38:39—39:30). Through a speech overflowing with attractive metaphors, God emphasized His awareness of both animate and inanimate creation and His care for a fallen creation: the fierce lion, scavenging vulture, gentle mountain goat, and vulnerable ostrich, as well as the man on the war horse. God's questions and survey show Him as very much aware of it all—the implication being that He was not simply aware but running, managing, controlling all life and nature, something Job was not unaware of (12:9–10).

The parallel reference to morning stars and sons of God, sometime rendered “angels” (38:7), indicates that they designate the intelligent, non-divine members of God's court first mentioned in Job 1:6. Doors, womb, and wrapping in darkness (38:8–9) are all metaphors for shorelines that keep the sea in bounds. The imageries highlight both the sea's almost irrepressible nature and the Lord's creative authority and control. Commanding the morning amounts to ordering the sun to rise and the light to reach out to the earth (v. 13). In v. 13, God is alluding to Job's own concern with criminal activity being covered by darkness (24:13–17) and reminds him that commanding the light would enable God to control such activity. Light gives and reveals the earth's character and contours, shape, and beauty. Since light is withheld (38:15) from the wicked, their wickedness is cemented, which will ultimately result in their final collapse. Job is ignorant of the storehouse of the snow, thus pointing to his inability to rule over it (v. 22). While the identity of some of the terms used to refer to heavenly bodies remains uncertain, Job is not unaware of these starry elements (vv. 31–32). He has already cited their testimony to God's power as seen in their creation (9:9). God then proceeded to question whether Job knew the rules of astronomy that are related to things on earth (38:33).

Concerning v. 36, interpreters are divided between those who render “mind” and “heart” in this verse and those who consider these rare terms as references to some creature of nature such as an “ibis” and “cock.” Verse 39 seems to open a new series of questions, this time on faunal references (lion), suggesting that “ibis” and “rooster” would be out of place in vv. 4–38. But whether put into a human heart or a rooster brain, wisdom always has its source in God. According to God, the chicks cry to Him for food, and He provides for them (v. 41).

The Hebrew term pere', translated sometimes as “onager” (39:5), designates the wild donkey that prefers the open countryside to the crowded population centers. Concerning the ostrich, it is said literally that “God caused her to forget wisdom.” This does not mean that she lost something she once had (v. 17). She simply lacks what others may possess. The stork is both more elegant in motion (ostriches cannot fly) and respected for its intelligence (cf. Jer. 8:7). But whatever her lack, the ostrich too possesses her strength. God has made her a great runner (39:18). The bird's size warrants the expression “on high.” The Hebrew word ra'mah (v. 19) has an uncertain meaning. It could be from the word ra'am—“to thunder.” Others have suggested that it refers to the “mane” of the horse. But it is also read as “quivering” or “vibration” and as such in this context could refer to a horse in battle when it moves with speed and passion.

The Lord's first monologue ranged widely through the mysteries of earth's founding and the sea's boundaries to light and rain, young lion, wild ox and donkey, ostrich and blood-sucking eaglet. No doubt there are countless more examples that God could have given. It is likely that He chose these because they were significant to Job and a familiar aspect of life in that part of the world. One who does not properly credit the story's integrity and its principal character's intelligence may conclude that this sequence makes no sense, whether as resolution of Job's dilemma or even confirmation of the theology of the friends or Elihu.

In order to gain a better understanding of the speech, it is necessary to return to the prologue, where Satan questioned God's integrity in relation to how He governs the world. Thus in this context, God's speeches provide testimony regarding how He runs the universe that He created, revealing that in the midst of conflicts and struggles He continues to care and to provide for all of His creation. There are not ulterior motives for providing for His creation, as Satan argued, except that He by nature cares for what is His. Unquestionably the speeches reaffirm the conviction that God is greater than Job, but their ultimate intention was to show that God freely provides and cares for His creation because that is who He is. The experience of Job, who never abandoned the Lord, shows that the relationship between humans and God is grounded in disinterested love.

40:1–5

Dialogue between God and Man: Job's First Concession

God's first monologue had sufficiently exposed Job to the limits of his knowledge and pointed not only to his position in relation to God but also to God's loving concern and care for His creation. Now God rightly demanded an answer from one who had brought a lawsuit against Him (v. 2). He had stated His case. Job must react.

Job averred that he was qalloti—"insignificant" (some translations have "vile"; v. 4). In fact, the nature and content of the answer may be even more striking than the fact that he spoke. He acknowledged that it was impossible for him to answer God's questions, but he was not yet ready to surrender his claim. This explains the need for a second divine speech.

40:6—42:6

Yahweh's Second Monologue: God's Supremacy

In this second monologue God confronted Job with the question of whether he would actually be willing to challenge or refute God's judgment (v. 8). If Job wanted to challenge God, he would first have to challenge the mightiest creatures God had supremacy over. God as a God of order controls Behemoth (40:15–24) and Leviathan (41:1–34), and if there is any need He restores order.

40:6–14. Challenge Renewed: Offer of Divine Prerogatives. While Job had conceded that he was not able to answer God's questions, the lesson was still not over. Heaven's purposes are not served simply because creatures acknowledge their finitude. Indeed, that would wonderfully justify the taunts of the adversary whose cynicism initiated Job's drama. It would support his claim that the relationship between God and His intelligent creation is servile—that creaturely loyalty is apparent rather than real. God is both all-knowing and all-wise. But He is also all-caring. Because Job grasped this foundational truth of His character, God, in the end, would strongly affirm him. Because the three friends both missed and denounced it, God, in the end, would fiercely denounce them. Thus, it was necessary for God to continue.

God's terseness in repeating His challenge to Job was followed by a grand elaboration on the idea of girding up one's loins. God explained the nature of the task to which He was summoning Job. In effect, He wished Job to see that it was his adversarial manner, and not his sense of questioning the meaning and justice of his lot, that God rejected. God did not have to be guilty for Job to be right (v. 8).

Nothing in the theophany is more crucial for interpreting the second divine monologue, and particularly the Leviathan phenomenon, than the topic of pride directly associate with the attitude of the wicked (vv. 11–14). The discussion is now about who is powerful enough to humiliate the proud and defeat the wicked. If Job could do such a thing (resolve the problem of evil in the world), then God would acknowledge the saving power of Job. Obviously, Job could not accomplish such a task. It was too much for him, and God would make this absolutely clear to Job through the introduction in His speech of two formidable beasts: the Behemoth and the Leviathan. Indeed, there was none but God Himself who could dare to trifle with such beasts—even Leviathan, the king over all the proud (lit. "sons of pride"; 41:34).

40:15–24. Managing the Created Order: Behemoth. The first beast mentioned in the second divine speech was the Behemoth (v. 15; see below, "Behemoth"). The word is feminine

Behemoth

The identity of the Behemoth has created much discussion, and three primary explanations have been suggested. The first seeks to match the description with a known living creature. The second seeks to identify an extinct creature. The third relegates it to the realm of mythology or poetic invention. Those in the first group generally identify Behemoth as a hippopotamus. Those in the second group typically suggest a dinosaur (generally one of the sauropods [four-legged herbivore] or ornithopods [two-legged herbivore]). But this is extremely difficult to demonstrate. The Behemoth is not mentioned in the literature of the ANE at all, which makes the mythical interpretation highly unlikely. It is also difficult to imagine why God would point to an imaginary creature as the penultimate illustration of His supremacy. Finally, the Behemoth is mentioned in the Hebrew text of the Creation account (Gen. 1:24) as created by God. As a result, the third suggestion seems fundamentally flawed. There are several things that we can say about this beast.

1. Description of the Beast. The final identity of the Behemoth remains unclear, but the biblical description of this beast, found in 40:15–24, fits quite well that of the hippopotamus, with the exception of its tail (which is described as being like a cedar; v. 17). The tail of the hippopotamus is short, while the cedars are tall trees. But it has been suggested that perhaps the comparison is not in terms of size but in terms of firmness or stiffness, and in that case the comparison with the tail of the hippopotamus fits. Unquestionably, in the description of the physical features of the animal, poetic hyperbolic language is employed to emphasize its uniqueness and strength.

2. Absence of Violence. God did not emphasize the violence of the animal at all, but it was certainly not a friendly beast. It hid but was self-confident and powerful (v. 23)—so powerful that humans were unable to subdue it, including more precisely Job (v. 24). God was the only one powerful enough to approach it, and He did so with His sword at hand (v. 19) to keep it under control. This implies that only through a struggle would the beast finally be defeated by the Lord.

3. Created by the Lord. Perhaps more importantly, Behemoth was created by the Lord as one of His most important creatures (v. 19; first in the sense of preeminent). Although created by God, it appears that for some unknown reason it opposed God, and He had to control it by using His sword. One could suggest that the contrast is between how it was created—re'shit (v. 19), “beginning” or “chief”—and what it has become now. In that case it was somewhat similar to Satan in 1:6. He was among the sons of God, challenged God, and was defeated by the Lord. Over such an enemy Job had no power, but the Lord did. Using creatures as metaphors for an evil power was a common practice attested to in ANE cultures.

More specifically, the hippopotamus was a symbol of evil powers in ancient Egypt. The hunting of the hippopotamus in Egypt was associated with a religious ritual in which the pharaoh, representing Horus, killed the hippopotamus, representing Seth, thus symbolically defeating evil. Since in the second divine speech God raised the question of who was able to bring to an end the proud wicked, thus resolving the problem of evil (40:11–13), God was clarifying that He is the only One who can control evil in the world. Whatever evil Job was experiencing, it was not undefeatable because the Lord had power over it and controlled its damaging effects (cf. 2:6).

plural from behemah (“beast,” “cattle”), evidently functioning as a name or title since the creature was spoken of as masculine. By poetic intention, the identity of this creature remains somewhat vague, but God spoke of it as a creature of preeminence (v. 19), subject only to His own control. The main point of this description is the creature’s power and fearlessness (v. 23). Verse 24 is difficult to interpret, but it is better to read it as a rhetorical question: “Can anyone catch him with [or in] his eyes?” “With [or in] his eyes” may mean “while he is alert” or, possibly, by poking something into his eyes, which would parallel the verse’s second strophe, putting a hook into his nose.

41:1–34. Beyond Behemoth: Leviathan. While Behemoth was unknown in ANE literature, Leviathan was a known mythic creature. Behemoth was introduced with an invitation to look at it and was identified as a creature of God. Both of these elements point to the reality of the Behemoth, an identifiable object of God’s creation, as Job was. But Leviathan, who followed, was both better known and less concrete in the ANE, a many-headed dragon also known as Lotan, who ruled the chaos of the deep and was attacked and defeated by other Canaanite deities (see “Leviathan,” p. 654). Much of his description in Job 41 evokes the image of the crocodile, which, like the hippopotamus, was a constant and menacing feature of Egyptian Nile waters. Still, attempts to limit his identity to that of the crocodile do not seem to be that productive.

The fishing methods mentioned in vv. 1–2 were useless in the case of the Leviathan. In Job 41 the horrible might of the description

Leviathan

Certainly, the image of Leviathan is much more complex than that of the Behemoth and would require a little more analysis. The Bible provides a more detailed description of it, and we do have some pertinent ANE literature that need to be taken into consideration.

1. ANE Background. In the ancient Canaanite literature, Lotan, or Litanu, is a mythological, snake-like creature that threatened the order of the world, making it necessary for Baal or his sister to attack and defeat him. Its name means “the fleeing serpent.” Lotan, together with Mot, the god of death, and Yamm, the god of the sea, represented the forces of chaos. Similar ideas are found in the mythology of Mesopotamia, where a seven-headed monster was defeated by Nabu (a wisdom god). Scholars tend to associate the mythological conflict among the gods with the creation of the cosmos. In such mythological ideas the motif of the conflict-with-chaos describes the rise of a hostile monster, a god who defeats him, and the creation of the world. It is possible that Leviathan was the creature behind these ANE ideas, and thus they could be useful when exploring biblical passages where Leviathan is mentioned. They should not determine the meaning of the text but can certainly help to clarify its message.

2. Leviathan as God’s Creature and Enemy. The Bible describes Leviathan as one of God’s creatures. According to Psalm 104:26, God formed it, and it dwelt in the sea together with many other creatures, large and small, which means that it was not a mythological creature. The text does not provide enough information for us to identify it with any known animal still living today; we can only say that it is described as a large sea creature. In His dialogue with Job, God asked him a series of questions about Leviathan (41:10). Some of the characteristics of the beast provided by the text are applicable to the crocodile (vv. 13–17, 30), and some of them to a whale (vv. 19–20), but others do not fit any known creature. Confronted by it, humans and their weapons of war were impotent and ineffective (vv. 7, 26–29). It was a threat to them that they could not subdue or stand against (v. 9), which means it could not have been a crocodile. Only God was able to subdue and control it. The description of the violent nature of this beast suggests that, although it was originally created by God as part of a very good creation (Gen. 1:31), its nature became corrupted. It could now be a useful symbol of corruption and violence.

3. Leviathan as a Defeated Power. The image of Leviathan as a many-headed monster is used in the Bible as a symbol of the historical and spiritual powers that God has defeated on behalf of His people. In a passage that points to the crossing of the Red Sea by the Israelites, the psalmist proclaims God’s defeat of the sea monster and the breaking of Leviathan’s heads (Ps. 74:13–14). The imagery from the ANE of a conflict with the sea monster is used here as a symbol of the Egyptian armies, the enemy of God and His people, defeated by the Lord. The biblical writer seems to acknowledge that behind the pagan mythology lies an element of truth: there is in the world an evil spiritual power that opposes God and His people, and only Yahweh can overcome him. This idea is explicitly stated in the prologue to the book of Job when Satan challenged and opposed God’s actions.

4. Leviathan as a Power That God Will Destroy. The language of Isaiah 27:1 is very similar to the language of a Canaanite text in which Lotan is called “the fleeing/gliding serpent,” “the twisted/coiling” one. This does not mean that the prophet was copying from that text but that this was common language used to designate an evil power. The biblical message is that the power represented by a snake-like animal will be destroyed forever, not by Baal but by the Lord. Thus in the Bible, Leviathan became a symbol of God’s apocalyptic enemies whom He will confront at the end, just as He did Satan in the book of Job, before His people will settle down peacefully by their vineyards (27:1–5). The final defeat of the serpent is announced in the book of Revelation, and as a result humans will be finally liberated from suffering and death (Rev. 20:1–3, 7–10; 21:4).

There was a primeval enemy of God whom He confronted and defeated before the creation of humans. That power was not a god but one of God's creatures, now a demon (see "Evil and the Fallen Cherub," p. 1008). History is the arena where that evil power displays his hatred toward God and His people, in this case against Job; yet in history, he has been defeated again and again, and one day he will be finally destroyed by the Lord. God was telling Job that even though he did not understand how these evil powers operate, He, the Lord, knows and has power over them. Consequently, Job should acknowledge Yahweh as the wise, supreme Lord of the universe who will bring to an end the work of evil powers who are the true oppressors of the human race.

of Leviathan reached even beyond the Behemoth's. Leviathan was unconquerable by means of harpoons or fishing spears (v. 7); he was a creature not to be tampered with (vv. 5–8) or trusted in any agreement (v. 4). None who remembered their encounter with him ever attempted another (v. 8). Leviathan's awe provided the deity with His clearest statement on ascendancy. The unmistakable message of the rhetorical question found in v. 10, and of the entire second speech, is that in spite of the awesomeness of this beast, God is the greatest, the One who transcends the terrible might and power of Leviathan. Even in the midst of His intimidating description of Leviathan, it is appropriate for God to insist that He is Lord of all, a reassuring counter to the Leviathan picture (v. 11). With v. 18, the description veered away from anything natural by mentioning his smoke-breathing, coal-kindling, and flame-throwing mouth (vv. 19–21). By representing Behemoth as a grass-eating beast and Leviathan as a fire-spitting terror, God transferred Job from the natural realm in which he lived, suffered, and disputed with friends to the supernatural realm where the whole drama began and where alone the full answer to his crisis could be found.

There is nothing unnatural about Behemoth's description, but there is something indeterminate about it. And there is nothing natural about the fire-emitting Leviathan who, according to God, had no equal on earth (v. 33). Scripture shows that this supernatural Leviathan, unequaled on earth (v. 33), king of pride (v. 34), uncontrollable except by God Himself (vv. 10–11), was, like Behemoth, an object of God's creation (Ps. 104:26). Job put all this together. And Bible students may put it all together too. We may see Leviathan as an actual being created by God who now represents the embodiment of all that is evil: a real and insidious force, working in realms beyond the natural senses—a being exalted by pride and lord of all the proud but one who knows that God is Lord and cringes in His presence (cf. Job 9:13). He is a force so mighty as to have no equal and yet, for all his evil and power, is inferior to God—one whom God will at last destroy (Is. 27:1).

The evil power represented by Leviathan may not have been fully disclosed in God's revelation to Job, yet Job's responses make it clear that he understood. Through the images of strange animals, he looked into realities that exist beyond and behind what is apprehended by the physical senses. He came to better appreciate both the astonishing turmoil that rages in nature and the supernatural realm, as well as God's ultimate and unerring power and supremacy over the wildest forces contending in these realms. Without naming names, God shared with Job, in his suffering, something of the truth of the book's prologue. Many readers have claimed that Job received no answer from God. But Job's own testimony does not seem to agree with these frustrations. We may not see what he did, and now we may know more than he did. But Job, who so often clamored for an audience with his God, ended the dialogue in awe and gratitude at the encounter he was granted and at what he gained from that audience with the Almighty.

42:1–6

Dialogue between God and Man: Job's Surrender

The dialogue documented through twenty-eight chapters with Job's friends (chaps. 4–31), in Elihu's monologue (chaps. 32–37), and in God's confrontation (chaps. 38–41), concluded with a second abasement by Job (40:3–5). But it was an abasement of awe-filled gratitude, not one of shame. His first submission offered no comment of appreciation for his experience and Yahweh's intervention—only surrender. But now, something more that he had learned moved him to gratitude. Job had always known that God could do everything. But this acknowledgment was distinct from Job's spoken thoughts throughout the dialogue. This acknowledgment was a word of respect and deference rather than one of rage and desperation. At this point, Job could express belief that what God wishes to accomplish will be accomplished (v. 2). His friends had long insisted on this. On the surface Job's words could well be heard as capitulating to their side.

Only God's clarifications in the epilogue preserve us from such a misunderstanding (which also reminds us that no segment of the book of Job may be dismissed as superfluous). His plaguing doubts had given way to insight: he realized that he had uttered what he did not understand and attempted to dabble in things too wonderful for him that he did not know (v. 3). He knew better, now, how wonderful they are and how awesome his God is. Job expressed repentance and either (according to some translations) a retraction of (at least some of) his words about the things he could not understand or (according to others) an abhorrence or rejection of himself. Job's "therefore" at the outset of v. 6 should remove misunderstanding of his reason for self-abasement. He himself explained that it is because he now saw what he had not before seen, both conceptually ("wonderful" things), and physically, in the theophany. God had revealed Himself to him. Job was humbled. His was the reaction of godly persons throughout the ages in the presence of Almighty God: Moses hid his face (Ex. 3:6), Isaiah cried "woe is/to me" (Is. 6:5), and Daniel turned to a deathly pallor (Dan. 10:8). Theophanies are not shaming. They are honor. And Job was not shamed. He was overwhelmed.

42:7–17

EPILOGUE: FINAL RESOLUTION

The poetic dialogues have ended, and the narrative with which the book opened is now continued in order to bring about a resolution of the plot. God was upset at Job's friends (42:7–8), and Job interceded for them (v. 9). All that remained was the restoration of Job (vv. 10–17).

42:7–9

God and Graceless Theology

The epilogue confirms, should there be any need, that God was still pleased with Job. God's rage at Job's friends comes next.

42:7–8. God's Rebuke of Job's Friends. The brief dialogue between God and Eliphaz featured an expression of divine fury scarcely equaled anywhere else in the book. God's words represent a category distinction between God's revelation to Job and His new engagement with Job's friends. The first was both chiding and sympathetic, while this, the second, was hostile.

That God addressed Eliphaz shows that he was considered the leader of the group (v. 7). God's very first word to Eliphaz was that He was furious at him and his friends. He twice stated the nature of the offense: His character had been misrepresented, distorted in fact, as callous and arbitrary. The argument for His transcendence and omnipotence had been used to justify Satan's brutality as unassailable divine integrity; God gave three successive imperatives to Eliphaz and company (take, go, sacrifice), in order for them to escape the full force of His vengeance (v. 8). Four times in the span of two verses God called Job His servant. His language exposes, in God's mind, a yawning gap of separation between Job and his friends. It was only Job's intercession that would save them this time (v. 8). On a subsequent occasion God underlined both the value and limits of intercession. He advised Ezekiel that in his time and place it would not be enough to rescue doomed Jerusalem (Ezek. 14:13–20). God gave Eliphaz an ominous threat. Apart from Job's intercession, God was inclined to deal with the friends according to their folly. When humans, in God's name, justify satanic cruelty as integrity and justice, then God is highly incensed. It is folly.

42:9. Job and Grace: Intercession. God could trust Job just as surely at the end of this long and contorted drama as He did at the beginning. God trusted him to pray for those who had maligned him, and He honored that intercession on their behalf. It may have taken a divine order to have them humble themselves before a man whom they had so insulted and against whom they had fabricated lies in order to win their theological argument. But faced with the options of Job's intercession and God's wrath, they chose to obediently receive Job's prayers on their behalf. The Hebrew idiom for God's acceptance at the end of v. 9 is "the Lord lifted up Job's face," meaning that He treated him with respect. In this instance, treating Job with respect meant heeding his plea to pardon his friends. Job's prayer on behalf of his friends was a function of his grace-filled spirit. He would not have been able to ask God's mercy on them if he himself were not prepared to be merciful. Jesus promised that those who are merciful will receive mercy (Matt. 5:7). Job's prayers for, and deliverance of, his friends are metaphors that recall another intercession, that of the only perfectly righteous One, through whose intervention we too are preserved from the penalty of divine wrath that we deserve (Rom. 5:9; 1 Thess. 1:10).

42:10–17. Job's Material Vindication. Job's physical and material restoration were no more contrived than was his loyalty to God. He had not remained faithful or prayed for his friends in exchange for any promises. The adversary's opening claim that Job served God in exchange for wealth was as unfounded as his cruelty to Job, his children, his servants, and his animals was unwarranted. And when he had been banished from the scene of action and torment, God was free to deal with His child, His servant, as God's own nature willed. It is His nature to care and to give—He opens His hand and satisfies His creatures' desires (Pss. 104:28; 145:16). And it is His will to honor faithfulness (Rev. 2:10). Job had been faithful to his God.

The idiom of restoration in 42:10 says that God "turned Job's captivity" and belongs to the language of liberation and restoration after exile (Pss. 14:7; 53:6). Job's restoration brought him back from a long and horrible exile. He has been exiled from family and society, and, to some extent, from constant communion with his God. In his season of distress Job listed his family, friends, and acquaintances as those who had abandoned him (19:13). His restoration was as complete as his abandonment had been (42:11).

Eating together—the idiom is "they ate bread with him"—is one of the strongest signs of full acceptance, trust, and mutuality (v. 11). His putrid sores were a thing of the past, as was the fear that he was cursed of God. There is significance in the Hebrew term used to describe the piece of silver that each of Job's children presented to him. The term qesitah is only used during the patriarchal period. This provides some internal evidence in favor of the antiquity not just of the story but of the writing of the book of Job. The unusual inclusion of the names of Job's three daughters (distinct from the anonymous sons) and the specific reference to their inclusion in his will (vv. 13–15) highlights Job's recognition of human equality before God. Male or female, servant or master, we recognize that before Him we have nothing to commend ourselves—except for His grace (cf. vv. 2–6).

Job died at an old age (v. 17). Job's vindication was as complete as his restoration had been, contradicting the predictions of Bildad, the most insistent of his accusing friends. His memory was celebrated in the earth (contra 18:17), and he died surrounded by his children and posterity (contra 18:19).

In a world as chaotic as Job's personal life turned out to be, Job's end rebukes a host of judgments that establish guilt by circumstance and majority vote. The story of his singular faithfulness is a standing complement to the divine grace which alone makes our faithfulness acceptable to God and our trust in His goodness possible. The ending is a mixture of the good and the bad. Good in that Job had a long life but bad in that it says that Job died (42:17). The true ending is found in the hope of Job that reached beyond the grave to a resurrection that would make seeing the Redeemer possible (19:25–27). That is where Job's hope and the Christian hope merge.

PSALMS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The Hebrew title of this collection of hymns and prayers is tehillim (“praises”), which is also the central theological theme in the book. The phrase “praise the LORD” (Heb. halelu-yah) occurs twenty-three times, especially toward the end of the psalms and particularly in Psalms 146–150. The title “Psalms” is derived from the Greek psalmoi, which is used in the Septuagint (LXX) to translate the Hebrew word mizmor (“psalm”; see Pss. 3:1; 4:1; 5:1).

Seventy-three psalms are attributed to David using the Hebrew phrase ledavid (“to/for/of David”). This Hebrew phrase denotes authorship (e.g., Hab. 3:1). Other composers of psalms are the sons of Korah (Pss. 42–49; 84–85; 87–88), Asaph (Pss. 50; 73–83), Solomon (Pss. 72; 127), Heman the Ezrahite (Ps. 88), Ethan the Ezrahite (Ps. 89), and Moses (Ps. 90). Fourteen psalms mention historical circumstances associated with the person who wrote them (e.g., Ps. 57:1). There are thirty-four psalms that lack any form of superscription. These orphan psalms are mainly found in the latter part of the psalms, beginning with Psalm 91. While critical scholarship dismisses these psalm titles as late editorial additions, biblical evidence from outside the psalms in both the OT (2 Sam. 1:17–27; 3:33–34; 1 Chr. 16:7–36) and NT (Mark 12:35–37; Acts 2:24–36; 4:25; 13:35; Rom. 4:6–8) points toward their credibility.

Date. The dating of the psalms has been the object of much debate, but comparisons with extrabiblical material as well as linguistic features used in the psalms show that the majority of them were originally composed during the Israelite monarchy (e.g., 2 Sam. 22 and Ps. 18 are almost identical) and some even before this period (e.g., Pss. 19; 29; and possibly 90). Furthermore, references to personal names and historical circumstances mentioned in the titles help us to date the respective psalms. Thus, the psalms were written over a period that spans the history of Israel, and conceivably scribes like Ezra after the exile produced the final compilation and editing of the psalms (see “Formation of the Biblical Canon,” p. 21).

Backgrounds. In the case of the Psalms, we have to assume a multiplicity of historical backgrounds reflecting the history of ancient Israel between the Exodus and Exile. The majority of the psalms are associated with the time of King David and the early monarchy (tenth century B.C.), but the body of hymns and prayers continued to grow during the divided monarchy (ninth to seventh centuries B.C.), the Exile (sixth century B.C.), and the postexilic period (fifth century B.C.). Annotations in the book itself suggest a variety of communal settings with a gradual growth of the collection and a purposeful grouping of the psalms.

Traditionally the psalms have been divided into five books, echoing the fivefold division of the Pentateuch (Pss. 1–41; 42–72; 73–89; 90–106; 107–150), each section concluding with a doxology (e.g., Ps. 41:13). These divisions were already present in the ancient Greek translations, but a closer look at the different books points toward a gradual growth of the Psalms based on earlier smaller collections (e.g., the collection of the prayers of David [Ps. 72:20], the pilgrim psalms [Pss. 120–134], the Asaph psalms [Pss. 73–83]). In the final editing, some of the psalms belonging to earlier collections were moved to other sections (e.g., the eighteen Davidic psalms that are found outside Book 1 and 2 [cf. Pss. 86; 89; 101; 103; 108–110; 122; 124; 131; 133; 138–145]). The compositional connections between psalms (e.g., between 42 and 43; between 18 and 144) demonstrate that there was an intentional theological structuring in the final compilation of the Psalms reflecting the history of Israel: from the Davidic monarchy as a period of harmony with God and His law (Books 1 and 2), to the failure of the monarchy as a result of disobedience, followed by the Exile (Book 3), to the restoration of Israel under a divine King after the Exile (Books 4 and 5). This suggests that the ordering of the psalms followed a rough chronological framework with some exceptions to that pattern (e.g., Pss. 90; 105; 106).

Theology and Purpose. The book of Psalms has been the prayer book of Jews and Christians alike, providing meaningful theological insights into the OT view of God from an individual and communal perspective. It contains an OT theology in a nutshell.

1. Diversity of Themes. The theology of the Psalms is not systematically or explicitly developed but emerges from the spirituality, piety, doubts, and protests of the psalmists. Through these prayers, written in poetic language, the psalms express a theological cross section of the theocentric content of the Israelite faith from the perspective of God's covenant with Israel. Some of the overarching theological themes are the conflicting experience of God's presence and absence (e.g., Pss. 13–14; 16; 88; 95); God as Creator (e.g., Pss. 8; 19; 29; 65; 104; 139), God as Judge (e.g., Pss. 7; 51; 75) and Lord of life over death (e.g., Pss. 30; 49); God as Protector of the poor (e.g., Pss. 12; 72; 82) and Healer of the sick (e.g., Pss. 6; 41); and His sovereignty in history and His kingship over the earth (e.g., Pss. 5; 47; 105; 136). The sheer number of references to the book of Psalms found in the NT (ca. A.D. 150) demonstrates its importance in the formulation of NT theology.

2. Praising the Lord. Praise lies at the center of the book of Psalms and unlocks its theology. God is presented as the absolute and exclusive object of praises (e.g., Pss. 145–150). The worshipers came before Him to praise His name with thanksgivings for all the blessings they had received from Him. Others came with their troubles, their sickness, their doubts and fears, and their complaints concerning their oppression at the hands of their enemies. These they presented to God. But even these individuals finally thanked and praised the Lord in anticipation of the acts of salvation that He was about to perform on their behalf in answer to their prayers. Meanwhile they could feel abandoned by God in the darkness of loneliness and fear and totally unable to free themselves from such desperate condition. Yet, they always found in God a safe refuge, and this led them to praise Him in the context of hopeful expectation. At times the individual or the community offered to the Lord a prayer for the forgiveness of their sins. In such cases they praised the Lord for His mercy and for His constant willingness to forgive their sins.

Praising the Lord brought the Israelites close to their very Source of life, the only One who could preserve and renew life and who could deliver them from the constant threat of death. The connection between praise and life is unambiguously stated in the psalms. At the close of the book we hear the voice of the psalmist saying, "Let everything that has breath praise the LORD" (150:6). Human existence expresses itself in a magnificent way through words and actions that praise the Lord. To praise Him is not simply a verbal expression—even though words are spoken only by those who are alive. We praise the Lord through actions, attitudes, and every aspect of our deportment. For the psalmists, everything we think, speak, and do should result in praises to the Lord for His goodness and mercies toward us. Only those who are dead are unable to praise the Lord.

Besides the personal and collective expressions of praises in the book of Psalms, there is a cosmic dimension. Again and again we hear the psalmists calling the cosmos to praise the Lord. In fact, the final overcoming of evil, the psalmists seem to suggest, will take place when the totality of creation with one voice will sing a song of praises to the Lord. God's intelligent creatures on this planet will set aside their selfishness and pride, and everyone—kings, princes, judges, men and women, and old and young—will find in the Lord the center of his or her existence (Ps. 148:11–12). The psalmists anticipate a glorious future when everyone in heaven and on earth will praise God for His mercy, justice, and love. Singing praise to God leads to eschatological expectation—God's people coming together to praise Him is a foreshadowing of the moment when the whole cosmos, including His children, will praise the Lord.

3. God Is Our Hope. God is portrayed in Psalms as not only the Source of hope but Hope itself. Humans may hope to be victorious in battle because of the strength of their horses, but horses are a false hope for victory (33:17). No one should place his or her hope in humans, because they are liars (116:11). There are some who want to be wealthy and who hope that through extortion and robbery their goals will be achieved. Such a hope, says the psalmists, is a vain hope (62:10). Instead of seeking hope at the horizontal level, the psalmists looked up and found hope in God. When oppressed by the enemy or threatened by death, they hoped only in God. The psalmists can affirm that their hope is in God (39:7). This is hope based on trust in the Lord (71:5; cf. Rom. 15:13).

In the Psalms the world is a place where humans face the forces of evil and chaos that seek to oppress humans through the attacks of enemies, sickness, suffering, sin, and the threat of death. The solution is deliverance, freedom, and redemption that can come only from God. Consequently, God's people place their hope in Him. This is not blind hope but rather a hope grounded in a deep and personal knowledge of the Lord, who in the past did wonderful deeds for His people and for those who waited on Him (40:1). The people trust such a wonderful God and know that He will be able to deliver His people from any situation that could diminish the quality of their personal or collective life. His promises of future deliverance are reliable. In the midst of anguish and suffering the psalmists were able to affirm that God was their refuge, shield, and hope through His word (119:114). Such a hope impacts the present life: those who have the God of Jacob as their hope and help will be blessed (146:5).

God has universal dominion over chaos and death and can therefore offer hope to every human being (65:5). One of the very peculiar ways in which this hope is to be actualized, according to the psalmists, is through praises to the Lord. As indicated above, hope is connected with praising the Lord and, as such, it looks forward to a time when humans will join the cosmic heavenly choir in praising God as Creator and Redeemer. This will be the ultimate deliverance from sin, death, and all forms of oppression perpetrated by God's enemies. The hope offered to us is one of perfect harmony between heaven and earth (Ps. 148; see commentary on Ps. 150:3–6). The psalmists eagerly waited for the full realization of this hope and encouraged Israel to also hope in the Lord—now and forever (131:3).

4. The Coming Messiah. The theology of the Psalms can be summarized as Israel's response to God's presence in their individual lives and His intervention in the history of the nation. Biblical history points first and foremost to salvation history, and the messianic psalms (Pss. 2; 18; 22; 40–41; 45; 68; 72; 89; 110; 118), as well as the role of these psalms in the NT (e.g., the usage of Pss. 2; 45; and 110 in Hebrews), illustrate this prophetic and typological dimension of the Psalms. In these psalms the experiences of David are often described in language that goes beyond what a human king could ever achieve.

Accordingly, there was an expectation of the coming of an eschatological Messiah through whom all divine promises would be fulfilled. David was therefore a type of this Messiah. The anticipated hope of the psalmists was to become a reality through the work of the Messiah. The Lord would give to Him the nations as His inheritance and the ends of the earth as His possession (2:8).

5. Temple Theology. The temple plays a central role in the theology of the Psalms as the dwelling place of God (e.g., 26:8; 43:3; 46:4). All prayers mentioned in the psalms were addressed to God in His temple and it was from there that He answered them (3:4; 28:2). The temple was the center of life because the God who dwelled there is “the fountain of life” (36:8–9; 52:8). He dwelled there as King of the earth (99:1–2; 103:19) and the kings of the earth would bring gifts to Him as tokens of submission. It was from this center of power that God sent the help and support needed to strengthen those who suffered in the midst of their affliction (20:2). The temple was the place from which the Lord defended the weak (68:5) and delivered His people from all kinds of oppression and affliction (18:6; 102:19–20).

From His dwelling place God blessed His people and declared them righteous by forgiving their sins (24:5; 32:1–3, 5, 11; 51:1, 11; 118:26). This was possible through the sacrificial system. When God accepted the sacrificial offering, He was in that act accepting the repentance of the sinner (20:3; cf. Lev. 1:4; 7:18). The Israelites and the priests had plenty of reasons to praise the Lord in His temple (135:2; 138:2). It was also in the temple that the psalmists were able to understand the fate of the wicked (73:17), probably in the sense that their lack of repentance would not make it possible for them to obtain forgiveness through a sacrificial victim. In that case their fate was represented by the fate of the sacrifice.

The book of Psalms also speaks about the heavenly temple. It is the cosmic dwelling of God, where the angelic host worship and serve Him (148:1–2; 150:1), and the ultimate source of help for God's people (20:2, 6; cf. Heb. 4:14–16). It is in that heavenly temple that Christ is now ministering for us through a work of mediation and judgment (Heb. 8:1–3; 9:23). Like the earthly sanctuary, the heavenly sanctuary is a place of judgment (76:8–9; 82:1–8). The judgment includes an investigation of the evidence (11:4–5) and the execution of the legal verdict (11:6–7; 102:19–20). The righteous will be involved in the judgment of the wicked (149:9; 1 Cor. 6:2; Rev. 20:4). It is the heavenly temple as the center of cosmic worship and judgment that brings together praises and eschatology. It is from there that the whole cosmos is called to praise God in order to restore harmony to it. The condemnation of the wicked and the salvation of the righteous will restore harmony to the universe when both groups will praise God, recognizing Him as a God of justice and love who granted to each one what they have chosen for their lives (see comments on Ps. 150).

Literary Features. The musical annotations found throughout the psalms suggest that they were mostly sung as hymns in the context of temple worship. Besides the superscriptions that refer to the use of specific instruments (e.g., “stringed instruments”; 4:1), tunes (e.g., “set to ‘Lily of the Testimony’”; 60:1), or performers (e.g., “to the Chief Musician”; 88:1) for singing the psalms, there are also annotations in the texts that indicate their liturgical usage. Selah is the most common Hebrew annotation in the psalms (seventy-one times) but also the most enigmatic one. It seems to be a command and has been interpreted as a pausal sign (translated as such in the LXX), perhaps for a musical interlude or to read Scripture, as a sign to indicate that worshipers should lift up their voices at this specific point, or as a signal to the congregation to prostrate in prayer. There are also other worship-oriented terms woven into the content of the psalms such as “bow”/“worship” (5:7), “confess”/“proclaim” (30:9), “kneel” (95:6), and “come near” (95:2). Interestingly, selah occurs 67 times equally distributed in the first three books of the Psalms and four times in last two books (140:3, 5, 8; 143:6) which belong to the fifth group of Davidic psalms. This indicates that the annotation selah was particularly associated with the psalms of King David.

The question of classification of the psalms has overshadowed the study of the psalms for the last hundred and twenty years. It has been suggested that the historical setting for almost the entirety of the psalms is connected to cultic events in the worship service from the time of the Babylonian Exile. This has resulted in a rigid classification of the psalms according to a limited number of types (usually five main categories are listed), trying to fit each psalm into one of these categories. Thus historical names and events mentioned and alluded to in the psalms were ignored and the postexilic cultic setting became the determining factor for the message of the psalm. While it is important to try to organize a body of one hundred and fifty hymns into categories, it is more important to look at and listen to the texts themselves and not superimpose a system that is built on questionable premises. It is better to look for indicators in the text that point to a type and its function, which in turn can provide a basis for classification. Such pointers can be found in expressions like tepillah (“prayer”; 17:1), tehillah (“praise”; 145:1), or shiggayon (“lamentation”; 7:1).

Metaphors of God in the Psalms

The theocentric focus of the book of Psalms provides the reader with important insights into the character of God. This is often accomplished poetically through imagery and metaphorical language. A metaphor helps us to understand an unknown reality (God) by means of a more familiar reality (e.g., a shepherd). Interestingly, our theological thinking (our thinking about God) is largely informed by these metaphors. Metaphors of God are common in the Psalms and describe Him as King, Judge, Shepherd, Host, and Father. At the same time we also learn how human kings, judges, shepherds, hosts, and fathers should be more like the heavenly One. Some metaphors come from the natural realm or refer to innate objects: God as Rock, Fortress, Shield, and Refuge. There are metaphors that make us pause and look again: God as a Warrior who is fighting on behalf of His people. These metaphors are an integral part of the authors’ attempt to communicate their messages.

COMMENTARY

PSALMS 1—41 BOOK I

Psalms 1–41 constitute Book 1 of the traditional division of the Hebrew Psalms. They focus on the assurance of God’s protection and deliverance for the psalmist, mostly identified as King David. Book 1 begins with a psalm that extols God’s law as the path of the righteous. This theme is reiterated in the center of Book 1. In fact, we can perceive a concentric structure from Psalm 15 to Psalm 24 accentuating the torah in Psalm 19.

Psalms 41, at the end of Book 1, outlines the responsibilities of the king to protect his people. This theme is also reiterated at the end of Book 2, which concludes the collection of the Psalms of David (72:20). There is a personal tone throughout Book 1 expressed through the usage of first-person speech vividly conveying the struggles and complaints of the psalmist turning to God for answers.

1:1–6

Torah as the Way of Life

While Psalm 1 is not a typical prayer or song of praise, the poem introduces the Psalms with a reference to the importance of the law. Torah (“law”) should not be understood as an antithesis to grace, which is a misconception without foundation in the Scriptures. Torah is the story of God’s actions in the human sphere communicated through history and instruction. Thus the beginning of the Psalms points back to the beginning of the OT, the instruction of Moses, and its fivefold division echoes that of the Pentateuch.

Without any type of superscription, we have no indication as to the authorship or date of this psalm. Nevertheless, its literary and thematic connections with the wisdom literature (e.g., Prov. 3:13; 8:32; 20:7) suggest a possible early (Solomonic?) date for the poem. The lack of superscription provides the psalm with a generic tone that fits its universal, introductory character to the Psalms.

1:1–3. Blessings for the Righteous. The first psalm begins with a description of the way of the righteous person set in stark contrast to the way of the many resha'im (“wicked” or “ungodly”), khatta'im (“sinners”), and letsim (“mockers” or “scornful”) people (v. 1). The beatitude in the first word, ‘asher (“blessed” or “happy”), is juxtaposed with the destruction of the wicked expressed in the last word of the psalm, to'bed (“to be destroyed” or “to perish”). These words begin with the first and last letter of the Hebrew alphabet respectively. The contrast is heightened by a threefold description of the life opposed to God’s law and that moves increasingly away from the divine path: first walking, then standing, and finally sitting. This suggests a progressive engagement and identification with sin that intensifies in a threefold way.

The positive alternative to this lifestyle is described in v. 2 by two parallel expressions centered on the word torah (“instruction”). Instruction and delight do not often go together, at least not in modern thought, but in the biblical worldview God’s instruction is as delightful as the relationship between man and woman, often described using the same Hebrew term employed here (e.g., Ruth 3:13; Esth. 2:14; Song 8:4). The parallel action in this verse refers to an ongoing “meditation” on God’s instruction. The verb hagah (“to meditate,” “to mutter”) designates a continuous audible “uttering” of God’s word. Such continuous immersion in the word leads to a life that can be adequately described only through imagery.

Tree and plant metaphors, as powerful images, connect the listeners and readers of the psalm to the physical world. The tree imagery at the beginning of the psalms creates another strong link to the beginning of the book of Genesis: the tree of life found next to the rivers that water the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2:9–10). In a predominantly dry climate, a tree is to be planted in a promising location—that is, close to a water source—in order to thrive and be fruitful (see Jer. 17:5–8). A threefold description of the positive results counters the threefold description of the wicked in v. 1: it produces fruit, not continuously but according to its season (possibly indicating the ups and downs of a godly life), its leaves remain green, and finally, it flourishes. The last sentence appears to be intentionally ambiguous by referring to either the tree or, most probably, the righteous.

1:4–5. What the Wicked are Like. The corresponding description of the wicked is introduced by this very abrupt statement, which creates a counter reality to the preceding abundant tree imagery. The simile of the wind-blown chaff underlines the lifeless futility of the ungodly using a well-known image that is connected to judgment terminology (e.g., Job 21:18; Is. 17:13; Zeph. 2:2). Their way is doomed to total failure, from both the legal perspective and religious perspective (Ps. 1:5).

1:6. For the Lord Knows. This final sentence underscores that the eventual separation of the two paths is dependent on God’s judgment based on His knowledge of the way of the righteous. This is an ongoing knowledge expressed by the Hebrew participle of the verb yada' and designates much more than a mental awareness. It refers to a living, intimate relationship sustained by love—a saving knowledge that leads to abundant life and prosperity. Accordingly, some translations render this verb here as “watch over.” In contrast, the wicked perish (cf. Luke 13:27) for lack of that type of knowledge. Both destinies are connected to their respective ways, which represent one’s movement toward or away from God. Psalm 1 introduces so much of what is later developed in the Psalms by reducing it to an “either/or” answer centered on the relational knowledge of God and His instruction.

2:1–12

The Crowning of Yahweh’s Anointed One

Psalms 1 and 2 are like two portals opening the gate into the world of the Psalms. There are a number of connections linking the two psalms. For example, whereas Psalm 1 ends with the vision of the wicked perishing (1:6), Psalm 2 ends with a vision of warning to a nation of destruction, expanding the image of the “way” from the individual to the community. This is followed by a final beatitude (2:12), connecting it to the initial beatitude in Psalm 1, thus concluding the introduction to the Psalms.

Like Psalm 1, this psalm also lacks a superscription, which further underlines its generic and introductory character. The psalm’s mention of the coronation of the king on Mount Zion, surrounded by raging nations, creates an environment that is compatible with the historical situation during the early united monarchy. Yahweh’s kingship becomes the ideal paradigm for earthly kingship and would find its utmost expression in the coronation of the Messiah as King.

2:1–3. The Foolishness of the Nations. The psalm is divided into four equal stanzas, beginning with a description of the wicked nations’ plotting, which connects antithetically to the description of the righteous in Psalm 1. While the righteous meditates (Heb. hagah) on God’s law (Ps. 1:2), the ungodly nations meditate (Heb. hagah) on emptiness (2:2), and their plots are in vain and useless (v. 1). As in Psalm 1, there is again a progression of evilness expressed by the four verbs found in vv. 1–2 and directed against the Lord and His Anointed. The psalmist refers to a rebellion instigated by the kings of the earth (v. 2), indicating a global insurrection against the authority of God and against the authority of His Anointed. The incredulous and rhetorical “why?” at the beginning of v. 1 points to the utter foolishness and futility of this endeavor. Verse 3 spells out the nature of the rebellion, saying that the nations are trying to break free from Israel’s control. Literally, the text refers to God’s fetters and ropes, which may be a reference to His guiding instructions for Israel. Though these were loving commands (Hos. 11:4), the nations viewed them as restrictive and oppressive. They were, in effect, fighting against God’s law (cf. Hos. 11:4).

2:4–6. God Laughs from Heaven. The next stanza underlines the foolishness of the nations’ attempt to throw off God’s rule. While the dominion of kings is limited to the earth, in contrast, God’s dominion extends from the heavens, where He sits enthroned as the heavenly King. From that perspective He is dismayed at their self-destructive efforts in a way that conjured up, in the mind of the psalmist, laughter.

However, the psalmist describes God’s amusement turning into a blazing fury (v. 5): two Hebrew words used to describe God’s anger here—’ap and kharon—are often found together (cf. Ps. 69:24; 78:49) and indicate the impending action that results from God’s anger. Whereas the first stanza ends with the speech of the nations, the second concludes with a divine speech contrasting His action to that of the earthly kings (v. 6), saying God has set up the king Himself, through dependence on His election and not on human intrigues.

2:7–9. The Reign of Messiah. The psalm continues with the king declaring the legitimization of his reign—that is, he will reign by divine decree—echoing the language of the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7:14). “Yahweh’s decree” (as translated in the LXX) is a covenant of adoption (v. 7). This

Anthropomorphic Descriptions of God in the Psalms

The Psalms often describe God in anthropomorphic (human) terms, assigning to Him the full range of human emotions, both positive (“laughter”) and negative (“anger”). One needs to be careful not to ascribe to God the same connotations that these emotions have in the human realm. The anger of God is different from human anger. Similarly, the term “repentance,” as anthropomorphically assigned to God, is “not like man’s repentance. ‘The Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent: for He is not a man that He should repent.’ Man’s repentance implies a change of mind. God’s repentance implies a change of circumstances and relations” (PP 630).

is foremost the metaphor of God as a Father and appears in various places throughout the psalms (68:5; 89:26–27). The coronation of the king has coincided with his adoption into the royal covenant. The verse introduces the strong messianic overtones of Psalm 2, which are echoed almost verbatim in Hebrews 1:5. The coronation of the Christ (Messiah) was to be the ultimate fulfillment of the Davidic covenant.

Verse 8 spells out the promises of kingship establishing the dominion of the king to the ends of the earth, which had formerly been part of the dominion of the kings of the earth (2:2). The means by which the king would establish his rule are mentioned in v. 9. The rod of iron is applied in a messianic way in Revelation 2:27 and 12:5, indicating the absolute and permanent nature of the messianic kingship.

2:10–12. Kiss the Son. The last stanza of the psalm serves as an admonition and, in this sense, as an extension of grace to the nations not recognizing the Davidic kingship. It is prudent to serve the Lord with fear, which connotes worship (cf. Ps. 134:1). The call to rejoice and celebrate with trembling is paradoxical but points to the ingredients of true worship (cf. 95:1–2).

The peculiar usage of the Aramaic bar for “son” (v. 12) has motivated a number of suggested changes to the text (e.g., “Do homage in purity,” JPS). Taking into consideration the international context and audience in this coronation psalm, it is an appropriate term here. The phrase designates an act of homage to the victorious king by his submissive vassals.

The psalm concludes with a beatitude (see 1:1) describing those who khasah (“take refuge” or “trust”) in Him. It is an invitation to the hostile kings to find refuge in Yahweh by submitting to His Anointed One. The first two introductory psalms contain a personal and a communal invitation to follow God’s instruction, and strongly focus on the typology of the Messiah.

3:1–8

Deliverance in Adversity

Psalm 3 begins with a historic annotation that connects this poem to the moment when David and his royal court fled from Absalom, his son, rendering the nation ungovernable for some time (2 Sam. 15:12–17). The content of the psalm coincides with the experience of David when his relationship with his son crumbled. Yet the psalm repeatedly returns to the motif of salvation.

3:1–2. Adversity and Many Adversaries. The repeated word “many” in these introductory verses of lament expresses the increasing adversity faced by David as he was avoiding the military conflict with his son. There are a number of verbal links at the beginning and the end of this psalm: there are many who rise up (3:1; Heb. qum) taunting that there is no yeshu’ah (“salvation,” “help,” “deliverance”) for David (3:2), but it is the Lord who ultimately is called upon to “arise” (3:7; Heb. qum) and to bring salvation and deliverance (3:8; Heb. yeshu’ah).

3:3–6. But God Is My Shield. The contrastive “but” (v. 3) introduces the metaphor of God as a shield that is found throughout the psalms (3:3; 5:12; 7:10; 18:2; 18:30; 59:11). It is part of an imagery that describes God as a Warrior and expresses David’s trust in God in a situation where he could not shield himself. God’s glory serves as a second line of protection often understood as a physical phenomenon indicating His presence and saving protection (e.g., Ex. 24:15–17; 1 Kin. 8:10–11). Finally, David speaks of God as Lifter of his head, a metaphor pointing to the future restoration and vindication of the king.

Verses 4–6 each begin with a first-person statement indicating David’s trusting response in prayer for Yahweh’s protection and enumerate the occasions when God sustained him during difficult times: God answered him from “His holy mountain/hill” even if David himself was no longer physically present in Jerusalem (v. 4). David also mentions that the Lord sustained him when sleeping and awakening. This is language which could connect this psalm with a morning prayer. This leads to a declaration of faith that extinguishes all fear even when surrounded by many thousands of hostile people (v. 6).

3:7–8. Petition for Deliverance. There are two imperatives in this section that connect the petition to the initial lament (vv. 1–2): “arise” and “save/deliver.” This is an expression of deep faith in God in circumstances with no salvation in sight. The Hebrew perfect verb tenses used for God’s striking David’s enemies and breaking their teeth in v. 7 have been variously rendered: some take them as past (“you have struck,” “you have broken”), others take it as another imperative (“strike,” “break”), and others view them as having a kind of gnomic (expressing a general truth) connotation (“you strike,” “you break”). In any case, David speaks with certainty of his deliverance, and this is expressed well by any of these renderings of the Hebrew perfect. The image of the smiting on the cheekbone and the breaking of the teeth of the ungodly refers to the silencing of the enemy who spoke against the psalmist (v. 2). The enemy was not just a political adversary but was also evil on a moral level because he had attacked God's anointed one. The language used develops the Warrior language in a more active and defensive way.

The psalm concludes with a significant theological statement (v. 8). This is the third time that the key term yeshu'ah ("salvation"/"deliverance") is used in the psalm. It is a final statement of trust that extends the blessing from the individual to the community. The concluding beatitude, in which David solicits/declares God's blessing upon His people, is a recognition that salvation is not only for the dethroned king, but also for all of God's people.

4:1–8

A Night Prayer

There are various literary connections between Psalms 3 and 4 (e.g., call/cry, v. 1 // 3:4; lying down and sleeping, v. 8 // 3:5; many people, v. 2 // 3:6), which have led some to suggest that they represent morning and evening prayers, respectively, uttered by David when escaping from Jerusalem. The mention of Davidic authorship in the superscription would fit this historical scenario. The musical annotations may suggest that the psalm was subsequently used on different occasions.

4:1. Hear My Call. This short prayer of petition at the beginning of the psalm is an appeal for vindication. David speaks to Yahweh, the righteous God and source of his righteousness, seeking for justice from Him. In his distress (Heb. tsar lit. refers to a tight place), he is praying about relief. God listens when we call and not after we call (Is. 58:9), and David pleads in this psalm for His immediate response.

4:2–5. Addressing the Adversary. In this extended section of the psalm, David directly addresses his enemies, whom he identifies as bene 'ish ("sons of men" or "people"), possibly indicating their ephemeral existence. He confronts them with two rhetorical questions introduced by the phrase "How long?" The question in itself serves as a delimiter to evil, followed by seven imperatives that increasingly invite the ungodly to return to God. He exhorts them to leave false accusations and riq ("emptiness,"

"worthlessness," "delusions") behind (v. 2; cf. Ps. 2:1) and to recognize God's election of him. God had set apart the faithful, godly ones for Himself and would listen to the prayers of His chosen one (v. 3).

In vv. 4–5, David admonishes the enemy away from his wrong ways toward fearful contemplation and reflection, searching their hearts in the stillness of the night (see 1:1–3). This act of introspection could lead them to turn to God with acts of true worship and sacrifices of righteousness as a result of a new trust in the Lord. This trust is often expressed throughout the psalms as an assured reliance upon God and security in His promises (e.g., 32:10; 56:4; 125:1–2).

4:6–8. True Gladness in the Heart. The concluding verses of the psalm underline the richness of such a life of trust in God. Although many ask what benefit such a lifestyle has, the psalmist recounts the blessings of God in an allusion to the priestly blessings, asking for the light of God's face to shine on us (v. 6; cf. Num. 6:24–26).

This might be a polemic against idolatrous practices connected to fertility cults and their celebrations of harvest time, which was the climactic moment of joy during the year. David suggests that true joy can be found only in a relationship with Yahweh. Some translations have rendered the Hebrew me'et in v. 7 as "when" or "in the time" and thus describe David's joy when the "many" would have received grain and new wine. In this case, the text would be saying that trusting in God brings gladness to those who respond to the exhortations given in the psalm to repent and trust God. Others have understood the term to mean "more than," in which case the text would be referring to the idea that David's joy in God is more significant than the celebration time of grain and new wine, when some used the occasion to worship other gods hedonistically in fertility cults. In either case, David's point is that God is the ultimate source of joy, harvest, and new wine.

The final statement of faith which concludes the psalm (v. 8) begins with peace (Heb. shalom), which again echoes Aaron's blessing. Trust in the Lord leads David to sleep in peace in the midst of trouble, resulting in true joy that could not be impacted by wrong accusations and opposition. It is this joy that David wants his enemies to experience. This is indeed a wonderful way of making friends out of our enemies.

A Morning Prayer

If Psalm 3 is possibly a morning prayer, Psalm 5 is much more explicitly a morning prayer for deliverance from slanderous people. The psalm is organized around the contrast between the psalmist and the wicked and their respective access to God and His temple.

Aside from the superscription indicating Davidic authorship, there is no other historical annotation. The reference to “flutes” or “pipes” possibly refers to reed instruments and indicates the performance instructions for the music director associated with this psalm. It has been suggested that this was performed as an antiphonal reading at the temple gate, as it moves back and forth between the righteous and their access to the house of God versus the wicked who cannot enter into the temple.

5:1–3. Lord, in the Morning Hear My Cry. As the psalm opens, a threefold appeal for God’s attention—David implores God to hear, consider, and listen (vv. 1–2)—underlines the seriousness of the psalmist’s cry for help. This is a crescendo of despair, and it includes the psalmist’s hagig, a word sometimes translated as “meditation” which here can be understood as a lament or an audible groan for help (cf. 2:1; 39:4). It is affirmed that God will hear this prayer (v. 3) as He hears all our prayers, particularly those expressed in loud shouts in moments of great pain. At the same time there is a confident expectation expressed in the verb arak, which could be translated “direct,” “set in order,” or “lay out before” (reminiscent of the laying out of the morning sacrifice on the altar; e.g., Lev. 6:5; Num. 28:4). The introduction of sanctuary language indicates a close connection between our prayers and the sanctuary (cf. Rev. 8:4). The response to the psalmist’s prayer would come only from God’s presence in the sanctuary.

5:4–6. No Room for the Wicked in God’s Temple. The next three verses describe the incompatibility between God and the wicked. They are unable to stand before Him (v. 5) or dwell or be welcomed into His presence (i.e., they do not have access to the temple; v. 4). Those who are liars and who are bloodthirsty and deceitful will perish (v. 6).

5:7–8. But I Will Come into Your House. This is an almost antiphonic response to the previous lines. In contrast to the wicked, the righteous have access to the temple because they are in harmony with God and rely on His abundant loving-kindness (v. 7). The term bayit (“house”) was used as a designation for the temple or tabernacle (and some translations consistently render this Hebrew word by these terms, depending on the context) since the time of the Exodus (Josh. 6:24; 2 Sam. 12:20). From the sanctuary God’s way is made straight before him and life is restored.

5:9–12. Judgment and Joy. The next counterpoint enlarges on the multiple reasons for the destruction of the wicked, listing the deeds of wickedness, which in their final analysis are acts of rebellion against God (v. 10). The last antiphonal declaration (vv. 11–12) returns to the audible expression of the psalmist. This time it is a crescendo of rejoicing as the righteous are to always shout and sing for joy. Yet, the cause for joy is not the destruction of the wicked but the fact of the righteous’ trusting the Lord as their refuge and His defense of them (lit. God “covers” them with His protection like a bird covers its chicks under its wings; cf. Ps. 91:4).

The psalm concludes with another beatitude (v. 12) concerning God’s blessing the righteous. Here once more God is presented as a protecting shield—not the small handheld shield of Psalm 3:3, but a large shield covering the whole person. There may be another connection with the sanctuary since the shield is a place of true refuge and protection for those who seek the Lord.

6:1–10

A Prayer for Healing

This is an intense prayer for healing from physical illness. In the Israelite worldview illness was often considered to be a rebuke from God, accompanied by the fear that enemies would take advantage of this moment of weakness. In this psalm, there is a penitential tone as the psalmist expresses the desire to be right with God during the physical affliction. The psalm is one of the seven penitential psalms that some Christian denominations read during the time of Lent (cf. 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143). It is a psalm of David and nothing in its content denies this. The sheminit, an eight-stringed harp (lit. “with eighth”), seems to be related to the psalm’s performance.

6:1–7. Cry for Deliverance from Anguish and Pain. The psalm is divided into two main sections (vv. 1–7; 8–10). The first section expresses the same sentiments in two consecutive subsections (vv. 1–3; 4–7). David appeals to God not to rebuke, chasten, or discipline him any longer (v. 1). Both imperatives are associated with God, indicating that David considers his illness to be God's fatherly discipline in reaction to a sin in his life (cf. Prov. 19:18). Nevertheless, he intensely requests God to be merciful to him (v. 2). This corresponds to David's reaction after his adultery with Bathsheba (2 Sam. 11–12) and after conducting the census in Israel (2 Sam. 24).

David is 'umlal ("feeble," "weak," "languishing"). His bones are bahal ("troubled" or "shuddering"; lit. his whole body is "shaking" and "trembling"; vv. 2–3). This section climaxes with the question "How long?" The sentence is incomplete and expresses David's utter despair in his condition when writing this. The Lord is invoked five times in the first section of this psalm, emphasizing the psalmist's anxious search for God. When experiencing God's silence and apparent absence, we must continue to cry out to Him for an answer. The condition of the psalmist affects the whole person: David's "soul" is greatly disturbed. The Hebrew nepeš, translated "soul," usually refers in the OT to the whole person as a unity.

The psalm proceeds to repeat a plea for healing using different expressions (vv. 4–7). If God would not deliver, then death was to be expected (v. 5). Death is a state where the Lord is not remembered or proclaimed (cf. Eccl. 9:5), an unconscious state where communication between humans and God is ended.

The extremity of the psalmist's despair is expressed through a repeated hyperbole—his bed is flooded and swimming with tears, and his couch is drenched (v. 6). In that condition he is unable to see God's acts; he is experiencing only the ongoing attacks from his enemies. The focus has now shifted to the psalmist's adversaries who contribute to his pain (v. 7).

6:8–10. Vindication and Healing. In the midst of despair and the attack of adversaries, the psalmist twice declares that the Lord has heard him (vv. 8–9), and he expresses the assurance of His receiving and accepting his prayer. Faith breaks through the darkness of personal despair and affirms God's intervention. There is no report of immediate healing, but the psalmist anticipates the vindication of the faithful and proclaims that the enemies will be shamed and disturbed. Previously the psalmist was vexed, but now he writes of shame for those who anticipated his death (v. 10, cf. vv. 2–3). Their shaming is mentioned twice and follows the double hearing of God.

Psalm 6 is reminiscent of the story of Job, whose vindication from a wrong theology of retribution as the cause for his suffering also came at the end. However, the psalm clearly connects the psalmist's sickness with sin—a balanced understanding of human suffering. While suffering should not be too easily connected to sin, neither by the sufferer nor, much less, by the observer, part of the healing process could include a personal search for a sin that might have contributed to the current condition. However, in both possible scenarios there is the assurance that God hears our prayers and vindicates us before the enemy.

7:1–17

An Appeal for Innocence

The psalm is centered on the metaphor of God as Judge, a common metaphor in the psalms. In Psalms He is referred to as seated for judgment on His throne (9:4), as probing the heart (17:3), and as defending widows (68:5). The reference to Cush, a Benjamite, has no parallel in the historical books, but the psalm probably originated during the time when David was persecuted by Saul and his men. Verses 3–4 may be connected to the events recorded in 1 Samuel 24:11 or to the Cushite ("Ethiopian," "Sudanese") who reported Absalom's death (2 Sam. 18:20–32). The psalm is classified as a meditation (Heb. shiggayon, "lament"), a genre mentioned in the psalms themselves (cf. Hab. 3:1; see Psalms: Introduction).

7:1–9. Appeal for Deliverance and the Innocence of the Righteous. In the face of persecution, the psalmist affirms his trust in God and asks for deliverance from those trying to tear him apart like a lion would. This simile is intensified by the image of a lion ripping its prey apart in pieces. The following section legitimizes the psalmist's appeal for deliverance using the language of an oath formula. This is done by three consecutive conditional clauses (vv. 3–4; protasis) which are followed by a consequential clause (v. 5; apodosis), underlining the innocence of the psalmist. The penultimate conditional clause identifies the false charge that has been brought against the psalmist: he is accused of having dealt unjustly with somebody who was at peace with him (v. 4). He is so sure of his innocence that he invites the enemy to trample him to the ground (i.e., if found guilty, he should be put to death).

The psalmist appeals to the divine Judge to establish his innocence. The anthropomorphic appellations for God to “arise” (v. 6) are urging God to stand up and pronounce a favorable verdict. The Judge assembles witnesses from the assembled peoples around Him and then rules on high, where the judgment throne is located (v. 7). The next line is central to the judgment motif of the psalm: the Lord will judge the peoples, and David prays that God will judge him and vindicate him against the false accusations he has endured. God’s judgment is both universal and individual, and the psalmist invokes both, indicating his righteousness as based on a legal principle and not on a personal, preferential treatment by Yahweh.

7:10–17. Confidence in the Righteousness of God. Appellations now turn to propositional descriptions of God’s righteousness. God is a defense or “shield” for the upright (v. 10), but He is angry with the wicked every day, especially if they do not turn back and repent. God will not turn back from His anger against them. The psalmist portrays God’s treatment of the wicked by employing the metaphor of God as a Warrior with sword, bow, and arrows to use against those who brought the false charges (vv. 12–13).

A proverbial statement describes what would happen to those who brought false and mischievous accusations against the righteous: they dig a pit and then fall into it (vv. 14–16; cf. 9:15; 57:6; Prov. 26:27). Verse 16 describes the situation in which the persecutor’s trouble recoils and falls on their own heads. The psalm concludes with a testimony of God’s righteousness, not the psalmist’s. This is to be expected in the legal case described in the form of a psalm that ultimately seeks to praise the Lord. It is a testimony to the integrity of the legal process and that of the person who waits for God’s vindication.

8:1–9

God’s Glory in Creation

This is the first actual praise song of the Psalms, and its theme is creation, a topic frequently found throughout the psalms (e.g., 19; 29; 65; 104; 139). The psalm is bracketed by the use of the same refrain in vv. 1 and 9 about the excellence or majesty of God’s name. It is attributed to David and is addressed to God using a second-person speech. The musical annotation gittit in the ascription may either refer to an instrument of Gath (cf. Pss. 81; 84) or a melody. It has also been interpreted as pointing to Obed-Edom the Gittite, a Levitical singer (1 Chr. 13:13–14; 16:4–5).

8:1–2. Exaltation and God’s Glory. The psalmist directs his praise to God, recognizing His sovereignty, which is encapsulated in the phrase “How excellent” (’addir, “majestic,” “mighty” or “splendid”) is your name in all the earth. This links Psalm 8 to the last words of Psalm 7, expressing the psalmist’s decision to sing praise to the “name of the LORD Most High” (7:17). The terms used here, “heaven(s)” and “earth,” describe the magnitude of God’s dominion. From this high and elevated chorus, the psalm descends to the weakest and defenseless of creation, referring to the infants and children to whom God has given strength to, with their praises, silence the enemy and the avenger. God uses the weak to confound the mighty.

8:3–9. God’s Glory in Humankind. God’s glory (i.e., His presence and magnificence) is visible in the dominion He has given to humans. After contemplating the majesty of God’s creative power displayed in creation (v. 3), the psalmist asks in amazement, “What is ’enosh?” (This term can be translated as “man,” “mankind,” or “human beings.”) Why does this majestic God pay attention to humans? He pays close attention to them and is actively involved in their lives.

Verse 5 is the center of the psalm, pointing to the status of humans within creation: they have been made “a little lower than the angels” and crowned with “glory and honor.” Yet, they could exercise the divinely assigned role of dominion only by acknowledging God’s creative glory. Beyond its immediate implications for the understanding of humans, v. 5 is used in the NT to refer to the humanity of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 15:27; Heb. 2:6–8), thus pointing to the messianic dimension of the psalm. The human dominion over creation (vv. 6–8) reminds us of the Creation story in Genesis 1. The dominion over all things is itemized and includes both domestic and wild animals. The psalm concludes as it began, refocusing on God. The greatness of the psalm lies in the connection between God’s majesty and its bestowal on humanity, showcasing a God who is worthy of praise because, in His sovereignty, He works with the most frail in His creation.

9:1–20

Praise for Vindication

There is some evidence that Psalms 9 and 10 were originally one psalm that was divided into two. They together form an alphabetical psalm that is taken by the LXX to be one unit.

Besides, Psalm 10 does not have a superscription, something unusual within Book 1. Finally, Psalm 9 ends with selah (see Psalms: Introduction). The division seems to be based on content. Whereas Psalm 9 is mostly thanksgiving, Psalm 10 is a prayer for protection against wickedness and violence. Besides claiming Davidic authorship, the superscription annotates that the psalm should be sung to the tune of “Death of the Son.” This could be a specific musical tune or may point to a historic situation. Suggestions have included the death of Absalom or the unnamed child of Bathsheba.

9:1–12. Praising the Eternal Judge. The praise in Psalm 9 begins where Psalm 8 ended, praising God for His marvelous, wonderful works. The section is centered on the praise of God as the eternal Judge who has upheld David’s just cause (v. 4) by completely destroying the wicked (v. 6). But He is, at the same time, a refuge in times of trouble (v. 10; cf. Ps. 10:1) to those who trust in Him (vv. 9–10). His judgment is in favor of the dak (the “oppressed” or “crushed”; v. 9). The section concludes with a renewed invitation to praise God (v. 11). Legal language is used in v. 12: God avenges blood (i.e., He holds the oppressor legally accountable for tyranny) and does not forget or ignore the cry of the ‘anawim (“the humble,” “the poor,” or “the afflicted”). The reason for praises is stated in concrete terms.

9:13–20. Prayer for Help. Praise is followed by prayer, which suggests that doxology could lead to petition. The prayer is personal, asking God to have mercy upon him (cf. 4:1), but it is based confidently on the experience described in the previous section. The “gates of death” (v. 13) are city gates that lead into a figurative city of death. In contrast, the gates of the daughter (of) Zion (v. 14) signify a city of abundance of life that leads to rejoicing in God’s salvation. Verses 15–16 recount once more God’s saving acts in the past in order to show the reliability of the promises of His future saving acts through judgment (vv. 17–18): the wicked shall be sent down or turned to she’ol (v. 17; preferred term for the grave), while the needy will not be forgotten by God (v. 18). The psalm concludes using imperatives to ask for God’s immediate intervention. He asks God to rise up and terrify the wicked nations (vv. 19–20; cf. 3:1). By placing the fear of God into the nations, they will recognize their own mortality versus God’s sovereignty.

10:1–18

Continued Prayer of the Helpless

Psalm 10 almost seamlessly continues after Psalm 9, although the tone is more intensified and personal and there are more petitions than praises. The lack of any superscription supports

Acrostic Psalms

An acrostic (“the tip of the verse”) poem demonstrates a literary technique that emphasizes the first letter, syllable, or word of a line or verse to create a specific pattern. In an alphabetic acrostic each successive line or verse begins with the following letter of the Hebrew alphabet, which consists of twenty-two letters. In the Hebrew Psalms there are a number of acrostic psalms that use different acrostic styles: Psalms 9, 10, and 37 are strophic alphabetic acrostics, in which the first line of each strophe (four lines) begins with the successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet; in Psalms 25, 34, and 145 each verse begins with the next letter of the alphabet; Psalms 111 and 112 are line alphabetic acrostics, both consisting of twenty-two lines beginning with the sequential letters of the alphabet.

The largest and most complex acrostic poem is Psalm 119, which consists of twenty-two strophes with each strophe having eight lines and each line beginning with the corresponding letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Interestingly, Psalm 1, the first torah psalm, begins with the letter aleph, and its last word begins with the final letter of the Hebrew alphabet, taw, alluding to the great torah. Psalm 119, possibly to indicate that it is a short version of 119. The acrostic technique makes it easier to memorize the poems and shows the high level of literary artistry that accompanied their composition from the earliest times of the kingdom of Israel, suggesting that literacy was widespread in Israel from an early period (see “Introduction to Hebrew Poetry and Wisdom Books,” p. 614).

the suggestion that the psalm originally formed a compositional unit with Psalm 9.

10:1–11. Frightening Description of the Wicked. Two rhetorical questions express the intensification of the situation of the psalmist: “Why does God stand far away?” and “Why does He hide Himself in times of trouble?” God’s hiddenness is a motif that runs through the psalms (cf. 13:1; 27:9; 30:7; 44:24; 55:1; 69:17; 88:14; 89:46; 102:2; 104:29; 143:7) and expresses in human language the psalmist’s desperate sense of God’s distance while hoping that He will soon draw close. The wicked are characterized as insolent and their opposition to God is stressed: pride, arrogance (v. 2), deception, curses, threats, trouble, malice, and iniquity (v. 7). The ruthless attacks of the insolent wicked are described (vv. 8–11): they lie in ambush (v. 8) and secretly plot the destruction of the helpless poor (v. 9). This idea is mentioned three times in vv. 8–9 using the mixed metaphor of a lurking lion waiting for a victim in order to catch it in a net like a hunter catches prey. While the psalmist laments the hiddenness of God, the wicked falsely count on His apparent absence or indifference (v. 11).

10:12–18. Arise, Lord! The provocation of v. 11 necessitates an immediate reaction and, in parallel fashion to Psalm 9:19, the psalmist appeals to God to “arise.” But in contrast to the preceding claim by the wicked, he urges God to not forget the humble, afflicted ones (v. 12). This appeal is based on God’s honor (v. 13) and the assurance that God intervenes on behalf of His people: He helps the orphans (v. 14). The prayer intensifies with a request to “break the arm” of the wicked (v. 15) and to finally do away with their wickedness. The phrase “the LORD is King” occurs for the first time in the Bible here (Ps. 5:2 makes a different point). It is one of the great images used in the psalms to describe the unknown in terms of the known (cf. 47:2, 6–8; 74:12; 84:3; 93:1; 96:10; 97:1; 98:6; 99:1; 145:1; 149:2). God’s divine kingship serves as an ideal for Israel’s monarchy and legitimizes it because it is God who installs His king on earth. The images of God as King and Judge are often combined, and they serve here to describe His absolute sovereignty in judging the wicked. He remains forever and ever, whereas the wicked perish (v. 16). The faithful in this psalm are described in terms of social conventions as the poor, humble, fatherless/orphan, and oppressed. This is reminiscent of the ethical ideals found in the Pentateuch (cf. Deut. 10:18; 24:17–21; 27:19). God as King is especially concerned about justice for the defenseless groups, thus providing a paradigm for Israel’s king.

11:1–7

Flee or Stay

The psalm starts with the image of a fluttering bird threatened by the hunter’s bow and ready to flee to the mountains. It points to the threat the righteous are experiencing at the hands of the wicked. The threat is resolved by the central image of God in His temple enthroned in heaven.

11:1–3. Temptation to Flee. The psalm begins with a programmatic affirmation of faith, saying David puts His trust in the Lord, his Shelter. This provides at the outset an answer to the rhetorical question that follows. The simile of a bird that flees from the hunter’s bow and arrow to the protecting underbrush covering the mountain seems incompatible with the psalmist’s faith. The imagery is clarified in v. 2, where the bird and the hunter become the upright and the wicked respectively. As in Psalm 10 there is a secret assault: the wicked are shooting secretly from the shadows. The threat is intensified when the foundations are destroyed (v. 3). These “foundations” refer figuratively to the laws, customs, and ethical norms which hold up society (cf. Is. 19:10), which David presents as being thrown down, with the righteous apparently unable to do anything about it.

11:4–7. Reason to Stay. The center of the psalm (v. 4) is focused on a vision of Yahweh in His heavenly temple assuring us He is in control—so there is no need to flee. From His elevated position in the heavenly sanctuary, God is watching all people, testing and examining them. The heavenly sanctuary is a place of judgment. God righteously judges both righteous and wicked (v. 5). It is through judgment that God tests/examines the innermost motives of humans (cf. Ps. 139:23; Ezek. 22:18). The “testing” of the wicked leads to their rejection because God hates the wicked and those who love violence (v. 5).

This type of language indicates God’s absolute opposition to evil. As a result of God’s judgment, He will rain coals on the wicked (pakhim, “bird traps of fire”). There may be here an ironic reference to the image of the bird hunter in v. 2, suggesting that the hunter will become the hunted one. The destruction of the wicked described here is reminiscent of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 6; Gen. 19). The psalm concludes with an emphasis on God's righteousness and His absolute incompatibility with evil. While He hates (v. 5) the wicked, He loves (v. 7) righteousness, and the righteous will see His face (i.e., an image of God's continuous pleasure; cf. 17:15; Job 19:26). Psalm 11 is a beautiful affirmation of God's faithfulness in the midst of a morally disintegrating and crumbling society. He provides stability and judgment on behalf of His righteous from His heavenly sanctuary. While it might be tempting to flee, God's faithfulness provides enough reason to stay.

12:1–8

Words of Silver

This is a psalm about the power of words, expressed through the use of several related terms like “speak”/“say,” “lips,” “tongue,” and “words.” The force of falsities is contrasted with the purity of God's words. The superscription is almost identical to that of Psalm 6, declaring Davidic authorship and mentioning the eight-stringed instrument for the musical performance of this poem. The theme of wrong accusations would fit David's experience as expressed in previous psalms (chaps. 4; 7).

12:1–4. Blasphemous Words. The psalm begins with a cry to God for deliverance because of the vanishing of faithful and loyal people—people who are truthful and speak truth. In Psalm 15:2 the one who has access to the tabernacle is the one who speaks the truth from the heart. The psalmist refers to an increase in people who speak shaw' (“vanity” or “lies”), a noun found in the Decalogue (Ex. 20:7). Truth is contrasted with emptiness, which is equivalent to a violation of the law, even more so as they speak it with flattering lips and a double or duplicitous heart, which refers to the false flattery of their speech (v. 2). Verses 3–4 arrange the agents of speaking—lips and tongues—in a chiasmic ABBA structure. This underlines the potentially devastating power of these organs, which are the actual means of rebellion against God in asking the arrogant and blasphemous question: “Who is lord over us?” This is an excellent illustration of the third commandment of the Decalogue.

12:5–8. God Speaks. The phrase “says the LORD” (v. 5) is the center of the psalm and is the only time in the poem where God speaks. It is framed by two negative statements that comment on the seemingly overwhelming power of the wicked. God's speech in the middle clearly indicates that He is in control and that He will deliver the faithful. His words connect again to the social groups mentioned in Psalm 10, assuring them that He is “arising” to action. The psalmist elaborates on the character of God's words: they are tahor (“pure,” “flawless”). This is a term indicating ceremonial purity familiar from the legal sections of the Pentateuch (e.g., Lev. 6:4; 10:10). The process of purification is described as taking place seven times. There is some ambiguity in v. 7, as translations differ in regard to the question of who or what is being kept. The closest previous referent would be the “words” (v. 6), but it could also refer to the “wicked” (v. 8) or the needy of v. 5. In any case, the main point of the text is that God will protect and guard the poor and needy and will protect us from the wicked of this generation (cf. v. 5). The psalm concludes as it began (v. 1), describing the pervasiveness of wickedness in society. Nevertheless, God's word is still at the center.

13:1–6

How Long?

The fourfold “How long?” of this lament psalm arises from a sense of divine abandonment. The hiddenness of God is at the center of the lament (cf. 10:11), and while there is no specific historical situation connected to this psalm, a number of events from David's life would be compatible with this deep feeling of being deserted by everybody, including God.

13:1–2. Lament. The psalm moves symmetrically from lament (vv. 1–2) to petition (vv. 3–4) and ends with praise (vv. 5–6), constituting a model prayer psalm. Four times the psalmist raises the question “How long?” It occurs in this identical form only once more in the psalms (62:3), but can be found in alternative forms throughout the Psalms (4:2; 6:4; 35:17; 74:9–10; 79:5; 80:4; 82:2; 89:46; 90:13; 94:3). It is one of the central questions in the relationship between the psalmist and God. It is a rhetorical question that grows out of sustained pain and the feeling of abandonment. Here, it is paired with the ensuing question that includes a time element: he wonders if he will be forgotten “forever.”

This sense of a seemingly endless time of sorrow wears down the psalmist's faith but, at the same time, expresses a faint hope for a limit to the pain. God's “forgetting” is the opposite of His “remembering.” It does not refer to a loss of mental recollection but to the apparent falling out of God’s favor and inaccessibility to His presence and help. This is reinforced in the parallel question “How long will God hide His face from him?” The psalmist moves from the religious (his relationship with God) to the psychological aspect of his sense of abandonment. He has been pondering and anxiously ruminating in his nepesh (“soul,” “heart,” or “mind”). This is a continuous emotional pain, a constant state of depression. There is also a sociological aspect as he asks, “How long will his enemy be putting him down?” The enemy remains anonymous in the singular but is someone who exalts himself over the psalmist. The question of how long expresses pain, loneliness, and fear yet also expresses the hope of deliverance.

13:3–4. Petition. The prayer moves now from lament to petition, beginning with an appeal to the Lord God to nabat (“consider,” “look upon”) him and to break His silence. The request to light up his eyes refers to renewing the weakened life-forces, reminiscent of the story of Jonathan eating honey, after which his eyes were enlightened (1 Sam. 14:27–29). Two reasons are supplied for God to answer David’s prayer: the threat of death, likened to a sleep, and the rejoicing of the enemy, who will think that he has finally defeated him.

13:5–6. Praise. There is a strong contrastive “but” at the beginning of v. 5 that introduces the last section of the prayer and provides the motivation for the psalmist’s confidence: his trust in God’s khesed (“mercy,” “unfailing love,” “loving-kindness,” “steadfast love”). David expresses trust in God’s loyal love (cf. 23:6) that will hold onto God’s faithfulness, being persuaded that God will prevail over evil. This is an occasion for praises anticipating divine deliverance. David’s confidence in this future deliverance is absolute and sufficient to reverse the abandonment mentioned at the beginning of the psalm. With God there is an abundance of blessings.

14:1–7

Foolishness

The instructional tone of Psalm 14 reminds us of Psalm 1. It focuses on the lifestyle of the godless and the pervasive corruption that stems out of a deep-rooted denial of God’s existence. This psalm is almost identical to Psalm 53 and has led some to suggest that Book 1 and 2 of the Psalms were initially independent collections. There are other psalms that occur twice in the OT (cf. 1 Sam. 22; Ps. 18), making it necessary to look beyond the similarities and notice nuances such as the preference for ’elohim (“God”) as the name of God in Psalm 53. It is conceivable that Psalm 53 was adapted to a different historical reality and audience. The authorship of the psalm is attributed to David.

14:1–4. The Fool’s Denial of God. Psalm 1 describes the blessed life of the righteous, but Psalm 14 describes the foolishness of a life without God. The term “fool” (v. 1) lacks a definite article, giving a generic and universal tone to the statement. The remainder of v. 1 and the following lines present a sustained negative description of the “fool,” which climaxes in the repeated observation that there is none who does good (vv. 1, 3). The universal corruption becomes even more apparent when God searches the whole world in vain to see if there are any who understand and seek Him or who recognize His sovereignty. God’s rhetorical question in v. 4 illustrates His astonishment at the extent of spiritual blindness. The foolish eat God’s people as they eat bread, indicating that the denial of God leads to the persecution of His people.

14:5–7. From Foolishness to Salvation. The turning point in the psalm is found in vv. 5–6 with the change in perspective introduced by the use of an adverb of place (i.e., “there”). As God is gazing from heaven, He sees the foolish huddled together in fear and dread. Foolishness and rejection of God turn into terror, and their oppression of the poor is thwarted. They did not count on the fact that the Lord is a refuge (v. 6). There was to be a final day of accounting for those rejecting God’s existence, and it would be a day of reversal of fortunes—Israel’s restoration would result in rejoicing and gladness. The restoration of Israel is not referring to their return from exile but is used in preexilic passages to denote a time of misery followed by restoration (cf. Job 42:10; Hos. 6:11; Amos 9:14). In the NT, Revelation predicts terror and shame for the foolish and ungodly (Rev. 6:16), caused by the eventual recognition of God’s existence and His care for His people.

15:1–5

The Gatekeeper I

Psalm 15 introduces a group of ten psalms that are organized in chiastic form around the second torah psalm (Ps. 19), ending with

Psalm 24. Both the beginning and end of this group serve as gatekeepers asking liturgical questions at the gate of the sanctuary. It is conceivable that these questions served to gain entrance to the Holy Place. In response the psalm lists ten characteristics of the person who is eligible to be admitted into the court of the sanctuary, reminiscent of the Ten Commandments. David is mentioned as the author of this psalm.

There is a rhetorical component in the questions that are asked at the gate concerning who may enter into and remain in God's tabernacle. The implication is that no one is worthy of close communion with God on their own merits. The "tabernacle" refers to a tent structure (Heb. 'ohel) and not to the temple, which had not yet been built. The verbal forms used in v. 1 refer as well to temporary "sojourning" (Heb. gur) and to "settling down" (Heb. shakan). The remainder of the psalm answers the two questions. Inner qualities that reflect the character of God (righteousness and truth, v. 2) are emphasized, followed by characteristics which flow out of them in words and deeds (v. 3). The righteous are those who differentiate between good and evil and side with the good even if it is to their disadvantage (v. 4). They also refrain from dishonest economic practices and the exploitation of the socially disadvantaged (v. 5).

The list goes deep into all aspects of life, serving as a practical application of the Ten Commandments. They describe a life of integrity that assures that the person will never be moved or shaken (v. 5). The faith of the righteous is unshakable! From a human perspective, one may shrink back from such a high standard, yet Jesus upholds it (cf. Matt. 5:48). The second gatekeeper psalm answers the question as to how we can attain such a life: blessing, righteousness, and salvation are gifts from the Lord (Ps. 24:5).

16:1–11

The Lord Is My Cup

God's everlasting provisions for His children are at the center of this psalm, which continues the chiasmic structure outlined above. It should be read together with Psalm 23, which uses similar imagery of the cup (16:5; 23:5), a term that is related to both salvation (e.g., 116:13) and judgment (e.g., 75:8). The superscription identifies the psalm as a miktam of David. The LXX understands this term to refer to an "inscription" (Gr. stelographia).

From comparison with ANE images, such a prayer could have been inscribed on a stele as a permanent and public commemoration of God's goodness. There is a group of other "inscription" psalms (Pss. 56–60). The connection with Psalm 23 underscores the Davidic ascription (cf. Acts 2:25).

16:1–4. Trusting in God and Not in Idols.

Psalm 16 begins with a plea for continued protection, which turns into an affirmation of David's trust in God, in whom he takes refuge. This affirmation is underlined with the statement that he has no good apart from God (v. 2; lit. "my good is not beyond you"), indicating that outside of God there is no other source of well-being. The psalmist strongly identifies himself with the qedoshim ("saints" or "holy people") and sharply disassociates himself from those who go after other gods (vv. 3–4). The verb mahar here can have a secondary meaning as in "barter" or "acquire" in the sense of paying a dowry for a wife (cf. Ex. 22:16). David shows his disgust for idolaters who have "gotten" themselves a new god. He will not follow their practices nor invoke their god's name.

16:5–7. You Are My Cup. David uses two metaphors to emphasize his trust in God's provision (v. 5). God is his kheleq ("Portion" or "Inheritance"), a term associated with the allocation of land during the conquest of Canaan (cf. Josh. 19:9), and his Cup, which is representative of both positive and negative destinies. This imagery connects Psalm 16 with Psalm 23. The allotment motif is further developed in v. 6. The boundary "lines" mentioned refer to cords used in the surveying and measuring of property. This is followed by a response of praise (v. 7). The biggest blessings are not material but rather God's instructions received at night. These instructions come to David via his kilyah ("heart," "mind"; lit. "kidneys"). The "kidneys" are used in the OT to refer to the conscience through which God can communicate with humans (cf. Job 19:27; Pss. 7:9; 26:2; Jer. 11:20).

16:8–11. Future Hope. God is at the center of the life of the psalmist and therefore he can affirm, even in the face of death, that he shall not be moved or shaken (v. 10). The soul (nepesh) refers to the person as a whole. The threat of she'ol ("the grave") and shakhat ("corruption," "decay"; lit. "pit") leads David to think about death and beyond. The language of the passage points beyond the immediate historical context to the coming of God's holy and faithful One, which is interpreted in the NT as a prophetic reference to the resurrection of Jesus Christ (Acts 2:25–28; 13:35). Christ's resurrection is the first fruit of the defeat of death. The life-threatening experience of David foreshadowed the ultimate experience of the Messiah, who would experience resurrection instead of corruption in the tomb. He is our true refuge.

17:1–15

A Prayer for Deliverance

David is urgently praying for deliverance from a threatening situation, which is more severe than the one in Psalm 16. The two psalms are terminologically linked and both look forward to God's vindication in a legal context (cf. 7:9; 11:5–6). The poem is framed by vv. 1–2 and 15, connected by various terms, such as tsedeq (“righteousness,” “justice,” “vindication”), panim (“Your face,” “Your presence,” sometimes translated as simply “You”), and khazah (“to look” or “to see”). The psalm moves from God looking at the psalmist and examining his case to the psalmist looking at God for vindication. The psalm is called “A Prayer of David,” but no information is given about the historical context.

17:1–5. Oath of Personal Innocence. This psalm is replete with anthropomorphic descriptions of God, such as His face (sometimes translated “presence” or simply “You”), eyes (v. 2), and hand (v. 14), as well as the image of the shadow of His wings (v. 8). These body parts are contrasted with the body parts of the wicked (vv. 10–14). The psalmist is appealing to the divine Judge as he affirms his innocence and pleads to God that vindication will come from His presence. David employs legal terminology (testing, trying, examining; v. 3) to present his case and argue for his faithfulness.

17:6–12. Liberation from Enemies. The second plea for deliverance is based on his own righteousness. Interestingly, the language of v. 7 is strongly allusive to the “Song of Moses” (Ex. 15:7, 11–13); thus there is a parallel between his deliverance and the Exodus. Two further images, the “apple” or pupil of God’s “eye” (i.e., the miniature image of what the eye sees as reflected in the pupil) and the shadow of His wings (v. 8), demonstrate God’s care for His children. They also underline the psalmist’s urgent plea for protection from the wicked, who are like young lions lying in wait for their prey (v. 12).

17:13–15. Assurance of Future Deliverance.

The series of familiar imperatives in v. 13 (cf. 7:6; 9:19) call for God’s immediate action and the destruction of the wicked. The request is for deliverance from the people of the world who live only for this earthly life (v. 14). Some interpreters understand the second part of v. 14 as referring to the righteous, but the strong contrast that is created at the beginning of v. 15 suggests that it describes the wicked. They are satisfied with the immediate and will finally reap what God has stored up for them—sometimes rendered as “treasure”—an expression often used to designate God’s judgment (cf. Job 20:26). In contrast to such a futile life, the psalmist will be satisfied by beholding God’s face (v. 15). This is not necessarily in conflict with Exodus 33:20, which warns that no one may see God and live. It rather means that the psalmist will witness God’s favor and intervention on his behalf. It might also refer to the resurrection and when humanity will behold God’s face. The term “face” depicts God in a very real and tangible way.

18:1–50

Yahweh Fighting from Heaven

Psalm 18, a thanksgiving psalm celebrating God’s deliverance of David in battle, is the third largest psalm in the Hebrew Psalms (after Pss. 78; 119). It describes God as a Warrior, one of the more frequently used divine images in the psalms (e.g., 21; 46; 68). The metaphor occurs mostly at the beginning of the Psalms throughout Books 1 to 3. It can be correlated to the historical situation during the early part of the monarchy and characterized by the military consolidation of the emerging kingdom (see Psalms: Introduction).

Psalm 18 and 2 Samuel 22 are almost identical, and this further supports Davidic authorship. Psalm 18 appears to have undergone some modifications in line with its liturgical usage. The liturgically modified but otherwise identical heading—the longest in the psalms—reflects this tendency. When the two psalms are compared, we find a number of cases where there are spelling variations and places where the available manuscripts and translations differ. For example, the Masoretic Hebrew text in Ps. 18:7 mentions the foundations of the mountains, whereas 2 Sam. 22:8 refers to the foundations of the heavens.

Some translations have the words matching in both places. This situation occurs several times in these parallel passages.

18:1–3. Invocation. The psalm begins with a strong commitment to God through an expression of love to God. What is unusual is that the verb used here (rakham) normally refers to God's compassion for humans (cf. Ex. 33:19). Nevertheless, it expresses David's strong commitment to his Lord, a concept that will be developed using nine divine epithets based on geographic and military metaphors. They are introduced by the possessive pronoun "my," expressing a deeply personal relationship between the psalmist and Yahweh. For David, the Lord is his Rock, Fortress, and Deliverer. The Hebrew word for "fortress" (metsudah) was applied to the later rock fortress of Masada on the western shores of the Dead Sea. This site is dated much later than David's reign but illustrates the images the psalmist had in mind when he penned his words of confidence in God, his Shield and Horn, which are terms for military strength. The invocation closes with a statement of faith in the form of praise (v. 3). The one who prays will experience salvation.

18:4–30. Affliction, Theophany, and Deliverance. The psalm now describes the life-threatening experience David is facing (vv. 4–6). There is a fourfold poetic description of death that, for the psalmist, seems to be imminent. This causes him to cry out toward God's temple for divine help. God's intervention is described as a divine appearance (a theophany; vv. 7–15), reminiscent of the Exodus experience at the Red Sea and at Sinai (cf. Ex. 15; 19). There is an earthquake, and the description of God's anger uses natural phenomena in connection with God's body (v. 8). There is a spatial movement from above to below: Yahweh rode upon a cherub with darkness and clouds surrounding Him (vv. 9–12); His voice thundered from heaven (v. 13), and He sent His arrows, which are likened to the accompanying lightning of the divine thunderstorm. This meteorological arsenal is directed against the enemies of the psalmist (v. 14). The violent descent of Yahweh as a Warrior concludes with another earthquake and the foundations of the earth being exposed. He rescues David from his enemy, drawing him out of the waters, which represent chaotic and evil forces (vv. 15–19).

Deliverance turns into praise as the psalmist exalts God's faithfulness to those who are faithful to Him (vv. 20–30). At the center of the praise is David's threefold affirmation of his own faithfulness: he is merciful or faithful (khasid; v. 25), blameless (tamim; vv. 23, 25), and pure (nabar; v. 26). These three words point not to the psalmist's merits or achievements but to divine characteristics that God bestows on His faithful ones. The last one could also be translated as "purified," indicating a relationship of forgiveness through ritual cleansing (cf. Is. 52:11). The section concludes with the use of some military metaphors: advancing against troops and scaling walls (i.e., in the attack of a fortified city; v. 29).

18:31–45. Yahweh Trains the King. After a short description of the character of God in which the psalmist theologically clarifies the relationship between God (His way is tamim—"perfect," "sound," "complete"; v. 30) and human perfection (God makes our way tamim; v. 33), Yahweh equips David with strength (v. 32), training his hands for battle so that his arms can bend a bronze bow. From v. 36 onward, the king remembers God's instructions that helped him to win wars with other nations (v. 43) and foreigners (vv. 44–45). The records of David's wars provide a realistic historical backdrop for this section (cf. 2 Sam. 8–21; 1 Chr. 18–20).

18:46–50. Doxology. The psalm closes with praises that begin by affirming God's power as revealed through His acts. After describing his military successes, David affirms that it is Yahweh who delivers him from his enemies (v. 48). This recognition leads into a final high note of praise to God, who shows khesed ("mercy," "loyal love") to His anointed, David, and his posterity forever (v. 50). Yahweh, the divine Warrior, is not necessarily a comfortable image of God for modern Christianity, but it nevertheless forms an important part of the many metaphors found in the psalms. In a period where physical warfare has moved to a spiritual one (Eph. 6:10–18), it is still comforting to know that Yahweh, the divine Warrior, is fighting on behalf of His children.

19:1–14

Torah in Creation

Psalm 19 is the center of the subgroup of psalms that are structured in a chiastic form. It is also one of the four torah psalms (cf. Pss. 1; 111; and 119) and relates God's law to creation. It moves from the general revelation of God in nature to the special revelation of God in Scripture and more specifically in His law. The contemplation of both necessitates a response from humans. Some commentators have suggested that the first part (vv. 1–6), which is distinct from the remainder of the psalm (vv. 7–14), was initially an old Canaanite hymn to the sun-god. However, there is an elaborate complementarity between the two parts that is reminiscent of the complementarity between Genesis 1 and 2. The divine name 'el (short for 'elohim) is used in the first part of the psalm, as in Genesis 1, while Yahweh is used in the second part, as in Genesis 2. According to the superscription, the psalm was composed by David.

19:1–6. Natural Revelation. All creation—represented by the heavens and the sky (or firmament)—declares the glory of God in a united chorus (v. 1). Translators differ in regard to how v. 3 is rendered. Some understand it to mean that the message of God's glory through His works is universally displayed in all languages—that is, “there is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard.” Others believe that it refers to a silent yet evident declaration—that is, “there is no speech, nor are there words; their voice is not heard.” The strongly personified description of nature (v. 2) connects repeatedly to the Creation account in Genesis 1. From vv. 4–6 the focus shifts to the sun as the central light in creation. Its daily journey through the sky begins as if in a tent or tabernacle that God has provided, and then it is described like a strong man or champion running its race through the circuit which God has ordained for it. The language can be associated with the Egyptian notion that the sun was reborn each morning, fresh and strong, or with Mesopotamian mythology, in which the sun-god Shamash (cf. the Heb. shemesh) is described as a “bridegroom.” On the famous Hammurabi stele, the sun-god is shown as giving the law to the Old Babylonian King Hammurabi. However, there is a certain polemical element in the psalm since the sun is clearly part of God's handiwork and it runs the divinely ordained circuit in obedience to Him. This becomes even clearer in the next section.

19:7–14. Special Revelation. Instead of the sun-god providing the law, v. 7 emphatically and almost abruptly states that it is the law of the Lord. The psalmist moves on from natural revelation to special revelation. In Hebrew thought, there is often a movement from effect to cause or from the secondary to the primary. While natural revelation provides us with a glimpse of God, it is torah, His written revelation that contains a far superior knowledge and far-reaching effect on humans. The divine name of God appears only once in vv. 1–6, whereas there is a sevenfold mention of Yahweh in vv. 7–14. Special revelation through God's word points much more directly at God than natural revelation does.

The law has power to shub, a word that essentially means “to return” but has been rendered variously in its participial form as “converting,” “refreshing,” “restoring,” etc. Its nature and effects are further explained as a perfect revelation of Yahweh's deeds, making the simple wise as right precepts or statutes that bring joy to the heart and as pure and radiant commands that enlighten one's eyes (vv. 7–8). The effects of the law on human beings are so valuable that they surpass the value of gold and are more enjoyable than honey (v. 10). There is great reward (v. 11) in keeping the torah. This deep view of the law elicits a response in the form of a prayer for cleansing from sin that has been committed inadvertently, as well as for protection from willful or presumptuous sins (vv. 12–14). The concluding formulaic line is one of the most widely used prayers (v. 14), and its language connects it to sanctuary terminology linking it to the acceptability of sacrifices (Lev. 1:3). It is by beholding that we are changed. The contemplation of nature in union with God's word has a life-changing impact on our hearts.

20:1–9

Victory in Battle I

Both Psalms 20 and 21 are prayers for protection in battle and are linked through their content to Psalm 18. Since Psalm 21 has a liturgical

The Great Reward of Psalm 19:11

David used seven distinct words to describe six aspects of God's written word (Ps 19:7–9). He claimed that the keepers of these six would obtain a great reward (v. 11). The nature of that reward, however, is not just in the clean life that results in keeping the six. Rather, the inner thoughts of such a given voice makes God happy and thus brings such a one into harmony with God. Living in the presence of God is the greatest reward of all.

change of speaker, it may have been used in a dedication ceremony at the sanctuary before King David and his army went out into battle (cf. 2 Chr. 20). It could be read as a report of what God accomplished in battle on behalf of His king and people.

20:1–5. Prayer for Protection. The psalm begins with the people's intercessory prayer on behalf of the king. It is an urgent prayer offered in times of trouble and distress for God to send help from the sanctuary (vv. 1–2). The reference to the name of the God of Jacob (v. 1) is a powerful invocation of the experience of the patriarch. But it is now the Name that will defend the king (lit. "to set on high;" i.e., make him unreachable). The name of the Lord is closely linked to His character (see Ex. 34:5–7). Thus, God's name has saving power as it invokes past experiences of divine deliverance during the patriarchal and the Exodus periods. It is also a prayer that God will remember and accept one's offerings and sacrifices (v. 3; the Hebrew verb dashen here implies the fat of the sacrifices). These may have accompanied the ritual at the sanctuary, stressing the total submission of the king to God and His blessing of the king's purposes and plans (v. 4). The intercession turns into a confident affirmation of salvation, deliverance, and victory, and using military language, the people proclaim the lifting of their banners in the name of God.

20:6. David's Response. There is a shift in speaker to the first person, and it is David who now expresses his confidence in divine deliverance, introducing his statement of faith with a contrastive and very strong affirmation of what he knows (v. 6). God deeply cares about His Anointed One (the Messiah). But deliverance comes not only from the earthly sanctuary but also from His holy heavenly sanctuary. This description is reminiscent of the image of Yahweh descending from heaven in a theophany, as described in Psalm 18:7–15.

20:7–9. Trust in the Name of the Lord. The psalm returns to the "we" of vv. 1–5 and concludes with a final appeal by the people for the Lord to save. The passage is sometimes translated as a general reference for God to save, "Save, Lord," and a final petition to the King (God) to answer. It could also be translated as, "Oh Lord, save the king! May He answer us on the day when we call." The final "He" would then refer to God. Although the Lord had trained the king for battle (Ps. 18:31–45), it is He who gives victory. Psalm 20 is a beautiful demonstration of the power of communal intercessory prayer on behalf of the king as he prepares for battle. God's people should always lift up their leaders in prayer, asking God to give them victories in the spiritual battle.

21:1–13 Victory in Battle II

The deliverance of the king in battle is now an experience of the past, and the resulting prayer of thanksgiving complements the pleas of the preceding psalm. The poem is consistently addressing God in the second person. The speaker might have been a temple singer or a priest who led the congregation in praises to God as David returned from battle. Davidic authorship is indicated, and the proximity of this psalm to Psalm 21 provides the background information needed.

21:1–7. Rejoicing in the Strength of the Lord. The psalm starts out with the note of praise as the king rejoices in the Lord's strength. This idea is echoed at the end of the psalm with a similar expression of praise—the Lord is exalted in His own strength (v. 13). It is God's strength that has delivered the king and answered the urgent plea that concluded the previous psalm.

Verses 2–5 list various blessings that God has bestowed upon the king. The verses move back and forth between past answered prayers (vv. 2, 4) and present ongoing blessings (vv. 3, 5), as the Hebrew verbal forms indicate. The blessings include goodness (or "good/rich/best blessings"), a crown of gold, length of days, salvation, victory, splendor, glory, and majesty. These eternal blessings are bestowed because the king trusts in the LORD. This acknowledgment forms the center of the psalm (v. 7; cf. 13:5).

21:8–13. Future Victories. The focus shifts from the king to God's (and the king's) enemies. The final defeat and destruction of the wicked is depicted (vv. 8–12), but it is Yahweh the Warrior who will fight on behalf of His king; the Lord will swallow them up in His wrath (v. 9). Their destruction is imminent because they planned evil against "you." This "you" is ambiguous, possibly intentionally, pointing to either God or His king. Ultimately it is God who, through His king (or sometimes without him), will gain victories for His people. The psalm ends on the same note it began (as in Ps. 20), praising and expressing confidence in God's power.

Desperate Prayer for Deliverance

Psalm 22 is a moving lament of personal suffering and affliction that typologically epitomizes the suffering of Jesus on the cross. But it moves beyond despair to deliverance and finally to praises. One cannot read the psalm without thinking of Christ's last words on Calvary. Yet, we need to consider the historical dimension to the poem. Christ's antitypical appropriation of the psalmist's words validates the typology. This Davidic psalm is "set to 'The Deer of the Dawn,'" which possibly indicates a musical tune, although the "deer" ('ayyalah) could also be translated as "help" (cf. v. 19). According to the LXX, which prefers this translation, help comes at dawn.

22:1–21. Why Have You Forsaken Me? The psalm starts with a double question introduced by a twofold cry of 'eli, which appears as a personalized appellation of God elsewhere in the psalms (cf. 18:2; 63:1; 68:24; 89:26; 102:24; 118:28; 140:6) and as a positive declaration in v. 10. Yet while David feels forsaken, God is still his God and he turns to Him in the hour of despair and forsakenness. Jesus's Aramaic appropriation of these words demonstrates the messianic dimension of the psalm and demarcates the moment of redemption in which the Son of God experienced the ultimate separation from His Father through the weight of sin (Matt. 27:46).

Facing God's silence, the faithful one recalls Yahweh's deeds on behalf of the forefathers (vv. 3–5) and invokes God's holiness (vv. 3–5). But not even this resolves the sense of abandonment (v. 6) accompanied by the mockery of the wicked (vv. 6–8). The psalmist recalls God's creative power in his birth (vv. 9–10), turning the question of v. 1 into an affirmation of faith: from his mother's womb, Yahweh has been his God. The lament is found in vv. 11–18, alternating between the third-person description of the wicked and the first-person declarations of the psalmist. The wicked are compared to bulls, lions, and dogs. Such frightening animal imagery, often used in ANE iconography to describe the realm of demons, points to the demonic dimension of the imposing company of the wicked threatening the king. They pierced his hands and his feet (v. 16), divided his articles of clothing, and cast lots over them (v. 18). The section is full of prophecies and explicitly describes Jesus's suffering on the cross (cf. John 19:24). It ends with a protracted plea for deliverance (vv. 19–21), which returns to the three animal metaphors.

22:22–31. Deliverance and Praise. Pleas move to praises that emphasize the communal character of the praise (v. 22). Praise focuses on a God who has not hidden His face (v. 24) but who hears and answers prayers. This praise increases exponentially and echoes from the individual to the assembly (v. 25) and finally to the ends of the earth and all nations (v. 27). Even the future generations will come to proclaim His righteousness (v. 31). The praises of those who experienced God's silence and deliverance are a powerful witness. Beyond the historical dimension, the messianic language of Psalm 22 illustrates how David was inspired to go far beyond his own suffering to point prophetically to the Messiah, whose death would resolve suffering forever (Ps. 22:1 // Matt. 27:46; Ps. 22:7 // Matt. 27:39; Ps. 22:8 // Matt. 27:43; Ps. 22:15 // John 19:28; Ps. 22:18 // John 19:23–24; Ps. 22:22 // Heb. 2:12).

23:1–6

Shepherd and Royal Host

This is most likely the best-known psalm. However, this familiarity does not necessarily imply a full understanding of its meaning. Psalm 23 is driven by two metaphors—God as a Shepherd and Royal Host—both of which express a deep trust in God's provisions and are intimately connected to the life of David, to whom the psalm has been ascribed.

23:1–3. My Shepherd. Psalm 22 opened with a personal appellation to God ("my God"); this psalm opens with "The LORD is my shepherd." It introduces a metaphor that runs through the Bible as a beautiful image of God's care and provision with messianic overtones (cf. John 10:11–14). Sometimes it is also applied to ungodly leaders (cf. Ezek. 34:2). The image of the king as a shepherd was known throughout the ANE and served as a paradigm for just kingship. Egyptian kings held a flail and a shepherd's crook to demonstrate their might and protective responsibilities. The Babylonian King Hammurabi (1792–1750 BC) called himself "the shepherd of the oppressed and of the slaves." The second part of v. 1 functions as a result clause to the first part. Because the Lord is the Shepherd, His sheep will not be in want or lack anything.

God's perfect provisions are further developed in vv. 2–3 using images that were familiar to a shepherd in ancient Israel and terms that go beyond the shepherd metaphor. There are green pastures, evoking vistas of abundant fresh grass on which the morning dew has fallen (cf. Deut.

32:2), and still, quiet waters (lit. “waters of rest”). Interestingly, menukhah (“rest,” “resting place”) is used elsewhere to denote the rest from war that God provided after the conquest of Canaan (cf. Deut. 12:9; 1 Kin. 8:56). God also shub (“returns,” “restores,” “refreshes”) the soul/life (v. 3). This theologically significant verb shub is often used for forgiveness and spiritual renewal (1 Kin. 8:33). Finally, He leads in the paths of righteousness (or “the right paths”). This means that God’s ways always lead home; they are righteous because God is doing this for His name’s sake (i.e., He is acting according to His character).

23:4. Death Valley. The image of rich abundance and bliss changes abruptly to a valley of the shadow of death (v. 4). It threatens the psalmist, who is now speaking not about God but to Him. The somewhat odd expression can also be translated as “valley of deathly darkness,” expressing a life-threatening experience (cf. Job 10:21; Jer. 13:16). It is alleviated only through the immediate presence of the Lord. Verse 4 is also the center of the psalm, where the psalmist shifts from the Shepherd metaphor to the metaphor of a Royal Host. This is done through the juxtaposition of two seemingly redundant terms: the “rod” refers to a short scepter, the insignia of a king (cf. Ps. 2:9; Is. 10:5), and the “staff”/“cane” is the longer shepherd’s rod used to provide support for sheep (Zech. 8:4). God is depicted here as Lord of the sheep and the One who cares and rescues them.

23:5–6. Royal Host. As the shepherd provides for his sheep, the royal host does the same in ways that reflect ANE hospitality. The first image is that of a royal banquet (cf. 2 Sam. 9:7–13) prepared in the presence of the guest’s enemies. According to the rules of many ANE hospitality cultures, the enemy could not touch the guest because he or she was under the protection of the host (cf. Gen. 19). The royal treatment continues as oil is poured onto the guest’s head, a treatment reserved only for royal guests (cf. Luke 7:46). Finally, there is a cup that overflows and satisfies all possible thirst and which, according to hospitality rules, was continuously refilled.

The conclusion of the psalm again shifts toward a theological reading of the imagery: goodness and mercy will follow. While righteousness was the theological keyword in the first image (“paths of righteousness”), now it is khesed, that rich, covenantal word previously encountered and difficult to convey in one English word. Here it is sometimes translated as “mercy,” but its range of meanings includes such terms as “love,” “faithfulness,” “loving-kindness,” and “loyalty.” The covenant term khesed does not only follow, it “pursues” and makes one “return” to the house of the Lord. Shub, the same verbal root used in v. 3, can be read as “return” here. The house of the Lord is both palace and temple, merging the religious and royal sphere in the image of the Shepherd and King.

24:1–10

The Gatekeeper II

Psalm 24 concludes a group of psalms and returns to a question-and-answer liturgy performed by the Levites at the gates of the temple. It is well known from its musical arrangement in Handel’s Messiah (Movement 33), which connects it thematically to Christ’s ascension. The psalm was possibly sung as a song of triumph after victory in battle over the Canaanites at the conquest of Jerusalem or as the ark was brought to Jerusalem by King David, the author of the poem.

24:1–2. Doxology. Using creation terminology, the psalmist acclaims God’s sovereignty and proclaims that the earth is the Lord’s, indirectly requesting a response in worship from its inhabitants (v. 1). The verse expresses in poetic form the OT cosmology indicating that God established the earth upon the waters (v. 2). Most probably the psalmist is criticizing Canaanite cosmology, where creation was the result of a battle between the Canaanite gods Baal and Yam. In the psalm God is depicted as the sovereign Creator.

24:3–6. Approaching Worshiper. As the worshipers respond to the doxology, the question is raised concerning the qualifications of those who are allowed to enter God’s mountain and His holy place (v. 3). These qualifications of the worshipers who are worthy of approaching the temple gates are a list of standards that reflect OT ethics found in the legal parts of the Pentateuch. These are based on an inward disposition of righteousness, a pure heart, as well as on the result of just action, clean hands. They refrain from idolatry and blasphemy (v. 4; cf. Ex. 20:7), and consequently Yahweh blesses them (v. 5). The abrupt mention of Jacob at the end of v. 6 is used to designate Israel and epitomizes the experience of the patriarch as the receptor of Yahweh's blessings.

24:7–10. Gate Liturgy. The question-and-answer liturgy continues as the worshipers stand by the temple gates. The gates, which are personified (v. 7), are the 'olam ("ancient" or "everlasting") doors of the temple, but by extension they represent the city and people that are ready for the coming King (cf. Ps. 118:20). The King is described as the Lord mighty in battle, returning victorious from war (v. 8), and as the King of glory (vv. 7–10). The refrains found in vv. 7–8 are repeated in vv. 9–10, adding new ones. The opening of the personified gates of the temple to welcome the sovereign and victorious God, invites us to also acknowledge Him as our sovereign Lord and open up the gates of our hearts to receive the King of glory.

25:1–22

An Acrostic Prayer

Psalms 25–28 bring together a group of prayers for a variety of situations. Psalm 25 initiates this with an alphabetic composition (two lines beginning with r instead of the expected q). The psalm is clearly organized around prayer and wisdom, making it a model prayer that can be easily remembered via its acrostic pattern. David is mentioned as the author and there is nothing in the psalm that could not be lined up with the events of his life.

25:1–7. Initial Invocation. The "lifting up" of the soul or life is translated idiomatically in some versions (e.g., "I put my trust" or "I turn to You"). There is a correspondence between the initial invocation and the concluding request through repetition of terminology—for example, nepesh ("soul" or "life"; vv. 1, 20), 'oybai ("my enemies"; vv. 2, 19), and bosh ("to be ashamed"; vv. 2, 3, 20). This creates a concentric emphasis on the second section on wisdom (vv. 8–15). An initial affirmation of trust is followed by a plea not to be ashamed (i.e., not to be humiliated and ruined by enemies' victories over him) but rather to have the shame fall on them instead, since they have been treacherous with him for no reason (v. 3). Those who have dealt deceitfully with David are inexcusable and are traitors to God's cause (cf. 78:57). The plea continues by asking for God's instruction and daily guidance in His ways and paths. These two synonyms are repeated throughout the psalm (vv. 4, 8, 9, 10, 12) and introduce the wisdom motif. The section concludes with a plea for God's forgiveness according to His mercy and love (v. 6). God's eternal (Heb. 'olam) attributes are stressed as the basis for divine forgiveness.

25:8–15. Reflection on Wisdom. The central section consists of a series of declarative statements about the character of God and His guidance. He teaches His way, which is mishpat ("justice," "right," "judgment"; v. 9), khesed ("mercy," "lovingkindness," "loyal love"; v. 10), and 'emet ("truth," "faithfulness"; v. 10). In the middle of the wisdom section and in the middle of the Hebrew alphabet (lamed), there is a supplication for forgiveness (v. 11). Then the psalm continues with a description of God's way (v. 12), focusing on the benefits experienced by those who fear Him (v. 14) and expressed in terms of the covenant promise of inheriting the land (v. 13; cf. Deut. 4:1).

25:16–22. Concluding Request. The change from third- to first-person viewpoint introduces a plea in the final section that echoes the plea of vv. 1–7. The psalmist uses the imagery of sight and asks God to look on his affliction (v. 18) and intervene. God should recognize how numerous his enemies are (v. 19) and deliver him from them (v. 20). God's seeing means action (Ps. 142:4–7). The psalm concludes with an expansion of the plea to include the people of Israel—a prayer for their padah ("ransom," "redemption," or "deliverance"; v. 22). This multi-themed poem is foremost an intense prayer for guidance and instruction in "the way." This term is used in the NT as the earliest self-description of Christians (cf. Acts 9:2; 11:26) based on the radical claim of Jesus as "the Way" (John 14:6–7).

26:1–12

Integrity and Vindication

Psalm 26 continues the tone set in the previous psalm by providing a model prayer for different situations in life. While Psalm 25 asked for guidance, Psalm 26 is a prayer of vindication based on a strong affirmation of the psalmist's own integrity. There are a number of links between the two psalms (e.g., v. 1 // 25:2, 21) and there is also a similar framing in the beginning and end of the psalm, centered on the theme of integrity. It has been suggested that Psalms 25–28 originated together during a specific time in the life of David, possibly during the rebellion of Absalom. They probably reflect prayers that arose from the pressing circumstances David experienced during that dark period in his life.

26:1–2. Plea for Vindication. The psalm begins with the forensic imperative, “vindicate me,” followed in v. 2 by three further imperatives that use legal terminology: bakhan (“test,” “examine,” “prove”), nasah (“test,” “try,” “prove”), and tsarap (“try,” “examine,” “refine”), all intensifying the request. The petition is based on the psalmist’s integrity because he trusted in the Lord (v. 1; cf. 7:8–9). This is not an expression of self-righteousness but an affirmation of faith based on his relationship with God that trustingly invites divine scrutiny (cf. 139:23–24).

26:3–8. Affirmation of Integrity. Following the invitation for divine trial, the psalmist affirms his own integrity through invoking the guiding principles of his life: he has always looked at God’s khesed (“lovingkindness,” “unfailing love”) and has lived (lit. “walked”) by trusting in God’s ’emet (“truth” or “faithfulness”), which refers to a lifelong commitment to God’s way (cf. Ps. 25, which also uses the metaphors of seeing and walking). This implies a clear separation from the wicked, who are described as shaw’ (lit. “empty” or “vain”), sometimes used to refer to deceit (e.g., 12:2; 41:6; 144:8) or idolatry (e.g., Jer. 18:15). They are hypocrites and evildoers (vv. 4–5). The psalmist also acclaims his ritual purity; he will wash his hands in innocence, an action that grants access to the altar in the sanctuary (v. 6; cf. Deut. 21:1–9). This is done in order to join the congregation in praise (vv. 6–8). The temple, as the place David loved (v. 8) contrasts with the assembly of evildoers that he loathed (v. 5).

26:9–12. Plea for Deliverance. The contrast is further developed in the final plea of the psalm. The description of the sinners continues and the psalmist asks not to be included among them in death (v. 9). This is followed by a final reiteration of personal integrity, which leads into public praise. Moral integrity implies a clear separation from wickedness and is foremost grounded in God’s redemption and vindication.

27:1–14

Praise and Plea

Psalm 27 begins with a prayer of trust (vv. 1–6) followed by a lament in the second part of the psalm (vv. 7–14), rather than with a lament followed by praise as in most psalms. It recalls Psalms 9–10, which together form an acrostic poem following the same sequence (cf. also Ps. 40). From a theological and didactic perspective, praise should precede plea. The group of psalms that bring together prayers for different occasions demonstrates that one should present thanksgiving before requests. David’s life provides the backdrop to the poem and the LXX dates it prior to his anointing.

27:1–6. Praise. At the outset the psalmist acknowledges the power of Yahweh through the metaphors of ma’oz (“mountain stronghold,” “refuge”) and ’or (“light”; cf. Is. 60:1; Mic. 7:8–9) and asks the rhetorical question “Of whom shall I be afraid?” He then recounts how God has protected him in the past (v. 2) and how He will protect him as well in the future, even if an army were to besiege him (v. 3). Verses 4–6 enhance the image of refuge by connecting it to the sanctuary. The psalmist wants to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of his life (v. 4; cf. Ps. 23:6) in order to be in God’s continuous presence and behold the beauty of the Lord (i.e., to contemplate His wonderful works; cf. 90:16). He is looking for a hiding place in the shelter of God’s tabernacle/tent and offers sacrifices with joy because God has saved him from his enemies (v. 6).

27:7–14. Plea. Now the psalmist turns to his plea, requesting that God hear and answer (v. 7). In Hebrew, it is not clear who is speaking in v. 8. Some translate as if God is speaking, while others claim it is the conscience of the psalmist (his heart; cf. v. 3, 14), which seems to speak on God’s behalf as the means of communication between God and humankind. Either way, the psalmist responds affirmatively that he will seek God’s face (v. 8). Seeking God’s face is equivalent to longing for His presence (105:4) and trusting in His miraculous intervention (31:16). The petition is then concretized by petitioning God to not hide His face, which is a request to not be abandoned by God.

The request for instruction in God’s way (v. 11) connects this psalm to the two preceding prayers (Pss. 25–26) by expressing the desire to follow God’s will and be led in a smooth or straight path, even in the face of his oppressive enemies who have risen against him as false witnesses (vv. 11–12). A final exhortation of trust encourages the audience beyond the psalmist with a twofold “wait on the Lord,” at the beginning and end of v. 14. The prayer of Psalm 27 follows the positive confidence of the two preceding psalms, but it adds an emphasis on the sanctuary (vv. 4–6). It is the sanctuary that provides a safe haven, God's pleasant presence and future guidance for the psalmist. In Jewish tradition the psalm is recited during the sixth month in preparation for the Day of Atonement.

28:1–9

Plea and Praise

This poem concludes the group of prayers (Pss. 25–28) dealing with various pressing situations in the life of David. As in Psalm 27, the structure is twofold and help comes from the sanctuary, in this case the holy of holies (v. 2), but the sequence is reversed and plea is followed by praise.

28:1–5. Plea. The psalmist asks the Lord to hear his cry of despair and not be silent (vv. 1–2). God's silence would mean death; he would become like "those who go down to the pit." The cry intensifies as David lifts up his hands toward the tabernacle, a physical gesture that often expresses an urgent appeal (v. 2). He seems to be standing in the courtyard of the tabernacle facing the debir qodesh ("the holy inner room" or "the holiest of holies"). This is the only occurrence of this phrase in the Psalms (see 1 Kin. 6:19–31; 2 Chr. 4:20 for others). The psalmist next concretizes the request. He does not want to be "dragged off" like a criminal for judgment along with the ungodly, who speak cordially and peacefully but have malice and evil in their hearts (v. 4). God can deal with them in only one way: they will be destroyed and torn down rather than built up (v. 5). Notice the contrast between the endeavors of hands of the wicked (v. 4) and those of God's hands (v. 5). One leads to destruction and the other to salvation, which is the content of the following praise.

28:6–9. Praise. The praise begins with the familiar formula, baruk yahweh ("praised" or "blessed be the Lord"; cf. 31:21; 41:13; 72:18; 89:52; 106:48; 124:6; 135:21; 144:1), because He has answered the supplication of the psalmist. A number of metaphors for divine refuge follow that are first applied to the individual and then extended to the community. God is the psalmist's Strength (v. 7), but also the Strength of His people (v. 8). Some translations render the phrase literally "their strength" without a referent. That "His people" is the implied referent is suggested by both the LXX and other manuscripts, as well as by the final appeal for God to save His people and shepherd them. This invokes once more the image of the divine Shepherd (v. 9; cf. 23:1–4) who serves as the ideal paradigm for the earthly king. Psalm 28 is a prayer for separation from the wicked and from the judgment against them. While the prayer is just, we must recognize, as David did, that it is God who judges and executes that judgment.

29:1–11

Yahweh's Seven Thunders

The sevenfold qol yahweh ("the voice of the LORD") that runs through the center of this beautiful hymn (vv. 3–9) resounds like a thunder in a storm that rages above the interior of northern Israel, which provides the geographical locale for this psalm. The psalm has repeatedly been likened to a Canaanite hymn dedicated to the weather and storm god Baal. However, the exposition will show that it rather serves as a well-aimed polemic against Canaanite mythology, demonstrating the monotheistic supremacy of Yahweh over all the gods of Canaan. Davidic authorship provides a good link to the historical background during a time in which the Israelite king established the monarchy among its Canaanite enemies.

29:1–2. Glory in Heaven. There is a parallel between vv. 1–2 and vv. 10–11 (more specifically, v. 9c) that brackets the thoughts of the psalmist. This is done through the use of the word "glory" and the fourfold mention of the name "LORD." While the introduction serves as a call to angelic worship in heaven, the final invitation to worship extends the blessings to earth. We attribute greatness to God (vv. 1–2), and God gives us strength and peace. This represents a spatial movement from above to below that runs throughout the psalm. The term bene 'elim has been interpreted and translated in various ways. It is literally "sons of God" but has also been translated as "sons of the mighty." The term 'el is sometimes understood as indicative of power, might, or "heavenly beings," understood as angelic beings that serve before God's throne (cf. 89:6; Job 2:1), or as those who are "godly." Being the "son" of something or someone conveys the idea of having their characteristics (Judg. 19:22; 1 Sam. 2:12; John 5:18; 8:44; Acts 4:36). Whichever is intended, they are invited to worship God and, by contrast, not to be worshiped by humankind as in Canaanite mythology.

29:3–9. The Divine Storm. Seven times the “voice of the LORD” is mentioned, and every time it is not only audible but also active, impacting fauna and flora. The divine manifestation through the thunderstorm begins over rab (“many” or “mighty”) waters, an expression that often designates the Mediterranean. The natural event of a storm forming over the sea and traveling inland is an observable phenomenon in the Holy Land. There is an implied polemic here as the “waters” in Canaanite mythology represent the forces of chaos with which the gods have to fight.

However, Yahweh is over the waters and sits enthroned over the flood (v. 10). As the storm moves over the Lebanon and Sirion (i.e., the Sidonian/Canaanite name for Mt. Hermon) and finally subsides in the Syrian desert/the Wilderness of Kadesh (vv. 6–8), it breaks and splinters trees (v. 5), makes mountains skip like a calf (v. 6), shakes the wilderness (v. 8), and strips the forests bare (v. 9). The Hebrew text in v. 9 literally refers to God causing deer to writhe in birth pains, but some have suggested an emendation to the text in order to strengthen the parallel with the stripping of the forest. In this case, the plural Hebrew word for deer ('ayyalot—the singular is 'ayyalah) should be replaced by one of the words for oaks ('elot—from the singular 'ayil or 'elah) instead, and accordingly the phrase would be referring to the convulsion of the oaks. Lightning and earthquakes accompany the thunderstorm, and trees and mountains—both of which are normally symbols of divine strength in Canaanite mythology—are subject to the majesty and power of Yahweh’s thunderstorm. Even the wilderness, normally the habitation of demons, and the reproductive cycle of nature are subject to the power of Yahweh. One cannot but notice the continuous polemics here.

29:10–11. And Peace on Earth. The final call to worship in the heavenly sanctuary with a shout of “glory” (v. 9) introduces an almost tangible change of tone. In contrast to the dynamic verbal action forms of vv. 3–9, there is a static quality to v. 10 as Yahweh sits enthroned as King forever (v. 10). From the heavenly sanctuary He bestows blessings on earth on His people (v. 11). While in vv. 1–2 God was the object of worship, now He is the subject who blesses His people. The Psalm closes with peace after the storm. Worship of God in the heavenly sanctuary returns to earth as a blessing of peace.

30:1–12

From Weeping to Joy

This thanksgiving psalm represents a masterpiece of Hebrew poetry, playing on contrasts and reversals from negative to positive: e.g., “brought...up” and “go down” (v. 3), “weeping...for a night” and “joy in the morning” (v. 5), “mourning” and “dancing” (v. 11), all pointing to a drastic experience in the life of the poet based on a self-sufficiency that eclipsed God (v. 7). The superscription has been parsed in different ways, leading to different understandings. There are four Hebrew word groupings: “a psalm,” “a song of dedication,” “the house,” and “of David.”

There is universal agreement that the first two word groupings are meant to be separate. The relationship of the last three are debated. Some translations read, “A song at the dedication of the house of David.” Others read, “A song. For the dedication of the temple/palace. Of David” (indicating Davidic authorship as in other psalms). In this way, some have understood the “house” (bayit) as referring to the house of God (i.e., the temple), which would then render the title anachronistic because David did not dedicate the temple. It is more likely a reference to a song David wrote in preparation for the future dedication of the temple, even though there is no indication that it was sung at the dedication (1 Kings 8:62–66). He may have composed it soon after the experience of the census he conducted (cf. 2 Sam. 24:1). On the other hand, David did complete his palace in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:11–12), which may be what is referred to here (though Scripture does not record a dedication event). For whichever event this psalm was composed, David gave God the glory.

30:1–3. Praise for Deliverance. The psalm commences with praise for healing from a potentially fatal illness, when God brought him up from she'ol, the realm of death and the grave (v. 3). The healing (v. 2) may be not just physical but also spiritual in nature, and both go hand in hand in the OT (cf. 147:3). If one takes David’s census (2 Sam. 24; 1 Chr. 21) as the historical backdrop for the psalm, both aspects are relevant.

30:4–5. God’s Discipline and Favor. The praise is extended to the congregational level, to the khasidim (“faithful ones” or “saints”; v. 4). The subject of their thanksgiving hymn is identified through striking contrasts. God’s anger lasts for only a moment (lit. “twinkling of the eye”), while His favor is for a lifetime, contrasting the proportion between God's wrath and His pleasure. This is then further enhanced by the contrast between the night and the morning, when joy replaces weeping.

30:6–10. Self-Sufficiency. The psalmist now confesses in more detail what lies at the heart of his alienation from God. The shalu mentioned in v. 6 can be translated as “prosperity” or as “careless security” (cf. Ezek. 16:49), denoting a self-sufficiency that leads to the moment when David realizes that God had hidden His face. Then he was terrified (v. 7). The sobering realization of God's absence leads to a request to God for Him to hear him once more and show him mercy (vv. 8–10).

30:11–12. Mourning into Dancing. The final section replicates vv. 4–5 in returning to the contrasts and reversals that mark this psalm. The emblems of death (weeping and sackcloth) have been replaced by the emblems of life (dancing and rejoicing). It is an outward expression of joy over restoration (cf. Jer. 31:13), which leads to a final vow to give thanks to God forever. Psalm 30 is a striking image of a God who disciplines, but only for a moment if compared with life and eternity, and who is able to reverse and transform our darkness into light in a moment.

31:1–24

A Repeated Prayer of Distress

The two movements of Psalm 31 (vv. 1–8 and 9–24) are parallel in that they move from plea to expressions of trust and from deliverance to praise. Because of its repetitive content, it has been suggested that this psalm is a conflation of two originally individual poems. However, repetition is an important rhetoric and didactic device that goes through the same “story” twice, a phenomenon which can be found in various places throughout the psalms (cf. Pss. 30; 42–43; 95; 100). The two sections are furthermore connected by recurring expressions (e.g., “trust”; khasah, lit. “seek refuge”; vv. 1 and 19; “into Your hand”; vv. 5 and 15). Besides the Davidic authorship, the LXX adds “of alarm” to the superscription, an expression related to the Hebrew verb khapaz (“to be alarmed” or “to hurry in alarm”) in v. 22. This has motivated commentators to link it with 1 Samuel 23:26, where this same verb is used in regard to David's reaction to Saul's pursuing him.

31:1–8. Prayer I. The psalm goes straight into a plea for deliverance, underlined by an affirmation of faith: David trusts and takes refuge in God. The divine metaphors of Rock and Fortress are used twice (vv. 2–3), and this could remind the listener/reader of Psalm 18. The request for deliverance is linked to a deceptive net or trap laid for him (v. 4), drawing on the imagery of hunting. The flight of David from Saul as he tried to pull his net closer and closer comes to mind here. Verse 5 commences with a statement of trust, which Christ appropriated just before His death (Luke 23:46)—the psalmist will commit his spirit into God's hands. This encapsulates the experience of all those who completely entrust their lives to God and praise Him for deliverance. Such people are contrasted with those who give homage to vain idols (v. 6). The psalmist can rejoice in God's mercy, because He has set his feet in an open place. With this image of wide space the psalm returns to the plea.

31:9–24. Prayer II. The psalmist pleads for mercy and then lists a number of physical and emotional consequences of his trouble: his eyes are weakened by his distress, his strength fails, he is despised by his enemies, and he is even dreaded by his acquaintances (vv. 9–11). He has become a persona non grata, somebody who is forgotten as if dead (v. 12). In v. 13, he mentions whispering slander as the cause and states that fear is on every side (or, alternatively, that his enemies are saying, “fear/terror on every side” as a plan for their attack), a phrase that occurs also in Jeremiah's sentencing of Pashhur (Jer. 20:2–3; cf. Is. 31:9). Jeremiah probably took the phrase from this psalm and used it to summarize his message of judgment.

The affirmation of trust and petition for deliverance (vv. 14–16) is linked to the high priestly benediction (Num. 6:25) that God shine His face on him. He is requesting a renewal of God's favor and the silencing of his enemies (vv. 17–18). This second prayer (vv. 19–24) concludes the psalm and serves as an extended praise of God's goodness that protects those who trust in Him. There is an exhortation for all of God's people to be encouraged (vv. 23–24). David, persecuted by Saul, becomes a type for Christ, who is the ultimate persecuted One, even unto death. Jesus used the words of Psalm 31:5 to express His ultimate trust in His Father as He breathed His last for the forgiveness of our sins.

32:1–11*A Prayer for Forgiveness

Psalms 32 is a penitential poem closely associated with Psalm 51. Both express sorrow over sin and the joy that comes with the forgiveness of sins (cf. also Pss. 6; 38; 102; 130; 143). Traditionally, the Davidic authorship of the psalm and its similarity with Psalm 51 have led to its connection with the aftermath of David's sin with Bathsheba. The superscription maskil (sometimes rendered as "contemplation") occurs here for the first time and can also be rendered as "instruction." The term is based on the verbal form sakal, "to instruct," which also occurs in v. 8. There is an instructive element here in that the psalmist encourages others to follow not the way he has taken but God's way.

32:1–5. Praise for Forgiveness. Similar to Psalm 1, this psalm opens with a beatitude, this time for those who are forgiven. This opening summarizes the content of the remainder of the psalm. Sin is described as "rebellion" (pesha') and "missing the mark" (khata'ah), both of which can refer to a deliberate act. Theologically and legally, the Lord does not impute iniquity to the sinner. Rather, the Lord imputes (khashab) righteousness to those who have faith in Him (Gen. 15:6; cf. Paul's usage of Ps. 32:2 in Rom. 4:8). Verses 3–5 describe the agony of unconfessed sin, which is described in the strongest physical terms, indicating the far-reaching consequences of hidden iniquity and divine discipline (vv. 3–4). This is relieved only after David acknowledged his sin (v. 5). One needs to be careful not to relate sin and discipline too dogmatically (as Job's friends do), but the psalmist is here recognizing God's attempt to correct him in his sin. Note the immediacy of forgiveness following the confession, "and You forgave." This is expressed emphatically in the Hebrew by the placement of the personal pronoun "you" in the front position. This is not grammatically required but is done for the purpose of emphasis.

32:6–11. Encouragement and Instruction. David immediately feels the need to extend his experience to others as the burden has been lifted off his shoulders. He concludes by noting that God's faithful and godly ones should pray to Him while He may be found, leading to deliverance and protection (v. 6). In v. 7, the psalmist returns to the personal dimension. The final section (vv. 8–11) is the formal instruction, in which the speaker appears to be God first addressing the psalmist (v. 8; singular) but then extending His instructions to others as well (v. 9). He uses the metaphor of the horse and mule, which must be harnessed. This is the style of wisdom language. In v. 10, we find a proverb (cf. Prov. 28:25). The final line of the psalm returns to psalmodic praise with a resounding invitation for the upright in heart to sing and shout for joy (v. 11). The contrast between the effects of unconfessed sin and the experience of forgiveness marks this psalm as one of the great penitential psalms that should encourage sinners to seek forgiveness.

33:1–22*God in Creation and History

Besides the two portals to the Psalms (Pss. 1 and 2) and Psalm 10 (a continuation of Ps. 9), Psalm 33 is the only other psalm in Book 1 that lacks a superscription (cf. the LXX and a ms. from Qumran, which add Davidic authorship). Psalm 33 is a hymn of praise, describing God as Creator and Lord of history. Verse 1 responds to 32:11 with a similar bidding of the righteous to rejoice.

33:1–3. Call to Praise. Psalm 33 is introduced by an extended call to praise that includes song and instrument. The motivation is that the praise of the upright is na'weh ("beautiful," "comely," "fitting"). Praise is a natural outflow of a heart that has experienced the redeeming power of God.

33:4–19. Cause for Praise. The fundamental cause for praise is God and His character: He loves righteousness and justice (v. 5), together with 'emunah ("truth," "faithfulness"; v. 4) and khesed ("mercy," "goodness," "unfailing love"; v. 5). These are the perfections of Yahweh that run through the Psalms (cf. 25:8–16). Verses 6–9 move from a description of God's character to a description of His work of Creation, which was accomplished by His word (v. 6). This should inspire all people to revere Him. There is a strong affirmation of Genesis 1 and 2 as a literal Creation account (v. 9). Based on John 1 and on Christ as the logos, we can find here a messianic perspective.

From Creation the psalm moves to history, declaring the supremacy of God among the nations. His purposes and plans supersede those of the nations (cf. Dan. 2). No king is saved by the great size of his army (v. 16), but by his relationship to God (v. 12). Yahweh's salvific actions are manifested throughout history, and He is ready to deliver those who fear and hope in Him. History in the OT is always linked to God's interventions and is focused on the salvation of His people and beyond.

33:20–22. Declaration of Trust. An affirmation of trust in Yahweh concludes the psalm, its final climax being a congregational invocation for the Lord's khesed ("mercy," "unfailing love") to be upon His people who hope in Him. Trust provides a solid foundation for hope. Yahweh as Creator and Lord of history provides a historical basis for the work of salvation, which finds its supreme expression in Christ.

34:1–22

An Acrostic Testimony

Psalm 34 continues the instruction of the previous psalm in the form of an alphabetic poem, with some small irregularities (cf. Ps. 25) that testify about the goodness of Yahweh. The psalm is continuously about God, but none of the lines are directly addressed to Him. It covers a variety of life situations together, with the corresponding deliverance by Yahweh. The form is that of a didactic poem, which one may easily recall under a pressing situation. It was composed by David, and the historic superscription connects the psalm with a time when he feigned insanity before Achish (here called Abimelech, likely because that was a title for Philistine kings). That event (1 Sam. 21:10–15) is connected to the psalm in a number of ways, such as the emphasis on fear and the usage of the rare term ta'am ("taste, good sense"), which occurs in both passages (1 Sam. 21:13 // Ps. 34:1, 8).

34:1–10. Declarative Praise. Praise as a continuous and iterative attitude, both on individual and communal levels, dominates vv. 1–3. The motivation for unceasing praise is Yahweh's deliverance, mentioned in the next lines. He delivers from fears (v. 4), hears, and saves (v. 6). The often quoted v. 7 emphasizes the ministry of angels but goes beyond as the "angel of the LORD," or "messenger of the LORD" (mal'ak yahweh) is used as a divine title and has attributes that belong only to God (cf. Gen. 16:7; Josh. 5:14; Judg. 6:11–22; Zech. 3:1–6; see "The Angel of the Lord," p. 395). It points to the presence of Jesus in the OT, the One who as the Son of God and supreme Commander of all angels cares for our well-being. With such protection one can only taste and see that the Lord is good (v. 8). God's goodness is like tasting delicious food and wanting more of it (cf. 1 Pet. 2:3).

34:11–22. Instruction. The "fear of the LORD" is something that can be taught (Ps. 32:8; see Excursus, "Wisdom and the Fear of the Lord," p. 764). The didactic section of the psalm is introduced in v. 11 and continues to the end as the fear of the Lord is being taught. This fear is further explained through five statements: govern both words and deeds (vv. 13–14), live the life of the righteous (vv. 15–16), search God in prayer with a broken heart (vv. 17–18), depend on God's protection in affliction because He delivers (vv. 19–20), and be confident in the judgment because no one who trusts God and takes refuge in Him will be condemned. As we can see, Psalm 34 continues the instructional tone of the previous psalms, providing practical lessons to be memorized for times of distress and connecting them to praise.

35:1–28

The Angel of the Lord

Psalms 34–35 are the only psalms that mention the "angel of the LORD." Psalm 35 does so in more detail by drawing more extensively on the divine Warrior metaphor. While Psalm 34 was more focused on protection, in Psalm 35 the request is for the "angel of the LORD" to stop the enemies who are attacking the psalmist. Three times the psalm goes through lament, plea, and praise for future deliverance, with emphasis on one of them in each of the stanzas (cf. Ps. 31). Davidic authorship is mentioned without any further superscription, but the period of his life when he was persecuted by Saul would fit this prayer well.

35:1–10. Prayer I. The first stanza emphasizes a plea for the destruction of the enemy, who is scheming without reason to take the life of the innocent psalmist (vv. 7–8). The "LORD" (v. 6) is called upon in military terms to put on his armor, to take both his magen ("shield") and his tsinnah ("large shield"; v. 2), and to draw his spear (v. 3), indicating both protection and aggression. When David requests that the Angel of the Lord chase them, the persecutors become the persecuted (vv. 1–6). By asking for the Angel of the Lord to act, David was recognizing that God often carries out these acts through these means. The section ends with a prospect of rejoicing in deliverance (vv. 9–10). The language is reminiscent of the Exodus (cf. Ex. 14–15).

35:11–18. Prayer II. In the second stanza, the focus is on the lament as it describes how the psalmist is suffering unjustly and how his enemies render him evil for good. They are false, malicious witnesses of khamas (“violence”), indicating that they are more interested in bloodshed than reconciliation. The psalmist even recalls that he prayed and fasted for his enemies when they were sick, as a friend or brother would (vv. 13–14). Obviously, there was a good personal relationship between the psalmist and his enemies that was now broken. His incredulity and disappointment at their hostility is summarized with a short plea in a question that echoes through the Psalms (v. 17), “How long?” The section concludes with a brief praise for future deliverance in the great assembly (v. 18).

35:19–28. Prayer III. The final stanza returns mostly to petition, requesting that God not let the enemies rejoice over him (v. 19). It is constructed by a series of calls for a divine intervention to end the slander that is aimed not only at the psalmist but also at those who live quietly in the land (v. 20). David uses legal terminology (cf. 9:4) as he invokes Yahweh to ‘awar and qits (stir and awaken Himself) for his mishpat (“vindication,” “judgment”) and rib (“dispute”) and appeals to God as Judge (vv. 22–26). The final praise concludes the psalm along the same legal lines (vv. 27–28). A psalm bearing a threefold request for the destruction of the wicked, even though they persecute the just, makes some uncomfortable. However, one should not forget that it is a prayer to God (i.e., the appropriate channeling of justified anger against injustice). God prefers to take charge of our vindication instead of us taking charge of it ourselves (Deut. 32:35; Rom. 12:19).

36:1–12

A Stark Contrast

Psalm 36 is built around a stark contrast between human wickedness and divine faithfulness (khesed in vv. 5, 7, 10) which is developed in three movements (vv. 1–4; 5–9; 10–12). The title identifies David as the author and qualifies him as “the servant of the LORD.” The title occurs only here and in 18:1.

36:1–4. Description of the Wicked. The description of the wicked moves from the inward (thoughts) to the outward (words and actions). Verse 1 should be understood as the revelation the psalmist receives from God concerning their wickedness. This is about the motivation of evil that takes place in the heart and then outflows in words and actions. At the bottom of evil motivation lies the denial of God’s authority, because they do not fear Him. The denial of divine authority leads to the elevation of self and the rationalization of sin. Most translations refer to the wicked person “flattering himself” in v. 2. This expression can also be translated, “for he deals smoothly with himself” with regard to his sin. The glossing over of sin produces wicked words (v. 3), the person ceases to act with wisdom and goodness, and evil becomes an all-consuming occupation.

36:5–9. Divine Faithfulness. Without any transition, the poem moves to address Yahweh through a description of His faithful deeds. God’s characteristics of mercy or constant love (khesed), faithfulness (‘emunah), righteousness (tsedaqah), and judgments or justice (mishpat) (vv. 5–6) are mentioned. These characteristics, which are often linked together in covenant language (cf. Gen. 15; Ex. 34; 1 Kin. 3), are lofty, enormous, and deep, providing the safest place for humans to put their trust and take refuge under the shadow of God’s wings (v. 7). This image is connected to the sanctuary and the cherubim above the ark, where all these divine attributes were at work. This is further developed through the provisions of the temple, where people ate from the fullness or abundance (lit. “the fat”) or God’s house and drank from the river of His pleasures, alluding to the rivers of Eden (v. 8; cf. Ps. 23 where eating and drinking is also connected to the temple). In that sense the sanctuary and its services are a reminder of paradise (see “Creation, Sabbath, and the Sanctuary,” p. 231). Ultimately, it is Yahweh who is the fountain of life and He is light (v. 9), divine attributes which are appropriated by Jesus (John 4; 8:12).

36:10–12. Preservation of the Just. The final plea of the psalm returns to the themes of love and righteousness (cf. vv. 5–6) to be bestowed on the upright in heart (v. 10). There is also a request for protection from the wicked (v. 11). The psalmist describes the future downfall of the wicked, while acknowledging that for now they could be a threat to him. For him good and evil coexist often in astonishing proximity, until the day comes when God’s judgment elevates the one and destroys the other (cf. Matt. 13:24–30, 36–40).

37:1–40

The Inheritance of the Land

Psalm 37 is another acrostic psalm creating a didactic poem almost at the end of Book 1 that is modeled along the lines of wisdom literature. A number of thematic parallels can be established with the book of Proverbs (e.g., v. 5 // Prov. 16:3; v. 24 // Prov. 24:16) and also with the beginning of the Psalms (especially the torah instruction of Psalm 1). There is a marked contrast between the way of the righteous and the way of the wicked, likened to the image of a tree (cf. v. 35; in Ps. 1:3 the just person is the tree). This contrast also links it to Psalm 73, which stands at the beginning of Book 3 (cf. also Pss. 91; 119). All these psalms create an ideal paradigm of how things should be, even if the psalms in between show how often things are not as they should be. Theologically, the psalm focuses on the possession of the land (vv. 3, 9, 11, 22, 29, 34), but not on returning to the land after the Exile. We find here both righteous and wicked living alongside each other and the righteous being under attack. This would fit well the historical situation at the beginning of the monarchy, to which the psalm has been connected through its Davidic authorship.

37:1–6. Commitment. The focus of vv. 1–6 is perseverance in faith connected to dwelling in the land. In a way this section outlines the theme of the psalm (vv. 7–40). The exhortation to not fret in v. 1 is paralleled in vv. 7 and 8 at the beginning of the next section. Refraining from anxiety in the face of adversity is possible by trusting that the wicked are like grass that withers and is cut down (v. 2). Furthermore, one should trust in the Lord and find delight in Him, the clear opposite to fretting (vv. 3–4; cf. 1:2). Using the metaphor of righteousness as light, verses 5–6 emphasize the commitment of the faithful one to God and the future promise that is connected with it.

37:7–33. Instruction. This section contains the main didactic instruction of the psalm and is a development of vv. 1–6, as indicated by the repeated exhortation to not fret (vv. 7–8). It is again a call to perseverance, to wait patiently for Him (v. 7), because the wicked will perish but the meek will inherit the earth or land (vv. 9–11). Land possession is a covenant promise and a keyword from Deuteronomy to Judges. Jesus contextualized v. 11 in the Beatitudes, extending the promise beyond Israel (Matt. 5:5). The contrast between the wicked and the just is elaborated in vv. 12–22. These contrasts often demonstrate true biblical wisdom and a worldview that transcends the here and now: the few possessions of the righteous are preferable to the wealth of many wicked people (v. 16). In reaction to the evil plotting and scheming, the Lord laughs at the wicked (v. 13) because they will perish and fade away (v. 20). This worldview also extends to ethical behavior, as the wicked borrow and do not repay but the righteous show mercy and give generously. The section ends with a summative statement that returns, by way of contrast, to the theme of inheritance. Those blessed by the Lord will inherit the land, but those cursed by Him will be karat (“cut off” or “destroyed”).

The psalm shifts now to the blessings of the righteous (vv. 22–26), adding the voice of experience to the instruction: from his youth to his old age, the psalmist has never seen the righteous forsaken or begging for food (v. 25). The comportment of the righteous is linked to generosity, in contrast to the wicked who borrows and does not repay (v. 26; cf. v. 21). Generosity in the OT was an expression of righteousness and lending without interest, an ethical norm (cf. Ex. 22:25; Ps. 15:5). Because of this ethical lifestyle, God preserves the just from judgment and reiterates the refrain-like promise—the righteous shall inherit the land (v. 29). Ethics is described as wisdom and consequently the righteous speak wisely and the law of God is in their hearts (v. 31). This is an internalization of torah that projects itself into the NT (cf. Jer. 31:33; Heb. 8:10).

37:34–40. Future Perspective. Psalm 37 ends with an exhortation for the righteous to qawah (“wait” or “hope for”) the Lord and keep His way, connecting it to previous reflections on “the way” (cf. 25:8–15). A final contrast, now located in the future, is created between the destiny of the wicked (they will have no future; it will be karat, “cut off”; v. 38) and the just (they will have a future). Some translations understand the future of the upright to be one of peace, while others suggest that peace is the characteristic of the upright person who has the future. The guarantor of this future is Yahweh, who will deliver the righteous from the wicked and save them (v. 40). Psalm 37 provides an ideal paradigm for a life based on God’s instruction, a life of wisdom, torah, and eternal peace, based on the conviction that eventually and ultimately there will be peace.

38:1–22

Sin and Suffering

The physical illness described at the outset of this psalm connects it closely not only to Psalm 6 but also to the story of Job and the extended discourses with his friends on sin and suffering. Psalm 38 is also linked to Psalm 37 through a number of literary connections, such as the usage of the unusual teshu'ah ("salvation"; 38:22 // 37:39). It is not an acrostic, but its twenty-two verses connect it further to the preceding alphabetic poem. The psalm is ascribed to David. While physical suffering on the part of David is not recorded specifically in the historical books, the connection between sin and illness is familiar from the Davidic psalms (cf. Pss. 32; 51). The additional superscription, "to bring to remembrance" or "a petition," is also found in Psalm 70 and can be connected to the memorial offering, which acknowledged God's provisions as part of the sacrificial system (Lev. 2:2, 9, 16).

38:1–14. Initial Prayer and Lament. The psalmist begins by asking God not to rebuke and discipline him in His anger. The psalmist accepts divine discipline as a result of personal sin through the usage of yasar ("correct, discipline, chasten"; cf. 94:10), but at the same time he asks for a delimitation of divine displeasure. The first line of the psalm is almost identical to 6:1. The psalmist repeatedly expresses his physical suffering as a result of personal sin in vv. 2–4, and vv. 5–10 provide a detailed description of the sickness: his wounds are festering (v. 5), his kesel (translated variously as "loins," "back," or "insides") is/are burning (lit. "burning with shame"; v. 7), and his strength fails (v. 10). All this recalls the suffering of Job, yet with recognition of culpability. It is conceivable that David modeled his experience on Job as indicated by a number of linguistic and thematic connections between this lament section and the book of Job (see Job 6–7).

The lament now moves from the personal to a social dimension describing how loved ones, friends, and even relatives and neighbors stand afar off, avoiding and ostracizing the sick person—a common human reaction to suffering. The feeling of abandonment by the people closest to him worsens through the triumphant stance of his enemies, who exploit his weakness and speak of destroying him (v. 12). His reaction is a contrastive silence to all the enemies' hurtful words: he is like a mute who does not open his mouth (v. 13).

38:15–20. Faith in God's Salvation. The turning point away from lament to an expression of faith is introduced by the contrastive conjunction (ki), which also begins each of the next three verses. It underlines the appropriateness of the silence with which the lament concluded: he waits for and hopes in the Lord, trusting that He will hear and answer (v. 15). He is silent so that God may answer. The emphatic personal pronoun (lit. "you, you will answer") indicates that he has handed over to God the question of personal vindication. The psalmist himself is not capable of responding because he is close to falling and his pain and sorrow are continuous (v. 17). His emotional condition is beyond the physical dimension of his suffering. Verse 18 is climactic in that it uses the contrastive ki for the last time, introducing the psalmist's public acknowledgment of his sin. This forms the basis for God's vindication.

38:21–22. Final Prayer. The psalm ends with an echo of its beginning, pleading for God to intervene. It concludes by invoking Yahweh as his salvation (v. 22), as Psalm 37 did. Sin and suffering are not necessarily linked to each other, but this penitential psalm expresses the sober reality of sin as the cause of suffering. What is required from all is confession of sin and a request for forgiveness.

39:1–13

Life's Brevity

Psalm 39 continues the theme of prayer for deliverance from sickness and sin found in Psalm 38, but focuses more on the final result of sin, death, and the experience of life's brevity. The two psalms are connected through verbal links such as "mute" or "silent" (vv. 2, 9 // 38:13), "rebuke" (v. 11 // 38:1), "mouth" (vv. 1, 9 // 38:13, 14), "hope" (v. 7 // 38:15). A number of repetitious phrases emphasize the transitoriness of life (e.g., everyone is vapor/breath; vv. 5, 11). The theme recalls the experience of Job (cf. vv. 12–13 // Job 10:20–21) as well as the book of Ecclesiastes (e.g. 1:2; 12:8). "Jeduthun" was a music leader in the temple during the reigns of David and Solomon (cf. 1 Chr. 16:41–42). The verbal connections with 1 Chronicles 29:15 strengthen the Davidic authorship.

39:1–3. Unbearable Silence. At the outset of the poem, the psalmist commits himself to silence (cf. 38:13) so that he will not sin with his words. Verses 8–13 (esp. v. 9) give the motivation for his silence as he wants to refrain from complaining about God's discipline in his life. He does not want to bring reproach upon Yahweh in the eyes of the ungodly. The following statement, that he did not even say anything good (lit. “I showed silence from good”), is difficult to understand. Combined with the following line, it could be interpreted as a comparative construction: “I was silent more than was good for me,” therefore his sorrow increased (v. 2). The inner pressure of unconfessed sin (his heart became “hot”) finally gives way to speech (he spoke with his tongue; v. 3).

39:4–6. Everyone is but Vapor. Before he confesses his sins (vv. 7–13), the psalmist directs his words only to Yahweh in a contemplation of life’s brevity and the certainty of his own mortality. Verse 5 uses hebel (“breath” or “vapor”) for describing the brevity of human life even at its best, and v. 6 repeats twice the adverb of degree, ’ak (“surely”; translated differently or omitted the second time in some translations), followed by further descriptions of the inevitability of death. How much more fragile is life without God?

39:7–13. Hope Through Forgiveness. The turning point in the psalm is introduced by a contrastive conjunction with “now,” transitioning to an expression of faith that acknowledges God’s discipline yet confesses and asks for deliverance (v. 7). The plea for saving deliverance from transgressions (v. 8) refers to the forgiveness of the psalmist’s rebellious acts (pesha), which are the cause of his current misery. David asks God to remove His nega (“plague,” “scourge,” “stroke”; cf. Ex. 11:1) and refers again to the motif of human mortality (v. 11). The psalm ends with a prayer in which David likens himself to a ger (“foreigner,” “stranger”). This terminology is reminiscent of the sojourners of the patriarchic period who had no permanent dwelling place (v. 12; cf. Deut. 10:18–19; 1 Chr. 29:15).

The final petition, for God to turn His gaze away from him (lit. “blind yourself from me”), must be understood as an appeal for God not to look at the psalmist to punish him (cf. Job 7:19; 14:6). He wants to balag (“smile”; some translations follow the LXX and the Greek anaphuxō and thus have “regain strength”) before he departs and is no more. The brevity of life described in this psalm serves as a sober reminder of the emotional and physical pressure that unconfessed sin creates in the life of the believer—it touches the physical, emotional, and spiritual aspects of the person. Only confession and forgiveness deliver us from this pressure, making it possible for us to smile again, even in the face of transient life.

40:1–17

Sacrificial Service

The central theme of Psalm 40 is a dedication to God’s service that flows out of deliverance from a near-death experience. Psalm 39:13 ends with the idea of death and 40:1–2 follows on with a song of praise because God brought the psalmist up from the pit. The psalm moves from praise (vv. 1–12) to plea (vv. 13–17) in similar fashion as Psalm 27. It has been suggested that the two parts of the psalm were originally separate psalms, particularly because the second part is almost identical to Psalm 70. However, there are verbal links between these two parts and praise can naturally precede plea (cf. Pss. 9–10; 27; 89). It is conceivable that Psalm 70 represents a liturgical adaptation of the latter part of Psalm 40. David is mentioned as the author, and through its connection to the previous psalm it continues the theme of deliverance from sin. This psalm also has been seen as having three parts (vv. 1–5; vv. 6–10; and vv. 11–17).

40:1–12. From Deliverance to Service. The psalmist has waited patiently for the Lord, an extended time of extreme suffering that is followed by deliverance out of a horrible pit of destruction (v. 2). This is poetic language often used to describe death and the grave (cf. 28:1; 30:3; see also Jer. 38 for a literal experience). Having returned from a deadly experience, he praises God with a new song and reaffirms his faith in Him as a man who makes the Lord his trust (v. 4). Praise turns to a contemplation of God’s wonderful works (v. 5) and as consequence to a personal dedication to service (vv. 6–8). That service moves beyond empty rituals (v. 6; cf. 1 Sam. 15:22–23) to commitment based on a changed understanding (opening his ears) and a new heart (where the law is).

This is not an undoing of the OT sacrificial service but a shifting of priorities to the correct motivation for service (cf. Jer. 31:33). The psalmist’s dedication to service finds its typological and messianic echo in Hebrews 10:5–7 as it describes Christ’s ultimate dedication to service. Verses 9–10 make personal praise a public witness and vv. 11–12 appeal to God to continue to show His love to the psalmist, as the threat of innumerable difficulties is still very present in his life. This sets the tone for the next section of the psalm.

40:13–17. A Final Plea. The final petition of the psalm begins with an appeal to God to deliver (v. 13). It is followed by a plea for divine vindication against those who seek to kill him (vv. 14–15). Then, as in the first part of the psalm, the psalmist turns from the individual to the community, asking for blessings on those whose lives are at the service of God (v. 16). Verse 17 returns to the needs of the psalmist for divine intervention as he pleads with God to not delay. The messianic dimension heightens the true motivation for service. Our dedication for service (cf. Rom. 12:1) only makes sense in the ultimate sacrificial service of the Son of God on the cross (cf. Heb. 10:5–7).

41:1–13

Healing

The last psalm of Book 1 starts, like Psalm 1, with a beatitude, thus connecting the end to the beginning and reinforcing the idea of torah (“instruction”) once more. The central theme of the psalm is healing (vv. 4–10), which connects it well with Psalms 38–40. While there is no direct record of David being ill, there was certainly occasion in his life for him to have written this poem.

41:1–3. Beatitude. Like Psalm 1:1, Psalm 41 begins with a beatitude for those who consider the poor and needy. The focus is on ethical conduct, connecting it, through the use of the participle maskil (“look at,” “act with insight”), to wisdom literature (cf. Prov. 16:20; 21:12). We find a list of all the fortunes that will come to those who do good to the needy. In v. 3, the blessing of right doing is recovery from sickness.

41:4–10. Healing. The section contains the psalmist’s prayer for recovery. As in Psalm 38, it connects sickness with sin (v. 4; cf. also 51:2). It also includes an extended reference to the enemies who are just waiting for David to die (vv. 5–9). But it is not only his enemies who are exploiting his illness; it is even one of his close, trusted friends. The betrayal is brought to its cruel completion by the friend (some suggest Ahithophel; cf. 2 Sam. 15:31) who turned against him (lit. “lifted up his heel”). The image alludes to Jacob, who became known as the “heel-grabber” or “deceiver” (Gen. 27:36). The passage is appropriated by Jesus with reference to His betrayal by Judas (John 13:18). Yet, even if betrayed by his closest friends, the psalmist finds refuge and healing in Yahweh, who in His mercy will raise him up (v. 10).

41:11–13. Thanksgiving for Deliverance and Doxology. The psalm concludes with a short prayer of thanksgiving relating how God answered and healed him so that his integrity is reestablished and, using sanctuary imagery, he stands in the presence of the Lord once more (v. 12). The final verse (v. 13) is not part of the psalm but serves as a doxology for Book 1 (the doxologies of the other books are in 72:18–20; 89:52; 106:48; 146–150). The twofold “Amen and Amen” affirms the reality that the psalms are as much theology as they are doxology. Declarations about God call for a response in worship.

PSALMS 42—72

BOOK II

Book 2 of the Psalms continues the association with the period of the Davidic monarchy through authorship and historical notes. The book contains most of the psalms from the Korah collection (Pss. 42–49), while the remainder of this collection is in Book 3 (Pss. 84–85; 87–88). Korah and his descendants served as gatekeepers and musicians in the sanctuary from David’s reign onward (cf. 1 Chr. 9:19; 26:19). This explains the thematic focus of the Korahite psalms on the nations and their pilgrimage to the temple. Beyond this group, there are Davidic psalms that end with Psalm 72:20, marking the end of an earlier collection of psalms.

The beginning of Book 2 also marks the beginning of another group of psalms that displays a preference for 'elohim (“God”) instead of yahweh as a designation of God (Pss. 42–83). This has motivated scholars to speak of so-called Elohistic Psalms, even though there are 45 occurrences of yahweh in those psalms. The divine name preference is also indicated by the fact that there are only nineteen occurrences of 'elohim in the rest of the Psalms. However, both names often occur in poetic parallelism (e.g., 46:11), each name indicating a specific aspect of God’s character; yahweh expresses His closeness and immanence, and 'elohim, His distance and transcendence. It is also interesting to note that a single Asaph psalm (Ps. 50) is sandwiched between the Korah psalms (Pss. 42–49) and the Davidic psalms (Pss. 51–72), which make up the sub-collections of Book 2 (see commentary on Ps. 50:1–23).

42:1—43:5

Longing for God’s Presence

A number of literary connections between Psalms 42 and 43 allow a unified reading of the two poems: (1) Psalm 43 is the only psalm in the Korahite collection without a superscription (cf.

Pss. 9–10); (2) there is a recurring refrain that is repeated thrice throughout the two psalms (vv. 42:5, 11; 43:5); (3) some Hebrew manuscripts combine the two psalms; and (4) there is a thematic continuation from lament to plea between the two poems. The superscription maskil (“instruction”; sometimes translated as “contemplation”) occurs with thirteen psalms designated as instructional or didactic psalms (cf. Pss. 32, 42, 44–45, 52–55, 74, 78, 88–89, and 142).

42:1–5. Longing for God. The simile in v. 1 of the deer that pants for water effectively introduces the theme of longing for God. It is applied to the psalmist, whose soul (nepesh, refers to the whole being; v. 2) thirsts for God. More specifically, he wants to appear before God and meet with Him, an expression that is linked to the sanctuary (cf. Deut. 31:11). The deer is a familiar image found on seal impressions from OT times and communicates the intense longing for God’s presence. Verse 2 repeats nepesh, and v. 3 introduces the mocking enemies who repeatedly ask throughout the psalm, “Where is your God?” (cf. v. 10), indicating that the psalmist is far from the temple. He reminisces the time when he had access to the temple, when he joined the thronging multitude and went dadah (“to walk slowly in procession”) with them to the house of God. The section concludes with the first occurrence of the introspective question “Why are you downcast?” It is also an expression used in mourning (cf. Ps. 35:14). The positive answer comes with a resounding encouragement to hope in God (lit. “wait upon God”). Inner dialogues of the faithful often include God and the inner voice speaks to our conscience. Jesus appropriates the words of vv. 5–6 during His experience in Gethsemane (cf. Mark 14:34; John 12:27).

42:6–11. More Longing. After a short glimmer of hope expressed in the first refrain, the psalmist returns to the despair of separation from God’s presence, using the geography of northern Israel to underline his argument. Continuing with the initial image of the deer panting for water, the psalmist now refers to the land of the Jordan, which has its headwaters at the foot of the heights of Hermon, the multi-peaked mountain on the northeastern border of Israel (v. 6). The Hill or Mount Mizar is an unknown locale, but the waterfalls in v. 7 bring to mind the cascading river Jordan at Baniyas. However, thundering nature and water imagery speak of despair and life-threatening experiences as God’s waves and billows sweep over him. There is a ray of hope in the middle of despair—the Lord’s love by day and His song by night (v. 8). This is the only mention of yahweh among the twelve occurrences of ’elohim in Psalms 42–43, expressing God’s closeness in the middle of divine absence and in response to the psalmist’s longing for His presence. The scornful question of the enemies is repeated, “Where is your God?” (v. 10). The refrain of v. 5 is also repeated. Some translations follow the LXX in which vv. 5 and 10 are identical, both affirming the Lord as the psalmist’s personal Savior and God. The Masoretic Hebrew text renders v. 11 with slight modifications from v. 5, making it more affirmative. Whereas deliverance in the first refrain (v. 5) came from God’s presence or countenance, now the God who delivers is his personal God and Savior.

43:1–5. Plea for Vindication. Taking both psalms together, the poem now moves into petition, requesting God in legal language to plead his cause against a faithless nation, placing the prayer in the national arena. Verse 2 connects well with Psalm 42:9, asking the almost identical rhetorical question: Why must he go mourning because of the enemy’s oppression? The appeal for God’s deliverance follows in v. 3 and restoration is connected to the return to God’s holy har (“hill” or “mountain”) and to His mishkan (“dwelling place” or “tabernacle”).

Return to the sanctuary is further developed in v. 4, climatically fulfilling the longing of the psalmist to stand once more in the temple (see 42:2–4). The third repetition of the refrain in v. 5 completes the fulfilled longing, and within the context of the third section it becomes now a shout of joy, sung with rejoicing (v. 4). Longing for God’s presence is often accompanied by a despaired feeling of His absence. However, His perceived absence is not necessarily real absence. Jesus used the words of Psalms 42–43 in the garden of Gethsemane, but His Father and the angelic host were at His side: “God suffered with His Son. Angels beheld the Savior’s agony” (DA, 693).

44:1–26 National Defeat

The psalm is a communal psalm, using mostly “we” instead of the individual “I” that has characterized the Davidic psalms. It connects verbally to Psalms 42–43 in looking for deliverance (v. 4 // 42:5, 11), mentioning oppression (v. 24 // 42:9; 43:2), and noting the fear of being cast off by God (vv. 9, 23 // 43:2). The historical background of the psalm appears to be a national defeat (vv. 9–16), which is difficult to date. The Assyrian invasions recorded in 2 Kings 15 and 18 provide possible occasions for the poem. The superscriptions of Psalms 42:1 and 44:1 are identical (though the order is slightly changed) and unique in the Korahite group in Book 2. It identifies this psalm also as instruction.

44:1–8. Past Glories and God as King. The psalm commences with a recollection of the conquest when God drove out the nations (v. 2) and settled Israel in the promised land. This event is clearly viewed by the psalmist as a historical event, namely, the invasion of the Holy Land under the direction of God. Building on the historicity of the conquest, vv. 4–8 didactically extol Yahweh's kingship, asking Him to once more ordain victories for Jacob (v. 4). Victory, as in days past, was possible only through Him when He saved them from their enemies (vv. 4, 7). A chiasmic structure for vv. 1–8 is perceivable, placing an emphasis on v. 4 as the central declaration of trust in the section.

44:9–16. National Defeat. After the historical praise of vv. 1–8, the psalmist next introduces a major contrast using the disjunctive 'ap ("yet," "even," but"). God's defeating of the other nations for the sake of Israel (v. 2) appears to have ended. He seems to have rejected them, no longer accompanying and helping their armies in battle (v. 9). This results in national defeat and exile (vv. 10–12), making Israel a byword among the nations (v. 14). All this has resulted in dishonor, disgrace, and shame for Israel (v. 15), which ultimately reflects on Yahweh.

44:17–22. Claim of Innocence. The psalmist speaks collectively, affirming faithfulness to God and to His covenant (vv. 17–18). This is not a defeat brought about by the sins of the people but rather the suffering of the innocent, and they are accounted as sheep to be slaughtered (v. 22). Romans 8:36 quotes this passage and applies it to the suffering of Christians for the sake of Christ.

44:23–26. Plea for Deliverance. The psalm concludes with four imperatives directed to God as a plea for deliverance: 'awar ("awake," "raise Yourself"; v. 23), qits ("awaken," "rise up"; v. 23), qum ("awake," "rise up"; v. 26), and padah ("redeem"; v. 26). The final appeal is to Yahweh's khesed ("mercy"). Innocent suffering has been the experience of God's children throughout the ages, but we can appeal to God because faith knows that the moment comes when He arises again to redeem.

45:1–17

A Wedding Song

Somewhat surprising is this shir yedidot among the Korahite psalms. A shir is a song and the term yedidot, which occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible, is closely related to the adjective yadid, "beloved." The phrase has thus been translated as "a love song" or "a wedding song"—the latter primarily because of the content of the Psalm. It seems to be more in tune with the Song of Solomon (cf. Song 3:6–11; 5:10–16). It is conceivable that the psalm was composed for a royal wedding, possibly during the early monarchy. There are seven references to the king and royal regalia (throne, scepter, garments). There is a messianic dimension underlying the psalm, as characteristics which are attributed to the king seem to move beyond the human sphere (especially in v. 6, where the King is referred to as "God"). Thus the psalm has been interpreted as messianic from earliest times (supported by Ellen White, MB 49). The portrayal of military activity fits with the time of David. The poem is set to the tune of "Lilies," which is also referenced in Psalm 60.

45:1–9. Dedication and Groom. The psalmist describes himself as one whose tongue is that of a skillful scribe and who is ready to recite his poetic work for the King while his heart is rakhash ("stirred," "moved," or "overflowing"), a verb used only here in the OT. The psalmist is stirred by his vision as he clads a messianic prophecy within the beautiful garment of love poetry. The description of the groom begins with his outer appearance (v. 2): he is superlatively "handsome"/"fair," a description reminiscent of David's introduction in 1 Samuel 16:12. The comparative expression then moves beyond the human sphere. Beyond the physical, there is also grace that characterizes the words of the royal groom.

The king is described in terms of his military role as commander in chief, mentioning his sword and arrows (vv. 3, 5) and his enduring throne and scepter (v. 6). The expression "Your throne, O God" (v. 6) has been rendered in various versions to make it applicable to an earthly royal wedding (e.g., "Your throne is from God," NJB). However, the original text points beyond the immediate historical context to a prophetic messianic reading of the psalm. The inspired commentary on vv. 6-7, as found in Hebrews 1:8-9, confirms this by identifying Jesus as the Anointed (v. 7), the Messiah. Verses 8-9 switch back to the immediate historical context in describing the clothing of the royal groom. They are scented with myrrh and aloes and cassia (v. 8) as he awaits his queen (v. 9). The Hebrew word used here, shegal ("royal consort"), occurs in its noun form only here and in Nehemiah 2:6.

45:10-16. Bride. The psalm turns now to address the bride using marriage terminology reminiscent of Genesis 2-3. The emphasis is on the physical and emotional relationship between husband and wife. The king is enamored with the queen's beauty, and she is to bow down and honor him because he is her lord. The verb 'awah ("desire, crave") does not always have positive connotations, and the description accurately reflects the marriage relationship after the Fall (Gen. 3:16). As the groom's garments were described at the end of the previous section, now the bride's attire is also described (vv. 13-14) as she is led in procession to the king (v. 15). Her dress identifies her as the queen. The wedding poem concludes with a blessing for procreation, wishing that the sons will succeed the fathers so that the royal line will continue.

45:17. Blessing. Psalm 45 concludes with a blessing for the king that he be remembered throughout all generations. The language moves once more beyond the human sphere when it is said that the people will praise the king forever. Bride/groom is an important metaphor for the relationship between Christ and His church (John 3:29; Eph. 5:25-27; Rev. 19:7-9). While it is important not to overlook the historical aspect of this psalm, the prophetic dimension is clearly indicated in the NT.

46:1-11

A Mighty Fortress

The poem is a declaration of trust in a God who, in the midst of turmoil, provides peace from His city to the whole earth. At the center of this declaration are the references to God as "our refuge," which is found three times in the psalm (vv. 1, 7, 11). The first stanza begins with the refrain, whereas the second and third stanzas are concluded by it. Selah marks the end of each section. The heading identifies the psalm as Korahite. The musical annotation 'alamut occurs here and, in a modified form, 'almut, in Psalm 9:1 (where it means something different. In comparison with 1 Chronicles 15:20, it has been suggested to translate it here as "according to maidens," possibly meaning that the instruments were tuned to a high (soprano) key.

46:1-3. Even Though. Following the programmatic refrain "God is our refuge" at the outset of the psalm, a series of four enormous upheavals in nature creates a striking contrast with the safety that the faithful find in God. Verses 2-3 describe an earthquake accompanied by roaring waters and shaking mountains that fall into the sea. These are the accompanying natural phenomena of theophany (cf. 18:7-15).

46:4-7. Peace in the City of God. From a cataclysmic nature the psalm changes its tone and moves to a peaceful description of the city of God (v. 5) that enjoys divine protection because God is in it, especially in the mishkan ("the holy place" or "tabernacle"; v. 4). Instead of roaring waters, there is a peaceful river whose streams make the city glad (v. 4), an image that is taken from the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2:10-14; Rev. 22:1-2). The remainder of the stanza returns to the upheaval coming from nations instead of nature, again connected to theophanic language (the earth melts at God's voice; v. 6). The refrain is now repeated with two modifications. First, instead of the more abstract makhaseh ("refuge;" v. 1) we find the more concrete misgab ("secure height," "a stronghold," "a retreat"), denoting a physical structure. Second, the phrase "God of Jacob" is added, which recalls the experience of the patriarch under the protection of Yahweh.

46:8-11. Peace on Earth. The final stanza is a surprising one. While the description of God in the previous sections has been dominated by terminology that draws on the Warrior metaphor (e.g., yahweh tseba'ot, "LORD of hosts" or "LORD Almighty"; v. 7), the psalm suddenly creates a striking contrast by stating that God makes wars cease (v. 9) and extends peace from the city to the ends of the earth. He destroys the implements of war (i.e., bow and spear). The destruction of warfare is completed as He burns the chariot (or shields; LXX) in the fire. This irenic departure from the expected Warrior metaphor enlarges our understanding of it and demonstrates that the ultimate objective of divine warfare is peace. The physical connotation of the refuge as a stronghold in Psalm 46 motivated Martin Luther to compose the hymn "A Mighty Fortress is Our God." The hymn recalls not only the towering fortresses of Germany but also how God will finally make all wars cease.

47:1–9*God Reigns

The divine epithet of God as Most High ('elyon') is used in Psalm 47:2 as well as in the previous psalm (46:4) connecting the two psalms to each other. Further connections include the universal perspective of "nations" and "peoples" (vv. 3, 8; 46:10) and the mention of Jacob (v. 4; 46:7, 11). Psalm 46 ended with a universal extension of divine peace to all the earth, and Psalm 47 invites all to acknowledge God's universal kingship as the foundation of peace. Critical scholarship has called this an enthronement psalm, describing Yahweh's coronation ritual, which was supposed to be an annual festival comparable to similar occasions in other ANE cultures. However, a close reading of the psalm reveals that it is an acknowledgment of eternal divine kingship rather than the initiation of God's reign. The psalm belongs to the collection of the sons of Korah.

47:1–5. Yahweh Subdued Nations. The psalm begins with a universal invitation for all people and nations to clap their hands. This is an expression of joy that acknowledges God as the universal and triumphal King. "For" or "because" (ki) provides the first reason for the praise of Yahweh Most High: He is a majestic and sovereign God (cf. Gen. 14:18–22; Ps. 57:2). He has also subdued the peoples. Some translations understand this to occur in the future ("will subdue") while others see it as a current situation ("subdues"). The verbal context of vv. 1–5 and the reference to the past experience of Jacob in v. 4 suggest that the section can also be understood as a reference to the past election of Israel when Yahweh subdued the nations during the Exodus and the conquest of Canaan. This is confirmed by the use of the expression ga'on ("height," "loftiness"; translated variously as "pride," "excellence," or "glory"), which can be a literal reference to the hill country of Israel. As Israel occupied the heights of Canaan, so God ascended with a shout and the sound of a trumpet. These expressions are associated with the conquest (cf. Josh. 6). Theologically, the exaltation of God is the reason for Israel's exaltation.

47:6–9. Yahweh Is King. The correspondence between the two sections of Psalm 47 provides a blueprint for its interpretation. The invitation to praise in v. 1 is repeated four times in v. 6, occurring as a framing device at the beginning and end of the two lines that make up the verse. The motivational clause of v. 7 (introduced by ki) offers God's kingship as the second reason for praise, repeating the invitation once more (lit. "sing a maskil praise"). God's universal sovereignty is stressed again in v. 8, and v. 9 concludes the psalm with another reference to Israel and the nations. The last motivational sentence has a Hebrew reference to the shields of earth belonging to God. This has been translated by some as a possible reference to the kings or rulers (cf. Hos. 4:18). The psalm ends with a final exaltation of God. The universal proclamation of God's kingship in Psalm 47 and the offer of peace to all the earth in Psalm 46 remind us that the healing of the human race is found in humble submission to Him.

48:1–14*The City of God

The focus of Psalm 48 is on Zion as the city of our God, linking it to the two previous psalms. This is done through its reference to the Exodus and conquest, the universal nature of divine deliverance, and other literary connections (e.g., misgab "fortress"; v. 3; 46:7, 11). Both psalms 46 and 48 could have been performed as victory songs, and the superscriptions on both assign them to the sons of Korah.

48:1–3. City of God. The psalm begins with an extended invitation to praise God from Zion as the great King (v. 2) who lives in Zion's citadels or palaces (v. 3). God is recognized as Zion's refuge and as the fortress (cf. 46:7, 11) that provides refuge for the whole earth (v. 2). The mention of the tsapon ("north"; v. 2) stresses the importance of the city, since the "north" is where the abode of God is located (cf. Is. 14:13). It could also be a polemic against Canaanite religion, for which Mt. Zaphon (Heb. tsapon in v. 2 can be translated as either "north" or "Zaphon") was the abode of its main deity, Baal. Thus, Zion is occupying the most important position among all mountains, and Yahweh—not Baal—is the sovereign God above all other gods.

48:4–8. Victory over Foreign Forces. The next section provides the motivation for the statements in the first section. The image is that of an attacking army that melts away in fear as they behold the fortress of Zion. The extent of their terror is likened to birth pains of a woman in labor (v. 6), and the destructive power of the yahweh tseba'ot (“Lord of hosts” or “Lord Almighty”; v. 8) is compared to the east wind that breaks the strongest of all seafaring vessels. The ships of Tarshish refers to ships that were capable of making the long journey to southern Spain on the other side of the known world (cf. 1 Kin. 10:22; 2 Chr. 9:21).

48:9–11. Human Response. Worship is the adequate human response to divine acts of deliverance. The language used draws on the Song of the Sea in Exodus 15 (e.g., God’s right hand, v. 10 // Ex. 15:6, 12). In His temple, people meditate on God’s khesed (“kindness,” “unfailing love,” “faithfulness”) as the driving force that has brought deliverance from Zion. The daughters of Judah most probably designate the cities or towns of Judah (cf. Josh. 15:45).

48:12–14. Victory Procession. There is an invitation to walk throughout Zion and all around her (v. 12). A victory procession circumnavigates the city of God from all angles, marking all its architectural features and defense systems. The purpose is to tell the next generation all about the city and keep alive the memory of God’s deliverance in order to sustain future generations. God has promised to always guide us, even to the end. The peace that the earthly Jerusalem has never been able to experience will be a reality when the New Jerusalem descends from heaven (Rev. 21:2, 10) as the eternal habitation of God’s people.

49:1–20

Trust in Riches

The final Korahite psalm of Book 2 deals with, in the tradition of wisdom literature (cf. Pss. 1; 37), the question of where to put one’s trust in the face of death and its inevitability. In line with the remainder of the collection, it maintains a universal scope by appealing to the peoples of the earth. There is a refrain that concludes both main sections (vv. 12, 20), contemplating the transience of human life apart from an understanding of God—a human being is “like the beasts that perish” (v. 12).

49:1–4. Call to Listen to Wisdom. The introduction to the poem is reminiscent of Proverbs 1–2, emphasizing the need to reflect on wisdom as it applies to everyone—low and high, rich and poor (v. 2). It draws on all sensory faculties (the poet’s mouth provides wisdom, and his heart, understanding).

49:5–12. Futility of Human Wealth. The psalmist now explores the futility of those who trust in their wealth (vv. 5–9). Since death is inevitable, wealth cannot save us or our relatives. Similarly, names, land, and wealth are subject to fading away since human beings do not remain (v. 12). The section ends with the sobering refrain that people are like “the beasts that perish.” The lifestyle of those who trust in richness does not much differentiate humankind from animals.

49:13–20. Futility of Humankind. The psalm moves from the wealthy to those who pursue a beast-like lifestyle. Death is the final destiny for them, in contrast to the upright who will rule over them in the morning (v. 14). This is a reference to the concept of resurrection, which is reinforced by the reference to being redeemed from she’ol (“the grave”; v. 15). The rich person was not able to redeem (padah) him or herself or any relative (v. 7), but God will redeem the whole being (nepesh) of the faithful on resurrection morning. Verses 15–19 once more review the futility of humans who, separated from God, pursue riches; their final destiny is death. The repeated refrain of v. 12 in v. 20 has a variation that underlines the final message of the psalm. While v. 12 emphasizes the finality of death, in v. 20 the emphasis is on discernment. It is of existential importance to understand at some point in our lives that the riches of this world are nothing in the face of death and eternity. Only God can redeem us from the inevitability of the grave, and He has done this through the death of His Son.

50:1–23

Trust in True Sacrifice

Psalm 50 connects to Psalm 49 through numerous verbal links. Twenty-two significant terms appear in both psalms that are otherwise rare in the rest of Book 2 (e.g., ratsah, “to be pleased with,” “to join”; v. 18; 49:13). This psalm provides a counterpoint in focusing on the sacrificial system and its life-giving effects when approached in true worship. Again, the connecting theme is trust in God (Ps. 50), not in riches (Ps. 49). There is a prophetic dimension to the psalm (esp. vv. 1–6), which is in line with its authorial superscription, “of Asaph,” who was a seer and musician in David’s days (1 Chr. 15:17, 19; 2 Chr. 29:30). It will become evident below that the psalm has connections not only with the first collection of the Korah psalms (Pss. 42–49) but also with the second group of Davidic psalms (Pss. 51–72). The Asaph psalm is thus sandwiched between the two groups and serves as a hinge between them. The rest of the Asaph psalms are found in Psalms 73–83 in Book 3.

50:1–6. Covenant Lawsuit. The introduction to this psalm is the proclamation of a covenant lawsuit which has its roots in Genesis 3:8–19 and the legal material of the Pentateuch (cf. Lev. 26; Deut. 27–28), and which is also common in the prophetic literature (cf. Is. 1; Mic. 6:6–8). God calls upon heaven and earth as witnesses (v. 4) as He appears from Zion (v. 2; this establishes a link with Ps. 48). The theophany is accompanied by fire and tempest (cf. 18:7–15) as He gathers together those who made a covenant with Him by sacrifice. The reference to the making of the covenant echoes the ritual of Genesis 15:7–21 but also clarifies that the covenant was ratified by sacrifice (Ex. 24:5–8), pointing typologically to the new covenant in Christ (Heb. 9:18–23).

50:7–15. First Accusation. While the previous section does not identify the parties of the lawsuit, v. 7 indicates that the accused are God's people, and it does so by modeling the charge on the Shema (Deut. 6:4). The Shema is the most explicit monotheistic confession of the covenant in ancient and modern Israel. It begins with the command to shim'ah, imperative of the verb shama' ("to hear" or "to listen"), and ends with the allusive expression "I am God, your God!" The substance of the accusation goes along the lines of 1 Samuel 15:22. While there is an abundance of sacrifices and external ceremonies, there is a lack of personal commitment and true obedience, which contradicts the original covenant conditions. The center of the section clarifies that God is not dependent on our sacrifices: all the animals in the forest and the cattle on a thousand hills belong to Him (v. 10). God rather looks for a heart full of true thanksgiving, true commitment, and a sincere prayer life (v. 15).

50:16–23. Second Accusation. The accusation intensifies against those who speak of God's covenant (i.e., those who claim to be part of the covenant people) and are now identified as being wicked (v. 16). Verses 17–20 list the ethical infractions through which the covenant has been broken (i.e., injustice, deceit, and slander). God patiently kept silent for a time, but now it is time to arraign them, rebuke them, and help them to consider this (lit. "understand"; v. 22) before it is too late, lest God tear them in pieces.

This is the same understanding (Heb. bin) that concluded the previous psalm (49:20), creating a further link between the two poems. The psalm concludes with an invitation to salvation for the person who directs his/her conduct well, namely, the one who responds positively to God's charges, repents, and returns to covenant faithfulness.

51:1–19 Repentance

As a truthful reaction to the indictment of Psalm 50, Psalm 51 is a penitential poem, emphasizing heartfelt repentance as the only way to return to God. Psalms 31, 38, and 51 focus on the confession of sin. Psalm 51 makes an explicit historical connection in its superscription to the life of David when he committed adultery with Bathsheba (cf. 2 Sam. 12). As in the previous psalm, God is looking not for external forms and sacrifices but for a broken and contrite heart (v. 17; 50:9–13). The psalm introduces the second group of Davidic psalms, which continues until the end of Book 2.

51:1–9. Confession of Sin. The psalmist begins with a plea for God's grace, appealing to mercy (khanan, "to have mercy"), faithfulness (khesed), and compassion (rakhamim) as the foundation of divine grace. All three theological terms are an integral part of Yahweh's self-revelation in Exodus 34:6. The psalmist is asking God to deal with him in accordance with His character. The three mercies of God are juxtaposed with the three offences of the psalmist that are the subject of this psalm: transgressions, iniquity, and sin (vv. 1–2). The true character of evil is identified in the acknowledgment that all our sins are committed against God (v. 4). Sin, while tragically and destructively impacting other people, is foremost a rupture of our relationship with God (vv. 3–4). Further, all of humanity is systemically affected by sin from conception. This is not an implicit reference to David's birth but a sobering affirmation of the pervasiveness of sin on this planet; it is about humanity's inherently sinful nature (v. 5). It is exactly in the tukhot ("the inner being") that God wants to effectuate change (v. 6). Verses 7–9 constitute a desperate cry for forgiveness and cleansing from sin. It takes us back to vv. 1–2, thus effectively framing the section.

51:10–15. Personal Restoration. Beyond forgiveness, the psalmist now moves to restoration: he asks God to give him a clean, pure heart and a steadfast spirit (v. 10). The verb bara' is reserved for divine creative power (cf. Gen. 1:1), which is needed to effectuate a change of heart. Such re-creation leads to the restoration of the joy of God's salvation and enables us to witness to others (v. 13). Such persons proclaim praise to God (v. 15).

51:16–19. True Sacrifice. The psalm could have ended with such high note of praise, but it returns once more to the question of true sacrifice: a broken spirit and a broken, contrite heart are just as (if not more) important to God than the sacrificial rituals themselves (vv. 16–17). However, personal transformation has a national impact because through it the walls of Jerusalem are built (i.e., the moral safety of the city depends on the integrity of its citizens). As a result, they shall offer bulls on God's altar that are acceptable to Him (v. 19). The external form of worship will finally coincide with the internal motives of the heart. Interestingly, words for sin predominate (twelve times) in vv. 1–9 and God is mentioned only once, whereas in vv. 10–19 sin (mentioned only twice) is pushed out by God's grace and God is referred to six times.

52:1–9

The Boasting of the Wicked

The psalm picks up on the theme of Psalm 49 in the form of an instructive wisdom poem, annotated in the superscription as a maskil ("instruction"). The idolatrous dependence of the wicked on riches and their accompanying boasting is contrasted with the righteous, who are content to dwell in the presence of God. The historical note connects this psalm with "Doeg the Edomite," who divulged to Saul that David had visited the priest Ahimelech while fleeing from the king. In the ensuing massacre, it was Doeg who killed the priest and his family because none of Saul's servants were willing to be part of the hideous act (cf. 1 Sam. 21–22).

52:1–5. Wicked Arrogance. The central rhetorical question involves the challenge to the mighty warrior, asking why he is trying to boast in evil. Doeg, as a mighty man in Saul's service, creates a credible historical backdrop for the wicked in this psalm. He was someone whose tongue devised and plotted destruction and who loved evil more than good (vv. 2–3). There is a repeated emphasis on the deceitful tongue (v. 4), and its destructive force finally leads God to take action and uproot him from the land of the living (v. 5).

52:6–9. Righteous Perspective. In contrast to the wicked, the righteous person looks at the arrogance of the wicked and, surprisingly, laughs at him. Laughter (sakhag) in the Psalms is often reserved for God when He sees the futility of the wicked (cf. Ps. 37:13). The reason for the laughter of the righteous is that the wicked, instead of depending on God, trusted in wealth. Using the metaphor of vegetation, the righteous (in contrast to being uprooted; v. 5) are like a green olive tree in the house of God (v. 8). They are safely rooted in the presence of God, enjoying longevity and fruitfulness (cf. Jer. 11:16; 17:8; Hos. 14:6), which echoes the first poem of the Psalms (cf. 1:3). The psalm concludes by praising God for His intervention and reiterating His goodness. The destructive boasting of the wicked fades away as a result of his foolish self-sufficiency that leads only to his being uprooted. This is in marked contrast to the permanency of the righteous person, who is deeply rooted in God.

53:1–6

Foolishness—Once More

Psalm 53 is almost identical to Psalm 14. However, this similarity should not obstruct its exposition in this part of the Psalms. It is important to look at the poem in its context; that is, in juxtaposition to the previous psalm, which confronted the wicked and unmasked the senselessness of life without God. Psalm 53 enlarges on the theme of foolishness, which finds its ultimate climax in the denial of God's existence. The superscription adds that the psalm is related to makhalat. This term has been variously defined as being related to sickness/persecution or being a musical term for a tune or an instrument. It is also called a maskil ("a contemplation" or "instruction"), which integrates the psalm well within the current context of instructive poems. Jewish interpretation connects the fool (nabal) of v. 1 with the story of Nabal (1 Sam. 25).

53:1–4. The Fool. As in Psalm 14, in this psalm the fool is a person who has said that there is no God (v. 1). Whereas Psalm 14 uses yahweh and 'elohim interchangeably, Psalm 53 does not use yahweh at all, creating a more universal tone for this wisdom psalm. The rest of this section describes the foolish from God's perspective, reaching the general conclusion that no one does good (v. 1; repeated in v. 3). Those who fashion evil lack knowledge as they ignore God and turn against His people (v. 4).

53:5–6. God’s Reaction. In v. 5, we find the clearest divergence between the two almost identical poems (v. 5; corresponds to 14:5–6). Whereas Psalm 14 placed an emphasis on God’s protection of the righteous using the metaphor of refuge, Psalm 53 concentrates exclusively on the destruction of the wicked in v. 5. It is only in v. 6 that their destruction is contrasted with the salvation of Israel when God returns His people from captivity. Thus, Psalm 53 is less concerned with the fate of the righteous than with the dire destiny of the fool. It is reassuring to know that judgment and salvation come out of Zion, from a righteous God who sees deep into the motivation of the human heart.

54:1–7

The Name that Saves

This psalm is a plea for deliverance connected through its superscription to the historical experience of David when the Ziphites betrayed him to Saul by revealing the fact that he was hiding among them (see 1 Sam. 26; cf. 1 Sam. 23:19). The sequence of Psalms 52–54 aligns with the sequence of events from the life of David (1 Sam. 21–26), illustrating human foolishness and a life without God from different angles (Doeg, Nabal, and the Ziphites).

54:1–3. Calling on Your Name. God’s name serves as a framing device of the psalm. It is mentioned in v. 1 as the means by which David is saved and then praised in v. 6. Interestingly, ’elohim and yahweh, together with ’adonai, are used in this psalm in connection with the theology of God’s name that emphasizes His character and authority. Verse 3 provides the rationale for the plea. The people who are rising up to attack can be connected to the Ziphites who lived in a town southeast of Hebron where David escaped from Saul. They decided to betray David because they disregarded God’s authority like the fool in Psalm 53 who denied His existence. The Ziphites were part of David’s own people, and while they knew God, they did not follow Him.

54:4–5. Vindication. The central message of the psalm is in v. 4, which states that God is David’s help and He supports those who uphold and sustain his life. This is in contrast to those who have sought his life (v. 3). Consequently, God will cut them off or annihilate them (v. 5).

54:6–7. Praising Your Name. Beyond the crisis, the psalmist will express his praise to God in an act of worship and will sacrifice a freewill offering to Him (cf. Ex. 35:29; Lev. 7:16). A final praise for deliverance concludes the psalm and gives the psalmist an opportunity to look down on his enemies (v. 7; cf. Ps. 37:34). In the Bible, calling upon God’s name is a transferral of authority to Him, a willingness to follow His will versus our own.

55:1–23

Betrayed by a Friend

As in the previous psalm, there is a strong plea for deliverance from an enemy or enemies, with a constant shift from the singular to the plural (e.g., vv. 9–10, plural; vv. 12–13, singular; v. 15, plural). There is also a progression in the usage of the divine name from ’elohim (v. 1) to ’adonai (v. 10) and then to yahweh (v. 16). There are two pleas that follow each other (vv. 1–8 and 9–14) with some correspondence between them, and then a statement of hope concludes the psalm. The psalm is a didactic poem or contemplation (maskil) of David, accompanied by “stringed instruments.”

55:1–8. First Plea. The fourfold plea for God to hear underlines the urgency of the psalmist’s need for deliverance from the enemy who is first introduced in v. 3, in both the singular and the plural. The agony of the psalmist in v. 4 is described as his khul (“pain,” “agony”), which is used elsewhere to describe a woman giving birth (e.g., Is. 26:18). He also experiences the terrors of death (v. 4); horror has overwhelmed him (v. 5) like the Flood covered the earth (Gen. 7:19). He longs to escape this situation and wishes for the wings of a dove to fly away and remain in the desert (vv. 6–7). David’s escape into the wilderness may well serve as the historical backdrop for this psalm. Some commentators have identified Ahithophel, David’s counselor who deserted to Absalom, with the betrayer mentioned in the psalm (cf. 2 Sam. 15–17).

55:9–15. Second Plea. Whereas the first plea was for God to listen, the second asks Him to act by confusing their words (lit. “divide their tongues”; v. 9), which echoes the confusion of tongues in Genesis 11. This effectively puts a stop to the plans of the wicked. The motivation for this request is the presence of violence and strife in the city, caused by someone who is not an enemy but his peer, companion, and friend (vv. 12–13). It is a person that belonged to David’s immediate circle, a friend with whom he had had close (Heb. metaq, “sweet”) fellowship and walked to the house of God in procession. The enormity of this personal betrayal leads the psalmist to God for deliverance, requesting that He let death come suddenly upon his enemies (v. 15). Interestingly, the psalm switches here again to the plural, indicating how the person who betrayed him is part of a larger conspiracy. He serves as an agent of a larger evil scheme.

55:16–23. Expression of Trust. A transition is introduced in the psalm (“as for me”) that reveals the psalmist’s reaction to the threat: he will pray, crying out in distress—in the evening, in the morning, and at noon (vv. 16–17; cf. Dan. 6). He also expresses his confidence that God will act on his behalf and by faith states that He will rescue him unharmed from the battle (Heb. “redeem my soul in shalom (“peace,” “soundness,” “completeness”; vv. 16–18). The prophetic perfect in the Hebrew (“He has redeemed”) here indicates that the psalmist considers his redemption as certain as if it had happened already. Accordingly, some translations place the verbs in the present (“He rescues”) or future (“He will redeem”). In vv. 19–21, there is another shift from the plural to the singular, focusing on the faithless friend who betrayed the psalmist using smooth words that contrast with his violent actions (v. 21). But the psalmist reaffirms his trust in God, who will never allow the righteous to be shaken (vv. 22–23). He extends a general invitation to others, encouraging his listeners to cast their burdens and cares on the Lord, for He will sustain them. The noun yehab (“burden”) occurs only here in the OT and is rendered in the LXX as merimna (“anxiety,” “worry,” “care”). Some personal disappointments in life are difficult to bear, but the psalmist extends the invitation across the millennia to throw onto God what life has thrown onto us.

56:1–13

Continued Persecution

Psalms 56–60 are each titled as “A Michtam/miktam of David,” a designation that already occurs in Psalm 16. Psalm 56 connects thematically with the previous two psalms, issuing a plea for deliverance from persecution combined with imprecations against the enemies (56:7; cf. 54:5; 55:9, 15, 23). The psalm also displays close ties with Psalm 57, starting with the identical plea for God to be merciful and describing deliverance from similar situations. The historical note concerning his capture by the Philistines in Gath may allude to one of two experiences of David with the Philistines (1 Sam. 21:10–22:1; 27:1–29:11). The wistful musical note about the silent, distant dove occurs only here and creates a further link to Psalm 55, where the psalmist longs to fly away like a dove. In some ANE cultures, doves were messengers that carried communications to and from the gods.

56:1–4. Complaint and Trust. The request of the psalmist is introduced with a cry for God to be merciful. The verbal form khanan (“to be merciful”) combined with the divine name occurs throughout the Davidic psalms as an appeal to God’s grace for deliverance (cf. 6:2; 31:9; 41:4, 10; 51:1; 56:1; 86:3). The psalmist experiences oppression, and he feels continuously (lit. “all day”) sha’ap by his enemies. This word can mean either to “gasp” or “pant after”; that is, he is pursued by the wicked like dogs chasing a hunted animal (or in some translations, to “trample” or “crush”; i.e., he feels crushed by his enemies). However, the section concludes with an affirmation of trust in God, ending with the rhetorical question “What can human beings do to me?” (v. 4). This puts the threat into perspective, and ultimately the enemy is only basar (“flesh”).

56:5–13. Complaint, Imprecation, and Vow.

The psalm now returns with greater detail to the initial complaint, describing the ongoing (lit. “all day”) attempts of the enemies to look for an opportunity to bring him down (v. 5). The psalmist now turns to God, asking Him to act and throw down the nations (v. 7). This is followed by a request to record his lament permanently, to count his difficult experiences, and to put his tears into God’s bottle (lit. “wineskin”) and on His scroll or book (v. 8). Some translations follow manuscript variants which have text that reads that the psalmist’s tears are on God’s scroll and (with parallelism) in His record and thus omit the reference to the “bottle.” But the basic meaning is the same—he wants the Lord to collect his suffering as one would collect precious liquids and place them in a leather bottle.

The idea of recording David’s sorrows fits well with the idea of the miktam in the superscription as a commemorative inscription. God’s record of human actions and experiences is mentioned throughout Scripture (e.g., Ps. 69:28; Mal. 3:16). “In the book of God’s remembrance...every act of sacrifice, every suffering and sorrow endured for Christ’s sake, is recorded” (GC, 481). The section is completed with a threefold expression of trust in God (vv. 10–11) that echoes v. 4 in a refrain-like manner. The psalm concludes with vows (v. 12) and their legally binding character (cf. Ps. 22:25). The psalmist promises to render praises to God (cf. Gen. 28:20–22) for His deliverance. Human fear can be effectively countered only with a continuous confession of trust in God.

57:1–11

Deliverance from Persecution

Psalms 56 and 57 have been called twin psalms as they coincide with each other in theme and structure and begin with the identical plea for mercy. Psalm 57 moves the emphasis to deliverance and has a more triumphant tone than Psalm 56. There is a twofold refrain (vv. 5, 11) that concludes the two parts of the poem. There are similarities in the superscriptions of the two psalms (except the tune, “the words were set to ‘Do Not Destroy,’” also found in Pss. 58–59, 75; cf. Is. 65:8) and the historical background of both are connected to 1 Samuel 21–22. It is possible that David wrote the poem in the cave of Adullam, which is traditionally located on the eastern side of the Elah Valley.

57:1–5. First Plea and Deliverance. The psalm begins with a plea identical to the previous psalm, followed by the imagery of a hen gathering chicks under her wings and the cherubim throne above the ark of the covenant to express the idea of refuge in the “shadow” of God’s “wings” (cf. 17:8; 36:7; 57:1). The psalmist is totally sure that God will send from heaven and save him (v. 3). David compares the experience he and his companions had as they made their nightly resting place in the wilderness among wild animals to that of a potential prey surrounded by lions. There are threats on every side, particularly that of destructive words used like a sharp sword (v. 4). A refrain concludes the first section, exalting God’s sovereignty above the heavens (v. 5), creating a sharp contrast with the surrounding threats.

57:6–11. Second Plea and Deliverance. The second plea returns to the plotting of the enemies who are hunting the psalmist like a wild beast and have dug a pit for him. But this time the enemies’ purposes are thwarted and consequently they have fallen into their own trap (v. 6). In reaction to this surprising turn of events, the remainder of the psalm breaks out into a sustained song of praise (vv. 7–10), closing with the repetition of the refrain in v. 11. The mention of the dawn in v. 8 brings to mind how David might have arisen after a dark night of impending threat to a new morning of hope. The reference to God’s unlimited khesed (“mercy,” “unfailing love,” “grace”) connects v. 10 to the initial plea of vv. 1 and 3. The historical scenes from David’s life that underlie these psalms illustrate how God can surprisingly turn a dark, life-threatening situation into a bright new hope.

58:1–11

Judgment on Unjust Judges

Psalm 58 is replete with violent imagery that vividly portrays God’s judgment on unjust judges. The unjust judges are asked if they are speaking and acting justly (v. 1). This question is answered in v. 11, affirming that God is the One “who judges the earth.” The psalm follows the same tune of the previous psalm, and David is identified as the author.

58:1–5. Unjust Judges. The psalm opens with an address to the ’elem. This term has been interpreted in various ways: it might be referring to leaders (changing the Heb. text to ’elim, “rams,” “men of power”) or even gods (changing the Heb. text to ’elohim). The parallel expression bene ’adam (“sons of men”) at the end of v. 1, connected with the verb shapat (“to judge”), indicates that the psalm is directed against powerful human judges who, through their corruption, have elevated themselves to the level of gods (cf. 89:6). The violence and lies of the wicked (vv. 2–3) are likened to a deaf cobra that no longer heeds the charmers (vv. 4–5), not even the most skillful.

58:6–11. Plea for Divine Judgment. The request for God to intervene changes the imagery from cobra to lions (v. 6) and connects this psalm to the previous one (57:4). Human violence meets divine judgment and God reduces all evil intentions to nothing. This is communicated through the use of fast-paced images, such as cut arrows, a dried up slug or snail, a stillborn child, or a pot that is blown over by the wind before the food is cooked (vv. 7–9). What remains is the rejoicing of the righteous (v. 10) as they see wickedness being destroyed and the confession of all human beings acknowledging that there surely is a God who judges the earth (vv. 10-11). Corruption abounds and no one is exempt from its damaging impact, not even God's children. But God is the Judge who will eventually and permanently set things right.

59:1-17

Deliverance from Violence

As in Psalm 57 there is a refrain that concludes each of the two sections of this psalm, in which David refers to God as his misgab ("defense," "fortress," "strong tower"; vv. 9-10a, 17). There is another repetitive phrase in each section that provides the background imagery for the psalm: the wicked traitors return at evening, growl like dogs, and go all around the city (vv. 6, 14). The imagery is that of a pack of stray dogs that are viciously dangerous, running their deadly attacks during the night (cf. 1 Kin. 14:11; 21:23; 2 Kin. 9:34-37; Ps. 22:16). Like the preceding two psalms, Psalm 59 follows the tune "Do Not Destroy" and is a miktam of David. The historical note connects this psalm directly with 1 Samuel 19:11 and Saul's intention to kill David in the morning. Instead, he escapes and praises God the next morning (v. 16).

59:1-10a. Attack of the Enemy. The psalm begins with a request for deliverance from the enemies, identified as those who practice evil, are bloodthirsty, and lie in wait like a prowling animal (vv. 2-3). Affirming his innocence, the psalmist now implores God to intervene with a series of imperatives in which he asks God to rise up to help him and rise up to punish the nations (vv. 5-6). He invokes punishment without mercy on all the nations and any wicked people who bagad ("to act treacherously"), thus raising his request to a universal level. Personal deliverance is merged here with national protection (vv. 4-5). The simile of the threatening dogs (v. 6) is followed by a sudden turn of events, as Yahweh will laugh at them (v. 8), showing that under God's protection the deathly threat amounts to nothing. David refers to God as his misgab ("defense," "fortress," "stronghold"). This refers to an elevated place of refuge out of reach from the attack of the enemies (cf. Ps. 46:7, 11; 48:3). God is referred to as being One of khesed ("mercy," "faithful love") in vv. 10 and 17.

59:10b-17. Defeat of the Enemy. The second part of v. 10 moves the focus from the psalmist's deliverance to the enemies' defeat. He asks for God not to kill them but to noa' ("scatter" or "uproot") them and ultimately consume them in wrath (vv. 11-13), leading them to acknowledge Yahweh and know that He rules over Jacob (v. 13). Once more the simile of prowling dogs is repeated, but now they wander around looking for food and are not satisfied (vv. 14-15). This reversal of fates based on the same imagery provides a powerful antecedent to the final praise (vv. 16-17) in which the psalmist once more invokes the refuge metaphor of the misgab ("strong tower"; cf. v. 9) and God's khesed ("mercy" or "faithful love"). It is encouraging to understand that God laughs at what we perceive as snarling dogs and deathly threats to our lives. He laughs because He can reverse threats into blessings.

60:1-12

Military Defeat

This is the last psalm that, like Psalms 56-60, is introduced in the superscription as a miktam, a commemorative inscription. The language of violence that permeated Psalm 59 becomes even more pronounced in this psalm. The background seems to be a military defeat suffered by David against the Edomites (2 Sam. 8; 1 Chr. 18). There are some differences between the superscription of the psalm and the other passages (e.g., the number of Edomites slain and who did the deed), possibly pointing to variant text forms. There is an additional note, "for teaching", which occurs only here in the Psalms and recalls David's instruction to teach his song of lament about Saul's death to the people of Judah (2 Sam. 1:18).

60:1-5. Communal Lament. Verses 1-3 voice Israel's communal lament after they have been defeated by an enemy that is not further identified, unless the question at the end of v. 9 ("Who will lead me to Edom?") is understood as pointing to Edom in accordance with the historical superscription. However, within a Hebrew theocentric worldview, God is viewed as responsible for the hardships of His people. Consequently we find a series of laments directed to God, all beginning with descriptions of His actions, including their negative effects. Verse 4 continues along the same syntax, but this time a positive statement is introduced. There is a banner raised by God as a final stand against the advancing enemy and around which those who fear Him rally (cf. Is. 5:26; 11:12). It is a banner mippene qoshet. This has been translated as either "against/from the bow" or "because of the truth." Mippene can mean "in front of" or "because of." Qoshet can mean either "bow" or “truth,” and it occurs in only one other place in the Hebrew Bible (Prov. 22:21), where it seems to mean “certainty.” Here the translation “bow” would fit the military context, but it is most probably referring to the valuing of the truth by those who fear Yahweh. Whichever the case, the banner is displayed in order that God’s beloved people may be delivered (vv. 4–5). In the narrative in Exodus, it is God Himself who is this banner (cf. Ex. 17:15), and here the psalm invokes the Exodus imagery through usage of nes (“banner, standard”). The section ends with a request for God to save.

60:6–8. God Responds. The following lines contain God’s direct response to the allegations and appeals of the previous section. As the experience in Exodus was invoked, the psalmist now calls on the experience of the conquest of Canaan and the division of the land among the twelve tribes, covering the geographic areas east (e.g., Gilead) and west (e.g., Judah) of the Jordan River. But the conquest moves beyond the initial conquest under Joshua and includes more recent victories over Moab, Edom, and Philistia that are associated with David’s conquests and battles. As much as the defeat of the nations has been God’s responsibility, so is the victory that has made the nations God’s washbowl.

60:9–12. Lead Me On. The question is now directed to God and the focus returns to Edom as the current enemy: “Who will bring me to the strong, fortified city? Who will lead me to Edom?” (v. 9). This is a reference to the rock fortress of Sela, the capital of Edom. In v. 10 God is asked whether it was not He who did not go out with the armies. In response, vv. 11–12 conclude the psalm with a request for God to lead on once more, to give them help against the trouble caused by their enemies and to trample them down. Overall, one can perceive an intensification of threats in this group of miktam psalms of David (Pss. 56–60). This has led some commentators to call this group of psalms the “passion of David,” likening it to Christ’s passion, as they describe moments of persecution, betrayal, and apparent defeat, which are reversed into divine victories.

61:1–8

The King’s Prayer

The psalm has been associated with the time that David was exiled from Jerusalem while fleeing from his son Absalom (cf. 2 Sam. 16–19). It is a royal prayer expressing his desire to return to the sanctuary. It is mostly in first-person speech (vv. 1–5, 8) but that changes to third person in vv. 6–7. The prayer for the king is framed in vv. 5 and 8 by the expression “my vows,” which may indicate that vv. 6–7 are a wish echoing the king’s vows, possibly pronounced by a court official. The psalm is to be performed on a stringed instrument and is ascribed to David.

61:1–5. Plea and Vows. The prayer is introduced by a petition (v. 1) that echoes Psalm 17:1; both verses emphasize the psalmist’s request to be heard by repetition with intensification. Verse 2 expresses the circumstances under which David lifts up his petition as he cries to God “from the end(s) of the earth,” which hyperbolically describes his distance from Jerusalem and his emotional exhaustion from running away from Absalom. A series of three familiar refuge metaphors follow (rock, refuge/shelter, and tower), which alludes to elevated places that could be associated with Mahanaim, the fortified city along the Jabbok River to which David fled and where he regrouped before attacking the pursuing Absalom (vv. 2–3; cf. 2 Sam. 17). Verse 4 expresses the psalmist’s desire to be in God’s tabernacle/tent under the protection of the shelter of His wings (i.e., under the cherubim that stand above the ark of the covenant). The section concludes with an affirmation of vows that David has made toward God during his exile.

61:6–7. May the King Live Forever. The shift to a third person speech in vv. 6–7 makes it possible to understand this section as a responsive prayer on behalf of the king by one of his officials. Based on the royal vows, he reaffirms the king and prays for his longevity.

61:8. Final Vow. The final lines of the psalm return to the first-person speech and reconnect to v. 5 by mentioning “my vows” once more, indicating that it is David who now speaks. It is a final praise and a desire to shalam (“fulfill,” “complete,” “repay”) these vows. This was accomplished at a special dedicatory offering publicly performed in the sanctuary (cf. Num. 6:13–21). David’s prayer from exile and his longing for the sanctuary can cause us only to renew our longing to be with the Lord in the house of the Father (John 14:1–3) and pray for the end of our exile.

Trust in God

Psalm 62 continues the refuge imagery of the previous poems by referring to God as “Rock” (vv. 2, 6–7 // 61:2) and misgab (“Defense” or “Fortress”; vv. 2, 6 // 59:9, 16–17). The context of the psalm is a threatening military conflict, possibly an attack on the rock fortress of Mahanaim, which created the historical backdrop for the previous psalm. This creates a sustained affirmation of trust in God, although it is only in the last line that the psalmist addresses God directly. In the Hebrew text, there is a sixfold repetition of the adverb ’ak at the beginning of vv. 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, and 9. This term can have either an emphatic (“surely,” “truly”) or a restrictive sense (“only”). In the former case, it would serve to increase the certainty of God’s protection (or, in v. 4, the certainty of his enemies’ plots) and set this psalm apart from the previous ones (cf. 39:5–6, where ’ak occurs in three consecutive lines). If the word is taken as restrictive (“only”), it would serve to emphasize the uniqueness of God’s capacity to save; in v. 5, it would indicate the singularity of the enemies’ intentions, despite their false posture of friendliness.

In v. 9, the Hebrew word hebel (“breath” or “vapor”) is used. The word ak could refer to either the certainty of the vapor/breath-like state of human beings or to the idea that they are “only” breath/vapor. There is a refrain-like repetition which frames the first section of the psalm (vv. 1–2, 5–7). The association in the superscription with “Jeduthun,” one of David’s music leaders in the temple, possibly points to one of his musical arrangements (cf. 39:1; 77:1).

62:1–7. Trust and Plea. The affirmation that introduces the psalm in the indicative (“my soul” or “I”) damam (“wait” or “find rest”) for/ in God is repeated as a self-directed imperative desire in v. 5, “my soul, wait/find rest.” Verse 2 expresses trust in God’s protection, drawing on the imagery of refuge used in previous psalms. At the center of the plea, the attitude of the attackers is described. They bless with their mouths but curse in their hearts and plot to topple him from his high position. This is possibly referring to David when he found refuge in the rock fortress of Mahanaim. Verses 5–7 expand on vv. 1–2 with repetitions and additions clarifying that God is the Refuge.

62:8–12. Trust and Advice. The second section of the psalm takes on a more universal and didactic tone in addressing the people encouraging them to trust in Him at all times and reaffirming that God is a Refuge. The psalm then turns to wisdom literature and draws heavily on Proverbs and Lamentations (vv. 9–11). The likening of humans, both low and high, to hebel (“vapor” or “breath”) approximates the poem to Psalm 39:5–6, but it also creates a strong link with Ecclesiastes, in which this same term (“breath,” “nothingness”) is a central motif. The numerical saying in v. 11 is comparable with Proverbs 6:16–19 and others. The message here is clear: trust not in riches, violence, oppression, or robbery but only in God. Appropriately, the final line addresses God directly and ascribes both khesed (“mercy,” “unfailing love”) and justice to Him in His dealings with humanity. It is difficult to remain silent and wait on God in the midst of oppression, but Psalm 62 encourages us to do just that and to trust God in the midst of the storms of life.

63:1–11

Longing for God

In contrast to the previous poem, Psalm 63 continuously addresses God in a personal way. The last line shifts from the first-person viewpoint to the third. The psalm is annotated as written by David from the wilderness of Judah and consequently expresses a deep longing for closeness to God and His sanctuary.

63:1–2. Longing. The psalmist’s longing for God is expressed by the vivid metaphor of someone anxious for water in a dry, parched, and weary land, a description very much in tune with the conditions of the Judean desert. In his search, he has seen God in the sanctuary, a place from which the psalmist is physically separated. The verb “to look/see” (khazah) could also refer to a prophetic vision. The visionary character is furthermore underlined by his desire to see God’s glory (kabod), which is associated with God’s presence in the Most Holy Place (cf. 2 Chr. 7:1–3).

63:3–8. Joy in Communion. In response to David’s vision of God’s glory, the psalm breaks into an extended praise, emphasizing the satisfaction the psalmist receives from communing with God. In this experience, the psalmist is satisfied as with kheleb (“fat”) and deshen (“fatness”); the imagery is of rich foods in abundance within the context of an ANE banquet scene (cf. 23:5–6). In v. 6, reference is made to the spiritual experience introduced in v. 2 by clarifying how the king contemplates God's glory during the night. He meditates on Him in the night watches and finds refuge, protection, and joy in the shadow of God's wings. This is possibly another reference to the sanctuary (i.e., the cherubim above the ark; see commentary on 36:5–9; 57:1–5). He is determined to totally rely on God and encourages others to do the same (v. 8).

63:9–11. Long Live the King. David has turned his thoughts to God during a sleepless night in the wilderness of Judah. Away from the immediate threats of his pursuers, his mind now returns to his enemies and concludes that since he is under God's protective wings, those who are trying to kill him will go down into the depths of the earth. The psalm closes by contrasting the fate of the wicked with that of the king. While the wicked will be destroyed, the king will rejoice in God and together with his people will glory in Him (cf. 61:6–7). Longing for God and meditating on His goodness will strengthen the soul. Turning our thoughts to Him when the night hours are dark and long nurtures hope.

64:1–10

Deliverance from Evil Tongues

Psalm 64 concludes a group of Davidic psalms (Pss. 52–64) that addresses war and persecution combined with prayers for deliverance from violence and scheming enemies. This psalm focuses on the last motif, that of the attackers, followed by a statement of trust in God's deliverance from them. All this is done using military language in which the destructive power of the tongue is compared to swords or razors (cf. 52:2, 4; 55:9; 57:4; 64:3, 8). The superscription of the psalm points to David but lacks any further historical annotations.

64:1–6. Evil Plotting. After the initial plea for God to hear him, the psalmist describes the verbal attacks of the wicked (v. 2). They move from conspiratorial plots to open attack as they sharpen their tongues like swords and shoot cruel and bitter words like arrows. Military attacks were often accompanied by verbal assaults, as in the case of David's conflict with Absalom. It started with the young prince's sharpened words spoken at the city gate that turned away the hearts of the people from his father, the king (2 Sam. 15:1–6). This led to the open rebellion and civil war portrayed throughout this group of psalms. The section concludes with a comment about the deep corruption of the inner being of rebellious humanity.

64:7–10. Deliverance. Deliverance begins with an ironic reversal of action. As the enemies shot their verbal arrows at the psalmist, God will now shoot an arrow at them. In this section, God's deliverance is described as something that has already taken place. David has seen how God made his enemies fall, turning their own words against them (vv. 7–8), which constitutes another ironic reversal (vv. 1–6). Verses 9–10 anticipate the time when all people will acknowledge God's work as they consider what He has done. At the end of the previous psalm the king rejoiced, and now the righteous will rejoice in the Lord. In both psalms they are said to "glory" in the Lord (cf. 63:11). The psalm affirms a biblical truth related to the cosmic conflict, namely, that the attacks of the enemy will finally come to an end through divine intervention.

65:1–13

God Waters the Earth

This Davidic thanksgiving hymn sets a different tone from the preceding psalms, although it shares some of the universal perspectives that have characterized previous psalms. It also introduces a series of four "songs" (Pss. 65–68) that provides an interlude of praises in the laments that surround the group. The psalm is characterized by praises to God for all His provisions in nature. It starts by depicting a scene of praises in the sanctuary, then moves into all of creation, concluding with a picture of God as the One who fertilizes the land. All three sections use 'elohim ("God") only in their opening lines, and each section closes with a description of the effects of God's provision for the congregation (v. 4), for creation as a whole (v. 8), and for the land in particular (v. 13).

65:1–4. God in the Sanctuary. The congregation gathers in Zion to praise God in His sanctuary, a place where vows will be kept (v. 1; cf. 61:8), where all people (lit. "all flesh") will come, and where God will forgive their transgressions by providing atonement for them Himself (vv. 2–3). A beatitude concludes this section, describing the blessing of the atonement God provides for His congregation from His holy temple (v. 4). The hekal ("temple") most probably refers to the tabernacle that David erected in Jerusalem to house the ark of the covenant (cf. 2 Sam. 6:17). The same term was also used to describe the tabernacle at Shiloh during the time of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:9).

65:5–8. God in Creation. This section recalls the awesome deeds of God in Creation when He formed and established the mountains by His power and might (vv. 5–6). But it also affirms that He is able to still the noise of the roaring seas, keeping the forces of nature as well as the people who dwell throughout the earth (vv. 7–8) under control. The usage of le'om (“people,” “ethnic group”) is a more inclusive term than the usual goyim (“peoples,” “nations”) that one would expect here. It points to the universal manifestation of the power of God.

65:9–13. God’s Provisions for the Land. There is a third shift in the poem with the coming of God to paqad (“visit” or “care for”) the earth. The term ’erets (“earth”) could also be translated “land,” as indicated by the reference to local geographic features, specifically the semi-desert grasslands and pastures of the wilderness (v. 12). The central hills and valleys (vv. 12–13) of the Shephelah are covered (lit. “clothed”) with flocks and wrapped (’atap) in grain. It is God who waters the earth through the river of God (lit. the “canal of God”; v. 9), saturating its furrows with water and creating abundance (v. 10). This image of agricultural richness leads to a shout for joy (v. 13) that echoes through the valleys. The song of praise which goes out from Zion to creation in general, and to the land in particular, reflects the joyful reality that the blessings of God are dependent on His work of atonement on behalf of repentant sinners.

66:1–20

Communal and Individual Praise

This “song” divides into two parts, a communal hymn praising God for His “awesome” deeds in the past history of Israel (cf. 65:5) and an individual thanksgiving for deliverance. The latter could have been antiphonally presented at the sanctuary by the king in response to the first part of the psalm. The psalm is not explicitly associated with David in its superscription.

66:1–12. Deliverance during Israel’s History. The psalm begins with a summons to shout joyfully to God and praise Him for His awesome acts (vv. 1–4), thus creating a universal perspective. This is followed by another invitation (vv. 5–7) to come and see the works of God (v. 5), namely, His acts of salvation when He turned the sea into dry land and His people went through the nahar (“river,” “water”) on foot. There are verbal links that connect this psalm to the Song of the Sea in Exodus 15 (e.g., the reference to God ruling forever by His power clearly echoes Ex. 15:18). A final summons (vv. 8–12) invites the peoples to praise God for constantly preserving them from death. He is specifically thanked for bringing them to rewayah (“overflow,” “superabundance”) after going through fire and water (v. 12).

66:13–20. Deliverance Now. There is a change from “we” to “I” that introduces the individual thanksgiving in the second part of the psalm. The one speaking is most probably the king as representative of the people before God in the sanctuary. He sacrifices burnt offerings and fulfills his vows made when he was in trouble, thus creating a strong verbal link with the preceding psalm (cf. 65:1). The sacrificial ritual is concluded in v. 15, listing an extensive offering of rams, bulls, and goats (similar to Solomon’s sacrifices at the inauguration of the temple, 1 Kin. 8:62–64). It is an offering fit for a king, which suggests that the individual in the psalm could be David. Verses 16–20 are a final invitation to all who fear God to listen to the testimony of the king that God has answered his prayer and did not turn away His khesed (“mercy,” “steadfast love,” “kindness”). The awesome deeds of God on behalf of Israel still echo through the millennia, assuring God’s children today of salvation and deliverance.

67:1–7

From Israel to the Nations

It is impossible to overlook the similarity between v. 1 and the Aaronic blessing in Numbers 6:24–26. It has been suggested that this hymn was sung as a congregational response to the reading of the Aaronic blessing in the sanctuary. The Ketef Himnon silver scrolls, found in a burial cave near Jerusalem and dating to the late seventh century B.C., attest to the popularity of the blessing during OT times. The superscription of the psalm does not connect it to David, but there is nothing that disqualifies him from being its author. Both Psalms 66 and 67 could have been moved to this place in the Psalms in order to complement David’s hymns (Pss. 65 and 68) that surround them on each side. There are two refrains repeated in vv. 3 and 5 that divide the psalm into three sections.

67:1–2. Blessings for the World. The previous psalm ended with barak (“praise” or “blessing”) expressed toward God and continued in v. 1 as an invocation for God to bless (barak). The psalm also ends on the same note—God’s blessing—making the concept of blessings the main theme of the poem. The psalm moves immediately from “us” to “all nations,” who are to acknowledge God’s blessings on Israel and His salvation beyond their borders throughout the world (v. 2).

67:3–5. God is Just. The outer frame of blessing is followed by an inner frame of praise as vv. 3 and 5 repeat the refrain inviting all people to praise God. This creates a concentric emphasis on v. 4, which describes God as the One who will justly rule and lead the nations. He has become the universal King.

67:6–7. Blessings for the Land. As in Psalm 65, the result of God’s blessings is seen in nature as the earth yields its harvest (v. 6). The psalm concludes with a return to the initial invocation of God’s blessing, which again leads to the recognition by all the ends of the earth that God is the One who blesses all. The psalm has given to the Aaronic blessing a universal theological content by connecting it to the promise given to Abraham that through him all the nations of the earth will be blessed (Gen. 12:3; 18:18; 22:18).

68:1–35

God in History

As the last of the four songs (Pss. 65–68), Psalm 68 provides a grand finale that expands on themes found in the other three hymns and includes a procession of Israelite tribes to the temple, accompanied by other nations to testify about Yahweh’s power from a universal perspective. Commentators have noticed a certain disjointedness in the poem, but a thematic unity runs throughout it. The psalm could be divided into three major sections. David is once again associated with the composition of this “song.”

68:1–10. Exodus and Conquest. The first lines (vv. 1–4) portray Yahweh in terms of a Warrior and invite people to extol Him. God is referred to here as “YAH,” often rendered as “LORD.” This shortened form of Yahweh appears from here onwards more frequently in the Psalms (e.g., v. 18; 89:8; 115:18; 118:19), and it was also used in the Song of the Sea (Ex. 15:2). The image of the divine Cloud Rider is reminiscent of Psalm 18:7–15, which indicates that it is an ancient poetic expression connected to the Exodus experience. The geographic terms “wilderness” and “Sinai” (vv. 7–10) recall the days of the desert wanderings, while “inheritance” connects to the time of the conquest.

68:11–23. From Sinai to Zion. This section begins with a victory song (vv. 11–13) celebrating the conquest and occupation of the land as the kings of armies flee (some translations imply that their armies flee with them; v. 12). The mention of the dove’s wings plated with silver refers to the ancient custom of decorating the wings of doves after a victory and letting them fly as messengers of good news. The Transjordan geography of Zalmon (v. 14) and the mountain of Bashan (vv. 14–16) describes the battles east of the River Jordan during the Conquest. The mountains, as the abodes of the gods, are polemically set in contrast to God’s mountain. These other mountains look with envy as God proceeds toward the sanctuary. His return to Jerusalem was like that of a king returning victoriously from war with captives and tributes. He “led captivity captive” (according to some translations) or “took many captives” (according to others; v. 18), and He provides escapes from death (v. 20). Paul applies this passage to the ascension of Christ and His ultimate victory over death (Eph. 4:8). The final lines of the section (vv. 21–23) return to the Warrior imagery to speak about the destruction of enemies who are unable to hide from the Lord, for He will bring them back even from the depths of the sea (v. 22; cf. Rev. 20:13).

68:24–35. Procession to the Temple. The third section of the poem begins with a detailed description of a procession as God moves into the sanctuary (v. 24). There are singers and musicians (v. 25) and the leaders of the tribes of Israel, limiting the list to Benjamin (the tribe of Israel’s first king), Judah (the tribe of David), as well as Zebulun and Naphtali, representing the tribes furthest to the north of Israel (vv. 24–27). Verses 28–31 highlight God’s localized presence at the temple in Jerusalem (v. 29), and God is implored to rebuke Egypt (the beast in the reeds; v. 30). Then Egyptian ambassadors would come, and Ethiopia (or Cush) would stretch out her hands in submission to God. The image of God as a heavenly Warrior who rides on the clouds is invoked in vv. 33–34, and the psalm concludes with a resounding praise of God that is universally sung by the kingdoms of the earth. God always deserves our praises for His marvelous acts of salvation on our behalf. This makes the cross of Jesus the supreme reason to praise and serve Him.

69:1–36

Zeal for God's House

Following the glorious hymns of the previous psalms, this poem returns to familiar laments and introduces the last group of Davidic psalms (Pss. 69–72) in Book 2. The complexity of its imagery has motivated commentators to suggest that the psalm was composed using two originally different psalms. However, the sequence from lament (vv. 1–12) to plea (vv. 13–28) and finally to praise (vv. 29–36) is a familiar one (cf. Ps. 28). This is evidence for the unity of the psalm, something which is also underlined by a contrastive wa'ani (“but I” or “but as for me”; vv. 13, 29) used to introduce the second and third sections. Thematically, the poem is a lament and prayer of an individual who is suffering under the persecution of those who hate him for no reason (v. 4). The poem is associated with David, whose authorship is confirmed by Paul (cf. Rom. 11:9). Its tune is set to the tune of “Lilies” (cf. Ps. 45).

69:1–12. Lament. After the psalmist's initial plea for God to save him, the first lines of the poem (vv. 1–3) introduce the lament describing the situation of the psalmist using the imagery of water. The threat of the enemy is like shibbolet (“a flowing stream” or “flood”) that overwhelms the psalmist and takes him into deep mire (v. 2). From there he cries to God for deliverance as his strength fails (v. 3). Affirming his innocence, David identifies his enemies as many (more than the hairs on his head), and they hate him without cause (v. 4; cf. John 15:25 for a messianic application). Verses 5–12 describe the reason for the adversity the psalmist is experiencing and centers on his zeal for God's house (v. 9). David's intense zeal for the sanctuary has made him a reproach and alienated him from his family (v. 8). The misinterpretation of his pious actions reminds us of the moment when David was transferring the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem and Michal's reaction to his rejoicing (2 Sam. 6:16–23). When Jesus cleansed the temple, His disciples applied this psalm to Him (John 2:17).

69:13–28. Plea. The plea is introduced by a contrastive wa'ani (“but I” or “but as for me”) and returns to the initial water imagery, asking

God to deliver him out of the mire and from the deep waters (v. 14). What began as a lament now becomes a prayer for deliverance, using the identical expressions as in vv. 1–12.

The messianic dimension becomes more pronounced in vv. 20–21 as the psalmist looks for someone to show sympathy, but there was none. This situation foreshadowed the Savior's loneliness in the Garden of Gethsemane (cf. Matt. 26:56; 27:34, 48; Mark 14:50; John 15:25), as well as the gall and vinegar (v. 21) that was offered to Jesus on the cross (John 19:28–29). The remainder of the section (vv. 22–28) is a prayer for vindication that climaxes in a final request for the eternal punishment of the wicked—for them to be blotted out of the Book of Life. Within the messianic context of the psalm the request is especially meaningful as it outlines the final destiny of those who opposed the Messiah (cf. Dan. 12:2; Rev. 1:7).

69:29–36. Praise. The final wa'ani (“but I” or “but as for me”; v. 13) accomplishes a further change in tone from request to praise, similar to the change in another messianic poem (Ps. 22:22–31). This is a response to God's acts of deliverance, which involves all of creation (v. 34). God's saving acts extend from Zion to the cities of Judah and to all descendants of His servants who will dwell in it forever. David's personal experience, which underlies this psalm, prophetically foreshadowed the suffering of the Messiah, His loneliness, and His physical pain on the cross. The agony of the Messiah assures us of the end of all pain and suffering.

70:1–5

A Temple Plea

One of the longest psalms in Books 1 and 2 is followed by one of the shortest in the Psalms, reproducing the final plea of Psalm 40:13–17 almost verbatim. It is an adaptation of the passage for use during the memorial offering alluded to in its superscription: “to bring to remembrance” or “a petition” (cf. Ps. 38:1). Many ancient manuscripts combine Psalms 70 with 71, pointing to the possibility that the two once were a single composition. This seems to be supported by the fact that Psalm 71 does not have a separate heading and by a number of verbal and thematic links between the two poems (e.g., the unusual khushah, “hasten,” which serves as an inclusio in vv. 1 and 5, appears twice in 71:12 at an important place but rarely throughout the rest of the Psalms).

Furthermore, the temple plea of Psalm 70 is answered in the concluding statements of Psalm 71. Thus, Psalm 70 becomes the invocation for the overall composition of both psalms.

70:1–5. Invocation. The combined poem of Psalms 70–71 begins with an invocation from the psalmist that serves as a plea for deliverance from those who are seeking to kill him. Verses 1 and 5 stress the theme of deliverance by using the term khushah (“hasten”). There is an urgent request to punish the attacker, asking repeatedly for them to be ashamed and turned back. This is contrasted with the experience of those who seek the Lord, rejoice, and are glad in Him. While the wicked say he’akh (“aha!”) as a public expression of contempt and derision (v. 3), the righteous magnify the greatness of God.

71:1–24

Old Age

Psalm 71 directly continues with the plea that was introduced in Psalm 70. However, there is an additional concern over the difficulties that come with old age (vv. 9, 18) accompanied by a statement affirming the psalmist’s trust in the Lord from his youth (vv. 5, 17). The three sections (vv. 1–8, 9–16, 17–24) are each concluded with a verbal praise. “David was deeply moved; he was distressed as he looked forward to the time when he should be aged...David felt the necessity of guarding against the evils which attend old age” (1T 423).

71:1–8. Looking Back. An initial plea asks for God’s deliverance from being put to shame. The idea of being shamed serves as a connection to the previous psalm (cf. 70:2) and is a key one in the current poem (cf. vv. 13, 24). At the center of this section is a reflection on how God has led the psalmist in the past, moving backward from youth (v. 5) to birth (v. 6) and finally to his mother’s womb (vv. 5–6). This leads to a verbal expression of trust and hope in the Lord.

71:9–16. Old Age. After the psalmist reviews how God has led him in the past, his thoughts turn to the impending difficulties of old age when strength fails (v. 9). The waning power of the monarch is accompanied by the increased pursuit of his adversaries who want to capture him so that no one can deliver him (vv. 10–11). With an accumulation of volitional forms, David pleads for God’s protection and is ready to testify about God’s righteousness.

71:17–24. Youth and Old Age. The final section of the psalm combines the two previous themes to reaffirm once more that God has taught the psalmist from his youth. Now he asks for God’s continuous guidance when he is old and gray (v. 18). This suggests that David composed the psalm in his old age. The section moves between praises for the past and prayers for the present and future, concluding with praise accompanied by musical instruments (v. 22). God’s deliverance is described as an already accomplished fact. God never abandons us, particularly during the time when we are perhaps more fragile. He is always trustworthy.

72:1–20

A Prayer for My Son

The final psalm of Book 2 represents David’s prayer for Solomon, either as remembered and recorded by Solomon when he ascended to the throne or written by David himself. This is not clear because of the tension between the superscription referring to Solomon (cf. Ps. 127:1) and the subscript referring to the completion of the prayers of David at the end of the psalm, which closes book 2. However, if one reads the heading in the light of the ending, then lishlomoh could also be translated “for Solomon,” identifying it as a poem written by David in old age for his son (cf. Ps. 71). It is also recognized to be a messianic psalm.

72:1–7. A Prayer for Justice. The psalm opens with a request for the new king to judge God’s people with righteousness. It is a prayer for the king to exercise his authority in accordance with God’s will, which anticipates Solomon’s prayer in 1 Kings 3. The mountains and hills represent the geography of Israel and the blessings that come as a result of a righteous king, which are likened to showers that water the earth, an image of fruitful abundance in the land.

72:8–14. A Prayer for Dominion. The prayer continues, asking for dominion also from sea to sea. The geography could refer to the Red Sea and the Mediterranean in a north-south direction and east-west from the Euphrates River to the Aegean islands and as far as Spain. While some of the geographic dimensions reflect the extent of Solomon’s reign and his international recognition, there is an element of hyperbole in his idealized prayer at the beginning of his government. More importantly, the rationale for dominion is grounded in ethical concerns (vv. 12–14). Whereas righteousness was the keyword for the first section, now it is the needy, poor, and afflicted.

72:15–17. A Prayer for Longevity. Recognition from foreign rulers and fruitful abundance of the land will characterize Solomon's reign and his name will endure forever as he is blessed and others are blessed in him (v. 17). A prayer for longevity of his reign and a final blessing concludes the psalm and at the same time creates the transition to the doxology.

72:18–20. Doxology for Book 2 and Subscript. The doxology largely corresponds to the one at the end of Book 1, except that it expands it in mentioning the splendorous things God is doing by filling the earth with His glory. The subscript ends Book 2 as well as the first two Davidic psalms, concluding with a hopeful description of not only Solomon's future kingdom but also an ideal kingdom that finds its realization only in the kingdom of the Messiah.

PSALMS 73—89

BOOK III

Book 3 begins with a group of Asaph psalms (Pss. 73–83), which is the largest collection in this part of the Psalms. Thematically they concentrate on the question "God, where are you?" which is introduced in Psalm 73. This collection also includes the second and last group of Korahite psalms (Pss. 84–85; 87–88), which largely deal with Zion theology (cf. Pss. 42–49). It is interrupted and followed by two psalms of David (Pss. 86 and 89) that were not included in the main collection of the Davidic psalms.

73:1–28

The Prosperity of the Wicked

Psalm 73 provides an answer to the question of theodicy, more specifically, why the righteous suffer and the wicked prosper. It is a didactic poem in the tradition of Psalms 1 and 2 and is framed by vv. 1 and 28 with the repetition of tob ("good"), emphasizing God's goodness. In this way the question of theodicy is answered right from the beginning: God is good! There is also a reversal of fates where the psalmist finds himself on slippery ground (vv. 1–3) and the wicked are secure (vv. 4–12). Then it is the wicked who are slipping (vv. 18–20) and the psalmist is on firm ground in God's presence (vv. 21–28). This first Asaph psalm in the present collection introduces the question of God's absence and presence that will characterize the remainder of this group.

73:1–12. The Wicked Prosper. Following the preemptive declaration of God's goodness, the psalmist recalls how the question of the wicked person's prosperity (v. 3) vexed him to the point that he nearly slipped and stumbled (vv. 1–3). The psalmist is confused by the observation that everything seems to go well for the wicked while practicing their wickedness. They speak arrogantly about heaven and earth (vv. 8–9), and there is an increase in their accumulated wealth (vv. 4–12). How could this be?

73:13–16. Why Should I Remain Pure? This is the crucial but ill-directed question by the psalmist, who has kept his heart pure seemingly in vain (v. 13) and is trying to live a life of integrity in the face of adversity and successful adversaries. This question continues to haunt us even today.

73:17–20. Understanding from the Sanctuary.

The turning point of the psalm is reached when the psalmist goes into the sanctuary of God. He recognizes that human reasoning by itself lacks understanding (v. 16), but that understanding comes only from the sanctuary. Like Elijah (1 Kin. 19:14), he turns to the only source of true knowledge, and there in the sanctuary he suddenly discerns the end of that generation (i.e., their ultimate destiny; v. 17). He then realizes that it is the wicked, not the righteous, who are set in slippery places and facing eternal judgment (vv. 18–20).

73:21–28. I was Wrong. As a result of his new insight, the psalmist realizes that his previous reasoning was ba'ar ("brutish" or "foolish") and ignorant. His foolishness is contrasted with God's faithfulness (v. 23) and guidance that accompanies him from here into eternity (v. 24). The psalm ends with a recognition that all the things that happen to us in this life can draw us closer to God, and He is the One we should desire most of all (v. 25). Thus, it is good to be near to God (v. 28; cf. v. 1). God's goodness is reiterated as the ultimate answer to the question posed in the psalm.

74:1–23

The Sanctuary in Ruins

As in the previous psalm, the sanctuary lies at the center of the psalmist's maskil ("instruction" or "contemplation"). The two poems are connected by verbal links—the only two occurrences of mashu'ah (“destruction,” “desolation,” “ruins”) in the Hebrew Bible (Pss. 73:18; 74:3). But whereas Psalm 73 provided spiritual insight through the perspective of the sanctuary, Psalm 74 laments the desolation of the sanctuary. This is probably connected to the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C. With this historical background, the superscription “of Asaph” can be understood not as designating an individual but as a reference to a category of temple singers, as was the case after the Exile (cf. Neh. 11:22).

74:1-8. Destruction of the Sanctuary. The psalm begins abruptly with the question of why God has abandoned Israel forever. The question refers to God’s apparent rejection of Israel that resulted in the destruction of the temple. The Lord is invited to lift His steps toward the perpetual ruins; that is, to direct His attention to the temple and to see what is happening to Mount Zion, where He had dwelt (vv. 2-3) and which is now desolated. Verses 4-9 describe the destruction in detail as the Babylonians set up their military standards or banners (’ot), which usually bore the sacrilegious symbols of foreign gods. This is set in striking contrast to the Judeans who do not see signs (’ot) anymore, for there are no more prophets (v. 9). Not only has God abandoned His people, He is not sending them prophetic messages. The Babylonians break, smash, and burn God’s sanctuary, destroying all the places of worship (lit. “appointed places of God”). This indicates that other places of congregational gatherings (Heb. mo’ed, “meeting-place”), existed in Judah at this time.

74:9-17. How Long? The second section of the psalm is also introduced by a series of questions. Since there is not a prophet to answer the question of how long the situation will continue (v. 9), the questions are directed to God (v. 10). They are not only a request for God to look at the destruction but also a call for Him to act and destroy the enemy (v. 11) as He had done in the past. References are made to the experience of the Exodus, the crossing of the Red Sea, and Leviathan, which is an allusion to the power of Egypt (cf. Is. 30:7 which uses another name for the sea monster, “Rahab,” and connects it to Egypt; see “Behemoth,” p. 652, and “Leviathan,” p. 654). The psalmist goes as far back as Creation to underline God’s power (vv. 16-17).

74:18-23. Final Plea. The psalm concludes with an urgent plea for Yahweh to act, suggesting that those who destroyed the sanctuary have ultimately reviled and blasphemed His name. The image of God’s people is that of a helpless dove that is about to be devoured by wild beasts. Most English translations follow the LXX theriois (“wild beasts”) here as a clarification of the Hebrew MT, which has khayyat (“living thing,” “companies,” or “animals,” but not necessarily “wild”). This image is used to depict their frailty and their need for divine action (v. 19). There will be moments in history when the forces of evil seem to be triumphant and we experience God’s silence, but the message remains clear: God’s justice will prevail.

75:1-10 Deliverance

The “proper time” (mo’ed, “appointed time” or “meeting place”) serves to answer the questions of “how long” and “why” in the previous two psalms where the word was used to describe the meeting places destroyed by the attackers (cf. 74:4, 8). The psalm praises God for His deliverance through judgments that come at the appropriate time. While it is possible to connect the impending destruction of Babylon at the end of the Exile with the writing of the psalm, especially based on its connections to the book of Jeremiah (cf. Jer. 25:15-29; 48:25-26), there are other occasions in the history of Israel (e.g., the deliverance from the Assyrians in 701 or 689/8 B.C.) that would fit the tone of the poem. The tune “Do Not Destroy” has also been used for Psalms 57-59.

75:1-6. Doxology and Judgment. A congregational praise at the beginning of the poem expresses thanks to God for His wonderful works and the nearness of His Name. This declaration contrasts with the emphasis of the preceding psalm on the question of God’s absence. The change to first-person speech affirms that God’s judgment comes at His appointed proper time (v. 2), which does not always coincide with human expectations (cf. Hab. 2:3). The effects of Yahweh’s judgment are felt by the earth and its people (v. 3). Twice the arrogant and wicked people are warned to not lift up their horns (vv. 4-5). The horn is here a symbol of human strength (cf. Ps. 18:2) accompanied by arrogant defiance (lit. an “arrogant” or “stiff” neck). This self-exaltation lacks a real foundation (v. 6) and was the cause for the fall of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 4).

75:7–10. God is Judge. This is a didactic reflection about God as Judge (v. 7) written in the third person. God's wrath is represented by the image of a cup (cf. Ps. 60:3; Is. 51:17, 22) that is poured out on all the wicked of the earth (vv. 7–8; see "The Wrath of God," p. 918). This leads to praises expressed in the first person (v. 9), followed by another first person statement, this time by God, that picks up the symbol of the horn (v. 10). The constant change of perspectives may point to the liturgical usage of this psalm. God's timetable is always perfect, and what may appear to be delayed judgments are opportunities for grace.

76:1–12

Zion Saved

Psalm 76 has been associated with the deliverance of Jerusalem during the Assyrian attack under Sennacherib in 701 B.C. (or on his second campaign to Judah in 689/8 B.C., as some scholars have suggested; cf. 2 Kin. 19; Is. 36–39). The LXX makes that explicit by adding "to the Assyrians" in the superscription of the poem. It is a victory song for Zion that echoes Psalms 46–48 and describes God in His dwelling place in Zion, which is the focus of the Asaph psalms.

76:1–3. God in Zion. The usage of "Salem" (v. 2) as the ancient name for Jerusalem (cf. Gen. 14:18) before its conquest by David recalls the past saving acts of God that made Judah, Israel, His tabernacle/tent in Jerusalem into a place where He could be known (v. 1). It is the place where Yahweh as a Warrior broke arrows, shields, and swords (v. 3). This thought provides a smooth transition to the next section.

76:4–9. Deliverance. Yahweh's sovereignty and majesty are described in this section by recounting His deliverance from valiant, mighty warriors. Verse 4 mentions mountains filled with game or prey. The reference is to the result of the victory that precedes this verse and that left the hills around Jerusalem replenished with spoils of war that were ready to be plundered (v. 5). In line with the historical occasion, v. 6 portrays how the Assyrian army, with their chariots and horses, were caused to lie still as though sleeping. (The terminology and mention of Jacob echo the deliverance from Egypt; cf. Ex. 15). God rendered judgment from heaven (v. 8), delivering not only Jerusalem but all the 'anaw (poor, "afflicted," "humble," "meek"; vv. 8–9).

76:10–12. Praise. Victory leads to praises to the point that God's wrath directed against human rage and rebellion results in His praise—even Assyria needs to recognize that God is awesome and to be feared (vv. 11–12). At the ultimate manifestation of God on the arena of human history the superpowers of this world will indeed melt away.

77:1–20

God of Ages Past

In similar fashion to Psalm 73, the problem the psalmist is experiencing is resolved once he acquires a divine perspective from the sanctuary (v. 13). This takes place when he looks back at the wondrous deeds of God when He led His people out of Egypt. In looking back, the distress that the poet is experiencing is put into proper perspective and he can once more believe in God's guidance for his life. Psalms 77–80 recall God's historical deeds on behalf of Israel.

77:1–9. Lament and Questions. The psalmist finds himself in deep sorrow. He cries to God qoli. Some translations have rendered this as "[with] my voice" and some as "aloud," while others leave the word untranslated, as it might seem to create a redundancy. What else would one cry out with? This poetic idiom is clearly an audible expression of distress. The reference to "voice" or "sound" is also mentioned in v. 18, thus forming an inclusio. Verses 2–6 describe the trouble the psalmist is experiencing. It is an existential trouble so intense that his spirit became weak and overwhelmed (v. 3). He does not find sleep during the night (v. 4), and he meditates, earnestly trying to understand (v. 6). In his distress he raises six questions to God (vv. 7–9), climaxing in a question concerning whether God has shut out His khesed ("mercy," "faithful love," "compassion"; v. 10).

77:10–12. Reflections. These questions are interrupted by a contrastive section, which introduces some reflections that are centered on the root zakar ("to remember"), used twice in v. 11. By remembering Yahweh's wondrous actions, displayed from ancient times, the psalmist tries to find answers to his anguished questions.

77:13–20. God's Way. Understanding God's way begins in His sanctuary (cf. Ps. 73:17). Verse 13 says that God's way is baqqodesh. This has been translated as "holy" (i.e., God's way is "holy"; lit. "in holiness") but can also be translated as conveying the idea that God's way is

“in the sanctuary” (qodesh can mean “holiness” or “sanctuary”). The psalm has now turned to a second-person speech, addressing God directly and recounting His deliverance of Israel (v. 15) from Egypt. The language and imagery strongly resemble that of the Song of the Sea (Ex. 15). After the description of Yahweh’s theophany, the psalm abruptly moves to an image of the divine Shepherd leading His people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron (v. 20). God in this psalm is One who listens to our most desperate cries screamed out in anguish during the long hours of a sleepless and threatening night, and He is able to lead us on through the darkness as He has powerfully done in the past.

78:1–72

God in History

This epic psalm is the second largest poem in the Psalms after Psalm 119. As its predecessor, it records God’s miraculous interventions in the history of Israel, covering in more detail the period from the Exodus to the time of David. There are verbal and thematic links between Psalm 77 and 78 (e.g., “Most High”; vv. 17, 35, 56 // 77:10; as well as the Exodus motif). It is a historical psalm that reviews the history of Israel to provide a rationale for the current situation of the people (cf. Pss. 105–106; 135–136 for other historical psalms). The failure of Ephraim (vv. 9–11) at the outset of the poem (following the introduction in vv. 1–8), his rejection, and the election of Judah and David at the conclusion of the psalm (vv. 65–72) indicate how the psalm is legitimizing the Davidic monarchy. The maskil (“contemplation” or “instruction”) in the title underlines the didactic nature of the psalm.

78:1–8. Wisdom Introduction. The psalmist invites the people to listen to his torah (“law” or “instruction”). Verses 2–7 go back to Deuteronomy 6:7: God gave the torah to Israel and commanded the ancestors to teach their children (v. 5). The instruction has multiple purposes—that the children would remember God’s works, keep His commands, and not be stubborn and rebellious like their ancestors (vv. 7–8). The motif of rebellion follows throughout the whole psalm, contrasting God’s wondrous deeds with Israel’s repeated rebellion.

78:9–11. Ephraim’s Failure. Ephraim’s unwillingness to participate in a military battle (cf. Judg. 1; 12:2; 1 Chr. 7:20–24) might provide the background to this section. It is also possible that the “day of battle” (v. 9) refers to the Assyrian conquest of northern Israel (Ephraim; see Hos. 10:11–14). Whatever the occasion it might have been, Ephraim’s failure is connected to his rejection and the election of Judah (vv. 65–72). The central part of the psalm (vv. 12–64) moves back and forth between God’s deeds and Israel’s rebellion.

78:12–32. Exodus and Rebellion in the Wilderness. This section begins with the wonders God accomplished during the Exodus as He divided the sea and led them with the cloud (vv. 12–14). However, they continued to sin and rebel against the Most High in the wilderness (v. 17) in spite of all the provisions God gave them: water (v. 20), “manna” (v. 24), and meat (v. 27).

78:33–43. God’s Grace. At the center of the psalm, the psalmist recalls how God disciplined Israel until they finally sought and diligently returned to Him. The section goes back and forth between a halfhearted return and rebellion, underlining the fact that God repeatedly turned His anger away because He was merciful and compassionate and He forgave their iniquities (v. 38). As in the previous psalm (77:11), the verb zakar (“remember”) plays an important role in this section, occurring three times. First, they remembered that God was their Rock (v. 35), then God remembered that they were but flesh (v. 39), and finally they forgot His power (v. 42) and returned to their own ways.

78:44–64. Ten Plagues and Rebellion in the Promised Land. In order to counteract the lack of memory on Israel’s part, the psalmist returns once more to the time of the Exodus, listing the plagues that preceded it. The list is neither complete (plagues 3, 6, and 9 are missing) nor in sequence (plague 5 [livestock in v. 48] follows plague 8 [hail in v. 47]). The point here is neither chronology nor completeness but bringing back to memory the wondrous acts of Yahweh as He guided them in the wilderness like a flock of sheep (v. 52; cf. 77:20). The remainder of the section (vv. 54–64) returns again to the topic of rebellion, condensing Israel’s history from the conquest of the promised land to Shiloh (v. 60), where the sanctuary was located for about 300 years during the time of the Judges (cf. Josh. 18:10; Judg. 18:31; 1 Sam. 4:3). In reaction to Israel’s renewed rebellion (vv. 56–58), God abandoned the sanctuary of Shiloh and handed

His glory into the hands of the enemy—a reference to the capture of the ark of the covenant by the Philistines (1 Sam. 4; see “Shiloh,” p. 920).

78:65–72. David’s Election. As the psalm ends with the continuous rebellion of Israel, God begins to react like a man awaking from sleep (v. 65). He rejects the tribe of Ephraim (v. 67), but chooses the tribe of Judah, Mount Zion (v. 68), and David, His servant (v. 70), to shepherd His people (v. 71). The previous psalm concluded with the peaceful image of Moses and Aaron shepherding Israel, while this one closes with David shepherding God’s people. After centuries of turmoil and rebellion, there is peace once more through the shepherd-king. There is spiritual safety in remembering how God has led His people in the past.

79:1–13

The Temple in Ruins

The content of this Asaph psalm aligns itself with Psalm 74 by referring to the destruction of the temple during the Babylonian attack under Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C. It also connects with Psalm 78 in that the previous psalm ends with the election of David and Jerusalem, whereas Psalm 79 begins with the destruction of the city. All three psalms are linked by the otherwise infrequently used nakhalah (“inheritance”; 74:2; 78:55, 62, 71; 79:1).

79:1–9. Destruction and Confession of Sin.

Jerusalem and the holy temple have been destroyed by the nations (goyim; v. 1). The reference to the heaps of ruins in Jerusalem echoes Jeremiah’s description of its capture (Jer. 26:18; Mic. 3:12). A triple question concerning the extent of God’s punishment (v. 5; cf. 89:46) introduces a section that climaxes in a petition for atonement for sins (v. 9). The verb kipper, as the technical term for expiation in the OT, has also been at the center of the previous psalm (78:38; cf. 49:7; 65:3; see Leviticus: Introduction).

79:10–13. Vengeance on the Oppressor. The psalmist asks for a sevenfold return of calamity on the aggressors (v. 12); and as in the two previous psalms, he uses the peaceful imagery of the shepherd in an expression of praises (v. 13). While Psalm 78 dealt with the divine rejection of leaders from the northern tribes, Psalm 79 deals with God’s punishment of Judah that ended the Davidic dynasty elected by God. Divine election does not preclude the possibility of rebellion or rejection.

80:1–19

A Prayer for Ephraim

The divine rejection of Ephraim in Psalm 78 still echoes through the reading of this psalm, which connects through the use of terminology similar to the previous psalm. The “Shepherd of Israel” is requested to once more lead his flock, identified as Joseph, Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh (vv. 1–2). After the rejection of Israel (Ps. 78) and the destruction of Judah (Ps. 79), this prayer asks for restoration as expressed in three refrains that irregularly intersect the poem (vv. 3, 7, 19). The expression referring to God’s shining face is reminiscent of the Aaronic Benediction (Num. 6:24–26) and expresses the need for God’s blessings. This psalm “of Asaph” is set to the tune of “The Lilies of the Covenant.”

80:1–7. Shepherd: How Long? The initial section of this psalm describes God as the divine Shepherd who is requested to restore His people, in this case the northern tribes. The reference to God’s residing between the cherubim (v. 1) is in line with the theological focus of the Asaph psalms on the sanctuary as God’s dwelling place. The section concludes with the refrain asking God to restore Israel, make His face shine on them, and save them (v. 3). The invocation is followed by the same question—regarding how long God’s anger will last—that marked the confessional section of the previous psalm (cf. Ps. 79:5). Israel has become a source of derision for their neighbors; contention with them leads to ridicule (v. 6). The second refrain is slightly longer than the first one, adding another divine appellation: ’elohim tseba’ot (“God Almighty” or “God of hosts/armies”), which alludes to the image of Yahweh as a Warrior.

80:8–19. Israel as Vineyard. The familiar image of Israel as a vineyard (cf. Is. 5:1–7; Hos. 10:1) serves as the theme for the final section of the psalm. God brought a vine out of Egypt (v. 8). This alludes (as in Psalm 78) to the experience of the Exodus, and He caused it to take deep root in the land during the conquest (v. 9). As in the Song of the Vineyard (Is. 5), its hedges are broken down (v. 12) and damaged by wild animals, so the vine is burned and cut down (v. 16)—all imagery which reflects the devastating situation of the nation. The psalm concludes with an appeal for restoration and the promise of future faithfulness, followed by the third refrain adding to the divine name (v. 19).

The irregular stanzas of the poem grow longer as the increasingly longer refrain reflects the growing intensity of the anguish and prayer for restoration. It is good to read Psalms 78 and 80 together and to understand that God's rejection at one point does not prevent the possibility of future restoration. Hope is always present with the God of hope (cf. Rom. 15:13; cf. Jer. 29:11).

81:1–16

Listen!

As in the previous psalm, Joseph's experience in Egypt is singled out in this festival hymn, still recited today during the Jewish New Year's festival. Repeatedly the poem urges the people to "listen" (shama'; vv. 5, 8[2x], 11, 13) to what God has to say. This is a psalm of Asaph (see commentary on 50:1–23).

81:1–5. Festive Summons. The psalm begins with an invitation to worship accompanied by timbrel, harp, and trumpet (vv. 2–3). The specific time for worship is connected to the New Moon, perhaps the reference is to the Festival of Trumpets that introduced the ten-day period of repentance up to Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. The reason for celebrating this festival goes back to the time of Joseph (v. 5), when God went against the land of Egypt.

81:6–16. God Speaks. The change in person at the end of the v. 5 indicates that this line should be read as part of the next section, in which God speaks (lit. "I heard lips I did not know"). The statement refers to God listening to a cry for deliverance from a people (Israel) who did not have a relationship with Him. Verses 6–10 describe how God delivered Israel from the burden of slavery and the testing experience at the waters of Meribah (v. 7; cf. Ex. 17:1–7; Num. 20:13; Ps. 78:20). The giving of the law at Sinai with thunder (v. 7) is mentioned and followed by an allusion to the shema' ("hear") from Deuteronomy 6:4. The first two commandments of the Decalogue are also mentioned (vv. 8–10). The historical reality is that Israel did not listen, and now the Lord expresses His own pain (vv. 13–14). If Israel had listened, they would have had victory and well-being (vv. 14–16). The Lord would have provided for them, not just water from the rock, as in Meribah, but the best and purest food that can be imagined. God's yearning desire for His people to listen and walk in His ways continues to ring through the ages down to His children at the time of the end. It reminds us that listening to Him is also serving Him.

82:1–8

Judging the Judges

This Asaph psalm turns the focus from a nation that does not listen to its leaders and judges who rule unjustly. Crucial for understanding the psalm is the usage of 'elohim ("gods") at the end of v. 1, which can designate human "judges" holding positions of divinely ordained authority among the people of Israel (Ex. 21:6; 22:8–9; cf. 7:1). Verses 1 and 8 serve as an inclusio for the poem, describing God as the supreme Judge over the earth.

82:1. God Judging the Judges. The psalm begins with a description of God standing in the ba'adat 'el. This term can be understood as God's divine council or alternatively as a superlative expression ("the highest assembly"); see 36:6. In either case, the phrase would refer to the highest council where God presides as the divine Judge.

82:2–7. Unjust Judges. Following this ideal perspective, an appeal is made to those who judge unjustly (v. 2). This is explained in terms of defending the poor and fatherless as well as the disadvantaged (vv. 3–4), whose rights have been violated by corrupt judgments (cf. Lev. 19:15; Deut. 24:17). As a result of the unjust legal decisions the foundations of the earth are tottering (v. 5). The expression "you are gods" (v. 6) should be interpreted in terms of v. 1 as referring to human judges who will eventually fall from their supreme height when God judges them. Jesus supported this understanding of the phrase (John 10:34–36).

82:8. God Judging the Earth. The final line of the poem connects to its beginning by asking God to judge the earth in the absence of just earthly judges (v. 8). It is most unfortunate that those appointed by God to care for the needy in the political and religious arena have often used their positions to abuse and exploit them. The world would be a better place if we cared for each other as God cares for all.

83:1–18

The Conspiracy of Nations

A unique conspiracy of ten surrounding nations against Israel (vv. 6–8) is at the center of this last

Asaph psalm. The number represents not necessarily a specific historical alliance but the totality of the threat under which God's people lived for most of the OT period. The mention of Assyria, which concludes the list, could point to the volatile events of the late eighth century B.C., resulting in the deportation and end of the northern tribes.

83:1–8. The Crisis. Following a plea for God to not keep silent any longer (v. 1), His silence is contrasted with the noise of Israel's enemies (v. 2) who formed a shrewd confederacy of conspiracy (vv. 2–5). The list in vv. 6–8 consists mainly of relatives. Ammon, Moab, Edom, the Ishmaelites, the Hagrites, Gebal (Byblos or a mountainous territory in Edom), the Amalekites, and Israel's immediate neighbors (Philistia and Tyre) were all aggressors at different stages in history (though never all at the same time). The superpower of Assyria completes the list and serves as a climax of the anti-Israelite coalition. The closer hostile relatives, the descendants of Lot, were actually strengthened by this archenemy.

83:9–12. God's Interventions in the Past. The psalmist now mentions famous events from the history of Israel, mainly from the time of the Judges (Judg. 4–5; 7:25; 8:5–21), to describe how God acted in the past in comparable situations. Interestingly, the seven names that are mentioned in connection with God's past victories (Midian, Sisera, Jabin, Oreb, Zeeb, Zebah, Zalmunna; vv. 9–11) anticipate the failure of the ten nation coalition.

83:13–18. God, Please Do It Again! Based on these victorious experiences, the psalm now moves to a plea. Using metaphors from nature (vv. 13–15), God is asked to punish the enemies so that they will be disgraced and terrified forever and will finally acknowledge the supremacy of God as “the Most High over all the earth” (v. 18). This divine epithet has been an important part of the vocabulary of the Asaph psalms (cf. Pss. 73:11; 77:11; 78:17, 35, 56; 82:6; 83:18) and answers the theological question found throughout them concerning the location of God in the tumult of history: He is still the Most High over all the earth.

84:1–12

Just to Be in Your House!

This is the first poem of the four Korah psalms in Book 3. In terms of content it is close to Psalms 42–43, also Korahite, expressing an existential longing for the tabernacle and its altars. We also read about pilgrimage, as in the pilgrim psalms (Pss. 120–134), and a longing for the temple, suggesting that the author was temporarily removed from access to the temple, as was the case during David's exile from Jerusalem. On the superscription gittit, or “instrument of Gath,” see Psalm 8:1.

84:1–7. Longing for the Temple. The psalm opens with an existential longing for the temple as the psalmist faints for the courts of the Lord (v. 2). The image of the sparrow that has found a home in the temple precincts (v. 3) is most likely a metaphor for the psalmist that likens him to a defenseless bird that is hunted as prey and longs for a safe haven (cf. Ps. 11). In like manner, the altars mentioned represent a safe haven (vv. 3–4). The psalm moves to the image of a person in whose heart are the pilgrim highways to Zion (v. 5) approaching the temple through the valley of baka', a place otherwise unknown in the OT. Some versions translate it as “valley of balsam” because baka' is used as a plural noun for what are variously referred to in translation as “balsam,” “poplar,” or “mulberry trees” (cf. 2 Sam. 5:23–24; 1 Chr. 14:15–16). It could also be understood as a verbal form, the “valley of weeping,” since the term is related to the verb for “weeping.” This would coincide with the experience of David making his way back to Jerusalem and the temple with tears but trusting in the promise that each one will appear before God in Zion (vv. 5–7).

84:8–12. Prayer. The poem turns into a prayer asking God to look upon the face of His anointed (i.e., look upon the king with favor; v. 9). The desire to be in the temple is expressed through two striking comparisons: a day in God's courts is better than a thousand anywhere else. It is also better for the king to be a doorkeeper in the house of God than to live in the tents of the wicked (v. 10). The final metaphor of God as a sun and shield (v. 11) is evocative of God's life-sustaining and protective characteristics and does not necessarily connect with ANE worship of sun-deities (e.g., the Assyrian sun-god Shamash). The Messiah is called the Sun of Righteousness in Malachi 4:2. The sevenfold mention of both divine names, 'elohim and yahweh, in this short psalm demonstrates the deep longing of the psalmist to be in the presence of God.

85:1–13*Shalom

A common theme running through this Korah psalm is expressed through five occurrences of the verbal root shub (“return,” “repent,” “bring back”; vv. 1, 3, 4, 6, and 8). The psalm moves from thanksgiving (vv. 1–3) to plea (vv. 4–7) and finally to a prophetic vision of restoration. The restoring of Jacob (v. 1) could be connected to the return from the Babylonian Exile but also to other historical situations in the OT that involved restoration.

85:1–7. Return and Restoration. The psalm begins with a recollection of Yahweh’s deeds in the past as He restored Jacob. The noun shebut (“captivity”), preceded by the verb shub (“bring back,” “return”) has been translated by some as referring to God bringing back captives from Babylon. However, it is possible to render the phrase idiomatically (as some translations have) as “restoring the fortunes” or “restoring the prosperity” of Jacob (cf. 14:7; Job 42:10 where the same phrase appears and which did not involve literal captivity). The return is based on the divine forgiveness of the people’s sins, which had led to their difficulties. While God has made a return possible, the psalmist still asks for complete restoration and revival, bringing an end to God’s anger (v. 4). In contrast to divine wrath, a specific request for Yahweh’s khesed (“mercy” or “unfailing love”) and salvation concludes this section.

85:8–13. Peace. The final section of the psalm turns the psalmist’s attention to what God is saying (v. 8). In this way, God’s utterances take on a prophetic element. The first thing God speaks is shalom (“peace”) to His people. In the Bible, this word for peace designates a state of well-being that encompasses our relationship with God, fellow humans, and the natural environment. The following lines contain a list of theological keywords with surprising metaphors: khesed (“mercy,” “faithful love,” or “grace”) and ’emet (“truth” or “faithfulness”) have met together; righteousness and peace have kissed as loving companions (v. 10). Further, ’emet (“truth” or “faithfulness”) shall spring out of the earth, like a tree that grows and flourishes. These are key characteristics of God that occur together in Yahweh’s self-revelation recorded in Exodus 34:6–7. The result of the restorative process is that the land will yield its produce. The psalm ends with the beautiful image of righteousness walking before God to prepare a way for His footsteps. Full restoration includes all spheres of human life and we can experience it when God’s footsteps become our pathways.

86:1–17*A Model Prayer

The only psalm in Book 3 that is explicitly associated with David is basically an anthology of other prayers (e.g., v. 1 // 40:17; 31:2; 102:1; v. 4 // 25:1) and verses found throughout the OT (e.g., Ex. 34). The psalm has been likened to the Lord’s Prayer, which put together a variety of requests to form a model prayer. The poem is punctuated by the causal conjunction ki (“for,” “because”; vv. 1–4, 7, 10, 13, 17), which provides the rationale for David’s requests.

86:1–7. Invocation. The first section of the psalm is framed by a plea for God to listen and answer (vv. 1, 6–7), including further pleas to save and be merciful to him (vv. 2–3). Every plea is motivated by a different rationale that focuses on the psalmist’s needs or, by way of contrast, on God’s characteristics as found in Exodus 34:6–7 (e.g., vv. 1 and 5).

86:8–10. Central Praise. The central section of the psalm breaks out into universal praise, which also has an inclusio structure like the previous section. Verses 8 and 10 describe the exclusivity and superiority of God and His deeds (cf. Ex. 15:11). This doctrinal proposition is most accurately expressed in the context of worship and doxology when all the nations will come and worship before the Lord (v. 9).

86:11–13. Change Me! As a response to the preceding universal praise, the psalmist moves to the individual and inward realm, asking God to teach him (cf. 27:11; 119:33) and give him a sincere, undivided heart to fear His name. A divided heart cannot serve God completely (cf. Deut. 6:5; Jer. 32:39), but a united heart praises God (v. 12), echoing the universal praises of the previous section.

86:14–17. Protect Me! A plea for protection from a group of ruthless, violent men concludes the psalm, although it is punctuated by expressions of trust in God, which involve more explicit references to Yahweh’s self-revelation at Mount Sinai (v. 15) than the one used in v. 5. It echoes the exact wording of Exodus 34:6, although the original yahweh is replaced with

'adonai ("my Lord"), which reflects the liturgical reading of the divine name in worship. The final request is for a sign, a visible manifestation of Yahweh's power, like the signs that preceded the Exodus (cf. Ps. 78:48). The sequence of this model prayer is instructive, as only the changed heart that calls on Yahweh in worship and praise is ready to bring requests before God.

87:1-7

Born in Zion

The choice of Zion as God's dwelling place (vv. 1-3) and its future role as the exalted birthplace of nations (vv. 4-6) provides structure to this short Korah Psalm; its somewhat terse language takes on the form of prophetic speech. The psalm aligns itself with utterances found in the prophetic books about the messianic kingdom conditioned by the faithfulness of Israel to the covenant (e.g., Is. 60-62). The universal character of this psalm connects well with the universal praise of the previous psalm.

87:1-3. God's Election of Zion. God has founded Zion (cf. Is. 14:29-32; note the mention of the Philistines in Isaiah's message) and loves the gates of Zion more than all the other dwellings of Jacob (v. 2). God's preference for Zion is expressed through the "glorious things" that God speaks about it.

87:4-7. Glorious Things. These verses present three sayings of Yahweh about the city, each stating that "this one was born (in Zion)." It is thus a divine birth register that records Zion as the aspired birthplace not only for Israel but for the surrounding nations. They include Rahab, (a name for Egypt; v. 4; cf. Is. 30:7) and Babylon, covering both the hostile superpowers south and north of Israel, plus other enemies: Philistia, Tyre (already mentioned in the conspiracy of the nations in Psalm 83:2-5) and Ethiopia or Cush (modern Sudan). These nations are also mentioned in Isaiah's oracles (Is. 13-23).

The psalmist makes it clear that this is a matter of divine election, as the Most High Himself will establish Zion and record the inhabitants in His register (vv. 5-6). Verse 7 contains an instruction for the musical performers of this psalm to sing about all their springs being found in "you." This "you" ending the line can be understood as referring to Zion, which then compares the birth of peoples to springs of water that gush forth from Zion. While Zion, on account of Israel's unfaithfulness, never became what this psalm envisions, the Israel of faith can claim a citizenship in the heavenly Jerusalem (Phil. 3:20).

88:1-18

Utter Darkness

The last of the Korah Psalms does not end on a high note; on the contrary, it appears to express utter darkness reflecting a time of physical and mental pain in the life of the psalmist. Death is ever present. A plethora of words appear throughout the poem that can be associated with the experience of a fading life (e.g. "grave," "pit," "dead," "slain," "depths," "destruction."). The last word of the psalm in Hebrew is makhshak ("darkness"), which provides a woeful climax to this sad poem. It is a meaningful psalm for those moments in life when the darkness surrounding us seems to be impenetrable. The tune "makhlat le'annot" was also used in the title of Psalm 53. "Heman the Ezrahite" was a Korahite (1 Chr. 6:33) and is mentioned among the temple singers appointed by David (1 Chr. 15:16-19). The chronological proximity of David and Heman could indicate that the temple poet wrote this psalm while contemplating the experience of the old and dying king.

88:1-9. Affliction. The psalm begins with a plea for God to turn/incline His ear—a metaphorical image of listening closely. It is clear that we are dealing with a life-threatening situation that will be laid out in detail in the following verses. In his physical and mental affliction, the psalmist finds himself near to death and the grave (v. 3). It is replete with morbid imagery as he experiences his situation as God's wrath rolling over him like waves (v. 7). The psalmist finds himself in a pit, in darkness (v. 6), from which he is unable to escape (v. 8). He can only call and stretch out his hand in despair. Job's description of his experience bears a close similarity to these dark lines (cf. Job 10:21-22).

88:10-12. Questions and More Questions. Several rhetorical questions punctuate the center of this psalm and emphasize a common topic—being among the dead (repa'im; v. 10). This clearly refers to the lifeless human form and not to "ghosts" or "departed spirits" (as some versions translate). There is no recognition of God's wonders (v. 10); it reflects the belief that when a person dies, all physical, mental, and spiritual activities come to an end (cf. Eccl. 9:5–6). Interestingly, the question mentions divine characteristics such as love (khesed), faithfulness, and righteousness (vv. 11–12) that seem to penetrate the darkness with the light of hope.

88:13–18. In the Morning. The phrase “in the morning” (v. 13) introduces the last section of the psalm, but instead of referring to God’s favor that so often comes in the morning (cf. Pss. 5:3; 30:5; 46:5), there is only a return to suffering. God’s terrors (v. 15) are surrounding the psalmist all day long like a flood of water (v. 17). The psalm ends in darkness (v. 18). There is not always a bright morning after the darkness, not then and not now. However, one can find encouragement in the fact that this prayer is part of the Psalms and God hears this type of prayer as much as the hymns of praises surrounding this psalm. In fact, the psalmist affirms from the outset that the Lord is the God who provides salvation for him (v. 1). Indirectly, the believer is invited to continue to hope in the Lord in every situation of life.

89:1–52

A Covenant Psalm

This is the third longest psalm (after Psalms 119 and 78) and concludes Book 3. Its repeated focus on “Your anointed” (vv. 20, 38, 51) echoes the portal of the Psalms (i.e., Ps. 2), which describes the anointed as God’s answer to the plotting of the hostile nations. While the Davidic covenant stands at the beginning of this psalm, it ends with an uncertain outlook into the future of David’s descendants, especially in view of the national disaster at the beginning of the Exile and the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. This event has been associated with the writing of this poem and agrees with the approximate chronological setting of Book 3, which concludes the monarchic period of Israel and Judah.

The sevenfold mention of God’s khesed (“lovingkindness,” “mercy,” “faithfulness”) found throughout this psalm (vv. 1, 2, 14, 24, 28, 33, 49) not only unifies the poem but also points to the underlying eternal basis of the covenant, namely, God’s continuous faithfulness. As a frame, the poem mentions God’s mercy and covenant with David at the beginning and end (vv. 2–3, 49). “Ethan the Ezrahite” is mentioned only here in the Psalms; as with Heman in the previous psalm, he was a temple sage and musician (1 Kin. 4:31).

89:1–4. Introduction. The introduction to the psalm is an invitation to sing of the khasde (“mercies,” “faithful love,” “kindnesses”) of the Lord based on two historical deeds of God: Creation (alluded to in the mention of the heavens in v. 2) and God’s covenant with His servant David (v. 3). There is an antiphonal change of speaker between vv. 2 and 3, moving from worshiper to God. Other psalms have connected David’s election with the Exodus (e.g., Ps. 78), but here the psalmist concludes Book 3 with a grand historical sweep from Creation, to David, and to the time after the Babylonian Exile.

89:5–14. God of Creation. Nature lifts up praise to God in the heavens for His faithfulness, emphasizing His sovereignty and wonders (v. 5) manifested in creation and the Exodus (cf. the reference to Rahab in v. 10; 87:4). God created the north, south, east, and west, represented by Tabor and Hermon, mountains in the north of Israel that demarcate the eastern and western extension of the land (v. 12). The section is concluded with the mention of Yahweh’s attributes (v. 14; cf. 25:10), which serve as the foundation of the covenant and transition to the next section.

89:15–37. God of Covenant. Verses 15–19 begin this section with a beatitude for those who walk in the light of the Lord’s paneḥ (“face,” “presence,” “countenance”); i.e., they live according to the stipulations of the covenant. Then God speaks and announces the election of His servant David (vv. 20–29), with whom His covenant will be confirmed (v. 28). The blessings of the Davidic covenant also include the permanence of the Davidic line, even if his sons forsake God’s law. God will punish them but will remain faithful to His covenant (vv. 30–37).

89:38–51. God’s Judgment and Mercy. There is an abrupt change in the poem, introduced by a change in speaker and a contrastive description of God’s rejection of and anger with His anointed (v. 38). The final section replaces praises and rejoicing with complaint and mourning, describing the ultimate failure of the monarchy, which contrasts with the permanence of the Davidic covenant and lineage described in the previous section (vv. 38–45). Consequently, the psalm ends with a series of questions elaborating the familiar “How long, LORD?” (v. 46). A plea for God to “remember” the ridicule against His servants (v. 50) provides a glimpse into the desperate historical situation in which Israel found itself at the end of its monarchic period.

89:52. Doxology. The doxology that ends Book 3 stands in sharp contrast to the content of the psalm. It concludes the first macrocollection of Psalms 2–89, which reflects the monarchic period of Israel. The anointed one in Psalm 2 presented God’s counterprogram to the machinations of nations, climaxing in David’s election as king of Israel. Its failure created the urgent need for a new firm foundation, as well as the Messiah, who has repeatedly come to the fore throughout the first three books of the Psalms. A twofold “amen” confirms that God’s plans will continue forever (v. 52).

PSALMS 90—106

BOOK IV

The question of “How long?” near the end of the previous book still rings in the mind of the reader (cf. Ps. 89:46), and Book 4 appears to pick up the question (Ps. 90:13). This book begins its sequence with the only psalm ascribed to Moses. The name of Moses occurs seven times in Book 4, most notably at the end (90:1; 99:6; 103:7; 105:26; 106:16, 23, 32), in comparison to only two occurrences outside of Book 4 (18:17; 77:20). This has led commentators to call it the “Moses book.” Thematically, Book 4 begins with a confession of Israel’s guilt, a fitting counterpoint to the complaints that mark the end of Psalm 89. After the failure of the monarchy, the search for a rationale for Israel’s existence takes us back to the beginning of the nation, when the torah was given. Psalms 93–100 provide a central collection within this group that stresses divine kingship as a further basis for the future of Israel. The final psalms of Book 4 (Pss. 103–106) return to Moses and God’s blessings in the history of Israel. This effectively underlines the theme of Yahweh as King, creating a positive outlook for the future with a hope centered on the Messiah. There is hope for the Davidic lineage, which seemed to have collapsed by the end of Book 3.

90:1–17

God’s Word Remains

This “prayer of Moses the man of God” deliberately returns to the origin of God’s people and connects its content to Moses’ final speech in Deuteronomy 32–33 (cf. esp. Deut.

33:1, which also uses “Moses the man of God” in the introduction). The poem creates a contrast between God’s eternal nature and human brevity, an adequate response in a time of national disaster when socio-political structures are disappearing. Its place and chronological function in the Psalms do not necessarily coincide with the date of composition, yet its content is timeless. Psalms 90–92 form a thematic unit that moves from lament (Ps. 90) to divine promise (Ps. 91) and thanksgiving (Ps. 92) around the topic of long-lasting life under Yahweh’s protection.

90:1–12. Past and Present. The poem begins with a wisdom meditation on the eternity of God (vv. 1–2; cf. 93:2) versus the finite nature of human life—God is from everlasting to everlasting (v. 2). The realization that a thousand years in His sight are like yesterday (v. 4) puts into perspective the immediate, but temporary, threat of the Babylonian Exile. Imagery of withering grass (v. 5; cf. 37:2; 103:15; 129:6) completes the idea of God’s permanence and human transience. The poem changes now to first-person speech (vv. 7–12), taking the withering grass imagery and applying it to the current situation of God’s people (His servants; v. 13) as they are consumed by His anger (v. 7). In contrast to God’s thousand years, the brevity of a normal life-span is seventy years (v. 10), a life-span that is shortened by God’s anger (v. 11). This can be understood only by a heart of wisdom (v. 12). In a subtle way, Moses (who lived to 120 years; Deut. 34:7) recognized that the extra forty years he lived beyond age eighty were a gift from God. By calling Moses into service at age eighty (Ex. 7:7), when his life should have ended (Ps. 90:10), God was essentially reclaiming him from death.

90:13–17. Future. The call for God to shubah (from shub, “return,” “relent”) followed by the question “How long?” connects this psalm to the previous one and to the historical situation of the Exile. God can warn humans to “turn/return” and then relent from His judgments if they repent and return to Him (cf. Jer. 18:1–8). The constant reference to time units in this psalm (days and years; cf. also the seventy years that coincide with the prophesied time of the Exile) makes one wonder if this psalm describes the ongoing agony of the Exile and an enduring concern for its duration (cf. Dan. 9:2). Meanwhile, the psalm ends with a request to “establish the work of our hands,” granting some degree of permanence based on the presence of God's hadar ("honor," "glory," "splendor"; v. 16) with His people. The recognition of the fleetingness of our lives invites us to hope for permanency and eternity in the presence of God.

91:1-16 Long Life

The fleetingness of human life in the previous psalm is contrasted here with the promise of "long life" (v. 16) for those who rest in "the shadow of the Almighty" (v. 1). An individual speaks in the first-person viewpoint to affirm his trust in God at the beginning (vv. 1-2), followed by promises of divine protection in third person (vv. 3-13). The psalm finally returns to first person, but as a direct discourse with Yahweh answering the initial petition (vv. 14-16). The change in speakers and roles points to a possible antiphonal use of this psalm in the temple liturgy.

91:1-2. Trust in God. The individual emphasizes from the outset that he trusts in God every day. The shadow of the Almighty and the appellation of God as the Most High (v. 1) introduce temple terminology (cf. 17:8; 36:7; 57:1; 63:7). The psalmist's chief desire is to be in the presence of God to find refuge in Him (v. 2).

91:3-13. Divine Protection. The central section of the psalm is replete with vivid imagery expressing God's protection of those who trust in Him when passing through dangerous situations (vv. 3-8). The situations are increasingly dangerous, including the terrors of the night, arrows (war) of the day, stalking pestilence, and ultimately the destructive plague (vv. 5-6). The repeated movement between night and day expresses the ongoing dimension of the threats, which take on anti-godly or even demonic dimensions. This day/night alternation provides a fourfold contrast to the fourfold mention of God's name in vv. 1-2. The threat climaxes in a beautiful promise of protection, which has carried innumerable readers of this psalm through perils of war and persecution (v. 7). The large numbers amplify God's protecting power in the middle of an overwhelming and dangerous situation. Verses 9-13 return to the initial refuge metaphor and detail how God will protect the individual from all of these perils. Verses 11-12 stand out dramatically for their partial use by Satan during the temptation of Jesus (Matt. 4:6). Satan is the ultimate personification of the anti-godly threats in vv. 5-6. But here the psalmist enlists the ministry of angels, who protect him even from mortally dangerous beasts.

91:14-16. God Promises. The last section of this psalm abruptly changes to God as the subject. Through direct divine discourse, He confirms the protection requested and described in the two previous sections. In addition to that, He provides an answer to the question of the transience of human life raised in the previous psalm. God will give the psalmist a long life (v. 16) and his salvation. Jesus's response to Satan's temptation demonstrates that the intention of this psalm is not to encourage presumptuous gambling with physical and spiritual dangers, but rather to promise true protection for those who continually abide in God. Note also Jesus's implied quotation of v. 13 in Luke 10:19, where He bestows on His disciples authority over demonic forces.

92:1-15 Sabbath Praises

The title of the psalm identifies it as one used on the Sabbath day. It is a unique title within the Psalms that points to its use in the temple. It connects to Psalm 91 by giving thanks for what has been promised in that psalm. It also connects to Psalm 90 in its wise, didactic tone and usage of contrastive imagery.

92:1-3. Invitation to Praise. The poem begins with an invitation for continuous praises on the Sabbath. In Psalm 91, the deathly and demonic threats were felt day and night, but now the psalmist describes the goodness of declaring God's khesed ("lovingkindness" or "mercy") in the morning and His faithfulness at night (vv. 1-2). This creates a positive contrast by alluding to the evening and morning sacrifices that marked the Sabbath day. Praises are also expressed through instruments and music. A nebel (a ten-stringed instrument, possibly a lute) and the higgayon ("resounding music," "harmonious sound," "melody" of the lyre) combined in a kind of "orchestra."

92:4-9. The Wicked Are Like Grass. The psalm's wisdom section begins with repeated references to God's works (vv. 5-6) and their subsequent association with Creation (cf. vv. 12-14). This provides an apt beginning for a poem about the Sabbath. The connection to the Creation narrative is further strengthened by the sevenfold mention of Yahweh in the psalm (vv. 1, 4, 5, 8, 9, 13, 15), which links it to the seven days of Creation. It then moves from the works of Yahweh to the destruction of the wicked. In Psalm 91, humanity was likened to withering grass, but here the wicked spring up like grass that will ultimately be scattered by God (vv. 6–9). This presents an answer to the question “How long?” introduced in Psalm 90:13.

92:10–15. The Righteous Are Like Trees. In contrast to the destruction of the wicked is the exaltation of the righteous, who will flourish as a palm tree and grow as a cedar (v. 12). Instead of dry grass, they bear fruit in old age (v. 14). It is interesting to note the association between tree imagery, the house of the Lord (the temple; v. 13; cf. 52:9), and a description of the fruitful longevity of the righteous in the presence of God (cf. Ps. 1). A further association with Creation might be present here through the imagery of the tree of life as it stood in the middle of Eden. The psalm ends with a reference to Deuteronomy 32:4 and God’s righteousness, which provides an adequate rationale for the blessing of longevity the righteous enjoy under the protection of His righteousness. Rootedness in God versus the transiency of human life concludes this group of three psalms and prepares us for the permanence of divine kingship that characterizes the next section of Book 3 (Pss. 93–100).

93:1–5

Yahweh Is King

The divine kingship psalms in Book 4 (Pss. 93–100) are aptly introduced by the programmatic statement “the LORD reigns,” which may be translated as “Yahweh is King” (cf. also 97:1; 99:1). The psalm does not have a Hebrew heading, although the LXX connects it liturgically to the “day before the Sabbath” and associates it with David.

93:1–2. Throne Scene. The declaration of Yahweh as King describes Him as dressed with majesty and strength, which denotes His divine splendor, appearance, and readiness to engage in battle. The verb ’azar (“to gird oneself”), is usually found in a context of preparation for warfare (cf. 2 Sam. 22:40; Ps. 18:39; Is. 8:9). The question of when Yahweh’s kingship began is answered in v. 2 by describing His throne as being established from the earliest times (’az). He is from ’olam (“everlasting,” “eternity”).

93:3–4. Subduing the Nations. Some have suggested that the background for this part of the psalm borrows from the Canaanite mythological battle between the storm-god Baal and Yam, who represented the waters of chaos. A more biblically informed reading recognizes the threefold mention of nahar (“rivers,” “streams”) as referring to nations (see Is. 8:7).

93:5. Palace and Temple. The psalm concludes with a description of God’s house adorned with holiness and supported by Yahweh’s ’edot (“statutes,” “testimonies”; synonymous to His law; cf. 19:7). The house of the Lord is both palace and temple (cf. 5:7; 26:8). The combination of a reference to God’s house and “rivers” is also found in Psalm 36:8, where the imagery connects to the rivers of Eden and sets God’s eternal kingship in the context of Creation. While Yahweh as King might not be an easily accessible image in modern times, the sovereignty of God and acknowledgment of His majesty are important matters for Christian believers, who anticipate with hope the consummation of their manifestation in history.

94:1–23

Royal Judge

Psalm 94 provides further information about divine kingship, identifying God as a Judge of justice, who is ready to render punishment (v. 2) and bring onto the wicked the consequences of their sin (v. 23). The psalm lacks any superscription.

94:1–8. The Foolish. The poem begins with the twofold divine epithet ’el neqamot (“God of vengeance”), followed by a request for Him to rise up as Judge of the earth. The question of how long the wicked will exult creates a strong verbal link to the preceding psalms, especially the beginning of Book 4 (90:13). Verses 4–8 describe the foolishness of the wicked when they break and crush God’s people. The mention of the widow, stranger, and fatherless recalls Psalm 10:16–18 and its strong ethical overtones drawing on legal literature from the Pentateuch (cf. Deut. 10:18; 24:17–21; 27:19). It is unclear if the wicked represent oppressing nations or senseless people who think the Lord does not see their sin (vv. 7–8). In v. 7, a shortened form of the divine name (yah) is used, which becomes more prevalent in the last two books of the Psalms. The section ends by asking the fools when they will become wise (v. 8).

94:9-15. Wisdom. This didactic wisdom contemplation, similar to Psalms 90 and 92, is a response to the question of v. 8; the mention of nations in v. 10 gives the psalm a universal tone. At the center of this section is a beatitude of wisdom about instruction in God's law (v. 12) followed by a promise of restoration when judgment will return and again be established in righteousness (v. 15).

94:16-23. Personal Petition. Two questions reflect a troubled individual's need for justice and divide this section (vv. 16 and 20), each followed by answers that affirm Yahweh's role in defending the righteous. The reference to the throne of corrupt iniquity in the second question (v. 20) contrasts with Yahweh's throne of the previous psalm. The throne of iniquity gives judgments that are against the law and condemn innocent blood (i.e., condemn the innocent to death; v. 21). Here, Yahweh as Judge is contrasted with a wicked form of justice. The throne of God is also the seat of judgment. For the psalmist, Yahweh is a misgab ("fortress," "stronghold," "defense") in this context, perhaps connoting the idea of God as the psalmist's legal defender. The psalm comes full circle with the announcement of the punishment of the wicked (v. 23; cf. vv. 1-2). God as King and Judge are two images found in Daniel 7 in the description of the judgment scene in the heavenly sanctuary. "Thrones" are set up there and the investigative judgment begins. This psalm reminds us that Yahweh is our defense.

95:1-11

Invitation to Praise

This royal thanksgiving psalm invites God's people to sing to the Lord as a response to His wonderful works (vv. 1-7c). It then exhorts the people to listen to God's word and learn from the negative experiences of the heart-hardened generation in the desert after the Exodus (vv. 7d-11). The contrasting content of these two sections has caused questions about its original unity, but other festal psalms (e.g., Pss. 50 and 81) exhibit a similar twofold structure, whereas the second part is also a direct discourse of Yahweh. Hebrews 4:7 quotes from this psalm and mentions David in connection with the authorship of the poem, although the NT sometimes associates all of Psalms with David.

95:1-7c. Exhortation. The first part of the psalm alternates between exhortation to worship

(vv. 1-2, 6) and reasons for worship (vv. 3-5, 7a-c). The exhortations give rare insight into OT worship services. There is an invitation to shout joyfully to Him with zamid ("songs," "psalms"; v. 2) but also to bow down and kneel before the "LORD our Maker" (v. 6). The rationale for worship is found in God's work of Creation. We also find two divine metaphors that are familiar in the psalms and are often combined (cf. e.g., Ps. 23), Yahweh as King (v. 3) and Shepherd (v. 7).

95:7d-11. Yahweh Responds. Yahweh's direct discourse picks up where the previous section left off, with the image of God as Shepherd, which connects well with the Exodus experience. Interestingly, the verb nahal ("to lead"), appears in both the Shepherd Psalm (Ps. 23:2) and the Exodus poem (Ex. 15:13), describing God as Shepherd during the Exodus. The psalm's unity is indicated through the image of God trying to lead them as a shepherd while they hardened their hearts. Such was the case at Meribah (Ex. 17:7; Num. 20:13), a name that means "contention" or "rebellion." Their attitudes in the latter incident led to forty years (v. 10) of wandering in the wilderness, and that generation did not enter God's rest (v. 11). While in exile years later, Israel looked forward to returning to the promised land and was called to learn from its remote past experiences. Hebrews 4 uses this psalm and issues a similar warning to hear His voice "today" (v. 7c; cf. Heb. 4:7-8). The promise of the Sabbath rest still remains today.

96:1-13

A Universal Call to Worship

This psalm, also called a missionary psalm, expands the invitation to praise found in the previous psalm and broadens it to a universal dimension by including "the nations" (vv. 3, 10) and "peoples" (see vv. 3, 10, 13). It also connects to previous psalms by a reference to divine kingship (cf. 93:1; 95:3; 97:1; 99:1) and the invitation to praise. It is parallel to the psalm recorded in 1 Chronicles 16:23-33, which David composed when the ark of the covenant was brought to Jerusalem. The differences between the two versions can be explained by the liturgical use of the poem in the Psalms.

96:1-6. First Call. Three universal calls to worship run through this poem; the first is issued to all the earth (v. 1). It is a proclamation of God's sovereignty over the natural world. God's people are invited to sing, to proclaim, and to basar (“proclaim the good news”) of His salvation to the inhabited world (vv. 2–3). The rationale for praise is found in God’s sovereignty above all gods (v. 4) manifested through His work of Creation and presence in the sanctuary (v. 6).

96:7–10. Second Call. The second call is directed to the families/tribes of the peoples/nations (v. 7), and it serves as a response to the proclamation shared in the previous section. Verses 7–8 are a quotation from Psalm 29:1–2, although here the bene ‘elim (“sons of God,” “mighty ones,” “heavenly beings”) have been replaced with mishpekhoh (“families,” “tribes,” “clans”). The response of the people also includes bringing an offering and coming into His courts (v. 8); that is to say, they come to worship God in His temple in Jerusalem and become part of His people. The recognition of universal divine kingship stands behind the central phrase of this group of psalms (Pss. 93–100)—the Lord reigns (v. 10).

96:11–13. Third Call. The call to worship rolls back into the uninhabited world that has witnessed the conversion of the nations. Heavens, earth, sea, and trees all lift up their voices in praises (vv. 11–12). The psalm concludes with the eschatological hope of the coming of the Lord to judge the earth (v. 13). The reference is to the coming of the Messiah and the beginning of His reign of justice (cf. John 5:22; Acts 17:31). The inclusion of creation in the act of worship and its relationship to the conversion of nations are vivid reminders of the role of humanity in the preservation of the natural environment, as the creation also eagerly waits for the revealing of the children/sons of God (Rom. 8:19).

97:1–12

Yahweh Is King

This psalm is similar to Psalms 93 and 99 as it is introduced by the phrase yahweh malak (“Yahweh reigns,” “Yahweh is King”). The psalm describes the theophany (i.e., the appearance of God’s glory) that is often accompanied by dramatic events in nature (cf. Ex. 19:18; Ps. 18:8–16; 77:17–19). Psalm 97 continues where Psalm 96 left off, describing the arrival of the King as He descends from heaven to execute the judgment announced at the end of the previous psalm. The poem is framed by the invitation to rejoice (vv. 1 and 12), first directed to the earth and the righteous, who have been justified. There is no title for this psalm and no further indication as to the date of composition, except for its thematic connection with the surrounding psalms.

97:1–6. Invitation to Praise and Theophany.

Following the universal invitation to praise in v. 1, a theophanic event is described. God’s appearance is accompanied by a cloud cover that surrounds Him and serves to protect the human observer (v. 2; cf. Ex. 19:9). Fire, lightning, and intense heat melt the mountains in the presence of the Lord of the earth (v. 5). The usual elements of a thunderstorm are absent (cf. Ps. 77:17–19) and the fire imagery is emphasized, communicating the idea of judgment. The theophany climaxes in a universal declaration of God’s righteousness as all the peoples see His glory (v. 6). God’s appearance evokes a declarative response because it is impossible to remain indifferent to His coming.

97:7–9. Effects of God’s Appearance. The positive effects of the theophany are now contrasted with its consequences on those who worship and serve carved images, emphasizing the sovereignty of God over the other gods (vv. 7 and 9). At the center of this section, the poet quotes Psalm 48:12 but transposes it into an indicative, describing the effects of God’s judgments on Zion and Judah as already accomplished. The psalm is less future-oriented but views God’s appearance as if it had already happened.

97:10–12. Application and Renewed Invitation.

The final section begins with an admonition for those who love the Lord to hate evil. This is followed by deliverance, joy, and gladness for the upright in heart (cf. v. 8). The root samakh (“to rejoice”) is found four times in the psalm (vv. 1, 8, 11 [as the noun simkhah], and v. 12). While a theophany is a dramatic event whose effects are felt negatively by the unrighteous, it is also a moment of intense rejoicing for the righteous, foreshadowing the realization of the Christian hope, the final appearing of God and the eternal joy that will accompany it.

98:1–9

A Second Universal Call to Worship

Psalm 98 has been described as an echo of Psalm 96 as it substantially repeats both beginning and end. In three similar calls to worship (vv. 1–3; 4–6; 7–9), the text moves back and forth between “Israel,” the “nations,” and the natural “world,” focusing on the “salvation of our God” and His judgments as the central reasons for worship.

98:1-3. Invitation to Israel. The first invitation to worship is directed at Israel in the sight of all nations. The combination of the terms khesed (“mercy,” “grace,” “steadfast love”) and ’emunah (“fidelity,” “faithfulness”) in the psalms is used to demonstrate God’s covenantal commitment to His people (cf. 36:5; 40:10; 88:11; esp. 89:2, 3, 24, 33, 49).

98:4-6. Invitation to the Earth. The implications of Yahweh’s salvation for all the earth (v. 4) are expressed in a symphonic hymn of praise that recognizes God as King. The instruments of the harp, khatotsrah (a metal trumpet for signaling), and shopar (“ram’s horn”) are associated with temple service (cf. 2 Kin. 12:13; 1 Chr. 16:42) and point to the liturgical dimension of the psalm. The center of praise is thus to be found in the temple.

98:7-9. Invitation to Nature. As the praises grow in concentric movements, the third invitation is directed to the natural world, which joins the singing and instrumental praises. The whole of creation praises God and (like Psalm 96) the psalm climaxes with a universal acknowledgment of Yahweh, who will judge the earth in righteousness (v. 9). The good news of God’s salvation concentrically expands, reaching to the end of the world with the hope that everyone would finally praise the Lord (see Ps. 148).

99:1-9

Holy, Holy, Holy!

Like Psalms 93 and 97, this poem is introduced by the phrase yahweh malak (“Yahweh reigns,” “Yahweh is King”), celebrating once more the divine kingship, this time from the perspective of God’s holiness. The threefold refrain referring to God as holy (vv. 3, 5, and 9), which is amplified in each occurrence, divides the psalm into sections. Its historical imagery connects it to the Exodus experience (“Moses and Aaron;” cf. Ex. 15:1-18) as well as the early monarchy represented by the reference to “Samuel.”

99:1-3. Yahweh Is King. The first section of the psalm is a song about Yahweh on His throne, dwelling between the cherubim in the holiest of holies (cf. Ps. 80:1). As in Psalm 97, there are elements of theophany present, but this time they are only hinted at (v. 1 reference to trembling of the earth). A universal invitation to praise God for “He is holy” (echoed in v. 5) concludes the section.

99:4-5. Yahweh’s Strength. In contrast to ANE god-kings, whose strength was founded on their military power, Yahweh’s strength is in His law, with which He has established equity, justice, and righteousness (v. 4). The ideas of king and judge are combined as in the concluding theme of the previous psalm (cf. 98:9). The invitation to worship at His footstool (v. 5) stands in parallel imagery to the cherubim throne of the first section and once more introduces the idea of holiness. The second refrain (“He is holy”) is now amplified by the invitation to exalt and worship Him.

99:6-9. Historical Witnesses. There is a sudden change in the psalm, listing three historical personalities from the early history of Israel. The mention of Moses and Aaron (v. 6), both of whom are called priests (Moses is not called a priest outside this psalm, but he ordained Aaron; Lev. 8), associates the poem with the Exodus. The mention of Samuel (v. 6) connects it to the early monarchical period. Both are important key moments of election that form the basis for the future establishment of Israel after the Exile. Moses, Aaron, and Samuel all kept God’s ’edot (“testimonies,” “statutes”) and the khokh (“ordinance”) He gave them; thus they shared a common foundation—the law of God. These individuals had to rely on the mercy of Yahweh, who is a forgiving God (v. 8; lit. the “God who lifts up,” “who carries”; cf. Ex. 34:7); the verb nasa’ is also used to denote forgiveness. The final refrain expands the concept of the holiness of God by adding a third and final refrain, “the LORD our God is holy.” God’s holiness is grounded in His sovereignty (vv. 1-3), His Law (vv. 4-6), and His being experientially known as the forgiving God.

100:1-5

Final Doxology to the King

Psalm 100 concludes the divine kingship psalms (Pss. 93-100) and is similar to the first psalm in this group. The psalm serves as a concluding doxology to this collection even though the word “king” is not used. In its absence there is an abundance of royal terminology (e.g., “serve”; some translate ’abad as “worship,” “gates,” “courts”), as well as references to the other psalms in this group. It is a final universal hymn that invites people to worship in the temple of Yahweh through a series of seven imperatives that are concentrically arranged around v. 3b and which describe God as Creator and Sustainer using the metaphor of the shepherd. The superscription marks the psalm as a psalm of thanksgiving, which points to its liturgical usage within the temple service. The psalm has found its way into Christian liturgy as the basis for the widely used doxology “Praise God, from whom all blessings flow.”

100:1–3a. First Call. The first call to worship, which comprises the first group of four imperatives, is directed to all the earth. The thankful need to shout joyfully and rejoice in the presence of the enthroned king (cf. 1 Sam. 10:24; Ps. 47:2–3). The nations are to acknowledge that the Lord is God, the universal sovereign.

100:3b. Covenant. The center of the psalm is framed by imperatives on each side and emphasizes the covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel through creation (God made them) and election using the metaphor of the shepherd—they are His people and the sheep of His pasture (cf. Deut. 26:16–19).

100:4–5. Second Call. A second call to worship using three imperatives invites the universal congregation to enter His gates and His courts (i.e., the temple, which serves as Yahweh’s palace where His throne of grace is symbolically represented by the ark of the covenant; v. 4). The inclusiveness of the call is highly significant; it invites the whole world into the temple precincts, a place usually reserved for Israel only. The psalm concludes with a contemplation of Yahweh’s goodness, reminiscent of His self-revelation at Sinai (cf. Ex. 34:6). The psalm anticipates the moment when the redeemed ones will enter through the portals of the eternal city to worship their Creator and Redeemer with eternal joy.

101:1–8

How to Rule

Following the group of psalms emphasizing divine kingship (Pss. 93–100), this poem serves as a response of commitment to the principles of divine governance laid out in the previous psalms. This commitment is made by the ruler on behalf of the people. It is the first poem since Psalm 86 that is associated with David in its superscription. Psalms 101–103 have been recognized as the third group of Davidic psalms. While the original authorship fits David’s commitment to God, its placement in the Psalms and the absence of any explicit reference to a king may point to its use as a foundation for the governing of a new nation after the Babylonian Exile under God as King.

101:1–4. Personal Commitment. The principles of khesed (“steadfast love,” “mercy,” “grace”) and justice are related at the end of the previous psalm. These divine characteristics and guiding principles of the covenant mentioned in this section form the theological basis for governance (cf. Mic. 6:8). The commitment is expressed in the form of a song of praise (v. 1), which provides insight into the use of this psalm during an inauguration ceremony for leadership. The personal commitment of the king is centered on an inner attitude, a heart that is tamim (v. 2), a word expressing the idea of completeness, integrity, and straightness (cf. Ps. 15:2). This is contrasted with the psalmist’s resolution to abstain from a perverse heart, which is crooked or twisted (v. 4). The realization that sin often enters through visual perception is interesting to note (v. 3). This becomes especially meaningful in connection to David’s initial look at Bathsheba from his palace roof (2 Sam. 11:2).

101:5–8. Public Commitment. The resolve for a pure inner attitude translates now into a public commitment to act against the wicked and support the righteous. The psalmist (i.e., the king) will oppose anyone who is slanderous, proud, or deceitful (vv. 5, 7). He will even destroy all the wicked in the land (v. 8). On the other hand, the faithful (v. 6) and the one who walks in the way of tamim (“integrity” or “completeness,” see above on v. 2) shall be part of the future government. The heart of tamim in the leader translates itself into the tamim way in which his servants will walk. This psalm not only provides a good road map for a renewed nation under God after the Babylonian Exile but also describes a model of timeless commitment for anyone called and appointed to lead God’s people.

102:1–28

It Is Time for God’s Mercy

This is the fifth of the seven penitential psalms found in the Psalms (cf. Ps. 6; 32; 38; 51; 130; 143) and describes the hope of God’s people in Exile for divine intervention and deliverance. A complaint (vv. 1–11) is followed by a statement of confidence (vv. 12–22), which concludes the psalm with praises to the eternal God. The psalm is permeated by references to different units of time that climax with a contemplation of God's eternity: "day(s)" (vv. 3, 8, 11, 23, 24), "years" (vv. 24, 27), "generations" (vv. 12, 18, 24), "time" (v. 13 [2]), "endure/remain" (vv. 12, 26), and so on. All this identifies the main theme of the poem: the time has come for God to have mercy and compassion for Zion (v. 13). The superscription is unique in the Psalms, although a similarity to headings of some Babylonian prayers has been noted. This could underscore a date for its composition during the Exile in Babylon.

102:1–11. Bad Days. A plea for God to hear and answer (vv. 1–2) introduces a complaint framed by the image of human life that will wither away like grass (vv. 4, 11). Other images underline the fact that these are bad days (v. 3). There are three similes of birds (vv. 6–7), whose species are difficult to determine. They are each connected to the ideas of loneliness and abandonment. These images are used to express Israel's experience of God's wrath when He threw them down or away (Heb. shalak) into exile. The section concludes with the image of withering grass, emphasizing the shortness of human life. It is like a lengthening evening shadow, which eventually disappears into a night of oblivion. The idea is that the nation may fade away and disappear in exile.

102:12–28. The Time Has Come. A strong affirmation of God's eternal nature and character (v. 12) contrasts with the experience of the people. There is a similar description of God's eternity at the end of the psalm, creating another frame around the second section (v. 27). Verse 13 stands out as a long line in the poetic arrangement of the psalm and is the center of the poem. There is merciful compassion for Zion and a doubly emphasized rationale—the mo'ed has arrived. This term, meaning "appointed time," is used for some of Israel's annual gatherings (Ex. 23:15; Lev. 23) and by the prophets as a reference to a prophetic time (e.g., Dan. 8:19; 12:7). In this psalm, it may indicate Jeremiah's prophecy about the length of the Exile (cf. Jer. 29:10).

Like Daniel (Dan. 9:1–2), the psalmist eagerly anticipates the end of the Exile. The section looks forward to the rebuilding of Jerusalem (v. 16) and the nation (v. 18). In v. 19 we find an interesting reference to the heavenly sanctuary describing the Lord as looking down from His sanctuary, and viewing the earth from heaven. Verse 23 briefly returns to the shortness of life in exile.

The psalm concludes with a prospect of God's eternity, which serves as a guarantee for a future Israel whose descendants will be established before the Lord (v. 28). The divine plan is fulfilled within the flow of history and specific moments are identified by God as particularly significant in reminding His people that He is still guiding them.

103:1–22

Yahweh's khesed

Psalm 103 expands on the topic of God's khesed (variously rendered as "mercy," "faithful love," "lovingkindness," "covenant loyalty"; vv. 4, 8, 11, 17), raising a chorus of praises that grows concentrically from the individual (vv. 1–5) to Israel in the past (vv. 6–10), Israel at present (vv. 11–14), humanity at large (vv. 15–18), and finally the whole universe (vv. 19–22). A repeated beatitude begins and concludes the poem, creating an inclusio. Throughout the psalm are found numerous references to the divine self-revelation at Sinai, focusing on the attributes of God (cf. Ex. 33–34). There is a timelessness about this psalm. However, the image of withering grass as a simile for the brevity of human life (vv. 15–16), in contrast to God's eternity, reminds us of the previous psalm. This psalm has been ascribed to David, but its location in the Psalms points to an application to the historical situation of the Babylonian Exile.

103:1–10. Khesed on the Individual and Israel.

The invitation to bless (or praise) the Lord begins this psalm and is echoed at the end. The verb barak ("to bless"), with God as the object, can refer to the act of worshiping and praising Him. Five relative clauses in vv. 3–5 describe the characteristics of God centered on His khesed ("mercy," "steadfast love") and rakhmim ("compassion," "tender mercies"; v. 4) and their effects of forgiveness, restoration, and healing the individual so that one's youth is renewed like the eagle's (v. 5; cf. Is. 40:31). The psalm now turns to God's deeds of mercy in the past, specifically during the time of Moses, invoking in v. 8 the experience of the Exodus through a quotation from Exodus 34:6. Verse 8 forms the theological center of the psalm and has become a formulaic point of theological reference throughout the Psalms (cf. also 25:10; 86:15; 99:8). Verses 9–10 provide a commentary on v. 8.

103:11–22. Khesed on Humanity and the Universe. The scope of the psalm and of God's mercies gets broader now with the invocation of both heaven and earth (v. 11) and the poetic description of God's forgiveness: He has removed our transgressions from us as far as the east is from the west (v. 12). In effect, this is a further comment on v. 8. Similar to Psalm 102, this psalm also deals with the fleetingness of humanity versus God's eternity (vv. 13–17). The shortness of human life is contrasted with God's mercies, which are "from everlasting to everlasting" (v. 17). These mercies are extended to those who keep His covenant (v. 18). The conclusion of the psalm returns to the blessing at the beginning, where heavenly beings lift up their voices in praises within the heavenly realm (vv. 20–21). The impact of a person's experience of God's mercies and forgiveness can reach into the universe (cf. Luke 15:10).

104:1–35

Old Testament Cosmology

Both Psalms 102 and 103 share a common concern for humanity based on the view that humans are like withering grass. Psalm 104 moves from humans to the cosmos, shifting the focus to the way in which creation and the cosmos are held together by the Creator. As in the previous psalm, there is an inclusio on the topic of personal worship (vv. 1, 35): the psalm concludes with the first Hallelujah chorus of the Psalms ("Praise the LORD"). From this point on, it is found at the beginning or end of the remaining psalms in which it occurs (2x at the beginning [Pss. 111–112]; 5x at the end [Pss. 104–105, 115–117]; and 8x at both beginning and end [Pss. 106, 113, 135, 146–150]). It becomes especially prominent in the final doxology of the Psalms (Pss. 146–150).

The author of the psalm is not identified. The poem has been likened to the Egyptian Aten Hymn (fourteenth century B.C.), which originated during the reign of Amenhotep IV (who renamed himself as Akhenaten in honor of the sun-god Aten). This period was characterized by a fairly short-lived monotheistic reform focusing exclusively on the worship of Aten. Unquestionably, there is some resemblance in the imagery used. For example, v. 21 describes lions lurking during the night roaring after their prey, comparable with line ii 8 of the Aten Hymn, which mentions the lion coming from its den at night. However, the psalm constantly relates the sun to God as its Creator and the sun is not considered divine. In the Aten Hymn, the sun is divine. One could even suggest that Psalm 104 is a polemic, contrasting the superiority of Yahweh with the inferiority of the gods of the ANE. The psalm can be divided into seven sections, echoing the seven days of Creation (vv. 1–4, 5–9, 10–18, 19–23, 24–26, 27–30, 31–35).

104:1–4. God in Heaven. As in Psalm 103, the personal acclamation of the Lord opens and closes this psalm (cf. v. 35), framing the hymn with an invitation to worship (cf. 103:1, 22). In five relative clauses (vv. 2–4) the psalm describes the activity of God as He begins to create (stretching out the heavens; v. 2) and makes close verbal links to the Creation account in Genesis (e.g., light, heavens, waters, winds/spirits [the Heb. ruakh can mean either]; Gen. 1:1–5).

104:5–9. Establishing the Earth. The second section uses poetic language to describe the establishment of the earth and its atmosphere, focusing on the division between the waters above and those below the firmament, creating a boundary between water and dry land (vv. 6–9). The foundations of the earth (v. 5) do not necessarily refer to pillars that stand on an underworld ocean, as has often been suggested in the discussion of this psalm; rather, these are images taken from the field of architecture (cf. 1 Kin. 8:13). Overall, while the language is poetic, there is no mythological overtone in the description of God establishing the earth. The link is with the second day of Creation (cf. Gen. 1:6–8).

104:10–18. Creator and Sustainer. The next section continues with water imagery but focuses on its effect on plants and other vegetation and recognizes its role in the sustenance of animals and plants. God is not only the Creator but also the Sustainer who preserves creation on a daily basis that it may bring forth food from the earth (v. 14). A geographical description of Israel's fauna and flora (e.g., cedars of Lebanon; v. 16) links this section with the third day of Creation (cf. Gen. 1:9–13). There are also connections with the fifth and sixth days (cf. Gen. 1:20–25).

104:19–23. Night and Day. The fourth day of Creation (cf. Gen. 1:14–19) comes into focus in the next section as it describes God appointing the moon and sun to their assigned activities. The sequence of darkness followed by light reflects the evening/morning sequence found in Genesis 1:19. There is a strong demythologizing tendency in the wording here, as moon and sun, both worshiped as deities within religions of the ANE, have clearly set limits: the moon has its seasons and the sun “knows” to go down (v. 19). The section concludes with a description of human activity (Heb. ’adam; “man,” “humanity”) and alludes to the sixth day of Creation (cf. Gen. 1:26–31). It also connects humans with the daily labor of life on earth after the fall.

104:24–30. Wonder of Creation. At the end of the Creation week God contemplates His work (cf. Gen. 1:31). Within the psalm is a moment when the psalmist looks at creation and declares the bounteous plenty of God’s works (v. 24). All living things are under the caring dominion of Yahweh. All nature and humans are dependent on God for sustenance (vv. 27–30). Once more the language of creation is used, as God’s ruakh (“spirit,” “breath”) is identified as the source of life for all living creatures, and when it is taken away they die.

104:31–35. Final Praise and Exhortation. The psalm concludes with an invitation to praise and recognize God’s majesty and its negative effects on sinners (v. 35). A contemplation of God’s creative power should lead to worship. Psalm 104 moves between God’s initial creation and His constant preservation of it. At a time when science seeks to explain everything in terms of cause and effect within a closed system, we must remember that God is the Creator in whom we find the purpose for our existence.

105:1–45

Yahweh in History

This praise psalm shifts the focus to Yahweh’s saving activities in the history of Israel. It does so by concentrating on important historical events, beginning with the Abrahamic covenant, the Exodus, and the entrance into the promised land. Verses 1–15 are almost identical to the psalm recorded in 1 Chronicles 16:8–36, which commemorates the bringing of the ark to Jerusalem by David and may represent the incorporation of material from that composition for a liturgical purpose.

105:1–6. Invitation to Remember. The psalmist uses ten imperatives (vv. 1–5) to exhort the congregation of Israel—offspring of Abraham and Jacob, His chosen ones (v. 6)—to praise the Lord. The praises move from outward expressions

(e.g., make known, sing, speak; vv. 1–2) to an inward attitude (e.g., seeking the Lord with the heart; v. 3) culminating in the command to remember His wondrous works (v. 5). The verb zakar (“to remember”) plays an important role here by concluding this section and framing the next section, moving from human to divine remembrance.

105:7–45. God Remembers. The verb zakar at the beginning and end of this section (cf. vv. 8, 42) serves to frame the historical review that makes up the major part of this poem. God’s remembrance involves His concrete acts of salvation in history. The psalm begins with Israel’s election through the covenant He made with Abraham, including the covenant renewals with Isaac and Jacob, and culminating in an everlasting covenant (vv. 8–10). Israel’s election and accompanying promise of the land characterize the next section, which focuses on the time of the patriarchal wanderings (vv. 11–15).

The patriarchs are described as anointed ones and prophets (v. 15; cf. Gen. 20:7 for Abraham as prophet), creating a historical lineage of salvation that ultimately points away from the patriarch to the Messiah. Joseph and the preservation of Israel is the next historical event in the memory of God (vv. 16–25). The experience of Joseph is summarized and followed by that of Moses and Aaron, the story of the plagues (only eight plagues are selected [vv. 26–36]; cf. Ps. 78:44–53 where seven plagues are mentioned), and the Exodus (vv. 37–41). Only the positive aspects of the Exodus experience are listed—silver and gold (v. 37), quail, bread of heaven (v. 40), and water (v. 41). Consequently, no mention is made of Israel’s rebellion in the wilderness. The psalm concludes with another reference to God’s remembrance and ends with entrance to the promised land (vv. 42–45). That generation and the one returning from the Babylonian Exile were called to observe God’s precepts (huggim) and instructions (torot; v. 45). Another Hallelujah (“Praise the LORD”) shout concludes the psalm. A surprising element in this psalm is that God does not remember the sins of His people, probably because at the end of the conflict our sins will be no more.

106:1–48

Israel’s Confession

The final psalm of Book 4 aptly presents an extended confession of Israel’s wrongdoings throughout the history of the nation. Thus, it serves as a mirror image of the historical account in the previous psalm. The psalm focuses not on God's goodness and faithfulness but on the failures of Israel that finally led to the Babylonian Exile. All this is framed by a summons to praise (vv. 1–3) as individuals (vv. 4–5) and as a community (vv. 47), followed by the doxology that concludes Book 4 (v. 48). The twofold Hallelujah ("Praise the LORD") appears for the first time, both at the beginning and the end of the poem (vv. 1, 48). As one moves toward the end of the Psalms, the Hallelujahs ("Praise the LORD") become more frequent and intense until they reach the great final Hallelujah doxology at the end (Pss. 146–150). Historically, the Babylonian Exile provides the occasion for confession, and this leads to return from exile, which is thematically at the center of Book 5.

106:1–5. Introduction. In an almost identical fashion to the previous psalm, the short introduction to this psalm uses a number of imperatives to invite the congregation to praise and worship God. His goodness (v. 1), emphasized in the previous psalm, is now set into sharp contrast with Israel's sinfulness. Again the root zakar ("remember") appears in the introduction (v. 4) and toward the end, framing the main section (vv. 7, 45) and emphasizing God's salvific remembrance (cf. 105:5, 8, 42). The section concludes with the hope of a future restoration and communal praise for God's inheritance (v. 5).

106:6–46. Confession. The tone abruptly changes, focusing on the main theme of the psalm, that is, confession of Israel's sins (v. 6). It is a communal confession (cf. 1 Kin. 8:47; Dan. 9:5) pointing to a long history of guilt. The historical review of Israel's sins begins in Egypt at the time of the Exodus (vv. 7–12) when Israel rebelled by the sea (v. 7). Yahweh saved them for His name's sake (v. 8), thus establishing a pattern for the conduct of Israel. Next comes the rebellion in the wilderness and God's provision of manna (vv. 13–15), followed by the Korahite rebellion against Moses and Aaron (vv. 16–18; cf. Num. 16). The events at Mount Sinai are recalled (vv. 19–23), in particular the worship of the golden calf (cf. Ex. 32:4), which theologically exchanged their glory (God) for the image of an ox (v. 20). Verses 24–27 point to the rebellion instigated by the spies at the borders of Canaan (cf. Num. 13–14) and provide the first glimpse of the Exile, as God intended to scatter them through the lands (v. 27). This is followed by the apostasy to Baal of Peor (v. 28) and Phinehas's courageous intervention (v. 30), which in terms of results was the same as Abraham's faith—it was credited or accounted to him as righteousness forever (v. 31; cf. Gen. 15:6).

The rebellion at the waters of strife (Meribah, vv. 32–33) precedes a list of wrongdoings committed in the promised land (vv. 34–39), which spans the time from the conquest to the Babylonian Exile; idolatry and child sacrifice are identified as the major abominations during this period (cf. 2 Kin. 16:3; Jer. 7:30–31). Consequently, the Exile came as God gave them into the hands of the Gentile nations (vv. 40–43). At this point the confession turns to Yahweh's khesed ("mercy," "steadfast love") as He remembers His covenant (v. 45), thus closing the circle of remembrance (or lack thereof) that introduced this section (cf. v. 7).

106:47–48. Final Plea and Doxology. A communal plea for salvation and return from exile concludes the psalm, connecting it to the introduction with the words "thanks" and "praise" (vv. 1, 47). The final doxology of Book 4 is slightly more expanded than the conclusion of Book 3 but is almost identical to the doxology of Book 1, adding the divine epithet "God of Israel." This title is appropriate for the end of collected confessions that tried to come to terms with the reality of the Exile, seeking a foundation for hope in Yahweh's saving deeds on behalf of Israel in the past. The confessional anti-history of Israel demonstrates the greatness of God's mercies toward His children.

PSALMS 107—150

BOOK V

The final book of the Psalms begins with another historical psalm that almost seamlessly connects to the end of Book 4, thus providing a response to the final plea for the return from exile (106:47). The compositional theme of Book 5 is the restoration of Israel during the postexilic period. Before the final doxology of the Psalms, which spreads over five psalms (Pss. 146–150), there is a last group of Davidic psalms (Pss. 138–145). Some have been adjusted to the historical realities of the postexilic Jewish communities (e.g., Ps. 144 and its dependence on Pss. 18 and 104). The importance of David as an ideal paradigm for a postexilic state formation is underlined by the insertion of this group at the end of the Psalms. The pilgrim psalms (Pss. 120–134) constitute the largest subcollection in Book 5. The expression shir hamma'alot ("A Song of Ascent"), found in the superscriptions of this group, may refer to the Babylonian exiles returning from captivity and "going up" to Jerusalem or possibly the annual Israelite pilgrimage to one of the main festivals. It is also possible that both meanings merged in the late exilic and post-exilic periods, emphasizing the central role of Jerusalem and the temple for the national reconstruction.

107:1–43

Israel Restored

The links between this and the previous psalm are plentiful. Both psalms begin with the same thanksgiving formula and form historical narratives of God's salvation deeds (Ps. 106:44 is taken up as a refrain in 107:6, 13, 19, 28), demonstrating that the division between Books 4 and 5 is to some extent artificial. Psalm 107 serves as a bridge between the two books. However, the negative tone of Psalm 106 gives way to thanksgiving and the topic of Yahweh's redemption. The return from the Babylonian Exile is no longer something hoped for but instead is an accomplished historical fact that leads to the restoration of Israel as a nation.

107:1–3. Invitation to Praise and Thanksgiving. The invitation to praise at the beginning of the poem is almost the same as the one in the previous psalm (106:1) and vv. 2–3 connect to the ending of the previous psalm. The request in 106:47 (to be gathered from the Gentile nations) is now a reality. God has redeemed His people from the hands of the enemy and gathered them from the lands. Yahweh's redemption brings Israel back from all four directions of the compass (cf. Is. 49:12).

107:4–32. Four Experiences that Motivate Thanksgiving. As a rationale for thanksgiving, the psalmist now lists four experiences of deliverance. They are primarily metaphorical in language and all end in a refrain followed by a short exhortation (vv. 4–9; 10–16; 17–22; 23–32). The refrain of praise and thanksgiving (vv. 8, 15, 21, 31) refers repeatedly back to the introduction and possibly serves as a liturgical response by the congregation during congregational singing of the psalm. The first experience

(vv. 4–9) recounts that Israel wandered in the desolate wilderness wastelands (v. 4). The description is vague and could be a reference to the experience of the Exile rather than to the wilderness wanderings after the Exodus. The return from the Babylonian Exile is depicted as a second Exodus. At the end of the experience Yahweh provides a straight path to a city where they may reside (v. 7).

The second experience (vv. 10–16) is even more abstract as it describes liberation from darkness (v. 10), which came as a consequence of rebellion against God's instruction (v. 11). The breaking of bronze gates and cutting of iron bars echo the promise of Cyrus's liberation in Isaiah 45:2, making the reference to the Babylonian Exile explicit. Verses 17–22 describe the rescue from the gates of death (v. 18; cf. Job 38:17; Ps. 9:13), which poetically refers to proximity to the grave (cf. Ps. 28:1; 30:3). In this case, it designates the Exile as a threat to the existence of Israel. The final experience recounts a storm at sea (vv. 22–32), which reminds us of Jonah 1–2. The metaphor of God rescuing Israel from a storm may point to the diaspora of Israel that took them to a number of foreign shores beyond Babylon (Egypt and the rest of the Mediterranean ancient world). All narratives end with the refrain to give thanks to the Lord for His khesed ("goodness," "mercy," "steadfast love").

107:33–41. Yahweh's Transforming Power.

The psalm next moves into a contemplation of Yahweh's acts that change the destiny of both humanity and nature, characterized by a reversal of fortunes. Through His creative powers He turns dry, parched ground into flowing springs of water (v. 35). Again there is mention of a city where they could reside (v. 36; cf. vv. 4, 7), pointing to the return from exile and rebuilding of Jerusalem. Yet there is also punishment for the powerful (He pours contempt on leaders; v. 40) but deliverance for the poor and needy, who are like a flock led by the divine Shepherd (v. 41; cf. Ps. 95:7).

107:42–43. Wisdom Exhortation. The experiences of Israel in exile have a didactic function expressed in the final appeal of the psalm: the wise should pay close attention to all of these things (v. 43). All this leads to an understanding of God's khesed ("lovingkindness," "mercy," "faithful love"), which creates another strong linguistic link with the previous psalm (cf. 106:7, 45). Looking back at how God led us through darkness and in the wilderness can increase our faith and move us to sing about His mercies as we anticipate in hope the fulfillment of His promise of a future city for us.

108:1–13

Déjà Vu

Psalm 108 combines material from earlier psalms (vv. 1–5 // 57:7–11 and vv. 6–13 // 60:5–12) in a new way, a phenomenon that also occurs in other places of Book 5 (cf. Ps. 144 and its dependence on Pss. 18 and 104). Subtle changes take place that shift the focus from David's personal experience of musical praise (v. 2 // 57:8) to a more theocentric approach stressing Yahweh's sovereignty. Thus, it is no longer the king that is the principal actor; he is used only as a historical backdrop for a theocentric form of government, which creates a new foundation for postexilic Israel. Psalm 108 is the first of three poems that refer back to Davidic authorship (Pss. 108–110) at the beginning of Book 5.

108:1–5. Praise for Yahweh's Mercy. A hymnic praise to Yahweh introduces the poem. Some have taken kebodi (lit. "my glory") at the end of the verse as a reference to God (cf. Ps. 3:3), whereas others think it refers to "my soul" or "my whole being" (cf. Pss. 16:9; 57:8). Contextually, either could apply here. The praise echoes with a universal tone, combining with musical instruments to call peoples and nations to "awaken the dawn" (v. 2). This expression alludes to the Day of the Lord when Yahweh will intervene (cf. Joel 2:2; Amos 4:13); the intervention is further developed in the second section of the psalm.

108:6–13. Plea for Yahweh's Military Intervention. The petition for deliverance invoking Yahweh's right hand (v. 6; cf. Ex. 15:6, 12) is followed by the quote of a divine oracle (vv. 8–10). It is a declaration of God's rule over Israel's ancient territories on both sides of the Jordan, such as Shechem and Succoth, Jacob's first dwelling places in the land (v. 7; cf. Gen. 33:17–18), as well the neighboring countries of Moab, Edom, and Philistia. References to the tribes in v. 8 echo Jacob's blessings in Genesis 49. Following the oracle, the psalmist recalls God's abandonment of Israel in the Exile (cf. 44:9). For the psalmist, salvation is the exclusive work of God, who stands by and defends His people like a Warrior. He is always present in our battles.

109:1–31

Deliverance from False Accusations

Psalm 109 is permeated by legal terminology, turning the psalm into a court case in which the petitioner (the accused) is asking for vindication from God as the universal Judge. The long list of curses in vv. 6–19 are pronounced by the psalmist's enemies as they express the charges against him. In the second section, the psalmist does not defend himself but instead turns to God with an appeal for justice (vv. 20–29) that climaxes in a praise of thanksgiving for deliverance (vv. 30–31). The psalm has been attributed to David and can certainly reflect a dramatic situation in his life. However, its strategic placement in the Psalms and connections with Psalm 107, which portrays Israel's deliverance from the Babylonian Exile, suggest a reuse of the psalm. The legal conflicts and false charges raised against the Jews during the time of Ezra and Nehemiah could serve as a historical background for the use of the psalm.

109:1–5. Appeal to God as the Highest Judge. Following an appeal to God to not keep silent (v. 1), the psalmist repeatedly refers to the verbal accusations of his enemies and their words of hatred (v. 3). This description of the attitudes of the enemies is followed by the psalmist's reaction.

109:6–19. Accusations. As in court proceedings, the psalm now turns to the accusers' list of accusations and curses that reflect the words of hatred mentioned in the previous section, ultimately asking for a death penalty (v. 9). Most interpreters have understood this section as curses the psalmist utters against his accusers, as is the case in other psalms traditionally called imprecatory psalms. This is a viable interpretation. Nevertheless, the legal framework of the psalm, as well as the next section, which strongly contrasts the psalmist's position with that of the accusers, suggests that this section is the direct discourse of the accusing party, who are his enemies (cf. especially the contrast in v. 28 below; see "Imprecatory Passages in the Psalms," p. 733).

109:20–31. They Curse, You Bless. David asks God to help him for His name's sake, appealing to God's khesed ("mercy," "steadfast love"; v. 21), which culminates in the contrast of v. 28: the enemies will curse, but God will bless. Eventually, wrong accusations will return to their originators

Imprecatory Passages in the Psalms

There are a number of psalms in which the psalmist uses such strong language (referred to as imprecations) against his enemies that, according to some, it reveals an attitude that is incompatible with Christian love. For instance, when oppressed by the wicked, the psalmist prays that they be disgraced (35:4), destroyed (54:5), or descend to the grave alive (55:15). He also asks for God's wrath to consume them (59:13) and considers happy those who dash Babylonian children against the rocks (137:8–9). We will examine this type of language and explore its purpose and the theological significance.

1. Origin of the Language. First, there is significant evidence that the imprecations in the Psalms have theological and linguistic connections with previous revelation. The primary background for the language is the covenant curses against covenant breakers (cf. Ps. 37:22 and Deut. 30:1; Ps. 69:23 and Deut. 28:22, 28). In other cases, there are connections with previous descriptions of God's judgments in historical narratives (cf. Ps. 140:10 and Gen. 19:24; Ps. 83:9–18 and Judg. 4–5, 7–8; Ps. 55:9, 15 and Num. 16:30).

One of the significant and consistent themes is that of divine retribution. This principle is evident in the context of the court as well as that of war. There is often an implication that God's defeat of the enemies of His people in the past is a harbinger of His future judgment as well. Accordingly, it can be legitimately claimed that the imprecatory Psalms are not unique in their descriptions of God's roles of retributive Judge and Sovereign over the wars of the nations (Ps. 35:4–9; 70:2). These psalms thus often employ the language God Himself had previously used to indicate His evaluation and punishment of evil, and the suppliant was calling upon God to do again what He had done before (cf. 55:9, 15).

2. Concern for God's Honor. When praying for the punishment of the wicked, the psalmist is ultimately interested in God's honor (e.g., 58:6–11). Were the wicked to decisively triumph over the righteous in the contexts involved, it could convey the impression of divine indifference. God was thus implored to demonstrate His righteous character and vindicate His Name and the loyalty of His people. In some cases, there are implications that the divine punishment called for involves persons who might see the error of their conduct and repent (e.g., 9:19–20; 83:16–18). In most cases, however, the implication is that the persons are irredeemably recalcitrant and will thus be destroyed (e.g., 68:1–3; 69:25). In both circumstances, God's justice and sovereignty would be manifested to His people as well as their enemies (59:11–13).

3. Imprecations and Revenge. The call for vengeance is found in some of the imprecatory passages in the Psalms (e.g., 58:10). Concerning vengeance, it should first be pointed out that the English term does not exactly correspond with the biblical term. The Hebrew term naqam is primarily employed in two ways. It is (1) the declaration of a proper punishment against the wicked or (2) the vindication of the innocent who were oppressed by evildoers. The verb form connotes "to avenge" or "to repay," while the noun means "vengeance" or "retribution." Naqam appears in legal or covenant settings where the punishment is retributive (e.g., Ex. 21:20; Lev. 26:25; 2 Kin. 9:7; Esth. 8:13).

Second, extremely important for a proper understanding of the imprecatory passages is their affirmation that God is the One who is ultimately responsible for applying vengeance (18:47; 79:10; Deut. 32:43). Even when the psalmist prays to God to help him defeat his enemies and avenge him involving war or other human means (or refers to this situation in the past), it is clear that his victories were impossible without God's own righteous judgment and aid (e.g., Ps. 18:32–50; 44:1–8; 118:1–12; 144:1–10). The cries for vengeance were a request to God for the triumph of His justice and mercy, bringing redemption, restoration, and healing to the oppressed and judgment on the oppressors.

Third, personal, selfish revenge is prohibited in a number of biblical passages (e.g., Lev. 19:18; Deut. 32:35; Prov. 25:21–22// Rom. 12:19–20). It is true that provisions were made in the Mosaic theocracy for avenging the murder of a relative (Num. 35:19–21), but this type of vengeance or justice was controlled under the law of retaliation (lex talionis), a principle that the punishment should correspond to the crime committed (a tooth for a tooth; an eye for an eye). The imprecatory prayers were requests that God render a just verdict and punishment upon the rebellious in proper proportion to their crimes. This kind of prayer and affirmation of God's vengeance is not unique to the OT (see Rom. 12:19; 1 Thess. 4:6; Heb. 10:30; Rev. 6:10; 18:4–8, 20; 19:1–3).

3. Imprecation and Retribution. First, while some have evaluated the lex talionis to be morally primitive and determined that its association with imprecatory prayers confirms the psalmists' reprehensible stance toward wicked people, scholars have rightly pointed out that this law is found in contexts of legal settings that ensured the proper implementation of justice and compassion, including for those who were foreigners or women (Ex. 21:22–25; Lev. 24:17–22; Deut. 19:16–21). It has accordingly been suggested that a better name for this law might be the "law of equivalence"—the "eye for eye" passages use standardized language (e.g., "life for life" in Lev. 24 could refer to equal compensation for losses sustained) to convey the idea of just dealings in legal settings, not those of personal revenge.

Second, in the psalms the principle of retribution provides a legal background for the punishment of the enemy (Ps. 28:4; 54:5). This is important because through retribution the justice of divine vengeance is manifested. In other words, the judgment against the wicked is not arbitrarily imposed or unnecessarily cruel, but rather it is based on the principles that a punishment should coincide with the magnitude of the crime and that it should be restricted to the criminal. God judges individuals and nations on the basis of their deeds, and that is what the psalmist is requesting through his imprecatory language.

Third, the magistrates were responsible for ensuring law and order in society, and the implementation of the lex talionis was under God's purview. The individual had to learn to trust God and His judgment. As noted above, justice throughout Scripture is God's ultimate responsibility (cf. Rom. 12:17–19). He will judge, punish, and reward everyone according to their deeds (e.g., Rom. 2:6; 1 Pet. 1:17; Rev. 22:12).

4. Imprecations and Hatred. Sometimes the idea of hatred is used in imprecatory passages (Ps. 139:21–22). A few comments are in order. First, it should be noted that the Hebrew verb sane' does not have all the same connotations as "hate" in English. Sane' can mean "disregard," "despise," "dislike," "love less," as well as to hate maliciously. Hatred in this sense of continual hostility and antagonism is condemned (Lev. 19:17–18). The Israelites were called to love their neighbors as themselves (Lev. 19:18) as well as to extend love to strangers (Lev. 19:34; Deut. 10:19).

Second, the use of sane' in the context of the imprecations implies a strong disassociation of the psalmist with evil and those who are given over to the practice of it. "Hating" the assembly of evildoers (Ps. 26:5) means a rejection of their ways and loyalty to God's. A similar idea is expressed when the psalmist says that he hates those who worship idols (31:6). This is a unique way of affirming that he is not an idolater. In other passages (e.g., 101:3), the psalmist refers to his hatred—in this case referring to strong disapproval—for the actions of evil people.

Third, the hatred in these passages is not irrational or indicative of a self-inflated or fragile ego. It is referring to those who hate God and are His enemies—God's enemies are the psalmists also. He is refusing to be identified with their evil actions and hatred of God. Accordingly, this hatred is not an evil emotion but rather a rejection of evil and the evil one who exists in opposition to God. Fourth, in the Psalms this type of hatred is implied to be something that must be learned and which is not natural to fallen human beings. The psalmist exhorts those who love the Lord to hate what is evil (97:10; cf. 45:7). The natural human heart does not hate what is evil but rather loves it instead (e.g., Gen. 8:21; Jer. 17:9; Matt. 15:19; Eph. 2:1–3). Hating evil comes from a study of God's word (e.g., 119:104). Loving the law of God is associated with hating double-minded people (119:113) as well as falsehood (119:163) because the psalmist could not support any evil dispositions and actions.

Finally, none of the above findings clash with those of the NT. Jesus's reference to loving the neighbor and hating the enemy was referring not to an OT command but to a misunderstanding of some of the rabbis. However, it is significant to note that He affirmed the necessity of “hating” our immediate family as well as ourselves (Luke 14:26). Consistent with one of the connotations of the OT sane, this use of the Greek verb miseō is not a call to harbor hostility toward relatives but rather a call not to allow any natural ties to hinder our dedication to Jesus as Savior and Lord. This “hate,” as we saw above in the Psalms, actually stems from love: love for God above all else with dedicated loyalty. We could suggest that hatred in the imprecatory Psalms is not a repudiation of the law of love but actually presupposes a strong allegiance to it. Indeed, David’s imprecations in the Psalms should not be read without considering how he often treated his personal enemies: Saul (1 Sam. 24; 26); Abner and Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. 3–4), Ab-salom (2 Sam. 18:5, 33), and Shimei (2 Sam. 16:5–14; 19:19–23). While he recognized the need for eventual punishment and justice (1 Kin. 2:8–9), he allowed for the possibility of forgiveness and did not take vengeance into his own hands unilaterally or impulsively.

6. The Psalmist and Us. While the psalmist asked God to conquer, chastise, and even kill his enemies, he renounced personal or private vengeance and requested that God would judge and execute vengeance for him. The question inevitably arises as to whether we should pray the imprecations of the Psalms at times. The answer is affirmative if we pray them with the same rejection of personal pride or vindictiveness, concern above all for God’s glory and His justice, longing for the eventual eradication of all sin and rebellion, and firm faith in God as the One who saves. The problem we have with these prayers is not that they are incompatible with Christian love (as is often supposed) but rather that we are not loving enough and need the Lord to help us to find the dedicated love and commitment to Christ and His cause that the psalmists exhibited.

and they will be clothed with disgrace (v. 29). The psalm concludes by praising God for His righteous judgments and defense of the poor and needy. The NT quotes from this psalm (v. 8) in Acts 1:20, connecting it to the betrayal of Judas and the election of Matthias. Church tradition refers to this psalm as the Psalmus Ischarioticus, reflecting the above interpretation of the curses. It provides an inspiring example of how to react when false accusations come our way, even if it means betrayal by a close friend.

110:1–7 King and Priest

This Davidic poem points far beyond itself as one of the most prominent messianic psalms in the Psalms. It presents Christ in His twofold role as King and High Priest, in the order of Melchizedek. Outside of Genesis 14 and the book of Hebrews, it is the only mention of the typological figure of Melchizedek in the Bible. The psalm divides into two parts (vv. 1–3 and 4–7), each introduced by a divine speech. One uses the imagery of the king and the other uses the imagery of the high priest, while both parts describe the subjugation of the enemies. In the context of Book 5, it introduces an ideal form of theocratic governance for a restored Israel.

110:1–3. Christ as King. The psalm is introduced by a direct address from Yahweh to David’s ’adonai (his “Lord”). In the NT this is considered to be a conversation between God the Father and God the Son (cf. Matt. 22:41–45; Mark 12:35–37; Luke 20:41–43). It describes the king as sitting metaphorically at God’s right hand, a position of honor (Mark 10:35–37). The imagery of footstool and rod or scepter (vv. 1–2) points beyond the historical and represents the universal power of the Messiah. References to the womb and youth in v. 3 mark a sudden change from the Warrior imagery and are probably an allusion to the bringing forth of the Messiah King by Yahweh (cf. Col. 1:15).

110:4–7. Christ as High Priest. Another oracle by Yahweh introduces the second messianic imagery of Christ as High Priest (cf. Heb. 7:21). The reference to Melchizedek illustrates the convergence of both kingly and priestly function into one person. Christ’s supremacy as Judge of the nations (v. 6) and His strong rule are emphasized once more through warrior terminology. The section ends in a more peaceful image of the Messiah; His drinking from a brook by the road evokes the story of Gideon (cf. Judg. 7:4–6) and his army as they prepared for battle. The hopes of a postexilic Israel were directed toward a kingly priest or priestly king, yet the psalm prophetically goes beyond those immediate hopes and points to the Messiah, who fulfills the hopes of all people.

111:1–10

Torah and Wisdom

This praise psalm focuses on God's law and wisdom within the structure of an acrostic poem, as each line begins with the next letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Psalm 112 has been considered a twin of Psalm 111, as it follows the same pattern with similar content. Both psalms begin a group of psalms (Pss. 111–119) that concludes with the most extensive wisdom contemplation of torah, also in acrostic form. While Psalms 111–112 do not mention the word torah, their terminology (e.g., “precepts” in 111:7) is clearly geared toward torah. The initial “Praise the LORD” stands outside of the acrostic structure and functions as a title (cf. Pss. 112:1; 113:1). While an acrostic poem has an inherent structure, there are some content-based divisions in the poem.

111:1–6. Thanksgiving. The praise of Psalm 111 is congregational and in response to Yahweh's works, which should be considered carefully by all who delight or take pleasure in them (cf. 119:35). Yahweh's wondrous acts are described in terms of covenant (v. 5) terminology, identifying Him as gracious and compassionate (v. 4; cf. Ex. 34:6–7), sustaining those who fear Him (v. 5), and giving them the nakhlah (“inheritance”) of the nations. Verse 6 has been translated to mean that the nations have become part of Israel's inheritance (“the nations as their heritage”) or that the other nations' inheritances now belong to Israel (“giving them the lands of other nations”). In either case, the basic meaning is the same. The historical references are to experiences during the Exodus and conquest of the land.

111:7–9. God's Greatest Work: His Law. The gift of the Lord's precepts are described in v. 7. The noun piqqudim (“directions,” “orders”) occurs only in the psalms (cf. Ps. 19:9 and throughout Ps. 119) and expresses God's concern (paqad; “be concerned for,” “be mindful of”) for the well-being of His people. The giving of God's law to His people is part of His plan for their redemption (v. 9).

111:10. Wisdom Contemplation. The statement “the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom” at the end of the psalm is associated with God's people as those who, according to the Hebrew text, “do them.” “Them” probably refers back to the “precepts” of v. 7, which have been described. The psalm is a beautiful hymn about God's tender concern for His children as particularly manifested by giving them His law.

112:1–10

Beatitude

As a companion psalm to the previous one, Psalm 112 employs the same acrostic structure and contains similar expressions (e.g., God's “righteousness endures forever” in v. 112:3b // 111:3b). However, while both psalms focus on the blessings of torah, Psalm 112 picks up where the previous poem ended, emphasizing the didactic aspect of wisdom and how it plays out in the life of one who follows the Lord's commandments. Its introductory beatitude connects closely to Psalm 1.

112:1–3. Beatitude. Following the initial title (“Praise the LORD”) the beatitude introduces the one who fears the Lord and is greatly delighted by His commandments. The blessing is for that person's family, both the current generation and the descendants. The blessing of wealth is balanced with righteousness (v. 3), which is always connected to correct ethical behavior in the psalms.

112:4–6. Representing Yahweh's Character. Correct behavior is further described in this section, listing the attributes of the God-fearer as being gracious, compassionate, and righteous (v. 4). The characteristics of a person of God are used to describe the character of His people, who also become eternally memorable (v. 6).

112:7–9. Even in Bad Times. Even in adversity, when there is news of calamity and confrontation with enemies (v. 8), the psalmist twice underlines that he will not fear because he is trusting in the Lord (vv. 7–8). The metaphor of the exalted horn (v. 9), representing strength (cf. Deut. 33:17; Pss. 75:10; 89:17), concludes this section.

112:10. Fate of the Wicked. In contrast to the righteous, the wicked have their desires come to naught. This creates a further literary link with Psalm 1. It also ends with the identical two Hebrew words, resha'im to 'bed—the evil will come to an end (cf. 1:6; there it is the “way” of the wicked that will perish, not specifically their desires). The twin Psalms 111–112 connect well with each other; one (Ps. 111) presents theology (God’s law) and the other (Ps. 112) presents anthropology, namely, the playing out of God’s law in the righteous life of humans.

113:1–9

Hallel Psalms

Psalms 113–118 constitute the Passover Hallel, a group of psalms recited during the pesakh (Passover) which commemorates the Exodus. Jesus and His disciples most likely sang from these psalms during the Last Supper (cf. Matt. 26:30; Mark 14:26). They are bracketed by two acrostic torah wisdom psalms at the beginning (Pss. 111–112) and the most extensive torah psalm, also in acrostic form, at the end (Ps. 119). Replicating the relationship between Psalms 111 and 112, the first three Hallel psalms (Pss. 113–115) have a theological perspective on the Exodus, whereas the second three Hallel psalms (Pss. 116–118) are more anthropologically oriented. Psalm 113 serves as a hymnic introduction to the group, framed by a Hallelujah (“praise the LORD”) at its beginning and end.

113:1–6. Praise and Reason. A threefold exhortation to praise the Lord introduces the psalm. This praise is not limited by time (“forevermore”) and space (reference to the rising of the sun to its setting serves to refer to the totality of creation; vv. 2–3; cf. Ps. 50:1). The reason for praise is found in another set of spatial observations, namely, that God is exalted high above all nations as He dwells and reigns on high (vv. 4–6). A rhetorical question concludes the section, including another expression of totality (the heavens and the earth; v. 6), which invites a contemplation of creation.

113:7–9. God on Earth. The spatial dimension of God concretizes itself in His intervention on earth as He raises the poor from the dust and lifts the needy from the ash heap (v. 7). These descriptions, including the childless woman in v. 9 (cf. 1 Sam. 2:5, 8), are focused on lifting up the socially disadvantaged, elevating them to a position of power (cf. 112:9). It is this majestic God who is able to restore Israel after the Exile and who is still able to elevate the oppressed. Those whom God restores, He also elevates.

114:1–8

God of the Exodus

Foregoing an introduction, this poem immediately launches into a historical account of God’s miraculous interventions during the time of the Exodus. Some ancient versions (e.g., LXX, Vg.) and a few Hebrew manuscripts consider Psalm 114 and 115 to be a single psalm. However, the literary independence of Psalm 114 is supported by its intricate structure and artistically composed four stanzas (vv. 1–2, 3–4, 5–6, 7–8). They are chiasmatically arranged (e.g., “Jacob” in stanzas 1 and 4 [vv. 1, 7]; “sea” and “Jordan” in stanzas 2 and 3 [vv. 3, 5]). The preference for Jacob throughout the psalm serves as a possible indicator for the postexilic date of the poem (cf. Is. 48:20).

114:1–2. Election of Israel through the Exodus. The first stanza of the poem describes the Exodus in terms of the election of Israel. The reference to Judah becoming God’s sanctuary points to the fact that the parallel pairs of Judah/Israel and sanctuary/dominion (v. 2) describe the origins of Israel as a nation and God’s dominion over the earth from His sanctuary. This theocentric perspective was illustrated by the arrangement of the camp during the desert wanderings when the sanctuary was in the center of the camp (cf. Num. 2).

114:3–4. Nature Reacts. Psalm 114 addresses nature in the second stanza, describing the reactions of sea, Jordan, mountains, and hills (vv. 3–4). The imagery is reminiscent of Psalm 29, where nature reacted in similar fashion to the “voice of the Lord.” The miraculous passage through the Red Sea during the Exodus and crossing of the Jordan at the end of the desert wanderings caused reactions in nature that could be associated with the theophany at Mount Sinai (cf. Ex. 19:18). One can also interpret the mountains and hills as referring to the promised land and its joyful reaction at the arrival of God’s people. Interestingly, Isaiah promises a rejoicing of mountains at the return of the exiles (cf. Is. 44:23), an idea that fits the general context of Book 5.

114:5–8. Questions and Answers. Nature is addressed through a series of four questions, which appear to move the focus from past to present. The questions recall the different reactions of nature in the previous stanza: Why do the sea and Jordan flee while mountains and hills leap and skip? The problem in this psalm is the translation of the verbal form khul in v. 7. While it is translated in most modern English versions with a negative connotation (i.e., “tremble”), another possible meaning of this verb is “dance,” “whirl,” “twist” (e.g., Judg. 21:21). This would involve the earth dancing as a sign of rejoicing. The psalm concludes with further water imagery that dominates the remainder of the fourth stanza in v. 8. The Exodus, both first and second (i.e., the return from the Babylonian Exile), is cause for solemn joy for His people because Yahweh is the One who has led the way. The next psalm reveals that the nations who have rejected Him tremble because their gods are useless.

115:1–18 God Alone

God’s supremacy in history during the Exodus is followed by a liturgical poem that is characterized by polemics against idolatry and, conversely, by its strong monotheistic theology. As nature acknowledges God’s sovereignty (Ps. 114), humanity needs to follow (Ps. 115). Within a postexilic context, Israel had to come to terms with the problem of idolatry that constituted one of the main reasons for the Babylonian Exile (cf. Ezek. 5–8). The message is clear: this should never happen again in the restored Israel. As a liturgical reading for the Passover, the poem constitutes a communal response to Yahweh’s sovereignty in the cosmos.

115:1–8. The Idols. A brief invocation to give glory to God culminates in a question raised by the Gentile nations: “Where is their [Israel’s] God?” In response to this mocking question, the first section of the poem offers an extended polemic against their idols by focusing on the contrast between the impotence of their gods against the superiority of Yahweh. One can perceive the historical context of the postexilic community that is faced with similar questions during the reconstruction of the temple and Jerusalem (cf. Ezra 4).

115:9–18. Israel’s Response. In contrast to the idols of the Gentiles, Israel is exhorted by the speaker—perhaps the priest officiating at the temple—to trust in the Lord (v. 9). Following this exhortation, the priest bestows blessings on the congregation, while the change in person in the following section indicates that both the priest and congregation stand as a community before Yahweh, with the priest functioning as a mediator. The verb barak (“to bless”) occurs six times throughout this section (vv. 12 [3x], 13, 15, 18). This verb is sometimes translated as “praise” or “extol” when directed toward God, as is the case here in the last blessing, which is a thankful response to Him. The blessings are in the form of land, descendants, and prosperity (vv. 13–15) and are rooted in God’s sovereignty as Creator of heaven and earth (v. 15) who has given the earth to humankind (v. 16). The psalm concludes with another Hallelujah (“praise the LORD”).

116:1–19 Thanksgiving

Psalm 116 moves from theology to anthropology (cf. introduction to Ps. 113), focusing on the human response to divine deliverance. This personal thanksgiving psalm presents the psalmist as an individual rescued by Yahweh from a life-threatening situation, which is not further clarified (“death” occurs 3x in vv. 3, 8, 15). As in Psalm 30, there is a double structure in the psalm (vv. 1–9, 10–19), repeating the thanksgiving in parallel fashion. The first section expresses the thanksgiving verbally, whereas the second section expresses thanksgiving by means of a ritual.

116:1–9. Expression of Thanksgiving. Verses 1–2 introduce the psalm with a beautiful manifestation of the psalmist’s love for God (cf. 18:2) grounded in his experiences with Yahweh throughout his life. In vv. 3–6 Yahweh rescues the psalmist from the torments of Sheol. The emphasis is not so much on the exact nature of the threat but on God’s characteristics (cf. Ex. 34:6). The self-characterization peti (“simple,” “unwary,” “inexperienced”) in v. 6 is found elsewhere in the Psalms. Only in Psalms 19:7 and 119:130 is it used as an expression of a person who needs to grow in wisdom (cf. Mat. 11:25). As a result of the rescue, the psalmist has found rest and returns to “the land of the living” (vv. 7–9).

116:10–19. Demonstration of Thanksgiving. There is a transition in vv. 10–11 to the repetition of the thanksgiving. The conjunction ki (“therefore”) in v. 10 could also be translated as “even though” (i.e., “I believe, even though I spoke”), similar to the confession of faith in Yahweh found at the beginning of the poem. What follows, as in the previous section, is the negative experience of affliction and a judgment that indicates that truth is found only in Yahweh. The cup of salvation (v. 13) is a festal cup of abundance (cf. 23:5) that the psalmist takes up as a libation ritual, which connects it to the fulfillment of vows (v. 14; e.g., Num. 15). The action is repeated once more in vv. 17–19 with the addition of the place where the offering will take place (i.e., in the courts of the Lord's house). The reference to being freed from bonds or chains, which is sandwiched between the two thanks offerings (v. 16), can be understood as a reference to the Exile. Taken within the context of the postexilic community, this section expresses the hope and confidence that the psalmist will one day be able to offer his sacrifices within the precincts of a rebuilt temple. Psalm 116 is quoted by Paul (v. 10 in 2 Cor. 4:13 and v. 11 in Rom. 3:4), both within the context of faith and human response, reflecting the spirit of thanksgiving.

117:1–2

Praise the Lord

The shortest of the psalms finds itself in close proximity to the longest (Ps. 119) and is framed by a hymnic invitation to praise. It is universal in character and links to Psalm 115:1–2, inviting the nations to participate in worship to Yahweh. It forms the center of the triad of psalms (116–118) emphasizing human praises before the Lord.

117:1. Praise the Lord. The beginning and end of the psalm is an imperative directed at the nations/Gentiles and all people to praise God. With the return of Israel and the reconstruction of the temple that is envisaged in the previous psalms, Jerusalem becomes the center of universal praise. The nations that subjugated God's people in the past (106:41), who have mocked a defenseless Israel (115:2) and who have been the subject of divine judgment (110:6), are now invited to join God's people in praises.

117:2. Because God Is Good. Verse 2 provides the rationale for praises and thus constitutes the principal theme of the hymn. Exodus 34:6 is invoked once more through the mention of khesed ("faithful love," "kindness," "mercy") and 'emet ("faithfulness," "truth") as eternal characteristics of Yahweh. Although most translations render the verb gabar in the present tense ("is great"), the Hebrew perfect tense here could also be translated as "was great" or "was mighty," in which case this could be a reference to the completed first and second exodus, from Egypt and Babylonia respectively. The psalm concludes with the second and final Hallelujah ("praise the LORD").

118:1–29

Entrance into the Temple

As the last psalm of the Passover Hallel, Psalm 118 is a thanksgiving psalm that takes its audience to the gates by means of a liturgical procession, which is reflected in the twofold division of the poem (vv. 1–18, 19–29). Verses 1–4 and 29 create an inclusio around this procession with the repeated phrase, "His khesed ("mercy," "lovingkindness," "faithful love") endures forever." The psalm has been associated with the temple dedication after the Exile, recorded in Ezra 6, or with the first celebration of the Festival of Tabernacles described in Nehemiah 8–9. Psalm 118 also contains a number of quotations from Exodus 15 (e.g., vv. 14, 16 // Ex. 15:2), applying the Song of the Sea to the return from the Babylonian exile.

118:1–18. Rescue from Exile. The exhortation to give thanks to the Lord is motivated by His goodness and the fourfold repeated formula; His khesed ("mercy," "lovingkindness," "faithful love") endures forever (vv. 1–4) is echoed once more in v. 29. Three groups are invited to praise (i.e., Israel, the house of Aaron, and those who fear the Lord). The last group opens up a universal dimension to the psalm, a feature that also characterizes the previous psalm. Verses 5–18 describe a crisis and the rescue Yahweh provided, using the experience of an individual who recounts the various threats he faced and the divine interventions that occurred. The literary connections to Exodus 15 in vv. 14–19 (see above) call on Yahweh's rescue during the Exodus from Egypt, but also contextualize it to the second exodus by mentioning a seeming paradox—the Lord has yasar ("chastened," "disciplined") him severely but has not given him over to death (v. 18).

118:19–29. Festival in the Temple. The ritual of the gatekeepers at the temple doors (vv. 19–21) has already appeared in Psalms 15 and 24. As access is provided to the righteous (v. 20), the postexilic community marvels at the rebuilt temple, looking at its stonework and masonry. The imagery of the selection of appropriate stones for building lies behind the proverbial statement in v. 22: the stone rejected by the builders has become the cornerstone. The reuse of stones from the temple ruins for rebuilding after the Exile is a familiar sight in archaeological excavations. Theologically, it signifies Israel's re-election and takes on messianic dimensions through repeated quotations and allusions in the NT (Matt. 21:24; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17; Acts 4:11; Eph. 2:20; 1 Pet. 2:6–7). Rejoicing and blessing accompany the festive procession as it enters into the house of the Lord (v. 26). In v. 27 the altar comes into focus. The Hebrew term khag has been translated here as a festival (its usual meaning) or a festival sacrifice (see Ex. 23:18). Thus, this verse refers either to the binding of the sacrifice to the horns of the altar or joining of the festival procession with branches (Heb. 'abot) waving. The twofold monotheistic confession ("You are my God") cites once more from the Song of the Sea (v. 28; Ex. 15:2), leading into the final invitation to "give thanks to the LORD" in v. 29, which is identical to v. 1 and closes the frame. While some people cried when they saw the second temple (cf. Ezra 3:12), it was this temple that greeted the Messiah.

119:1–176

The Great Torah Psalm

This is the greatest (and longest) of the four torah psalms (Pss. 1, 19, 111, and 119), presented as an intricate acrostic structure that divides the poem into twenty-two strophes of eight lines each. Each strophe, and each verse in it, begins with the subsequent letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The central theme of the psalm is torah, although no single commandment from the law of Moses is quoted. It is rather a constant recital of the relationship between the "I" of the psalm and God's torah. Thus, it serves as a personal meditation on torah, which has a much broader scope in biblical thought than just the Ten Commandments given at Mount Sinai. It represents a life in close relationship with God, and therefore meditation on torah is always a contemplation of its Giver. Torah is thus the complete revelation of His will, and Psalm 119 seeks a deeper understanding of it (cf. v. 18).

The psalm's location in the Psalms and its composition in eight verses for each strophe could point to its use during the Festival of Tabernacles that was celebrated for eight days at the inauguration of the temple under Solomon (cf. 1 Kin. 8:2) and again under Nehemiah following the Exile (cf. Neh. 8). Torah is thus the foundation of the first and second temple periods, and the reading of this poem serves as a charter for public governance and personal piety. Psalm 119 is framed in similar fashion as the whole Psalms:

a beatitude begins the psalm (strophes 1 and 2; cf. Ps. 1), and it ends with an extended praise (strophes 21 and 22; cf. Pss. 146–150). There is a center (strophes 11–12), which elaborates on the power of torah.

119:1–8. Aleph. Blessings are designated for those (plural, not singular as in the beatitude of Psalm 1) who are tamim ("complete," "sound") in their ways; they have a life in harmony with torah (cf. Ps. 25:10; Prov. 11:20). Verses 5–8 respond to the beatitude with the individual's desire to be steadfast in following God's instructions (v. 5).

119:9–16. Beth. In typical wisdom style, the section begins with a question that refers back to the theme of the Aleph section (v. 9)—how can young people keep their ways pure? The answer provides a comprehensive list of synonymous expressions which focus on torah: word, commands, huqqim ("decrees," "statutes"), mishpatim ("judgments," "ordinances," "laws"), 'edot ("statutes," "testimonies") precepts, and ways (vv. 9–15). Throughout Psalm 119, the psalmist varies these expressions in order to demonstrate the meaning of torah as well as to avoid monotony. While torah needs to be internalized in the heart (v. 11), it also must be expressed outwardly and audibly through the lips (v. 13).

119:17–24. Gimel. The focus moves beyond the psalmist to external threats that may interfere in the relationship between torah and the individual. When the psalmist says that he is a stranger on the earth (v. 19), a phrase drawing on patriarchal imagery, he probably refers to the situation of the returning exiles who were surrounded by Samaritans and Edomites (cf. Neh. 2) and estranged in their own country. Within this context of personal insecurity, the psalmist, in contrast, meditates on God's huqqim ("decrees," "statutes"; v. 23).

119:25–32. Daleth. The negative situation intensifies in this section, and the psalmist finds himself in a deathlike situation as he is in the dust (v. 25; cf. 22:15). The Hebrew word used here, dabaq ("to cling"; i.e., he is "clinging to the dust"), is also used at the end of the section, where he is clinging instead to God's 'edot ("statutes," "testimonies"; v. 31) and is totally persuaded that Yahweh will (literally in the Hebrew) make his heart larger (v. 32). This metaphor could refer to God's giving him freedom from death, or it could mean that God broadened the psalmist's understanding (leb can refer to the mind), and this metaphor has been translated accordingly by some scholars.

119:33–40. He. All eight verses in this section begin with an imperative directed at Yahweh, and the first request—to be taught—is complemented by the last, to khayah (“preserve,” “revive”) him. Instruction in torah leads to a renewed life.

119:41–48. Waw. The psalmist is longing for God’s khesed (“mercy,” “kindness,” “faithful love”) and salvation, which come through torah. The twofold profession of love for the law (vv. 47–48) is accompanied by the psalmist lifting his hands (nasa’ kap) toward God’s commandments. This has been interpreted (and translated) as either a gesture of homage or an expression of desire—he is reaching out for God’s precepts as he meditates on torah, audibly recites it, and contemplates it (v. 48; cf. 1:2).

119:49–56. Zayin. The strophe is arranged around the verb zakar (“to remember”), which occurs three times in this section (vv. 49, 52, 55) and only here in Psalm 119. The psalmist prays for God’s remembrance (i.e., His concern; cf. Gen. 8:1 and commentary), but the psalmist also remembers both God’s mishpat (“judgments,” “laws,” “ordinances”; v. 52) and His name and appeals to them for deliverance from the wicked (v. 53).

119:57–64. Heth. There is a subtle appeal to Yahweh in the usage of the noun khelqi (“my portion”) at the beginning of this section. It connects to the land distribution at the beginning of the conquest (cf. Josh. 14:5) but is also applicable to the repossession of Israel following the Exile. The Exile is indirectly mentioned as being bound with the cords or ropes of the wicked (v. 61).

119:65–72. Teth. The first and last lines of the section begin with tob (“good”), thus creating a frame that communicates the main theme of the passage, namely, the goodness of God. This theme permeates the remainder of the section (cf. vv. 66, 68, 71) and goes hand in hand with the psalmist’s request for God to teach him (vv. 66, 68) so that he would learn (v. 71).

119:73–80. Yod. God as Creator introduces the section (v. 73) and forms the rationale for the psalmist’s petition for Yahweh’s rakham (“compassions,” “tender mercies”; v. 77). This request connects to the deliverance from the proud, who should be ashamed (v. 78). The psalmist wants to completely follow God’s statutes and decrees so that he would not be shamed (v. 80).

119:81–88. Kaph. The central two strophes of the psalm are juxtaposed to each other and begin with distress that is counteracted through torah as Yahweh’s saving power. At the beginning of the Kaph section, the psalmist’s soul faints (v. 81) and he asks God to khayah (“preserve,” “revive”) him. The intensity of the distress is underlined by reuse of the root radap (“to persecute”; v. 86), the imagery of a dried wineskin (v. 83) that can no longer hold liquids, and the pits (v. 85) dug by enemies.

119:89–96. Lamed. The cry for help that ended the previous section is answered at the beginning of this section with the assurance of God’s faithfulness that endures through all generations (v. 89). Central to the passage is the idea that torah gives life (v. 93), probably referring to the role of the sacrificial system in the law. In v. 96, the psalmist says that he has seen the qets (“end”) of all tiklah (“perfection”). This has been understood as “consummation of perfection” in the greatness of the law or as the “limit of all perfection,” referring to human limitations over the rekhabah mitswateka me’od (“exceedingly broad,” “boundless,” “unlimited”) nature of God’s commandments (v. 96).

119:97–104. Mem. The tone of the psalm becomes more positive as it focuses on the psalmist’s love for torah, which is the appropriate response of humankind to God (cf. Deut. 6:5; Rom. 13:10). The simile of honey (v. 103) is reflective of another torah psalm (cf. 19:10). The love for torah produces wisdom, understanding (v. 104), and a life in harmony with Yahweh.

119:105–112. Nun. The section begins with the most widely used line from Psalm 119, which likens torah to a light that illuminates the believer’s path, a familiar metaphor in the wisdom literature (cf. Prov. 6:23). OT lamps were made of clay, filled with oil, and carried through the darkness as a source of light to illuminate the path ahead. Torah is a light that provides safe passage in the midst of darkness.

119:113–120. Samek. The Samek and Ayin sections are linked chastically; the Samek section begins by contrasting hate and love (v. 113), whereas the Ayin section concludes with the reversed contrast love–hate (vv. 127–128). Strong emotions toward God and torah generate equally strong opposite emotions against the double-minded (v. 113), namely, people that reject God’s Law.

119:121–128. Ayin. The psalmist realizes that the abhorrence of evildoers does not exempt him from a sinful attitude in his own heart. Consequently, this section deals with an internalization of torah with the accompanying request that God will give him understanding and discernment for the purpose of knowing His ‘edot’ (“testimonies,” “statutes”). Categorically, the psalmist ends the section by expressing hatred for every deceptive path.

119:129–136. Pe. From a positive metaphor of a cave entrance that illuminates the darkness (v. 130), the psalm moves once more to a petition asking God for redemption from oppression (v. 134). The psalmist experiences pain and sorrow because people do not follow God’s law (v. 136).

119:137–144. Tsade. The keyword in this section is the root tsedeq (“to be righteous,” “righteousness”) occurring five times in various forms in the Hebrew text (vv. 137, 138, 142 [2x], 144) and always associated with Yahweh. In contrast, the psalmist is insignificant and despised (v. 141), and he can live only through an understanding of torah (v. 144).

119:145–152. Qoph. The section takes the form of a repeated cry for help with an interesting contrast between near and far. While the wicked draw near, they are far from God’s law (v. 150). However, Yahweh is near through His commandments (v. 151).

119:153–160. Resh. The verbal sequence ra’ah (“see/look,” “consider”) and khayah (“preserve,” “revive”) frames this section (vv. 153–154, 159), indicating God’s response to the cry of the previous section. When God sees, as in the Exodus story (cf. Ex. 3:7–8), He acts and revitalizes.

119:161–168. Sin/Shin. Following a final negative allusion to persecution at the beginning of the section, the psalm now turns to a final praise of torah in its last two strophes, including a double expression of love for it (vv. 163, 167).

The statement about praising God “seven times a day” (v. 164) emphasizes the completeness or fullness of praises.

119:169–176. Taw. The final lines of the psalm once more intonate praises (vv. 171–172) and end with a number of requests. The last appeal (v. 176) uses the familiar metaphor of a shepherd and affirms that the psalmist does not forget God’s commandments. The psalm describes a type of personal piety that is grounded on the divine torah and framed by love toward God. This is truly the good and happy life.

120:1–7 War and Peace

The contrast between “war” and “peace” characterizes this psalm and expresses the psalmist’s petition to be delivered from “distress,” identified as living side by side with those who hate peace (v. 6).

120:1–2. Call and Petition. The song is introduced by a call to God for help in distress, followed by a statement of trust: God heard and answered the prayer (cf. 81:8; 99:6–8). God’s hearing is His acting as well. Consequently, the psalmist clarifies his petition, asking God to act and deliver him from people who speak deceitfully (v. 2).

120:3–4. Retribution. The next lines turn to the consequences that those who speak dishonestly will experience (vv. 3–4). Since the words from a false tongue can serve as arrows and weapons (cf. 57:4; 64:3), they will receive sharp arrows and burning coals. This evokes the imagery of Yahweh as a Warrior. The “broom” is a desert bush still used by Bedouins today to make charcoal. The roots burn for a long time and can be used as fiery arrows to set houses and tents ablaze in warfare.

120:5–7. Protection among Enemies. The negative mention of Meshech and Kedar could refer symbolically to threats that surround the psalmist. Meshech has been identified as a warrior people in Asia Minor (cf. Ezek. 32:26) and Kedar as a reference to Bedouin tribes in the Arabian desert (cf. Ezek. 27:21). One can understand these topographic names as referring to the extreme north and east directions and thus as a metaphorical or proverbial allusion to life-threatening forces from the far ends of the world. The final line of the psalm reaches a climax by contrasting the desire of the psalmist for shalom (“peace”) with his current situation in the midst of war. The persistent threat is resolved only in the following psalm. David’s desire for the peace of long ago is a good starting point for the postexilic pilgrims as they make their way to Jerusalem, once more surrounded by enemies from every side.

121:1–8

I Lift Up My Eyes

This beautiful poem about Yahweh’s protection on the journey to Jerusalem begins with an introductory question, which is answered throughout the remainder of the psalm. The psalm is a liturgical dialogue between the pilgrim (or David in its original setting) and the congregation or officiating priest at the temple. There is a small variation in its title with the addition of a preposition that could literally be translated as “a song for ascents” (shir lamma’alot) instead of “a song of ascents” (shir hamma’alot), although it is grammatically ambiguous. Some have suggested that it marks the beginning of pilgrimage as this psalm is the only one in the group with the variation.

121:1–2. Help from the Lord. As the pilgrims set out on their journey, they lift their eyes to the hills/mountains. The “hills/mountains” should not be understood metaphorically (for danger) in this case but are used positively to denote the protective function of Mount Zion and reflect the actual topography of Israel (cf. 133:3). The ensuing question concerning the source of the psalmist’s help is used rhetorically to set up the answer in v. 2. The last word of the line is repeated as the first word of the next line, here ‘ezri (“my help”). Yahweh helps from His abode in Mount Zion, and He is further identified as the One who made heaven and earth. The same formula concludes the Song of Ascents in Psalm 134:3, indicating that God’s continuous creative power sustains Israel (cf. also 124:8).

121:3–8. Confirmation of Help. In response to the initial question and answer, the remainder of the psalm describes Yahweh’s protection with verbal links to the Aaronic blessing (Num. 4:24–26). Yahweh protects Israel and neither slumbers nor sleeps, in contrast to other gods of the ANE who claim the right for undisturbed sleep. Verses 5–6 change the metaphor of protection to Yahweh providing shade at the right hand (i.e., right next to the individual or king), and His shade continues day and night. The mention of the Lord’s power over the sun and moon can be understood as a further polemic reference to the deities of the surrounding nations. As a second motif from Aaron’s blessing, the psalm concludes with a more concrete description of God as He will shamar (“preserve,” “keep”; see Num. 6:24). The formulaic ending of the psalm from ‘attah to ‘olam (“from now till forever”) is also found in Psalms 125:2 and 131:3. It expresses the forward and upward movement of the Pilgrim psalms, thus initiating the journey to Jerusalem.

122:1–9

Prayer for Jerusalem

The poem is accentuated by keywords creating sound pictures, which transmit the main focus

Pilgrim Psalms

The Pilgrim psalms (120–134) constitute an important subgroup sharing the title shir hamma’alot, translated as “song of stairs” (referring to the steps leading up to a city, temple, or altar; cf. Ex. 20:26; Neh. 3:15; Ezek. 40:20, 26) or “song of ascents” (referring to the return from exile or pilgrimage to Jerusalem for the annual festivals; cf. resp. 1 Kin. 12:28; 2 Chr. 36:23). Metaphorically, they are also characterized by an upward movement, describing Israel’s elevation from degradation to new spiritual heights after the Exile.

Some of the songs are further associated with Davidic authorship (122, 124, 131, 133), but their grouping together and location in the psalms demonstrate their application to the historical situation following the Babylonian exile. Their short length and liturgical character made them suitable to be sung at the temple, and it has been suggested that their number of fifteen corresponds to the number of words in the Aaronic blessing (Num. 6:24–26). The keywords of the blessing (“peace,” “bless,” “gracious,” and “keep”) are frequently found throughout the collection.

of the psalm. The recurring and similarly sounding terms “Jerusalem” (yerushalaim 3x; vv. 2, 3, 6) and “peace” (shalom 3x; vv. 6, 7, 8) come together in v. 6 as the climax of the poem—“pray for the peace of Jerusalem.” The psalm is ascribed to David and continues the ascent toward Jerusalem to the annual festival.

122:1–4. Ascent and Expectation. The psalm begins and ends with mention of the house of the Lord (vv. 1 and 9), a structure which communicates the function of the temple as a conceptual frame for Jerusalem’s peace. This term (“house of the LORD”) is echoed by the reference to the house of David in the center of the psalm (v. 5). The verbal forms of the first section are indicative, describing the ascent of the pilgrims as they approach Jerusalem. They also portray the city with its gates (v. 2) and other features that provide security, such as its being built compactly (v. 3). It is a place where the tribes of the Lord (v. 4) come together once more, a situation which is reminiscent of the early origins of Israel. The purpose of the pilgrimage is to give thanks and praise the name of the Lord for all His wondrous saving deeds (v. 4; cf. 106:1; 136:1–3).

122:5. Judgment Scene. The preposition ki (“for”) introduces v. 5 as the center and relates it to the preceding lines. A judgment scene is described that is allusive to Daniel 7:9–10 and 13–14. It is set in the house of David, and the connection with the “house of the LORD” in v. 9 establishes a connection between sacred and governance. Israel’s reign needs to be framed by Yahweh’s reign. The fact that the Hebrew word for temple (hekal) is one of the words also used for palace is another detail which implies the overlapping of the religious and secular spheres. The Day of Atonement provides a feasible historical backdrop for the occasion of the psalm.

122:6–9. Prayer of the Changed. The ascent to Jerusalem for the festivals is not a mere ritual requirement, but it effectuates changes in the pilgrims who attend. Thus, the verbal forms of the final section of the psalm change to volitional ones, a prayer that expresses the desires of the pilgrims, who enjoy the life-changing effects of the Day of Atonement. It is a prayer for shalom (“peace,” “wholeness”) within the walls and shalwah (“quietness,” “rest,” “security”) within the palaces of Jerusalem (vv. 6–7). This prayer includes the concept of shalom, which is an all-encompassing concept of well-being that includes physical, emotional, and spiritual aspects. Jerusalem thus becomes the eternal city of peace, and the prayer echoes the wish of the postexilic community.

At His triumphal entry into Jerusalem, Christ alluded to the LXX of Psalm 122:8 (Luke 19:42). The text in Luke 19 reflects the progression of this Song of Ascents in a dramatic way. As in the times of Psalm 122, Jesus and His disciples approached Jerusalem as pilgrims, but this time Jesus wept over Jerusalem with the realization that the time of peace for Jerusalem was coming to an end (Luke 19:35–42). This is followed by a judgment scene (Luke 19:43–44), which is acted out in the ensuing cleansing of the temple (Luke 19:45–46). Then there is shalom when Jesus taught (Luke 19:47) and healed (cf. Matt. 21:12–14). The peace of Jerusalem begins with those who pray for it.

123:1–4

From the Mountain to the Master

As the psalmist looked up to the mountains in Psalm 121 and to Mount Zion in Psalm 122, the poet in Psalm 123 looks up to God as the Master (v. 2). This expresses once more the upward movement of the Pilgrim psalms. The “proud” (v. 4) could indicate the resistance manifested by the enemies of the exiles when they returned from Babylon to Jerusalem.

123:1–2. Looking Up to Yahweh. The hopeful look of servants/slaves up to their masters and a maid/female slave to her mistress is used as a metaphor for the relationship between Israel and God. While clarifying the sovereignty of God on one hand, it also expresses Israel’s expectation on the other. There is a chiasmic arrangement in vv. 1–2, beginning and ending with the expectant look at God (vv. 1b–c and 2c–d), which frames the inclusive metaphor of the male and female servants (vv. 2a–b). The hand of the master is the location from which blessings or favors are to be expected (cf. 145:15).

123:3–4. Petition for Mercy. The hopeful expectation of the first section is verbalized in vv. 3–4 through a twofold petition for mercy (v. 3). Among the reasons for the petition are contempt and scorn (vv. 3–4), things which occurred in Jerusalem during the rebuilding of the temple and city (cf. Neh. 2:19; 4:1, 4). We can look hopefully and expectantly to God in times of ridicule by lifting our eyes from our circumstances to the source of life.

124:1–8

True Help

A national calamity, which is not further identified, underlies this thanksgiving psalm. It is ascribed to David but can easily be contextualized to the situation of national threat following the Exile. This is also underlined by its liturgical tone.

124:1–5. Crisis. The national crisis is viewed in retrospect, preceded by Israel's liturgical repetition of a conditional clause. Verses 1–2 constitute the first part ("If...") and vv. 3–5 the second ("...then"). The contingent description ("if") of the situation, wherein the Lord was not on their side, implies that Yahweh has been faithful showing Himself as a God who delivers. The language points back not only to the Exodus (cf. Ex. 3:14) but also to the postexilic experience of Nehemiah (cf. Neh. 4:20). Verses 3–5 use water imagery to express the overwhelming threat of attack (cf. Ps. 42:7). The waters are likened to floods that would have overwhelmed them (i.e., threatened their lives).

124:6–8. Rescue. This section begins with the formula familiar from previous psalms, the verb barak ("bless," "praise") applied to Yahweh as "Praise/bless the LORD." This is always connected to Yahweh's marvelous deeds of deliverance (cf. 28:6; 31:21; 72:18; 144:1). It is followed by a metaphor of wild animals with sharp teeth (v. 6), introduced already in v. 3 but developed further in v. 6 and then modified once more in v. 7, where there is a switch to the metaphor of a hunter who traps prey. This overlapping of metaphors creates a fast-paced imagery, which effectively dramatizes Yahweh's rescue of Israel. Verse 8 concludes with an expression of trust that refers to the name of the Lord and His role as sovereign Creator, emphasized in the Pilgrim psalms (cf. Pss. 121:2; 134:3). The psalm's imagery foreshadows Paul's confident statement in Romans 8:31, "If God is for us, who can be against us?"

125:1–5

Mount Zion

Once again, mountain imagery and upward movement are used (cf. Pss. 121–123) to describe "those who trust in the LORD" as immovable like "Mount Zion" and its surrounding mountains.

The negative threats of the preceding psalms give way to a sense of security based on the reestablishment of Israel in Jerusalem by Yahweh. It climaxes in the final blessing, which invokes peace for Israel (v. 5). The subgroup of Psalms 125–129 within the Pilgrim psalms is marked by an inclusio (e.g., wicked scepter in 125:3; parallels of the cords of the wicked in 129:4) and a center (Pss. 126–128), which describes the daily life of a returned and redeemed Israel.

125:1–3. Mountains and Freedom. Two related but slightly varied similes introduce the psalm. The first one is Mount Zion, which points to the immovability of God's people (v. 1), and the second finds Yahweh protectively surrounding Israel as the mountains surround Jerusalem (v. 2). The center of the psalm introduces Israel's newfound freedom from the wicked scepter—a powerful metonymy for unjust foreign rule. Here it serves as an admonition to discourage the righteous from reaching with their hands to act wickedly. This freedom charter encompasses the allotted land, a term which references the time of the conquest (e.g., Josh. 14:2). This allusion serves to portray the return from exile as the second exodus.

125:4–5. A New Rule. God's new order of righteousness will create a contrast between those who are upright in their hearts and those who turn aside and follow their own crooked ways. For this last group there is no room in the land; the Lord will lead them away and banish them as He led Israel into captivity. The righteous will receive their allotment, as in the times of Joshua (cf. Deut. 30:5). The psalm ends with the blessing of shalom over Israel, which is further developed in a practical way throughout the following psalms.

126:1–6

Return to Zion

Psalm 126 celebrates Israel's return from Babylonia and recalls the "great things" (vv. 2–3) Yahweh has accomplished on behalf of Israel, which ultimately signify God's return to His people. The practical effects of freedom in daily life are recounted using agricultural imagery. The poem is a jubilant song that celebrates the reversal of fortunes for Israel at the end of the Exile.

126:1–3. Return. God brought Israel back from exile, and at the same time He again returned to Zion. The verbal form of shub used here and the reading of “again” (shibah, “turning,” “return”) instead of “captivity” (shebi “war captivity”) make it possible to render v. 1a alternatively as “When Yahweh returned again to Zion.” Another possible reading found in some translations is to view shibat as a variant of shebut (both from shub), which can mean either “fortunes” or “captivity.” Thus, God has “restored the fortunes” or “the captivity” of Zion, a reading which would imply that God was restoring their land and possessions. Israel’s return from Babylon implied a return of Yahweh to His city. The dreamlike character of this experience refers not necessarily to its lack of reality but to a wondrous realization that they were once more favored by Yahweh like those who receive dreams in divine revelation; that is, God once more was in communication with His people (cf. Gen. 41:15; Jer. 23:25). The result is laughter and singing as the nations recognize that the Lord had done great things for them. This is confirmed by Israel as they affirm that indeed the Lord had done great things for them (vv. 2-3). These were the same nations that mocked Israel when Jerusalem was destroyed, asking, “Where is their God?” (79:10).

126:4-6. Joy after Sorrow. The second section echoes the beginning of the first and, in line with the observations in v. 1a, could be rendered, “Return to us again, O LORD” or alternatively (as noted above) as a plea to “restore our fortunes” or “bring back our captivity.” This returning is as the streams in the South or “Negev.” The reference is to the riverbeds of the Negev that dry up during the summer but return in winter filled by the rains. This reversal of fortunes is further expressed in vv. 5-6, which picture the dramatic change from tears to joy through agricultural imagery familiar to its audience and often recited in the prophetic literature (cf. Jer. 31:23-25; Amos 9:13-15; Hag. 2:19). The psalm is about the reunion of God and His people in Zion and the deep joy that will accompany that experience. We also anticipate this most glorious moment at the return of the Lord.

127:1-5 God’s Gift

The practical blessings of a restored Israel move from agriculture in the previous psalms to the building of houses and the blessings of children in the present poem. In Hebrew thinking the term “house” (bayit) denotes both a physical structure and a family unit (cf. 2 Sam. 7:5, 11-12). The association of the psalm with Solomon reminds us of his building projects, which provided important foundation stones for the postexilic community. Furthermore, there are also important links between Psalm 127 and the book of Proverbs (cf. Prov. 5:10; 10:22; 14:1).

127:1-2. Building Houses. The psalm begins with the twofold emphatic statement that all human activity is in vain unless God is the author and partakes in it. This thought is applied not only to the building of houses but to the guarding of cities (v. 1) and the daily routine of work and sleep (v. 2). Work after the Fall is characterized by the bread of ‘etseb (“sorrow,” “toil”; cf. Gen. 3:17-19). This is stated as a reality and not so much as a critique (cf. the positive description of the fruits of labor in Ps. 128), especially in view of the last line of v. 2, which describes sleep as God’s blessing for a fulfilled life.

127:3-5. Building Families. A further important aspect of OT daily life is the family, which is dealt with in the second section of the psalm: children are a heritage from the Lord (v. 3). This is a further extension of God’s blessings (cf. Gen. 30:2; 1 Sam. 1:27). The heritage (or “portion”) is reminiscent of the language of the conquest (cf. Jos. 13). The following war imagery of a quiver full of children (vv. 4-5) denotes future social and political stability that depends on Yahweh. As a result, Israel is ready to confront their enemies, meet them on par in legal or economic disputes, and not be at a disadvantage (cf. Prov. 22:22). According to this psalm, a life permeated by God’s constant companionship is a truly fulfilled life. Its foundations are built on a strong family and a strong community.

128:1-6 The Fruit of Labor

This poem further develops the ideal of the Israelite family after the return from exile. It relates happiness to work, family, and society.

128:1-4. Beatitude. Psalm 128 begins with the same beatitude formula (‘ashre, “happy,” “blessed”) with which the previous psalm ended, continuing the theme of daily living and family blessing bestowed on those who fear the Lord and walk obediently in His ways. As a consequence, the reward will be happiness and prosperity—the fruit of what is worked for (v. 2). This represents a significant promise in the context of postexilic Israel under the Persian administration. The Persians implemented a system of taxation that left small farmers often unable to provide for themselves and their families. Further happiness comes through the relationship between husband and wife, who is likened to a fruitful vine (v. 3). They are visibly blessed by children who are like growing olive plants (v. 3). This is a more peaceful metaphor than the quiver in Psalm 127 and more in line with the agricultural imagery that permeates this psalm. Interestingly, the olive tree in Hebrew is masculine and the vine is feminine, thus describing the complementary relationship between husband and wife as the prerequisite for a blessed family. Verse 4 resumes the beatitude of v. 1 and concludes with the same thought.

128:5-6. Blessing. In vv. 5-6, a divine blessing comes from Zion, which once more connects the Pilgrim psalms to the Aaronic blessing (Num. 4:24-26). The blessing reaches out from Zion to Jerusalem, to one's life, and further to one's progeny. This is a truly fulfilled life that is an expression of the desire that there will be peace on Israel. This conclusion points back to Psalm 125:5 and once more illustrates how shalom for Israel is worked out in the daily life of its citizens.

129:1-8

Liberation from Exploitation

This poem continues to use imagery from the world of agriculture, though this time it is in a negative context. The metaphor of plowing (vv. 1-4) points to Israel's exploitation by their enemies while the metaphor of a frustrated harvest (vv. 5-8) serves as a petition for Yahweh to punish and withdraw His blessings from the enemies. The postexilic context brings to mind the socio-economic realities of the Persian Empire with a heavy taxation system that made life difficult for the common Israelite peasant. Another possible scenario is the experience of the Babylonian Exile, during which the farmers were not able to sustain themselves, in contrast to the previous psalm where the farmers were able to enjoy the results of their own labor (cf. 128:2). However, the psalm makes it clear that the negative experience is already in the past.

129:1-4. Plowing. The psalm is introduced in similar fashion to Psalm 124 by a liturgical double statement affirming the rab ("many," "great") hostilities suffered by Israel since its "youth." It is first introduced by the speaker/minister and then repeated by the congregation (vv. 1-2). Israel's "youth" is sometimes used as a reference to the time in Egypt (e.g., Hos. 2:17). However, the emphasis here is not on the beginning but rather on the duration of Israel's suffering, and the current situation is just another period of distress. The metaphor of plowing in vv. 3-4 presupposes that Israel is under a yoke, the preferred metaphor for bondage in the OT (cf. Deut. 28:48; Is. 9:4), and the image is cruelly intensified as Israel's back is plowed (v. 3; cf. Is. 51:23). This refers to Israel being exploited to the fullest by oppressors who make their furrows long by plowing to the edges of the field. God delivered Israel when He cut the cords of the wicked (v. 4; cf. Ps. 125:3). Yahweh has put an end to this suffering.

129:5-8. Harvest. Consequently, the psalmist shifts his focus by invoking God's wrath on those who hate Zion—he requests that they be shamed and turned back (v. 5). They are further likened to grass on the housetops, which withers quickly for lack of soil and is not even fit for harvest (vv. 6-7). The psalmist concludes with the observation that the traditional blessing usually given during the time of harvest (cf. Ruth 2:4) does not apply to the haters of Zion (v. 8). The paradox in the psalm is that those who exploit the poor to become wealthy will become poor because they lack the blessing of the Lord.

130:1-8

Out of the Depths

While Psalms 125-129 dealt with the daily life of the returned exiles, who are now in their own land, this last subgroup of the Pilgrim psalms (Pss. 130-134) portrays the restoration of the inner person after the Exile. It culminates in the blessings of righteousness and justice that proceed from Zion. Psalm 130 deals with the forgiveness of iniquity for the individual (vv. 1-6) and the community (vv. 7-8).

130:1-6. Forgive Me. Using water imagery ("out of the depths"; cf. 69:2), the psalmist implores Yahweh to let His ears be attentive to the sound of his cry for help (vv. 1-2). This is followed by an indirect acknowledgment of personal guilt by means of a rhetorical question—who could stand if God dealt with us according to our sinful records? (v. 3). The description of God as having ears is characteristic of the language of prayers in the psalms (cf. 17:6; 31:2; 71:2; etc.). It is also common throughout the ANE (e.g., some Egyptian steles show oversized ears to which the petitioner raises hands in prayer). Verse 4 resolves the tension with an affirmation of Yahweh's willingness to forgive. The psalmist has placed his hope in this forgiveness and watches for it with more intensity than the night watchmen who wait for the morning (vv. 5–6). The morning is the time for Yahweh to save (cf. Ex. 14:24; Ps. 46:5) and to judge (cf. Jer. 21:12; Zeph. 3:5). Through divine forgiveness the psalmist has moved from the depths of darkness (first Hebrew word in v. 1) to the brightness of the morning (last Hebrew word in this section, v. 6).

130:7–8. Forgive Israel. The speaker of the psalm now turns to the congregation and extends his hope to Israel, who can also trust in God's khesed ("mercy," "unfailing love," "redemption"; v. 7). This is the foundation of the relationship between Yahweh and Israel, and the psalmist emphatically affirms it: God will redeem the people of Israel from all their sins and iniquities (v. 8). When the angel appeared to Joseph for the naming of Mary's baby, he alluded to Psalm 130:8 and stated that He would save His people from their sins (Matt. 1:21). The saving relationship between Yahweh and Israel is personified in Jesus, who saves us from the depths of sin and will lead us to the morning of redemption.

131:1–3

Hope in the Lord

Although this short psalm is attributed to David, it is frequently interpreted as a woman's prayer based on v. 2. The wording itself does not give any clues as to the gender of the speaker (the first person in Hebrew is not gender specific). While it is conceivable that David used this tender imagery as much as a prophet might use female metaphors (e.g., Is. 1:2; 42:14; 45:10; 46:3; 49:15; 66:9), it is also possible to see him appropriating a mother's song and applying it to Israel.

131:1. Humility. The psalm begins with a series of four negative statements that contrasts the speaker's life of humility with the lives of the arrogant and proud (cf. Prov. 16:5). The heart stands for thinking and internal attitudes, while the eyes represent sight. The distancing from things too pala' ("wonderful," "profound") for him is not reluctance to think deeply but should be understood along the lines of Job 42:1–6, as an act of submission to God's knowledge versus human hubris.

131:2. Mother and Child. The metaphor of the "weaned child" builds on the calming influence of a mother toward her child (weaning usually took place at about three years of age in ancient Israel). The image here is not so much about separating the child from the mother as about fulfilling all the needs of the child and the resulting calm (i.e., God provides for all human needs; cf. 23:1).

131:3. Hope for Israel. Similar to the end of the previous psalm (cf. 130:7), hope moves from the individual to Israel. The focus is once again on hope. Within the context of this psalm, not only forgiveness is hoped for but also divine provision for all human needs without resorting to an arrogant and proud way of life. True humility is always based on forgiveness and the acknowledgment of God as the source of all human hope.

132:1–18

Remember David

From forgiveness to humility, the inward journey of this last group of Pilgrim psalms now moves to David as a role model for these qualities as manifested in his desire to build a temple for the Lord and bring the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem. As the longest of the Pilgrim psalms, it also has strong verbal links with the dedication of the temple of Solomon (2 Chr. 6:41–42, closely quoted in vv. 8–10). The emphasis has shifted toward David as the original initiator of the project to build the temple. It adds the inner attitude of commitment to God, based on the Davidic ideal, to the list of desired attitudes for a postexilic Israel.

132:1–10. David's Prayer. With an emphatic plea for the Lord to remember David, vv. 1–2 introduce David's prayer in the form of an oath directed to the Mighty One of Jacob. The reference is to Jacob's oath while fleeing Esau and seems to include a promise to build a sanctuary to Yahweh in Bethel (cf. Gen. 28:10–20). David's oath follows in vv. 3–5, and it emphasizes his humility before God (v. 3), as well as his determination and commitment for the building of the temple (vv. 4–5). Verses 6–10 retell the story of bringing the ark to Jerusalem, beginning with its return from the Philistines, which was announced in Ephrathah (the ancient name of Bethlehem), the home of David and birthplace of the Messiah (cf. Mic. 5:2). It was found in the fields of the woods (or “fields of Jaar”; v. 6), which is possibly a reference to Kirjath Jearim from where the ark was brought to Jerusalem. The psalm then describes the procession of priests and God’s khasidim (“the faithful ones,” “pious ones,” “saints”) as they rejoiced when the ark was brought to Jerusalem to the temple (v. 9; cf. v. 16). The section closes as it began, with a request for God to remember David and with an added future dimension—a reference to God’s Anointed (v. 10), a successor in the line (and spirit) of David and ultimately the Messiah.

132:11–18. Yahweh’s Response. In response to David’s oath, Yahweh Himself has sworn a true oath that there will always be a descendant on David’s throne if his children will keep God’s covenant (vv. 11–12) because the Lord has chosen Zion (vv. 13–14). God’s election of Jerusalem results in blessings on the poor, priests, and khasid (“kind,” “saints”; vv. 15–16; cf. v. 9). Thus, the temple is not only a place to which the people bring their offerings and gifts to the Lord but also a place from which He generously distributes His gifts to them (cf. 23:5–6).

The internal theme of the psalm is further enhanced as these gifts are identified as salvation and joy (v. 16). Verses 17–18 use two images, the horn as a metonymy of power (cf. 89:17) and David’s lamp (cf. 1 Kin. 11:36). The mention of God’s Anointed (v. 17) points again to a future perspective, just as it does in v. 10. In contrast, God will clothe the Anointed One’s enemies with shame, but His crown will flourish and shine radiantly (v. 18). The psalm uses Israel’s past as a motivation for the present and guarantee for its future. “We have nothing to fear for the future, except as we shall forget the way the Lord has led us, and his teaching in our past history” (3SM, 162).

133:1–3

Living Together

The practical outworking of Yahweh’s presence on Mount Zion in the life of Israel is expressed by the use of two similes (vv. 2–3). Living peacefully together as a community is linked to the imagery of Aaron’s anointing, once more invoking the Aaronic blessing (Num. 6:24–26), an important theme throughout the Pilgrim psalms.

Davidic authorship is mentioned in the title and following Psalm 132, which portrays David as the originator of the plan for the temple, this psalm associates David with the institution of the priesthood and festal liturgies.

133:1. Brothers in Harmony. The wisdom statement at the beginning of this short psalm introduces the theme of the poem—the blessings of living together in unity. The two adjectives tob (“good”) and na’im (“pleasant”) are used together to describe the life of the righteous (Job 36:11); they are also applied to God and His Name (Ps. 135:3). The term ’akhim (“brothers”) in this psalm is ambivalent and can refer to the community of Israel but may also refer to the old sibling quarrel between Jacob and Esau. The placement of the psalm in its present context suggests that dwelling together has to do with the postexilic community. Furthermore, if the verb yashab (“to dwell,” “live”) is understood as “to sit,” the scene is that of a festive gathering, a religious banquet along the lines of Psalm 23:5–6.

133:2. Like Oil. The anointing of Aaron and his sons included pouring aromatic oil on their heads, which would then drip on their garments (cf. Ex. 29; Lev. 8). The ritual inaugurated the temple service and provides a historical rationale for the gathering of the postexilic community. The repeated mention of Aaron’s beard (v. 2) focuses attention on the oil as it drips down and naturally flows onto the clothing of the priest, which includes the ephod and breastplate containing the names of the twelve tribes. Thus, the blessing extends once more onto Israel as a whole.

133:3. Like Dew. The imagery shifts now to the dew on Mount Hermon (v. 3), described as a substance that descends in order to illustrate that the blessings of the Lord are continuously flowing to His people. Geographically speaking, it is impossible for the dew from Mount Hermon in northern Israel to descend upon the mountains of Zion. The imagery is not attempting to describe things as they really are, but instead it depicts a theological topography. Hermon is the highest peak in Israel, closest to the heavenly realm than any other, while Mount Zion is the highest of all and the true spiritual dew flows from it (cf. Ps. 126). The concluding line of the psalm serves as a final blessing from Zion and seems to be an introduction to the Aaronic blessing in the next psalm (cf. 134:3).

The blessing is given directly by Yahweh to the people: life forevermore (v. 3). As a Christian community under God's blessings, life can be characterized only by harmony. Where it is lacking reveals a need to reorient ourselves to the Giver of these blessings.

134:1–3

Night Service

The final poem of the Pilgrim psalms is a farewell psalm that is set against the background of a night liturgy at the temple. This ceremony could have been the culmination of the festal activities on which the Pilgrim psalms were focused. Verse 3 begins with the exact words of the Aaronic blessing in Numbers 6:24 (yebarekeka yahweh; "May the LORD bless you").

134:1–2. Praise God. The congregation is exhorted to bless/praise the Lord. The "servants of the LORD" can refer to the whole nation (cf. 113:1; 135:1). Considering the qualifying subclause, which describes those who are serving in the house of the Lord at night, the term may point to the priests and temple singers officiating during the night service at the conclusion of one of the annual festivals (cf. 1 Chr. 9:27–33). The praise is expressed by a gesture of adoration as they are invited to lift up their hands in the sanctuary, a movement which expresses the upward direction of the Pilgrim psalms. The end of the section includes a repetition of the first phrase (bless/praise the Lord). Blessing/praising God is an act of worship and an acknowledgment of His sovereignty (cf. Ps. 63:4).

134:3. Blessing. There is now a change of direction within the psalm. The blessings of the people have gone up to Yahweh, and now He gives His blessing to them in the form of the first line of the Aaronic blessing. He who blesses them is the One who made heaven and earth. The Creator blesses them from Zion. This identifies the specific locale from which He will bless and reestablish His people after the exile.

135:1–21

Praise and History

Psalms 135 and 136 constitute another set of twin psalms (cf. Pss. 56 and 57; 111 and 112), both of which review the history of Israel and Yahweh's divine kingship. It has been suggested that both psalms constitute the Great Hallel (in contrast to only Ps. 136 as the Great Hallel), one of the three Hallel in Book 5 (Pss. 113–118 as Passover Hallel and Pss. 146–150 as Final Hallel). The Hallelujah ("Praise the LORD") frame of this psalm and similar content of the two psalms seem to further support this suggestion.

135:1–4. Invitation to Praise. The psalm begins and ends with a Hallelujah shout of "Praise the LORD!" (cf. the Passover Hallel; Pss. 113–118). The "servants of the LORD" who stand ministering in the house of the Lord refer back to the previous psalm and not only to the priests and Levites who are lifting up their praise. The corresponding section at the end of the psalm demonstrates that all of Israel is included (vv. 19–20). The word pair "good" and "pleasant" (v. 3) as descriptions for Yahweh recurs in 133:1, while the term tob ("good") may also connect the psalm to the beginning line of Book 5 (107:1). It employs the concept of God's goodness as an important theological pillar for the postexilic community. A further rationale for praise is God's election of Israel (v. 4).

135:5–18. God in History. The section is introduced by an emphatic ki ("indeed," "yes," "for"). Verses 5–7 emphasize God's sovereign uniqueness among all gods and His omnipotence within the universe as Creator. The review of God's deeds in history begins in v. 8 with the plagues of Egypt (cf. 78:44–64; 105:26–36) and continues to the beginning of the conquest (Ps. 135 stops at approximately the same place), and He is portrayed as King and Judge (vv. 12–14). In concentric parallelism, vv. 15–18 correspond to vv. 5–7, taking up the theme of the idols. The emphasis here is not so much on God's omnipotence as on the impotence of idols. God was described as Creator in vv. 6–7, while the idols of the ANE have no creative power (there is no breath in their mouths; v. 17), a fact that epitomizes the life-creating capabilities of Yahweh (cf. 115:4–8). The final observation—that those who make them are like them—shows that humans emulate what they worship; therefore, the idol worshiper becomes like a lifeless replica of the idol (cf. Jer. 51:17).

135:19–21. Exhortation. In contrast to this lifeless imagery, the final exhortation of the psalm invites various representative groups of people—Israel as a nation with its priests (Aaron) and other temple officials (Levi)—to bless/praise the Lord. All who fear the Lord are invited to bless/praise Him from Zion, His dwelling place. The old truth that we will become like what we worship is still relevant for God's children today.

136:1–26

His Mercy Endures Forever

The second account of Israel's history in the Great Hallel is liturgically composed with an antiphonal refrain line that concludes each of its twenty-six verses: His khesed ("mercy," "love," "lovingkindness") "endures forever." Between the introduction (vv. 1–3) and conclusion (v. 26) are twenty-two verses, which is similar to the acrostic structure, although it is not alphabetic. In terms of its threefold structure and content there is a close correspondence to its twin psalm, taking up the themes of Creation, Exodus, and conquest, as well as a final universal note. The refrain makes it clear that Yahweh's khesed is the sustaining principle that underlies both history and the present.

136:1–3. Introduction. A threefold summons to give thanks to the Lord introduces the psalm using His goodness as the rationale. This is followed by an allusion to His sovereignty (He is the "God of gods") as well as His divine kingship ("Lord of lords").

136:4–25. God in History. As in the previous psalm, the section begins with a description of Yahweh as Creator (vv. 4–9), although the references to Genesis 1–2 are more explicit and direct. For example, God creates the heavens, earth, and waters (vv. 5–7) and then He fills them with content (great lights, sun, moon and stars; vv. 7–9). The Exodus with its plagues (vv. 10–16) and the conquest with the subjugation of the Canaanite kings (vv. 17–22) serve as the historical highlights of Yahweh's wondrous deeds. These are applied to Israel's situation in vv. 23–24 and commemorate their return from Exile—Yahweh has rescued them from their enemies (v. 24). A final reference to God's provision of food for all His creatures (lit. "all flesh") expands the scope of His work beyond Israel and serves as a conclusion for this section (v. 25).

136:26. Exhortation. The final exhortation repeats the first line of the psalm. God's mercy and love, which continuously echo through this psalm in its antiphonal liturgical setting, still serve as the guiding principle of our lives today.

137:1–9

By the Rivers of Babylon

While the historical context of the psalm is clearly the Babylonian Exile, the text does not clarify if it was written from an exilic or post-exilic perspective. When we take into consideration the position of the poem within Book 5, the second option seems more plausible; the exile is mentioned as a traumatic memory. Psalm 137 is a transitional psalm between the historical twin Psalms 135–136 and the group of Davidic psalms (Pss. 138–145), which appropriate themes from the monarchy and adapt them to a postexilic setting. Thus, the poem transfers Yahweh's historical deeds from the Exodus and conquest (Pss. 135–136) to the return from the Babylonian Exile.

137:1–6. Babylonian Memories. The psalm commences with a description of Babylonian topography: rivers of Babylon (v. 1), willows/poplars (v. 2), and foreign land (v. 4). The Euphrates poplar would qualify for this description, and Ezekiel 3:15 refers to a Jewish community living by the Chebar River. It is possible that Jewish captives were settled along these waterways to work in the waterworks or mud brick production of the Babylonian empire. The hanging of kinmor ("harps," "lyres") in the trees was in resistance to the taunting question of the captors who required them to sing a song of Zion, indicating that there was no more reason for praise (cf. the connection between harp and praise in e.g., Ps. 92:3; 98:5; 150:3). The rhetorical question in v. 4 about singing songs of the Lord in a foreign land is retrospective and could be translated as, "How could we have sung the LORD's song...?" The noun nekar ("foreign land") is often used in cultic contexts to contrast God with foreign gods (e.g., Deut. 32:12; Jer. 5:19), so it seems that the mocking request was bordering on blasphemy. The painful past memory of Babylon is contrasted with commitment to Jerusalem in the present through the use of two oath formulas that pledge allegiance to a restored Jerusalem (vv. 5–6).

137:7–9. Edom and Babylon. During the turmoil surrounding the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., the Edomites formed an alliance with Babylon and provided mercenaries who were involved in the final destruction of Zion (Jer. 27:1–7; Obad. 10–11). These traumatic memories of war form the backdrop for the wishes of retaliation in vv. 8–9 (see "Imprecatory Passages in the Psalms," p. 733). They provide a glimpse into the atrocities of ANE warfare, often including the killing of innocent women and children, that Judah certainly experienced during the fall of Jerusalem at the hands of the Babylonians (cf. Is. 13:16; Jer. 6:11; 51:56). In the announcement of the fall of Babylon, Isaiah predicted that the children will be dashed against the rocks by the enemies of Babylon (13:16; cf. Jer. 51:20–25, 33, 48). In this psalm, it is a wish that is delimited by the law of retribution as expressed in v. 8. It is a wish not for disproportional punishment but for justified repayment—happy will be the one who repays Babylon for what was done to Israel. This war-torn world is filled with atrocities that far surpass the imagery at the end of this psalm. The poem invites us to deal with the trauma of the past by focusing on the present and future coming of the heavenly city, where injustice and warfare will come to an end.

138:1–8

Yahweh Delivers

The group of eight prayer psalms (Pss. 138–145) before the Final Hallel (Pss. 146–150) is called the fifth group of Davidic psalms as each one bears the king's name in the superscriptions, pointing to Davidic authorship. They begin with an allusion to Yahweh as King (Ps. 138) and move progressively toward a celebration of His kingship, climaxing in Psalm 145. The central Davidic themes of personal righteousness and relationship with God (Pss. 139; 141), social justice (Ps. 140), death (Pss. 142–143), and human kingship (Ps. 144) are again reviewed and at times adjusted to the needs of the postexilic community (see esp. Ps. 144).

138:1–3. Praise before Kings. The group begins and ends with a psalm of praise (cf. Ps. 145) that is introduced by a self-exhortation to praise. This praise is performed before the “gods” (the LXX translates the expression as “before angels”). As previously noted in Psalm 82:1, ’elohim (“gods”) was translated as “judges” or persons of authority (“mighty ones”). Most translations render it “before the gods,” finding here a possible polemic expressed by the preposition neged (“before”), which can also mean “opposite” or “against.” The praise is directed toward Yahweh's name (i.e., His character; v. 2). The reason for praise is His khesed (“mercy,” “lovingkindness,” “faithful love”) and truth, which exemplify His character (cf. Ex. 34:6). Verse 3 speaks about deliverance without any specific definition of its nature.

138:4–6. Praise of Kings. In similar fashion to the beginning of the first section, all kings of the earth respond now in praise to Yahweh. This might support the interpretation of ’elohim (“gods”) in v. 1 as “mighty ones” or “rulers.” The terms high (or exalted) and lowly (v. 6) illustrate both the transcendence and immanence of Yahweh. He specifically distances Himself from the proud.

138:7–8. Trust in Yahweh. The psalm ends with an affirmation of trust in Yahweh that resembles the syntax and tone of Psalm 23 in several places (e.g., “though I walk” in v. 7 // 23:4; God's khesed, “faithful love,” “mercy,” in v. 8 // 23:6). This promises that the Lord will gamar on our behalf. The verb has been rendered variously as “perfect,” “complete,” “fulfill,” or “vindicate” and (especially if the first two nuances are emphasized) is a concept continued in the NT in Philippians 1:6.

139:1–24

You Know Me

Following the transcendent loftiness of Yahweh as heavenly King in the previous poem, Psalm 139 reveals that God comes intimately close to humanity in His omniscience and omnipresence. At the beginning and end of the psalm (vv. 1, 23–24) God is described as one who has searched and known David (in v. 23 as imperatives). The phrase portrays God as both Judge and Creator, who is personally interested in the psalmist's life and destiny. In terms of language, there is an affinity between this psalm and the book of Job, which would point to an early date for the writing of this Davidic psalm.

139:1–6. God Searches and Knows Me. The depiction of God as one examining and probing the life of the psalmist is a familiar theme (e.g., Ps. 7:9; 26:2). His omniscience encompasses the totality of human existence (vv. 1–4). The statement that God has tsur (“confine,” “shut in”) behind and before (v. 5) is ambiguous, since it can negatively refer to the encircling of a city during a siege (1 Kin. 15:27) or an act of protection as one binds up money (Deut. 14:25). Only for the wicked is Yahweh's omniscience a fearful thought, while for the righteous it is “too wonderful” (v. 6).

139:7–12. Where Can I Go? From God's omniscience the psalm moves now to His omnipresence, which is expressed by the vertical, heaven and hell (she'ol, “grave”; v. 8), and the horizontal, “wings of the morning” or dawn (v. 9), the remotest part of the sea (v. 9), and darkness and light (vv. 11–12). These extremes comprised the known limits of the ancient world. The reference to being held (lit. “grasp”) by God’s right hand creates an ambiguity between Yahweh’s protection and restraining control (cf. Job 12:23; Ps. 119:53; 137:9). Nonetheless, the psalmist affirms that the abiding presence of the Lord is comforting to the believer.

139:13–18. Wonderfully Made. The pervasiveness of God’s presence also transcends time, and the next section contemplates the miracle of human birth. It is a beautiful description of creation through reproduction as the embryo is intricately woven by God (v. 15). The verb used here is the same technical term used for the workmanship in the construction of the sanctuary (cf. Ex. 26:36; 28:39; 35:35). It continues with powerful statements about the value of human life before birth (e.g., God saw the unformed substance of the body in the womb; v. 16). The psalmist reacts to these wonderful thoughts with the insight that God’s thoughts are countless in sum, yet this does not prevent closeness to Him (vv. 17–18).

139:19–24. Final Wish. The psalm takes a sudden turn as the psalmist asks God to slay the wicked (v. 19), who maliciously speak against Him and disregard the Ten Commandments as they misuse God’s name (v. 20). The psalm concludes with a return to the initial thought as the psalmist asks God to search him and know his heart (v. 23). With confidence as to the outcome of His judgment, the psalmist can request that God will lead him in the everlasting way (v. 24). The realization that God knows the most intimate thoughts and is always present can be comforting for the believer and damaging to the wicked. Romans 8:27 takes this relationship one step further by quoting from vv. 1–2 and 23 of the psalm to introduce Christ as our intercessor.

140:1–13

Preserve Me from the Wicked

Psalm 140 begins where the previous psalm left off (namely, with a strong contrast between the righteous and wicked) while asking for deliverance from evil people. There are a number of references back to Book 2 (esp. Pss. 52; 55–59; 62; 64).

140:1–5. Description of the Wicked. The initial section of the poem uses a number of violent images to describe (in general terms and through the use of plural) the enemies (e.g., violent men). They look for war (v. 2), are likened to a poisonous serpent (v. 3; cf. 58:4), and resemble hunters who have set traps (v. 5; cf. 64:5). These metaphors depict the wicked as being completely removed from Yahweh’s sphere and belonging to the sphere of other gods (cf. Ex. 34:12; Ps. 106:36).

140:6–11. Prayer for Protection. The language mode of the psalm changes to volitional forms as David asks God to hear his prayer for protection (v. 6) while at the same time expressing thankfulness for the protection already received (v. 7). In contrast, the heads of those who surround David will be covered by their own evil mischief (v. 9). Eventually, the evil that the wicked have accomplished will return to them. Ra’ (“evil,” “disaster”) will hunt the violent man (v. 11); this reverses the hunter metaphor that concluded the previous section.

140:12–13. Expression of Trust. Following the reversal of fate for the wicked, the psalm concludes with an expression of trust in Yahweh. He will ensure that justice is done for the poor and needy, whose fates are also reversed. The righteous will give thanks and praise God’s name, and the upright will abide in His presence (v. 14). Paul quotes v. 3 to describe human depravity without God and create a similar contrast between the wicked and God’s righteousness (Rom. 3:13), which He has revealed through Christ (Rom. 3:21–24).

141:1–10

Protect Me from Being Wicked

This prayer appears similar to the previous one as it speaks about snares, traps, nets (vv. 9–10), and protection from the wicked. But here the psalmist is taking a critical look at himself, considering the ever-present possibility of wickedness entering his own heart.

141:1–5b. Prayer for Protection. The prayer is introduced by sanctuary terminology, taking the evening sacrifice as a liturgical occasion for the supplication (v. 2). The idea of prayer as incense, which was part of the daily morning and evening sacrifice (cf. Ex. 30:7–8), is continued in Revelation 8:3–4. The psalmist continues by describing the danger of wickedness manifested through the door of the lips (v. 3) and a heart enticed to evil (v. 4). Participating in iniquity is likened to eating delicacies of the wicked. There is a progression of engagement with wickedness here that is reminiscent of Psalm 1:1. In contrast, righteous and corrective discipline are likened to oil on the head (v. 5; cf. Prov. 9:8; 27:5-6).

141:5c-7. Contrast. The last line of v. 5 shifts the focus back to the evil acts from which the psalmist intends to distance himself. Verse 6 mentions their shopetehem (“judges,” “rulers”) in a derogatory way—the unjust judges or leaders (cf. 58:1-5) will be thrown over the cliff. The expression is difficult and has been translated in a variety of ways (e.g., “their judges have fallen into a crevasse [lit. ‘side of a rock’]”), but the idea is that unjust judges would receive their just punishment and the rock could serve as a possible reference to God (cf. 18:3). However, the psalmist tries to convince the wicked of their mortal danger by speaking to them words that are na’em (“pleasant,” “sweet”; i.e., the words are well spoken). The danger is underlined with imagery of bones scattered by a plowing farmer at the entrance of a grave (she’ol; v. 7), possibly a burial cave.

141:8-10. Resolution. Shrinking away from this morbid imagery, the psalmist confirms his commitment to Yahweh (his eyes are looking to Him; v. 8), and he asks to be kept safe from the snares or traps that have been set for him by the wicked. This can refer to either the persecution (as in Ps. 140) or the temptation of falling into wickedness himself. He is certain that he will escape safely (v. 10). A wise rebuke given in love to a friend who may be wandering onto the wrong path may preserve him or her in the path of righteousness.

142:1-7

Deliver Me!

The superscription identifies this Davidic psalm as a maskil (“contemplation,” “instruction”; cf. 32:1) and “prayer” (tepillah; cf. 17:1; 86:1; 102:1). A historical annotation is also included, the first since Psalm 63: “when he was in the cave.” It could refer to the cave at En-gedi, based on links between the poem and the narrative in 1 Samuel 24. For example, qol (“voice”; v. 1) parallels 1 Samuel 24:16 and nepesh (“soul,” “life”; v. 4) parallels 1 Samuel 24:11. The psalm might then represent the poetic recollection of Yahweh’s deliverance of David from Saul, which could have later been adapted to the life of the postexilic community.

142:1-4. Situation of Distress. The two sections of this psalm are introduced by a loud cry (cf. 107:6) to Yahweh for deliverance. The first section mainly describes the distressing situation in which the psalmist finds himself. As in the previous two psalms, there is mention of snares or traps (v. 3); an expression of utter abandonment is repeated three times and leads to the final conclusion that no one cares for him (v. 4).

142:5-7. Cry for Deliverance. The tone of the psalm becomes more personal as David addresses God directly and appeals to the ancient divine promise of a portion in the land. But the psalmist is talking about the land of the living (v. 5), indicating that he is facing a life-threatening situation. The Portion is an epithet for Yahweh Himself (cf. 16:5; 73:26), suggesting that the promise has been internalized into a life-saving relationship with God. A number of pleas appeal to Yahweh for deliverance (vv. 6-7), climaxing in the plea for God to bring him (lit. his “soul” or “life”) out of prison. The infrequent noun masger (“prison,” “dungeon”) is used in connection with the return from exile (v. 7; cf. Is. 42:7; Jer. 29:2) and suggests that the prayer of David is being adapted to the experience of the postexilic Israelite community. The psalm concludes with a final note of confidence in Yahweh’s deliverance. When we make the Lord our Portion, the search for self-satisfaction comes to an end because we find in Him the center of our existence.

143:1-12

Close to Death

The distress the psalmist experienced in Psalm 142 is now intensified. Both psalms are connected by verbal links (e.g., the faint/overwhelmed spirit in v. 4 // 142:3). Beyond that similarity, Psalm 143 seems to be a collection of quotations from other Davidic psalms (Pss. 25; 69; 77; 86). Perhaps it is an anthology of prayers that David collected. This psalm was later appropriated by the postexilic community for their situations of distress.

143:1-6. Distress. The psalm begins with three imperatives of intensified urgency, asking God to hear and answer (v. 1). As he appeals to Yahweh’s faithfulness and righteousness (cf. Ex. 34:6-7), the psalmist contrasts his own lack of righteousness; indeed, no one living is righteous before God (v. 2). Verses 3-4 describe the situation of distress caused by persecution: the enemy crushes him to the ground (lit. “grinding my life against the ground”—an image which evokes a millstone that grinds out the psalmist’s life). The imagery is used in other contexts for the oppression of the poor (cf. Is. 3:15). This section ends with a remembrance of Yahweh’s historical works in past days, a reference to both the Creation and the Exodus (cf. Ps. 77:11–12; 139:14). The poet spreads out his hands in supplication and expresses his longing for deliverance (v. 6).

143:7–12. Petition. The petition is concretized in the second section, which begins with a renewed and more intensified plea for Yahweh to answer (v. 7). The next lines read like an anthology, collecting prayer lines from other psalms. The death metaphor in v. 7 comes from 28:1, the morning motif (v. 8) is similar to 30:5 (cf. also 59:16), and the plea for deliverance (v. 9) is also found in 59:1. In vv. 10–11, the focus shifts from deliverance from enemies to the future of the psalmist. He asks for instruction, guidance, and revival, and concludes with the request to bring him (lit. his “soul”) out of trouble. This is concretized in a final request for deliverance from the enemies (v. 12). Paul quotes v. 2 in Romans 3:20 and Galatians 2:16, building the argument for the doctrine of justification by faith around these quotations.

144:1–15

A New Government

Psalm 144 takes up the theme of human monarchy by drawing from older psalms, mainly from Psalms 18 and 104 (e.g., v. 1 // 18:34; v. 2 // 18:47; v. 5 // 18:9, 104:32; v. 6 // 18:14; v. 7 // 18:16). The material apparently was reworked by David and may have been adapted later to the needs of the postexilic community. After the exile, a new type of leadership is needed, based on the Davidic ideal and Yahweh’s kingship.

144:1–4. Divine Epithets and Humans. The introduction employs a long list of divine epithets (e.g., Rock, Fortress/Stronghold, Tower, Shield) that are reminiscent of Psalm 18:2 and 46. They are all related to war imagery used to depict Yahweh as Warrior. In contrast to the divine omnipotence, there is the fleetingness of human nature (cf. 8:4; 102:11). Humans cannot provide permanent refuge in times of conflict.

144:5–8. Theophany. The section is modeled after Psalms 18 and 104 and describes Yahweh descending from heaven. However, a number of important changes take place. One significant change is the switch from indicative to mostly imperatives (e.g., in v. 6). This corresponds to Psalm 18:14, which describes God’s activities of sending arrows and lightning to destroy enemies. Possibly the most important change is that Psalm 144 contextualizes the old theophanic realities by a new request that fits the postexilic circumstances. Yahweh must again come down from heaven and rescue, but this time from the hands of foreigners (v. 7).

144:9–15. A New Song and Blessings. In this new song (v. 9), the rescue of David from the deadly sword (v. 10) becomes a model for Yahweh’s rescue of Israel from the hand of foreigners (v. 11). The final section of the psalm makes reference to the Mosaic blessings (vv. 12–15), and it follows the sequencing of Deuteronomy 28:4–5 and 11 (v. 12, sons and daughters; v. 13, agricultural produce; vv. 13–14, sheep and oxen). Some conclude that the tone of the psalm is directed not toward an individual new king but toward postexilic Israel as a whole. Two beatitudes that emphasize the relationship between Yahweh and Israel as a nation conclude the psalm (cf. Ps. 33:22). It is important to build a new community and a new life around the old historical truths and promises of salvation, claiming them anew.

145:1–21

Alphabetic Praise

The concluding psalm of the fifth group of Davidic psalms is an acrostic poem that praises God through the psalmist (vv. 1–9), through the congregation, and through nature (vv. 10–20). The psalm is framed by a blessing to Yahweh’s name (vv. 1–2, 21), a common feature in this group (cf. 138:2; 140:13; 142:7). One letter of the Hebrew alphabet, nun (“n”), is missing in the acrostic sequence, although a psalm manuscript from Qumran (11QPsa) and the LXX provide the missing line. The psalm presents Yahweh as King as a logical consequence of Psalm 144, which searches for a new form of government after the Babylonian Exile. Psalm 145 also serves as the last psalm before the final Hallel doxology and thus provides a theological climax to the Psalms with its focus on divine kingship.

145:1–9. Individual Praise. The psalm is introduced by a promise or commitment to praise God’s name forever and ever, which is also mentioned in v. 21. This future outlook is further developed by the statement that one generation extols God's works to the next and passes on the knowledge of Yahweh's saving acts in history (vv. 5–7; cf. 143:5). The grace formula from Exodus 34:6, slightly shortened and adapted to the requirements of the acrostic, is used in v. 8 and reaches a universal dimension when it states that the Lord is good to all (v. 9).

145:10–21. Creation and Community Praise.

The universal dimension in v. 9 is continued in v. 10 as it introduces a wider praise choir. All of creation and the community of Israel are invited to raise their voices. They praise God for His mighty acts and His everlasting kingdom and focus on the image of Yahweh as King, whose dominion endures throughout all generations (vv. 11–13). Yet, God still cares for the poor (v. 14) and sustains the natural world (vv. 15–16; cf. 104:27–28). God is righteous and gracious in everything He does (v. 17) and is near to all who call upon Him and follow His way (v. 18). This implies the preservation of all who love Him and, by logical implication, destruction of all the wicked (v. 20). Verse 21 closes the frame by again mentioning the extoling of God's holy name. It is astonishing how this acrostic psalm of David weaves the most important themes of the Davidic psalms into a continuous fabric that is held together by praises. Doxology truly is the key to theology.

146:1–10

Individual Praise

The last five psalms are characterized by the dominance of the verbal root halal ("to praise"). It occurs thirty-five times in Psalms 146–150 and ten times as an imperative to which a shortened form of the divine name is attached (halelu yah). The phrase is found at the beginning and ending of each psalm. The circle of worshipers who "praise the LORD" gets progressively larger, beginning with the individual (Ps. 146) and growing to include Jerusalem/Zion (Ps. 147), the created world (Ps. 148), Israel within the cosmos (Ps. 149), and finally the cosmos through time and space (Ps. 150). This creates an ever-increasing cosmic symphony that rings through the ages and carries the theological themes of Creation, torah, and Zion toward an eschatological end. Psalm 146 has a number of parallels with other psalms, especially with Psalms 103–104. These are not mere quotations but rather form a condensed theological summary of the Psalms in its final doxology.

146:1–2. Frame. After the initial Hallelujah ("Praise the LORD"; v. 1), which is replicated at the end of the poem (v. 10), the psalmist commits himself to a lifelong melody of praise. This type of life is a guarantee for a full life (v. 2; cf. 104:33).

146:3–9. Yahweh Reigns. The psalm contrasts a false trust in earthly princes and the fleetingness of their rule (vv. 3–4) with the true hope that only the God of Jacob (v. 5) provides. This hope is introduced through a beatitude; He is our hope not only because He blessed Jacob (Gen. 28) but also because He is the Creator (cf. Ps. 75:9; 76:7). From the God of history the psalm moves to the God of creation (v. 6) and His rule as the heavenly King (vv. 7–9). The ethical dimension of the theology of the psalms surfaces when God is described as caring for the socially disadvantaged groups—those who are oppressed, hungry, prisoners, fatherless, strangers/foreigners, and widows. The liberation of Israel from the Babylonian Exile is echoed in these lines (cf. Is. 42:7).

146:10. Frame. The final "praise the LORD" of the psalm is preceded by a summary of the poem's contents. The reign of God is to be praised from Zion and throughout eternity (cf. 147:12). The contrast between human and divine rule is also found at the outset of the Psalms in Psalm 2. Thus, the end of this Psalm closes another theological circle.

147:1–20

Praise from Zion

The horizon of praises expands from the individual to the inhabitants of Jerusalem/Zion (v. 12). The LXX reproduces Psalm 147 as two separate poems (vv. 1–11 and vv. 12–20). However, the division of the poem in three sections (vv. 1–6, 7–11, 12–20), each beginning with an invitation to praise, supports the structural unity of the psalm. Each invitation to praise is followed by divine predication describing Yahweh as the Restorer of Jerusalem, Sustainer of the world, and Giver of the torah. The constant change of speakers points to the poem's liturgical use.

147:1–6. Restorer of Jerusalem. The psalm begins and ends with Hallelujahs ("Praise the LORD"). The first section describes Yahweh as the One who builds up Jerusalem (v. 2) and who deals kindly with the nidekhe ("exiled," "banished ones," "outcasts"; the latter translation would echo the end of the previous psalm). As the divine Shepherd, He heals the brokenhearted and binds up their wounds (v. 3; cf. Ezek. 34). As Creator, He manah ("counts," "appoints/determines") the number of the stars (v. 4; cf. Is. 40:24-26). As King, He takes care of the humble but "casts the wicked to the ground" (v. 6; cf. Ps. 113:7). Yahweh is accomplishing an outward and inward restoration of Jerusalem.

147:7-11. Sustainer of the World. After the second exhortation to praise (v. 7), the next section describes Yahweh as the Sustainer of creation (cf. Ps. 104), who provides rain for the earth and gives food to the animals (vv. 8-9). The negative references to the strength of the horse and the power of a soldier's legs (v. 10) point to the reversal of power under the rule of Yahweh as King (cf. Ps. 143:3-4) and to the total reliance humans have on Him.

147:12-20. Giver of Torah. The psalm then turns to Jerusalem and Zion as the sources of praise. In addition to security and fruitfulness (v. 13), the main reason to praise is given in v. 14 as peace. Jerusalem has finally become the city of shalom. Verses 15-18 return to the topic of Yahweh's power as the Creator, who sends out His command to the earth and utters things into existence (see Gen. 1). It was this powerful and life-giving divine word that gave His ordinances and rulings to Israel (i.e., the blessing of torah). This creates a further connection to Psalm 1, the first torah psalm. Psalm 147 celebrates God as the One who even today can restore peace, provide sustenance, and give a rule of life.

148:1-14

Worldwide Praise

The choir that sings Yahweh's praise expands now to the whole of creation. The twofold cosmology of the psalm is centered on the totality of heavens and earth, which are used to divide the psalm into two parts (vv. 1-7 and 8-14). Psalm 148 occupies the center of the final Hallel and is linked to the previous two psalms by the recurring Creation motif and its emphasis on Israel's preeminent role in the cosmos.

148:1-7. From the Heavens. Yahweh's praise begins "from the heavens" with His angels (v. 2) and then moves through sun, moon, and stars

(v. 3). Mention of these entities praising God clarifies their position within the created order, in contrast to their function as deities in other ANE religions. The mention of the waters above the heavens or skies refers back to the cosmology of the Creation account (cf. Gen. 1:7). The verb bara' ("to create"), used in Genesis 1:1, is also employed here in v. 5.

148:8-14. From the Earth. In the second section, praise is now requested "from the earth" (v. 7). The great sea creatures are connected to the waters below the firmament (Gen. 1:6-8), and they join the praise song in submission to Yahweh (in contrast to the ANE forces of chaos often portrayed as sea monsters). The psalmist then presents a list of earthly praise choir members, always in pairs. This echoes the order of creation in Genesis 1 and ends with humankind as the crown of creation, again in pairs that cover the whole spectrum of humanity by age, gender, and socio-political status (vv. 11-12). All these pairs reflect the differentiated but complimenting created order. Yahweh's glorious majesty and splendor are above the earth and heaven (v. 13) and above the created sphere that lifts up its praise in unison. Within this worldwide choir, v. 14 zooms in on Israel as a people near to Him and close to His heart. The reference to His people connects this psalm to the two preceding psalms and prepares the way for the next praise song. The whole psalm is a narrowing down from the broadest heavenly scope, climaxing with the people closest to Yahweh.

149:1-9

Israel's Praise within the Cosmos

Psalm 149 picks up the theme of the preeminence of Israel among the nations but with an increasing emphasis on the eschatological perspective of Yahweh's reign. This is expressed through a movement from imperatives in the first section (vv. 1-4) to future-oriented volitional verbal forms in the second section (vv. 5-9). According to Isaiah 42:5, Israel's "new song" is a song of liberation from exile and from the power of all "nations" and "peoples" (vv. 7; cf. also Ps. 96:1; 98:1). This psalm replicates the message at the beginning of Psalm 2 and follows the same sequence of nations, peoples, kings, and nobles (vv. 7-8; replacing the "rulers" of 2:2 here with "nobles"). The initial raging of the nations against Yahweh's "Anointed" is finally resolved eschatologically in Yahweh's eternal reign at the end of the Psalms.

149:1–4. A New Song. The Hallelujah (“Praise the LORD”) frame now provides an invitation to praise that focuses on the assembly of the khasidim (“faithful,” “godly,” “pious,” “saints”). The parallelism between Maker and King (v. 2) makes it clear that Yahweh’s divine kingship is meant here. The expressions of praise include dance, as well as the use of timbrel and harp (v. 3). The word makhol could either refer to “dance” or a musical instrument; the latter would seem to be the case in vv. 3–4, where makhol is listed in parallelism with musical instruments (see also 150:3–5). In any case, dance was an expression of joy, but it was never performed in the temple. That joy is the result of deliverance from Israel’s enemies (cf. Pss. 30:11; 150:4; Jer. 31:4, 13). Consequently, Yahweh will pa’ar (“beautify,” “glorify,” “crown”) the ’anawim (“poor,” “humble,” “afflicted,” “meek”) with salvation (v. 4). This expresses the divine concern for the oppressed and reveals the ethical dimension of the psalms.

149:5–9. Judgment for the Saints. The joyful song projects itself here into the future through a change from imperatives to volitional verbal forms, elaborating how the crowning of Israel will play out eschatologically. Praising God on beds (v. 5) recalls Deuteronomy 6:7 and the reciting of torah in all life situations (cf. also Ps. 1:2). The surprising metaphorical connection between praise and a two-edged sword (v. 6) alludes to the power of words (Ps. 52:2; 57:4; 59:7; 64:3), a theme that can also be found in the NT (cf. Heb. 4:12). Verses 7–9 portray the khasidim (“faithful,” “kind,” “pious,” “saints”) as having the glory or honor of performing the judgment written against the nations. Within the eschatological framework of the psalm, this could be understood as the participation of the righteous in the executive judgment of the nations based on the heavenly written records (cf. Dan. 7:9–14; 26–28). The overall imagery of binding with chains and fetters (v. 8) provides surprising links to Revelation 20:1–2 (cf. also Jude 1:6). Psalm 149 opens a wide vista into the glorious future of God’s people, characterized by praise, ultimately leading to eternal victory and the end of sin.

150:1–6

Praise Eternal

The grand finale of the Psalms consists of ten exhortations (the imperative halelu, “praise,” occurs ten times) to praise Yahweh, framed by the two Hallelujah shouts at its beginning and end.

They all build in a crescendo to a final cosmic invitation for everything that has breath to “praise the LORD.” This is an impressive conclusion to the book of Psalms in which doxology touches eternity. The number ten can be biblically associated with totality but also with the Decalogue and the ten utterances of God in Genesis 1. Thus, the beginning and end of the Psalms bring the theological motifs of Creation and torah into view once more. Consistent with the numerical schemes, the seven musical instruments mentioned in vv. 3–5 represent the perfection of praise.

150:1–2. From the Heavenly Sanctuary. In the last Hallelujah (“Praise the LORD”) psalm, praises occur in two places, namely, in God’s sanctuary and His mighty firmament in the heavens. While qodesh could also refer to the earthly sanctuary, the parallelism with the mighty firmament opens up a cosmic dimension and at the same time looks back to Creation. In Genesis 1:8, the firmament is called “heaven,” a meaning that would fit well in this passage. The acts of God are referred to as geburah (“powerful,” “mighty”), and they describe the historical deeds of God from Creation to re-creation.

150:3–6. Into the Cosmos. There is an interesting sequencing of musical instruments in vv. 3–5. They move from instruments used predominantly in a sanctuary context—shopar (trumpet), nebel (lute or harp), and kinnor (harp or lyre; e.g., Lev. 25:9; 1 Chr. 15:16)—to other instruments that were used in both cultic and non-cultic contexts, especially for the celebration of victories and deliverances (timbrel, string instruments, flutes [or pipes], and cymbals; e.g., Ex. 15:20; 1 Sam. 18:6; 2 Sam. 6:5). The dance (cf. observations to Ps. 149:3) is likewise associated with these manifestations of festive joy that go out from the heavenly sanctuary into the cosmic courts. The twofold repetition of the cymbals with the additional qualification teru’ah (“resounding,” “clashing”) cymbals announces an audible climax in the final symphony of the Psalms. The call is universal for everything that has breath to praise the Lord (v. 6) and manifests an eschatological expectation. The Hebrew neshamah (“blowing,” “breath”) refers primarily to humankind (cf. Gen. 2:7; 7:22). The final Hallelujah (“Praise the LORD”) concludes the doxology of Book 5 and with that all of the Psalms.

The cosmic and eschatological perspective that concludes the psalm points to a final doxology of cosmic dimensions that will accompany a procession out of the heavenly sanctuary and fill the universe with praises. The whole cosmos will praise the Lord; the dissonance of sin has come to an end. The cosmic conflict will end in a doxology of praises to the Lord. The Christian still looks forward in hope to the moment when everyone will acknowledge Christ as the supreme Lord of all (Phil. 2:10-11).

“The great controversy is ended. Sin and sinners are no more. The entire universe is clean. One pulse of harmony and gladness beats through the vast creation. From Him who created all, flow life and light and gladness, throughout the realms of illimitable space. From the minutest atom to the greatest world, all things, animate and inanimate, in their unshadowed beauty and perfect joy, declare that God is love” (GC, 678). In the book of Psalms, praise is directly connected to soteriology and eschatology, and as a consequence, it nurtures hope.

PROVERBS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The Hebrew title of the book of Proverbs consists of the first word in the book (mishle, a form of the word mashal), whose meaning is similar to but broader than the English word “proverb.” It refers to not only proverbial sayings but also to various other types of sayings (see Num. 23:7; Job 13:12; Is. 14:4; Ezek. 18:2). Therefore, mishle (commonly translated as “proverbs”) is best understood as “wisdom sayings.” In this commentary, the two expressions will be used interchangeably.

According to a Jewish tradition, Hezekiah and his associates wrote Proverbs. This would mean they compiled the sayings rather than authoring them (Prov. 25:1). The book itself ascribes the authorship of most of its contents to Solomon (1:1; 10:1), Agur (30:1), Lemuel (31:1), and other sages (22:17). The repetition of identical or virtually identical proverbs in the book (6:10–11 and 24:33–34; 14:12 and 16:25; 18:8 and 26:22; 21:9 and 25:24; 22:3 and 27:12; possibly also 20:16 and 27:13) suggests that parts of the book may have existed as separate collections that were eventually brought together as one book. Other proverbs are not identical but are very similar (see 10:9 and 28:18; 16:2 and 21:2; 19:5 and 19:9; 19:24 and 26:15; 20:10 and 20:23; 20:18 and 24:6; 22:13 and 26:13). Furthermore, there are instances where the exact wording of part of a proverb is repeated in another wisdom saying (see 10:6 and 10:11; 10:8 and 10:10; 10:15 and 18:11). Sometimes, the repetition is similar but not exact (see 16:28 and 17:9; 19:12 and 20:2). This suggests that some parts of some proverbs were reused in the creation of new wisdom sayings (it is, of course, impossible now to determine which saying preceded which). Thus, it is probably better to say that the book of Proverbs consists of collections of wisdom sayings that were compiled by Hezekiah and his associates from the writings of Solomon, Agur, Lemuel, and other sages (see 25:1).

Date. Following the Jewish tradition, the collections of wisdom sayings in Proverbs were gathered and compiled in their final form around 700 B.C. However, Solomon would have written his portion (the majority of the book) in the tenth century B.C.

Backgrounds. The reign of Solomon, which was the golden age (in terms of wisdom, wealth, and power) of the united monarchy, provides the appropriate setting for the collection of his wisdom sayings. The word “wisdom” is used in reference to both a concept and a type of literature. The concept of wisdom in Proverbs (and in the Bible) has a wider range of meaning than it does in English. Whereas the English word “wisdom” means good judgment and the ability to use knowledge, the biblical concept of wisdom encompasses a wide spectrum, including simple factual knowledge (e.g., Solomon’s knowledge of trees, animals, birds, fish, etc.; 1 Kin. 4:29, 33), various types of professional skills (see Ex. 35:35; 36:2, 8; 1 Chr. 22:15–16), good judgment and common sense (e.g., Solomon’s understanding of human nature; 1 Kin. 3:16–28), and righteous living (e.g., in Prov. 10–13 the contrast between the righteous and the wicked is interwoven with the contrast between the wise and the fool). Proverbs never speaks of a God-fearing person lacking wisdom or of an unrighteous person who is wise (see 1:1–7). Though the biblical concept of wisdom is difficult to define, it can be described as the attempt to understand the order of the world through observation and analysis, appropriate its principles, and successfully live by them.

Theology and Purpose. A number of theological observations can be made regarding the book of Proverbs. The observations below are selective and do not cover the entire theological significance of the book.

1. Proverbs and Inspiration. The book of Proverbs presents important insights concerning inspiration, especially for those who hold a high view of Scripture. First, some have suggested that there are similarities between Proverbs 22:17–24:22 and the Egyptian Wisdom of Amenemope. Were some of Solomon's wisdom sayings copied from Egyptian wisdom? And if so, can these sayings still be considered inspired? Or did Amenemope copy from Proverbs? Or did they both borrow from common sources of ancient Near Eastern wisdom? The common opinion among scholars is that Amenemope is older than Proverbs, and consequently Proverbs was in some way influenced by it. The relationship between Proverbs and Egyptian wisdom should not bring into question the inspiration of the book of Proverbs. Inspiration does not always claim originality. Inspired NT writers, under the guidance of the Spirit, sometimes gathered material from uninspired sources (Luke 1:1–4) and even quoted them (Acts 17:28; Titus 1:12–13; see “Revelation and Inspiration of the Bible,” p. 11).

The book of Proverbs does not claim to be based on direct visions and dreams. In fact, sometimes it draws lessons from nature (Prov. 6:6–11) or personal observation (24:32). It offers a broader understanding of how inspiration works. This aspect of the book of Proverbs may have relevance to Seventh-day Adventists since the inspiration of Ellen White has been challenged because of her alleged literary borrowings. It is important to consider not only what was borrowed but also how it was modified in order to achieve the purpose of the inspired biblical writer. It would also be useful to consider what was rejected and not borrowed in order to better understand the process of selection followed by the inspired writer. Further, the fact that 25:1 states that Hezekiah's scribes collected Solomon's wisdom sayings suggests that a high view of Scripture does not preclude later scribal rearrangement or compilation.

2. Central Theological Message of Proverbs. Though the book makes significant theological contributions, there is no consensus on its central theological message. Besides the ubiquitous theme of wisdom, a number of other themes are prominent. One recurring theme is the proper upbringing of children (see 13:24; 22:6, 15; 23:13–14; see also 3:11–12), which is also reflected in the frequently used introductory formula admonishing children to listen to parental instruction (see 1:8–9; 4:1–4; 6:20). Another prominent theme is wise speech (see 10:6, 10–11, 13–14; 16:20–30; 18:2–8; 25:12; 26:23–26), which is also reflected in the frequent occurrence of words such as “lips,” “mouth,” and “tongue.” Another theme is righteousness in contrast with wickedness (see 1:3; 2:8–9; 10:1–11:31; 12:5–7; 21:3; 24:15–16; 28:1; 29:27), including references to just scales (see 16:11), integrity, justice, uprightness (see 17:26; 18:5), and so on.

Also prominent in Proverbs are the themes of fidelity and infidelity (see 2:16–19; 5:1–23; 6:20–7:27; 22:14; 30:20), diligence and laziness (see 6:6–11; 12:27; 16:5; 19:24; 21:17, 25; 24:30–34; 26:15), riches and poverty (see 18:11; 19:6–7; 23:4–5; 30:8–9), proper behavior by or toward a king (see 16:10–15; 24:21–22; 25:2–7; 31:1–9), and dealing with conflicts (see 25:8, 21–24; 26:17–22), including warnings against anger (see 25:28). Of course, this list could be expanded. However, it is questionable whether any of these themes could be considered the central theme of the book of Proverbs. The fact that so many of the wisdom sayings are self-contained units may mean that there is no one overarching theme or theology. In addition to the apparent lack of an overarching theme, Proverbs also seems to lack a clear sequence or arrangement of its themes. Hence, some scholars prefer to summarize the book as a collection of miscellaneous wisdom sayings without a central theme. This position seems to be strengthened by the fact that scholars who do propose a central theological message cannot agree on what that message is.

Perhaps the concept that could function as the theological center of the book of Proverbs is wisdom. It pervades the book from beginning to end. In addition to the frequent occurrence of terms from a Hebrew root related to wisdom (the adjective khakam, “wise,” forty-seven times; khokmah, “wisdom,” thirty-nine times; various conjugations of the verb khakam, “to be wise,” thirteen times), there are also related words that occur frequently (e.g., da'at, “knowledge,” forty times). The word leb (“heart,” “mind,” “understanding”) occurs ninety-seven times. Many words related to instruction also occur frequently (e.g., musar, “discipline,” “instruction,” “correction,” thirty times; tokakhat, “reproof,” sixteen times; torah, “instruction,” “law,” thirteen times). To these could be added words that contrast with wisdom (e.g., “fool,” “folly,” “scoffer”). Since wisdom is, among other things, the correct application of knowledge and understanding, it can be expanded to include the various qualities promoted in the book (e.g., righteousness, diligence, the fear of the Lord). Hence, the theme of wisdom seems to be a good candidate for the central theme of the book.

Since wisdom attempts to apply a correct understanding of the order of the world by appropriating its principles in order to successfully live by them, there is a sense in which wisdom and life are related. Therefore, while the issue of the theological center of the book is still debated, this commentary adopts the working hypothesis that the central message is how to enjoy a meaningful and productive life. "In the proverbs of Solomon are outlined principles of holy living and high endeavor, principles that are heaven-born and that lead to godliness, principles that should govern every act of life" (PK 33–34).

3. Wisdom and Faith. An interesting aspect of the book of Proverbs is its apparent universal application. It does not mention the details of Israelite religious history, such as the Exodus from Egypt. There is no discussion of the temple or of the significance of the sacrifices. Further, many of the stated consequences of following or not following wisdom concern earthly, not spiritual, life (e.g., long life, riches, and honor; Prov. 3:16; cf. 22:4). The righteous are repaid on earth (11:31).

Although details particular to Israelite religion are not discussed, the book mentions different religious aspects of life. These include prayer (15:8, 29; 28:9), offerings and sacrifices (7:14; 15:8), firstfruits (3:9), and vows (7:14; 20:25). Proverbs also mentions God's involvement in human affairs (see 15:25; 20:22; 22:22–23; 23:10–11) and the sovereignty of God (see 16:33; 19:21; 20:24; 21:30–31). The book also states that "the fear of the LORD" is the foundation of wisdom (1:7; 9:10) and exhorts trust in Him (3:5). "The LORD gives wisdom" (2:6), and "those who seek the LORD understand" (28:5; see "Wisdom and the Fear of the Lord," p. 764).

Thus, though the book's counsel applies to the secular details of life and its benefits are not limited to any national group, Proverbs is a deeply religious book. It could be said that the historical facts concerning the religion of Israel are assumed as background knowledge. Further, the book's focus on this earthly life shows that the fear of the Lord is not limited to religious contexts. God is the God of the secular as well as the sacred. Indeed, it is hard to separate the two in the ancient world, where all life was tied to the sacred. Hence, all of life, including what are today considered secular activities, should be lived in relationship to the Lord.

4. Wisdom and Hope. As already mentioned, except for the Creation, the book of Proverbs does not discuss God's intervention in history, such as the Flood, the Exodus, or the future messianic age. Since the book is not prophetic or apocalyptic, not much is said about God's future direct intervention in human history. This does not mean that Proverbs is exclusively interested in everyday life. The book is also interested in a transcendental life, a life beyond the confines or limitations of an earthly existence. True life must be grounded in hope in God and requires a deep fellowship with the Lord. Therefore, Proverbs unambiguously asserts that there is no hope for the wicked beyond the grave (11:7). They know only the present, and when it is gone, their hope perishes with them. But the experience of the righteous is different: the righteous have a refuge in God even in death (14:32). This seems to imply that, for the righteous, death is not the end.

Another passage that seems to point to a life beyond the grave is 12:28, according to which there is no death in the pathway of righteousness and life. A literal translation would be "and the way of a path no death." The meaning seems to be that true life does not lead to death but transcends it. If this interpretation is right, then wisdom is associated with eternal life. It points to a life that transcends the limited nature of human existence.

The emphasis of Proverbs on earthly life offers a balancing perspective for Christians living in hope of the Second Coming of Christ. Though the ultimate Christian hope has an eschatological focus (i.e., the coming of fullness of life through Christ), which Proverbs points to, the present life should not be ignored. There is hope in the present as well as the future. Our fallen, sinful world does not always function as it should, yet God's justice and mercy are not completely absent because the law of cause and effect is still at work. Wisdom and folly still have predictable, though not unfailingly consistent, results. "To Adam and Eve in their Eden home, nature was full of the knowledge of God, teeming with divine instruction. To their attentive ears it was vocal with the voice of wisdom. Wisdom spoke to the eye and was received into the heart, for they communed with God in His created works....Nature is now marred and defiled by sin. But God's object lessons are not obliterated; even now, rightly studied and interpreted, she speaks of her Creator" (CT 186).

Further, Paul's statement in 1 Corinthians 15:19 about hope beyond this life must be balanced by John's statement that hope purifies us (1 John 3:3). That is, our eschatological hope results in changes in our present life. Proverbs also reminds us that true biblical hope impacts the way God's people live and treat others in this life. There are many wise sayings about living righteously (see Prov. 2:9; 8:20; 14:34; 16:8; 29:4); being honest (see 3:27–28; 11:1; 16:11; 20:10, 23); being generous (see 11:24; 14:21, 31; 19:17); not taking advantage of the helpless/defenseless (see 15:25; 23:10–11; 30:10); speaking with wisdom, honesty, and kindness (see 8:7–8; 15:1–2; 20:15; 25:11–12; 31:26); and even showing compassion to animals (12:10). Thus, Proverbs reminds Christians that eschatological hope should lead to choosing the path of wisdom in this present life.

5. Wisdom Acquired and Transmitted. Wisdom is not primarily obtained through supernatural revelations, such as visions and dreams (though these are not necessarily excluded). Rather, it is acquired by observation and experience followed by analysis and application (see 6:6). Wisdom is also acquired by accepting wise counsel, a fact emphasized throughout Proverbs. Thus, the value of wise counsel is highlighted (see 11:14; 15:22; 20:18; 24:6). The sayings are often addressed to a child urged to receive parental instruction (see 1:8; 5:1; 6:1; 7:1; 31:1).

Proverbs emphasizes the need to not only acquire wisdom but also transmit it. One of its frequent themes is the education of youth, which may have been the original setting of many of its wisdom sayings. Hebrew words for parents and children are used very frequently. In the first nine chapters, each lecture is addressed to a son (see also 23:19, 22; 24:13–14, 21; 31:2). It contains instruction concerning the responsibilities of children (see 10:1; 13:1; 15:5, 20; 17:25; 19:13, 26; 20:20; 23:24–25; 28:7; 29:3; 30:17) as well as of parents (see “Child Discipline in Proverbs,” p. 776).

We can also draw some inferences from Proverbs concerning the content of education. Since God is the God of all aspects of life, including both what we consider sacred and what we consider secular, education in the context of biblical wisdom is not limited to theological reflection. A careful reading of Proverbs, as well as wisdom literature in general, suggests a positive attitude towards all kinds of learning, including practical and scientific knowledge. Nevertheless, true wisdom, hence true education, has its foundation in “the fear of the LORD.”

Literary Features. On this, see “Introduction to Hebrew Poetry and Wisdom Books” (p. 614). The book of Proverbs is rich in descriptive and prescriptive sayings. With the exception of the first nine chapters and portions of the last few, most wisdom sayings in Proverbs are short, often consisting of one or two lines with parallel, opposite, or related thoughts. Many of these can be characterized as aphorisms, maxims, or pithy sayings. Since biblical proverbs are poetic in form, they use poetic parallelism. In most cases, these short wisdom sayings are self-contained units (i.e., each saying is contextually unrelated to the sayings before and after it) and the interpretation of each passage is not related to other passages in the context.

This commentary will not discuss every single wisdom saying in Proverbs individually since most of them are transparent and do not need comment or explanation. Instead, in sections where larger themes can be discerned, the discussion will focus on the larger context rather than on specific verses. Some individual verses that require special comment or explanation will also be discussed.

COMMENTARY

1:1—9:18

PROVERBS OF SOLOMON THE SON OF DAVID THE KING OF ISRAEL

The first nine chapters of Proverbs contain longer poetic sections than most of the rest of the book. Whereas much of the book consists of specific counsel for practical living, the poems in the first nine chapters interweave instructional poems with poems that praise or commend wisdom. Hence, even the admonitions against infidelity occur in the context of a contrast between choosing wisdom or the adulterous woman (see 7:4–5).

As some scholars have suggested, the material in this first major section consists of ten lectures or didactic speeches (1:8–19; 2:1–22; 3:1–12, 21–35; 4:1–9, 10–19, 20–27; 5:1–23; 6:20–35; 7:1–27) with four intervening interludes (1:20–33; 3:13–20; 6:1–19; 8:1–36), in addition to a prologue (1:1–7) and an epilogue (chap. 9). The lectures typically consist of three parts: the introduction, the body of the lecture, and some type of conclusion. The introduction usually begins with a formula expressed in the format of parental instructions. That is, the lecture is addressed to a child who is advised to listen to parental instruction (see 1:8–9; 3:1–2; 4:1–4; 6:20). This is followed by a statement of the benefits that heeding these instructions can bring. This may reflect parental instruction as the original setting of these sayings (see also 31:1). However, given the fact that the book of Proverbs is addressed to a wider audience (see 1:1–7), the imagery of parental instruction must be seen as a literary formula employed in the genre of didactic wisdom. This type of introductory formula also occurs elsewhere in the book of Proverbs (see 10:1; 23:19, 22).

1:1–7

Prologue

The title introduces the book and indicates that the following section is a compilation of proverbs written by Solomon, who was the son of David and king of Israel (1:2–9:18). Although the first seven verses of Proverbs function as a prologue to the first major section, they are also a fitting introduction to the entire book. These verses establish the book's purpose and audience.

The prologue clearly states the book's purposes: (a) To gain (lit. "know") wisdom and instruction means to obtain and apply principles of behavior that will regulate a disciplined life (1:2). (b) To perceive/understand words of understanding/insight means to separate or distinguish what is right from what is wrong in order to appropriate what is insightful or meaningful. Wisdom, discipline, and understanding are to be acquired for practical purposes. (c) To receive instruction regarding wisdom/prudent behavior means to live a life characterized by justice/righteousness (the preservation of proper relationships), integrity, and fairness (lit. what is "smooth," "straight," "free from any obstacle") and to do what is right/treat others justly (v. 3). (d) To gain prudence to the simple means to enable them to avoid being misled (v. 4). Someone who is "simple" (Heb. peti) is naïve and, consequently, open to enticement. The Hebrew word is related to the verbal root patah ("to be gullible," "to be open to enticement," "to persuade," "to entice"; v. 10; Ex. 22:15; Judg. 14:15). In some contexts, the word "simple" has a neutral connotation, referring to one who is inexperienced and needs instruction in regard to what is prudent. Such a person could either learn wisdom or be enticed to sin (Prov. 1:4; 7:7; 9:4, 6, 16; 19:25; 21:11). In other contexts, "simple" has a negative connotation. The simple are contrasted with the prudent (14:15, 18; 22:3; 27:12) and compared to fools (1:22, 32; 8:5).

Young people need knowledge and discretion that will enable them to plan (i.e., to wisely decide their own course of action in life). But Proverbs addresses not only the simple and the young but also the wise, who can increase their knowledge (1:5). Wisdom is a way of life, but it is also a way of expressing ideas and teachings through proverbs, parables, and riddles (v. 6). Although the meaning of most wisdom sayings is clear and easy to understand, the fact that they are called "riddles" encourages the reader to go beyond a casual surface reading to carefully ponder their meaning. According to v. 7, the fear of the Lord is the foundation of true wisdom. Those who want to experience true knowledge and wisdom must "fear the LORD" (i.e., be in the right relationship with God). This "fear" does not mean being afraid of God but denotes an awe-inspired respect for and obedience to Him (see below, "Wisdom and the Fear of the Lord").

Wisdom and the Fear of the Lord

The expression "the fear of the LORD" occurs quite often in Proverbs and is usually connected to wisdom. In fact, it provides a proper starting point for the search for wisdom, making it indispensable to the wise. Therefore, it is important to have a clear understanding of the expression.

1. Terminology. The expression may employ the Hebrew noun yir'ah ("fear"; 1:7, 29; 2:5; 8:13; 9:10; 10:27; 14:26, 27; 15:16, 33; 16:6; 19:23; 22:4; 23:17), the adjective yare' ("fearing"; 14:2; 31:30), or the verb yara' ("to fear"; 3:7; 24:21), all from the same root. Though the basic meaning of this root is "to fear" in the sense of "to be afraid" (see Gen. 32:11; Deut. 2:25; 20:8), it can also express the idea of "respect" (e.g., toward parents; Lev. 19:3; cf. Prov. 13:13) or "reverence" (e.g., for God and His word; Lev. 26:2; Ps. 112:1). Further, the word "fear" can also refer to the "worship" of a deity (see 2 Kin. 17:32–34). There is also a sense in which the fear of the Lord includes trust in God (Prov. 3:5–8). In Proverbs, the fear of humans is contrasted with trust in the Lord (29:25). The book exhorts trusting in the Lord (3:5; 16:20; 28:25) and waiting for Him (20:22).

2. Fear as Behavior. What is perhaps more important is the fact that the expression “the fear of the LORD” highlights not an attitude or emotion but a type of behavior. The fear of the Lord is often synonymous with righteous living (see Job 1:1; Ps. 128:1; 2 Sam. 23:3). In Proverbs, it characterizes those who walk in uprightness (Prov. 14:2). The expression means to hate evil (8:13) and to depart from it (3:7; 16:6). The parallelism in Psalm 111:10 matches the fear of the Lord with obeying His commandments (see Ps. 111:7–9; see also Deut. 6:2; Eccl. 12:13). Notice also that the commandments are to be feared/respected as well (Prov. 13:13). Thus, in the context of Proverbs, the fear of the Lord includes an awe and reverence manifested in good behavior and implies a right relationship with God. It ultimately means walking according to God’s will (i.e., keeping His commandments). A life lived according to God’s will is the beginning of wisdom (1:7; 9:10).

3. Fear and Wisdom. The book of Proverbs highlights the relationship between the fear of the Lord and wisdom. The fear of the Lord is described as the beginning of wisdom (1:7; 9:10) and the instruction of wisdom (15:33). In 2:5 the expression parallels “the knowledge of God,” and 2:6 explains that the Lord gives wisdom. In 1:29, the fear of the Lord is contrasted with hatred of knowledge. According to 28:5, it is those who seek the Lord who have understanding. Further, the fear of the Lord is described in terms of its benefits, which are similar to the benefits of wisdom. These include health (3:7–8), safety (14:26), riches, honor, and life (22:4). Of these, long life seems to be more prominent (10:27; 14:27; 19:23). Thus, the fear of God, which includes living according to His will, is the foundation that leads to true wisdom and its rewards. The sages presupposed that there was a God whose wisdom was manifested in the order of His creation, and that living according to His will would place them on the path of wisdom and life that would be in harmony with His creation.

1:8–19

First Didactic Speech: Avoid Evil Companions

The first didactic speech consists of a warning to avoid evil associates. Like most lectures in this part of the book, there is an introduction (1:8–9), the body of the lecture (vv. 10–16), and a conclusion, which here consists of an explanation of the admonition (vv. 17–19).

As is typical of the introductory formula, the lecture is addressed to “my son,” who is encouraged to pay attention to parental instruction (v. 8). The benefit of following this parental instruction is compared to an elegant garland on the son’s head and to a chain of honor, probably made out of gold, around his neck (v. 9). This metaphor emphasizes the beauty and value of wisdom.

Verses 10–11 introduce a long quotation (vv. 11–14). The first part (the “if” clause) in v. 10 is resumed in the second (the “then” clause), beginning in v. 15. The admonition may be summarized thus: if sinners invite you to join them in evildoing, do not join them. Although the warning involves an evil and violent gang that violates social order through violent robbery, the principle (i.e., resisting peer pressure) also applies to less extreme temptations to do what is evil. In v. 12, “Sheol” (the grave) is personified as swallowing those who enter it. Verse 16 is missing from some early translations, including some manuscripts of the Septuagint. However, it fits perfectly with the sentiment in the preceding verses. The conclusion of this lecture consists of an explanation of the admonition: the plans of those who do evil are futile because they result in their own destruction.

1:20–33

Interlude 1: The Call of Wisdom

In this interlude, wisdom is personified (which also occurs elsewhere in Proverbs; see 8:1–36; 9:1–6) as a messenger proclaiming her instruction to large audiences in the public areas of a city. Wisdom is anthropomorphically depicted as a prophetess delivering a message to the people. The implicit idea is that no one could claim that wisdom was inaccessible.

The message consists of two parts—an invitation/call and the announcement of judgment. The invitation calls to the simple/naïve to pay attention to the rebuke of Wisdom. If they would turn and listen, Wisdom would enlighten them with true knowledge. She would pour out her thoughts/spirit on them (1:22–23). The message of judgment is based on the fact that the simple reject wisdom. The judgment reflects the law of retribution: because the simple laugh at and mock Wisdom, Wisdom announces that when they face misfortune, she will laugh at and mock them (vv. 26–27). Verses 28–31 use the third person (“they”) to address those who spurn Wisdom. The element of retribution is more visible in this case. When she called and sought them, they did not answer. So Wisdom announces that when they call on and seek her, she will not answer and they will not find her. They had the chance of gaining knowledge from her, but they hated true knowledge, defined here as fearing the Lord.

Living according to divine wisdom should constantly characterize the life of God’s people. Wisdom is not something to access in times of trouble; in fact, wisdom will help avoid some misfortunes. The conclusion contrasts the fate of the simple and the righteous (vv. 32–33). The simple should understand that their present decisions determine their ultimate fate. The rejection of the Lord’s counsel, given through divine wisdom, will result in the destruction of the wicked. The ultimate fate of those who listen to Wisdom (i.e., those who appropriate and live according to her instructions) will be a life under divine protection, free from the fear of calamities. In the context of the cosmic conflict, such promises now find partial fulfillment in the lives of God’s people, but they anticipate a future when evil will never again touch them.

2:1–22

Second Didactic Speech: The Path of Wisdom

The instruction of this lecture consists of a call to seek wisdom and to learn to follow her path. It could be subdivided into two parts. The first is a call to seek wisdom (vv. 1–10), and the second describes deliverance from the enticements of the wicked (vv. 11–22). Each of these consists of smaller blocks of verses. The first part of the lecture consists of three stanzas. The first stanza contains three “if” clauses (vv. 1–4). The following two stanzas each begin with a “then” clause (vv. 5–8, 9–11). The second part of the lecture also consists of three stanzas (vv. 12–15, 16–19, 20–22), each beginning with the same preposition.

2:1–9. If You Seek Wisdom. The speaker is the teacher, and the addressee is, as usual, called “my son” (v. 1). The instruction is identified with that of Wisdom, indicating that Wisdom shares a deposit of instruction that can be the object of analysis—one may apply the heart (one’s rational abilities) in seeking to understand it. The exhortation to listen to Wisdom takes up the rest of this first part of the poem.

Three “if” clauses suggest that the attainment of wisdom requires effort and discipline on the part of the seeker, including accepting/receiving instruction (v. 1), calling/crying out for it (v. 3), and seeking/looking for it (v. 4). But the ultimate purpose of such efforts is to gain a better understanding of the fear of the Lord, resulting in knowing Him better and developing a deeper relationship with Him (v. 5). Wisdom does not exist for her own sake but offers a deeper fellowship with the Lord. The source of wisdom is God Himself, indicating that wisdom, often personified in Proverbs, is one of His attributes. Therefore seeking wisdom is in fact seeking God. He has wisdom in abundance and is willing to give it to His children. Through this divine instruction, God keeps His people in the path/way of life characterized by justice and righteousness. Only in seeking God can His people come to understand how to relate both to Him and to others (v. 9).

2:10–22. Deliverance from the Wicked. This section describes the practical benefits received by those who embrace and appropriate God’s wisdom. It is a pleasant experience that enables them to act according to their values and what they have found to be good (vv. 9–10). It prepares them to resist temptations to do evil (v. 11). The clauses regarding deliverance in vv. 12 and 16 express either purpose (i.e., wisdom preserves in order to deliver) or specification (i.e., wisdom preserves by delivering from certain kinds of people). This distinction is one of nuance, since the general substance of the passage remains the same. Three examples of deliverance are given. First, those who embrace Wisdom will not identify with those whose words entice others to do what is evil (v. 12). Second, they will not join those who abandon the way of life and choose the way of death/darkness, who find their joy not in wisdom but in crookedness (vv. 13–15). Third, they will not be trapped by the immoral/adulterous woman (vv. 16–19).

According to v. 17 the immoral/adulterous woman in this poem is a married woman who is willing to forsake the marriage covenant made before God. The word ’allup (“companion,” “partner”) is not the regular word for “friend” but refers to someone very close (see 16:28; 17:9). Here the Hebrew expression ’allup ne ’urim (“companion of [one’s] youth”) is best understood as the masculine counterpart to the expression ’eshet ne’urim (“wife of [one’s] youth”; 5:18). The expression ’allup ne’urim also occurs in Jeremiah 3:4, where it possibly means “husband.” The motivation for following Wisdom and not the immoral woman is that the immoral woman’s path leads to the dead (Prov. 2:18; the Hebrew term repa’im is a poetic term used to designate the dead; see Job 26:5; Is. 14:9). She promotes death while Wisdom promotes life.

Proverbs 2:20 begins with the Hebrew expression lema’an (see vv. 12, 16), which can express either purpose (“in order to”) or consequence (“so that”). Hence, the message of the second part of the poem is that Wisdom will preserve those who follow her (v. 11), delivering them from wicked men (vv. 12–15) and wicked women (vv. 16–19) so they may walk in the right paths (v. 20). This parallels the end of the first section (v. 10). In Proverbs, as in many other places in the Bible, there are two ways/paths to walk on—the way of life or the way of death. Verses 21–22 contrast the results of walking on the two different paths: the righteous, who follow the way of life, are preserved by Wisdom and receive a promise of life. The wicked, who follow the way of death, have their lives come to an end. These verses conclude the second part of the lecture.

3:1–12

Third Didactic Speech: Trust in the Lord

This lecture contains the typical three parts: introduction (vv. 1–4), body (vv. 5–10), and conclusion (vv. 11–12). The message of these wisdom sayings is that God must be put first. This chapter contains three lectures about wisdom (vv. 1–10, 11–20, 21–35), each beginning with an appeal to the son.

3:1–4. Introduction. On the introductory formula, see remarks above on the organization of chapters 1–9. The word torah (“instruction,” “teaching,” “law”) forms a fitting parallel with mitsvot (“commands”; 3:1). The structure of vv. 1–2 is very similar to that of vv. 3–4. The second-person negative command in v. 1 parallels the third-person negative wish in v. 3. Both are followed by affirmative commands and a statement of the results of heeding the injunctions. The concept of memory surfaces in the exhortation not to forget the father’s instructions. They bring healing/wholeness and lengthen the lives of those who keep them in their hearts. When interacting with others, mercy and honesty are important (v. 3). Those who follow these instructions find grace in the eyes of God and others (v. 4).

3:5–12. Trust in the Lord. The lecture itself can be considered to begin in v. 5. A number of commands are given in vv. 5–10. Most are affirmative: God’s people should trust in Him (v. 5), acknowledge and submit to Him (v. 6), fear Him, reject evil (v. 7), and honor Him with their abundance, including the firstfruits of their produce (v. 9). A couple of the commands are negative: God’s people should not rely/lean on their own understanding (v. 5) or be wise in their own eyes (v. 7). Also, a few blessings are mentioned that result from heeding the commands (vv. 6b, 8, 10). In light of the parallelism, the various commands should be understood as related facets of a proper relationship with God. Hence, this wisdom saying expands the meaning of the phrase “the fear of the LORD,” which occurs throughout the book. That is, to fear the Lord does not mean to be afraid of God but rather to trust, honor, and acknowledge Him in everything and to depart from evil. Likewise, though those who trust in the Lord feel confident and safe (cf. v. 23), as opposed to afraid (see 14:16; 29:25), they should also depart from evil and honor the Lord in His rightful claims to their possessions.

Proverbs 3:5–8 affirms the human need for divine guidance, suggesting that human wisdom is not enough to lead to ultimate success. This passage exhorts fully trusting in God, meaning acknowledging Him in all activities and decisions and living in humble submission to Him and His will. The implication is that there is something wrong with humanity and that a meaningful life is achieved only by fearing God in the sense of turning away from what is evil. The promise of v. 6 uses the Hebrew word yashar, which does not primarily mean “to guide” but rather “to make [the path] straight/smooth.” Though “to make straight” one’s own path can mean “to behave righteously” (see 9:15), to make another person’s path straight means to remove obstacles and difficulties from the way (see Is. 40:3). However, since trusting in the Lord involves departing from evil (Prov. 3:7), the notion of straightening/smoothing out a path that leads to righteousness could be included. Trusting the Lord has a physical impact on the life of those who do so; there is a psychosomatic component in trusting Him. Trust will impact the physical body and the bones, considered in the Bible to be the seat of a person’s inner life and emotions (v. 8).

It is not only the body and the bones of the wise but also their possessions that are blessed (vv. 9–10). This passage clarifies that God is honored by those who place their possessions at His service and give Him offerings from the best they have. Since it is good for God's people to honor Him, God promises to bless them in order for them to have enough to honor Him. Although the temple is not mentioned, it is obvious that the gifts were brought there.

Verses 11–12 change the topic to a degree, but they seem to function as a conclusion to this lecture. After the emphasis on God's blessings upon the wise in the previous verses, it is surprising to find the topic of suffering at the end of the lecture. Things do not always go well for God's children. In such cases it would be tempting to despise God, but the passage exhorts those who suffer to see in their painful experience the discipline of a loving Father, who is helping them grow in His wisdom.

3:13–20

Interlude 2: Praising Wisdom

This section consists of a poem that extols the value of wisdom, both to humans and to God. The poem can be subdivided into two parts: the value of wisdom to humans (vv. 13–18) and the value of wisdom to God (vv. 19–20).

3:13–18. The Value of Wisdom to Humans. The introductory formula of this interlude is clearly different from the way the other lectures in chapters 1–9 begin. The Hebrew expression ashre (“happy,” “blessed”) is a type of beatitude (i.e., “blessed is...”). Here it emphasizes the value of wisdom by calling attention to how fortunate are those who obtain it. The enjoyment of life is directly related to the possession of God's wisdom. The benefits received from wisdom far exceed those from material valuables, such as silver, gold, and pearls (3:14–15). Searching for and finding wisdom is more rewarding than working hard to obtain material wealth. The passage proceeds to list some of the benefits of wisdom (vv. 16–18): it frees from premature death and provides true wealth and wholeness of life. The reference to the tree of life recalls the Creation narrative (Gen. 2:9). Access to the tree of life is possible now by following divine wisdom. The direct connection between wisdom and life runs throughout Proverbs as one of its unifying themes. This part of the poem ends with a Hebrew verb that comes from the same root as the first word of the poem, 'ashar (“to be blessed/happy/fortunate”; Prov. 3:18).

3:19–20. The Value of Wisdom to God. These verses connect wisdom to God's activity in Creation and make it clear that it was God who created everything by/in wisdom. Creation is not the result of natural, irrational forces but the outworking of the divine mind configuring all of it. To speak of God “using” wisdom in Creation does not imply that wisdom is some entity that could exist without a wise God. Rather, saying that God employed wisdom in Creation is a figure of speech that is equivalent to saying that God created the world in His wisdom. Hence, the Creation reveals the wisdom of God. Verse 20 is probably a reference to Genesis 1:9 and 2:6.

3:21–35

Fourth Didactic Speech: How Not to Treat Others

This section consists of an introduction (vv. 21–26), a body (vv. 27–31), and a conclusion (vv. 32–35). The message of this wisdom saying, to deal honestly and fairly with others, is given in the form of a series of negative commands.

3:21–26. Introduction. Some consider this section to be a continuation of vv. 13–20. The reason for the uncertainty is that in Hebrew the first line has only a verb without its object. To fit English usage, some translations insert “them” or reiterate “wisdom and understanding” from v. 13. Other translations resolve the problem by reversing the lines. But it is more likely that the second line of the proverb contains the objects of the verb: sound wisdom/judgment and discretion. The Hebrew word tushiyayah (“sound wisdom/judgment”) points to practical wisdom/ability, hence to “competence.” The word mezimmar refers to private thoughts that people keep to themselves and could mean “discretion.” These qualities are indispensable for proper social interaction. Those who keep their eyes fixed on them will enjoy a favorable, safe, and long journey in life (vv. 22–23). Notice that such virtues do not themselves create safety, protection, and inner peace (vv. 24–25). It is the Lord who does that for those who keep their eyes fixed on wisdom (v. 26).

3:27–35. Message of the Lecture. The didactic speech itself (vv. 27–31) consists of five prohibitions that, when rephrased in positive terms, exhort giving what is good (payment for work, property, etc.) to those to whom it is due (v. 27); promptly giving neighbors what belongs to them (v. 28); planning to do only good to neighbors, knowing their services may be needed in the future (v. 29); going to court only with a just case (v. 30); caring for the well-being of others; and promoting peace (v. 31). The conclusion is that those who defy the prohibitions are an abomination/repulsive to God (v. 32). Verses 32–35 contain a series of four antitheses, which convey the message that God blesses the upright and curses the unjust. This provides good reasons for avoiding the evil actions forbidden in vv. 27–31.

4:1–9

Fifth Didactic Speech: Seek Wisdom

This lecture is slightly different from the others. It has only two parts, the introduction (vv. 1–2) and the body of the lecture (vv. 3–9). A father recalls his own father's advice and repeats it to his son. The message itself can be summarized as an exhortation to get wisdom.

As in the typical introductory formula, vv. 1–2 address children, urge them to heed parental instruction, and explain the benefit of heeding the instruction (see remarks above on the organization of chaps. 1–9). However, though most of the previous exhortations are addressed to a “son,” this one is addressed to “children” or “sons.” The benefit of heeding instruction is simply that the instruction is tob (“good,” “sound,” “correct”). It corresponds to God's good will for all. The body of this exhortation (4:3–9) contains the words of a grandfather and is almost autobiographical (vv. 3–4). His father instructed him to take his instruction seriously because it directly related to the quality of his life (v. 3). The exhortations are about getting/acquiring the most important thing in life, namely, wisdom and understanding (vv. 5, 7). Verse 7 is ambiguous. The Hebrew word re'shit connotes “beginning” (cf. Gen. 1:1), but it can also be translated as “principal” or “foremost.” Thus the verse can be translated as “The beginning of wisdom is this: get wisdom” or “Wisdom is the principal/supreme thing: therefore acquire wisdom.” Wisdom is described as a wife who is not to be forsaken but loved (Prov. 4:6) and highly valued (v. 8; salal, “raise,” “lift up,” “exalt,” “praise”). Wisdom will also honor and exalt those who embrace her (vv. 8–9).

4:10–19

Sixth Didactic Speech: The Two Paths

This section advises choosing the path of wisdom rather than the path of wickedness. It may be outlined as an introduction (v. 10), a body (vv. 11–17), and a conclusion (vv. 18–19). The introduction follows the typical introductory formula (see remarks above on the organization of chaps. 1–9): a son is urged to listen to and take firm hold of parental instruction (equated with wisdom; 4:10, 13) and promised that this will result in a long and stable life, a key theme in Proverbs (vv. 11–12). The passage exhorts staying/turning away from the way/lifestyle of the wicked (vv. 14–15), whose whole life, day and night, is characterized by their obsession with doing evil. Their actions reveal what nurtures them (vv. 16–17). The passage closes with a description of the ultimate fates of the righteous and the wicked. There are some eschatological overtones in the description of the path of the righteous (v. 18). In contrast, the way of the wicked is described as darkness, suggesting that is a way of ignorance or foolishness (v. 19).

4:20–27

Seventh Didactic Speech: Guard Your Heart

An interesting feature of this group of Proverbs is the figurative reference to various parts of the body, namely, the ear (v. 20), eyes (v. 21), heart (vv. 21, 23), flesh/body (v. 22), mouth (v. 24), lips (v. 24), and feet (vv. 26–27); wisdom impacts the whole person. In addition to the typical introductory call for the son to listen to his father's advice, these verses add the command to keep his words before his eyes and in his heart (v. 21). These same two body parts are used again in reverse order in the body and at the end the passage (the heart in v. 23 and the eyes in v. 25).

Since, in the biblical understanding, the heart is the seat of thinking and intentions, to keep/guard one's heart means to guard one's thoughts and will (v. 23). The Hebrew word tots'ot (“springs,” “issues,” “flows”; v. 23) refers to the place from which something or someone goes out (e.g., city exits or border limits; see Ezek. 48:30). What comes from the heart or mind is that which guides the course of life's river, as it were. In other words, the heart must be guarded because that is where life begins its journey. The thoughts of the mind determine how a person lives. The admonition to guard the heart is followed by advice against deceptive speech (Prov. 4:24). Jesus also noted the relationship between the heart and the mouth when He stated that the mouth speaks out of the abundance of the heart (Matt. 12:34).

In a sense, Proverbs 4:25–27 are part of the admonition that began in v. 23. However, these verses give less explicit counsel on the evils to be avoided. Instead, they admonish walking on the right path without swerving to the right or the left (v. 27) and staying focused on what is most important in life—divine wisdom—without being distracted by what is on the side of the path (see Heb. 12:2).

5:1–23

Eighth Didactic Speech: Warning against Infidelity

This speech is the first of three that deal with infidelity. An interesting feature of this lecture is that vv. 15–20 forms the only passage in Proverbs that celebrates marital sex. It contrasts marital sex with sex outside of marriage, endorsing the former and disapproving the latter. The introductory formula is typical, urging a son to heed advice (v. 1), followed by a statement of the benefit (v. 2). The passage exhorts preserving/maintaining discretion (i.e., behaving with discretion). The word “lips” here refers not to the physical lips but to the act of speaking. Hence, the idea that the lips will guard/preserve knowledge means that those who accept wisdom will speak knowledge, just as the priest keeps/guards knowledge in the sense that he speaks it when teaching (Mal. 2:7). The word “lips” also serves as a transition since it occurs again in Proverbs 5:3, which begins the main body of the speech.

The speech can be subdivided into three parts. Verses 3–6 state the deadliness of the immoral woman. Like the sweetness of honey and the pleasantness of oil, she appeals to the sensory dimensions of men (v. 3), but what she really offers is bitterness and death (vv. 4–5); she is deceptive (v. 6). The passage exhorts young men to keep their distance from her. Otherwise their lives would be ruined (vv. 7–14). In the end, those who listen to the words of this woman will be left with nothing of value in the midst of remorse. The metaphor of a fountain of water involves an exhortation to enjoy marital life instead of joining the immoral woman (vv. 15–20). The wife is like a cistern, and she provides streams of water to the husband. The couple is also compared to a doe and a deer in beauty and strength (v. 19). They are encouraged to sexually enjoy each other. In v. 18, “the wife of your youth” may mean either “the wife you married when you were young” or “your youthful wife.” Since marital sex is such a beautiful and enjoyable relation, going to the immoral/wayward woman is foolishness/irrational (v. 20). The passage concludes by stating that the Lord is the Judge and wickedness will be punished by the outworking of the sinner’s own actions (i.e., the wicked will be ensnared and held in the cords of their own sins, vv. 21–23).

6:1–19

Interlude 3: Various Topics

Although this interlude begins with the words “my son” (v. 1), it does not contain all the elements of the typical introductory formula of other speeches in Proverbs. This interlude consists of three or four wisdom sayings placed together because of related topics or themes.

6:1–5. Loans. The book of Proverbs counsels against guaranteeing someone else’s loan (see 11:15; 22:26–27). This passage gives instructions on what those who have already made that mistake with a friend or a stranger should do (6:1). Some have suggested that the loan is not given to aid the needy but is a business transaction for a fee or for profit. However, the passage does not give such details. The Hebrew verb taqa’ literally means “to clap” or “to strike” but is sometimes translated idiomatically, in terms of Western culture, as “shake hands.” Contextually it refers to sealing an agreement in order to guarantee someone a loan (see also 17:18; 22:26). Verses 3–5 advise those caught in such an agreement to humble themselves before the lender and ask for mercy. Though Proverbs is against loan guarantees, it also encourages generosity in giving to the needy (22:9; 31:20).

6:6–11. Laziness. This wisdom saying draws a lesson from the diligence of the ant (vv. 6–8) and is used to rebuke the lazy (vv. 9–11). This saying resembles 24:30–34. In fact, 24:33–34 repeats 6:10–11. Although the saying in vv. 6–11 is separate from that of vv. 1–5, it is possible that they are placed next to each other because both sayings call for diligence. The counsel to the loan guarantor not to sleep (v. 4) parallels the warning against the sleep of the lazy (v. 10). Notice that wisdom is acquired by observing the natural world, learning from it, and then applying to life the lessons drawn from the acquired knowledge.

6:12–15. The Worthless Person. Proverbs refers to wisdom as acquired by observing human behavior. These verses describe a person who is beliyya’al (“worthless,” “useless”), a word usually applied to those with some type of serious character defect (see 1 Sam. 1:16; 2:12; 25:25). It often, though not always, refers to the wicked

(see Judg. 20:13; Job 34:18). Proverbs 6:12–14 describes the gestures the worthless make with different parts of their bodies. Though the cultural significance of the gestures is not fully understood in each case, the mention of the various body parts (the mouth, eyes, feet, fingers, and heart) seems to imply that the whole person is involved in wickedness. The collapse of the wicked will arrive unexpectedly and without a remedy (v. 15; marfe, “remedy,” “healing”; cf. 1 Thess. 5:3).

6:16–19. What the Lord Hates. The formula “six things...seven” (v. 16) is called a numerical saying. Sometimes the climax of a numerical sequence comes at the end. For a discussion of this formula, see commentary on 30:10–33. The list of body parts in 6:17–18 is similar, though not identical, to the list in vv. 12–14. This leads some to interpret vv. 12–19 as a single saying. Alternatively, however, these lists of body parts may simply be the reason why these two sayings are placed next to each other. Verse 19 departs from the list of body parts. The common element in the list is that God hates all these personal traits of the wicked; He even abominates/abhors them. The list is about personal traits or ethical behavior that upset the social order established by the Lord. If the climax of this numerical sequence is the last item, then the focus of this wisdom saying is on those who stir up conflict and discord in a family or community. This is similar to the expression about conflict and discord created by those who are disruptive (v. 14).

If vv. 12–19 are viewed as one wisdom saying, then sowing discord can be interpreted as the chief characteristic of the worthless. However, if vv. 12–15 and vv. 16–19 are seen as separate wisdom sayings, then the first saying is simply a depiction of various actions of the worthless and their final fate, whereas the second saying focuses on how the spreading of discord is abominable to the Lord.

6:20–35

Ninth Didactic Speech: The Consequences of Adultery

Although the speeches found in 5:1–23 and 6:20–35 are independent wisdom sayings separated by the interlude in vv. 1–19, they share the common topic of infidelity. Whereas the previous passage contrasted marital relations with extramarital relations, this time the focus is on the consequences of adultery. This lecture consists of an introduction (vv. 20–24), a body (vv. 25–29), and a conclusion (vv. 30–35).

6:20–24. Introduction. As in the typical introductory formula of lectures, the addressee is “my son.” The exhortation to accept parental instruction (vv. 20–21) is followed by a statement of the benefits of receiving it, which in this case involves wisdom’s guidance in life (vv. 22–23). The words for “command,” “law”/“teaching”/“instruction,” and “bind” (vv. 20–21), as well as the references to traveling (Heb. halak, “walking,” “roaming”) and sleeping (v. 22), echo the instruction in Deuteronomy 6:4–9 concerning God’s commandments. The light of divine instruction protects the wise from stumbling and falling from the way of life. Proverbs 6:24 can be considered either part of the introduction or the body. The term ishah ra’ in this verse is unusual in Hebrew and has been understood as a “married [adulterous] woman,” “woman of evil,” or “woman/wife of a neighbor.” The latter is the expression used in v. 29.

6:25–35. Avoid Adultery. This passage admonishes the “son” to neither nurture sexual thoughts about a seductress in his heart/mind nor allow himself to be allured by her (v. 25). Immoral behavior has a financial impact on anyone who pays for sexual favors (v. 26). Those who sexually engage another’s spouse will unquestionably reap the consequences of their action (vv. 27–29). The Hebrew of v. 26 is difficult to translate. The expression be’ad can be translated as “by means of,” “through,” or “on account of.” Some translations add “a man is reduced to” in order to make sense of the Hebrew sentence. Others have suggested translating the sentence as “the price of a harlot is as much as a loaf of bread,” but this is uncertain. Either way, here is a comparison between going to a prostitute and committing adultery. Following the first translation means that going to a prostitute brings poverty but adultery results in death. Following the second means that going to a prostitute costs a loaf of bread but adultery costs one’s life.

In terms of application, it is important to keep in mind the context of this wisdom saying. The ancient world considered adultery a more serious crime than prostitution. But the book of Proverbs (and the rest of the Bible, for that matter) never condones prostitution (23:27; 29:3). In this particular case, it simply points out that the results of adultery are more serious than the results of prostitution. The fundamental teaching is that sexual immorality in any form has serious consequences. Proverbs 6:30–33 compares adultery with stealing food. In contrast to stealing, which can be resolved, adultery does not arouse any sympathy in the eyes of others. Consequently, the honor of the adulterer will be permanently damaged. According to the passage, the ultimate reason for not committing adultery is that the husband will take vengeance against the adulterer (vv. 34–35). The grounds for the exhortation are based on an observation and an analysis of the social consequences of adultery. Nothing is said about the commandment against adultery, but reasons are provided to support its value in preserving social harmony.

7:1–27

Tenth Didactic Speech: Warning against the Adulteress

This instruction continues the series on infidelity. The three lectures are independent sayings placed in sequence because of their common theme. This one again contains an introduction (vv. 1–5), a body (vv. 6–23), and a conclusion (vv. 24–27). The body of the lecture is a narrative of a first-person observation, similar to 24:30–34. The warnings of this and similar wisdom sayings are addressed to a son. Therefore, it is important not to read too much into the fact that they picture the woman as the temptress. In terms of application, the roles could just as easily be reversed. The warning against infidelity applies equally to both genders.

7:1–5. Introduction. As in the preceding lecture, expressions such as “words” (v. 1), “commands” (vv. 1–2), torah (“law,” “teachings,” “instruction”; v. 2), “bind,” “write,” and “tablet of your heart” (v. 3) echo instructions elsewhere concerning God’s commandments. In addition to the typical lecture introduction, the “son” is also exhorted to choose wisdom in order to be kept from the seductress. Whereas chapter 5 pictures marital relations as the alternative to infidelity, 7:4–5 pictures the woman called “Wisdom” as the alternative to the seductress.

7:6–27. An Illustration. The wise observe human behavior and its consequences. Here the author of this passage first tells what he saw: a young man who was simple, who lacked wisdom and was unable to distinguish right from wrong, walking on the street where the harlot met her clients as the sun was setting and darkness was approaching (vv. 6–9). Then the author describes the woman’s attire (perhaps referring to a particular type of veil; cf. Gen. 38:14) and demeanor, which was similar to that of a wild beast seeking its prey. Once she found the young man, she attached herself to him through a kiss, a foretaste of what she would offer him (Prov. 7:10–13). The author also reports her seductive speech (vv. 14–20). She tells the young man that he should not worry about becoming ritually impure because she had offered a peace offering in fulfillment of a vow (see Lev. 3:1–17; 7:11–21), implying that she was ritually pure. Her luxurious home indicates that she was a wealthy woman, an observation confirmed by the fact that her husband was a merchant. Even though she was dressed like a harlot, she was not a prostitute but a married woman seeking an affair. She told the young man not to worry about her husband because he was away on a business trip. Finally, the wise author reports the conduct of the simple young man. Unable to resist the seductive speech of the woman, he was led by her, like a dumb animal, to the slaughter (Prov. 7:21–23).

The author observed and analyzed human behavior and finally used it to exhort his children (vv. 24–27). He depicts those who tempt others to commit adultery as murderers to emphasize the serious risks to those who succumb. An adulterer’s house is indeed the gate to Sheol/the tomb.

8:1–36

Interlude 4: Wisdom’s Offer

Chapter 8 seems to be an interlude consisting of an extended call to gain wisdom. It is also a poem exalting wisdom. As in the first interlude (1:20–33), wisdom is here personified and depicted as calling out. The passage can be outlined as follows: the setting (8:1–3), Wisdom’s introductory call (vv. 4–11), Wisdom’s self-description (vv. 12–21), Wisdom’s origin (vv. 22–31), and the conclusion (vv. 32–36).

8:1–21. Setting, Call, and Wisdom. This interlude begins with a rhetorical question by an anonymous speaker. As in 1:20–21, Wisdom’s words are here preceded and introduced by a description of Wisdom calling. Though Wisdom’s words here are not addressed to a son, they are similar to other introductions in that, like the prophets, she appeals to her audience to listen to her words (8:4–6) because they are truthful, righteous, and easy to comprehend (vv. 7–9). Verses 10–11 repeat the same structure: wisdom again urges people to receive her teaching and not place their trust in financial security because the value of her teaching is incomparable (v. 10).

In this passage, Wisdom describes her attributes and virtues (vv. 12–14), states her value to kings and rulers (vv. 15–16), and indicates the benefits/rewards for those who love her (vv. 17–21). In v. 12, Wisdom, prudence, knowledge, and discretion comprise four personified virtues. In contrast, v. 13 lists four vices that characterize the way of the wicked: pride, arrogance, evil, and perversity. Then v. 14 again lists four virtues that Wisdom possesses: counsel, sound wisdom/judgment, understanding/insight, and strength/power.

The activity of Wisdom in the latter part of v. 12 has been translated variously to mean that Wisdom finds out knowledge and discretion, Wisdom has found/possesses them, or Wisdom shows the way for people to find them. In any case, Wisdom is personified here and, hence, is portrayed in human terms (i.e., anthropomorphically). Human beings are not naturally endowed with wisdom or knowledge but must find them through the process of learning. Wisdom will show the way. Some regard the first poetic line in v. 13, which equates fearing the Lord with hating evil, as a later addition because it disrupts the meter of the poem and could have been influenced by similar statements in Proverbs and elsewhere (cf. 3:7; 16:6; Job 28:28). That is, whereas most verses contain two lines (i.e., two parallel statements), Proverbs 8:13 contains three, and this line seems to break the continuity of Wisdom's words. Nevertheless, the line is part of the final form of the Hebrew text and fits the general message of the book of Proverbs. The poetic lines in vv. 15–16 are addressed to kings, princes, and judges, but they apply to all leaders. Wisdom is indispensable to those who lead if they are going to do it well.

8:22–36. Wisdom's Origin. These verses could be described as a history of Wisdom. They can be divided topically into Wisdom before Creation (vv. 22–26) and Wisdom during Creation (vv. 27–31). Whereas the previous part of the poem began with Wisdom (v. 12), this part begins with the Lord (v. 22) and ends with a reference to humanity (v. 31). This part of the poem ends with an almost personal touch. The word sha'ashu'im ("delight") occurs twice. Verse 30 portrays Wisdom as the Creator's delight, and v. 31 portrays humankind as Wisdom's delight.

The statement regarding the Lord's relationship to Wisdom (v. 22) has been variously interpreted. The Hebrew verb used is qanah, the basic meaning of which is "to acquire." However, the specific translation depends on whether God acquired Wisdom already in existence or whether God acquired her by bringing her into existence. The first would best be translated as "to get," "to possess," or even "to purchase" (see 17:16), and the latter as "to beget," "to create." Some have suggested that these are actually two different words with identical spelling in Hebrew (i.e., homographs), but the evidence seems to support the view that these are simply two different shades of meaning of the same word. Since the context describes the beginning of Wisdom (i.e., when it was born or brought forth; 8:24–25), the translation "created" is a possibility. In this case God did not acquire an already existing entity called "Wisdom," but He created it. On the other hand, there was never a time that God was not in possession of Wisdom. It has also been suggested that the word in this context means "to beget" (which is probably the meaning in Gen. 4:1) because the language of conception and birth is used. The idea is that Wisdom came from God. But the main point of the passage is that Wisdom came into existence before the Creation of the world (Prov. 8:22–26; see below, "Proverbs 8:22 and Christ"). In vv. 32–36, Wisdom repeats her invitation. The addressees are "my children" (lit. "my sons"). There are two calls to listen to Wisdom accompanied by two statements of the blessing to be received (vv. 32–35). This is followed by a statement contrasting benefits for those who receive Wisdom with the consequences for those who reject her.

Proverbs 8:22 and Christ

In the early centuries of Christianity, there were some Christians who believed that the Son of God was not eternal but had a beginning. The most prominent among them, though certainly not the originator of this idea, was the church father Arius (A.D. 256–336), and the doctrinal debate over the Trinity came to be known as the Arian controversy. Arian Christians cited Proverbs 8, especially v. 22, as evidence that Christ had a beginning and, therefore, was not eternal. Their interpretation was based on the parallel between wisdom and Christ both existing before Creation and having a part in it (cf. John 1:1–3).

1. Wisdom as a Divine Attribute. Some scholars have viewed this passage as being directly related to Christ and His installation (cf. the birth language of Ps. 2) as Creator and eventual Mediator (due to God's foreknowledge of sin). Others have viewed the passage as being primarily related to the preeminence of Wisdom over Creation as a personified attribute of God, related to Christ only by a secondary typological application (see below).

The NT stresses the religious significance of wisdom by referring to Christ as God's Wisdom. Paul says, "Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 1:24). While in the OT divine wisdom was to some extent accessible through the created world, the NT presents God's wisdom as being revealed in the person and work of Christ. In Him "are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. 2:3). He in Himself is the Wisdom of God. In this case Wisdom is not a personified divine attribute but God Himself in human flesh. This wonderful Wisdom was God's hidden Wisdom, which was ordained for our glory before time began (1 Cor. 2:7). By becoming flesh, He brought life to repentant sinners. Such individuals are in Christ Jesus, who has become Wisdom from God for us—our Righteousness, Holiness, and Redemption (1 Cor. 1:30). We appropriate that Wisdom of God in submission to Him—in the fear of the Lord.

2. Wisdom as a Type. The personified attribute of God's wisdom in the OT seems to point, almost like a prophetic type, to the incarnated Wisdom of God in the person of His eternal Son. Without Him it is impossible to acquire true salvific wisdom. The most glorious revelation of God's wisdom is now located in the incarnation, death, resurrection, and mediation of our Lord. The revelation of divine wisdom is now uniquely present in a Person and not only in the objects of the natural world. Proverbs 8:22 should not be cited to support the notion that Christ had a beginning. Instead, both the Father and the Son claim, "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End" (Rev. 21:6; see also 1:8; 22:13). And the NT teaches that both the Father and the Son are eternal.

9:1–18

Epilogue: Two Banquets

Chapter 9 is the last wisdom saying in the first major section of the book. It is possible that the poem is placed here not as an epilogue but simply because the interlude that immediately precedes it (chap. 8) contains an invitation by wisdom. Nevertheless, the contrasting invitations of Wisdom and Folly in chapter 9 make it a fitting climax to the section. It seems, therefore, just as likely that the placement of chapter 8 would have been influenced by chapter 9 as the other way around. The epilogue may be outlined in three parts: the invitation of Wisdom (vv. 1–6), the scoffers and the wise (vv. 7–12), and the invitation of Folly (vv. 13–18). The message of these contrasting invitations is a call to choose a way of life.

9:1–6. Wisdom's Invitation. These verses consist of the invitation/call of Wisdom. Wisdom is described as having built her house (v. 1), prepared her banquet (v. 2), and sent out the invitation (v. 3). Verses 4–6 contain her words of invitation. The seven pillars/columns (v. 1) suggest a large building. Some of the houses of rich families in ancient Israel did indeed have columns facing a courtyard; some even had seven columns. The number seven conveys the notion of completeness. Thus, both the columns and the number seven convey a picture of the greatness of the house. The size of the house shows how much Wisdom has to offer. Accepting the invitation and partaking of her food and drink (wine mixed with water) in her house means learning wisdom—and there is enough to last a lifetime.

9:7–12. The Scoffers and the Wise. Some scholars suggest that these verses constitute a later insertion because they seem out of place. But it should suffice to say that, in their present context, these verses offer a contrast between those who accept Wisdom's invitation (the wise) and those who accept Folly's invitation (the scoffers). Verses 7–9 discourage correcting scoffers because nothing good could come out of it but encourage correcting the wise because they will respond positively. Verse 10 repeats a common theme in Proverbs, the fear of the Lord.

In v. 11 Wisdom seems to refer to herself again in the first person, promising long life to those who possess and follow her. Verse 12 returns to the topic of vv. 7–9 and contrasts the wise with scoffers. The point is that they must bear the consequences of their own response to Wisdom.

9:13–18. Folly's Invitation. Folly is personified as a foolish woman. Like Wisdom, Folly is pictured as giving a loud invitation (vv. 13–15). There is, however, no description of her building a house or preparing her banquet. Verses 16–17 contain the words of her invitation to the simple/naïve, the same group that is addressed by Wisdom (v. 4). Interestingly, Folly herself is described as simple (v. 13). Although the stolen water in v. 17 may be an allusion to illicit sexual enjoyment (see 5:15–20), the imagery of stolen drink and secret food probably applies to all illicit activities (see 1:10–14). The words lekhem setarim (“bread of secrecy”) can mean either that the bread was secretly obtained or that it was eaten secretly. The words in 9:18 are not Folly's words but state that death is the result of following Folly. Proverbs offers only two options: following Madam Wisdom or Madam Folly. The choice is a matter of life or death.

10:1—22:16

PROVERBS OF SOLOMON

This section contains wisdom sayings that are short and less closely connected. Some sayings are placed next to each other not because they address the same topic but because a word occurs in both sayings (see 22:5–6). Therefore, these proverbs are harder to group, and it is not always possible to discern thematic subsections. There is no overarching theme running through the entire section. Each proverb generally provides its own context, and the proverbs occurring before and after are not necessarily related to it. Hence, each wisdom saying in this section is a separate saying and should generally be individually interpreted.

Nevertheless, this section can be roughly divided into two major subdivisions, though neither the twofold division nor the exact boundary between the subsections is precise. The subdivision in 10:2—15:33 contains more antitheses and sayings about the righteous and the wicked than 16:1—22:16, which in turn has a greater variety in terms of structure and topics. Although the sayings in this section cannot be thematically organized, there are a few clusters of sayings where some themes are prominent. Yet, even within those clusters, there are sayings that are not related to their prominent themes. Since most of the individual sayings in chapters 10–22 are clear and easy to understand, the ensuing discussion will not comment on every proverb but will focus on words or expressions that require clarification or whose relevance needs to be highlighted.

10:1—15:33

Introduction and First Subdivision

Proverbs 10:1 introduces the section and includes a title and an introduction. The first part of the verse consists of the title or heading of the section. The section is a collection of different proverbs of Solomon. He may have intended them for his children, but they speak to a wider audience as well.

Although there is no overarching theme in either the first or second subdivision of this section, chapters 10–15 contain a significant number of wisdom sayings about the righteous. They also consist mostly of antitheses, with only a few exceptions (see 11:29–30; 12:14; 13:14, 19; 14:7, 13, 26–27; 15:3, 10–12, 30–31). Further, many of the sayings in this section are chiasmic in structure. It is worth noting that the righteous/upright are contrasted not only with the wicked but occasionally with fools (10:21), those who trust in riches (11:28), and the lazy (15:19). Also, the wicked seem to be contrasted with those who fear the Lord (10:27). Hence, there is a sense in which righteousness is equivalent to wisdom and all its good attributes (including the fear of the Lord), whereas wickedness is equivalent to folly and all its bad attributes. Chapters 10–15 most clearly bring out that wisdom entails righteousness. To be wise means to be righteous, and it is impossible to be wise without living righteously.

10:2—11:31. The Righteous and the Wicked.

Although the whole subdivision (chaps. 10–15) contains many sayings about the righteous and the wicked, chapters 10–11 contain the densest group of such sayings (10:2–3, 6–7, 9–11, 16–21, 23–25, 27–32; 11:1, 3–11, 18–21, 23, 28–31). A number of sayings focus on the speech of the righteous or the wicked (see 10:6, 11; 11:9). A few of the sayings that do not explicitly mention the righteous or the wicked also focus on speech (see 10:8, 10, 13–14; 11:13).

The wording of many wisdom sayings allows them to be classified under more than one topic, and a few sayings are clustered together by common themes. The result is an interweaving of many themes. In addition to clusters of sayings whose main common topic is the contrast between the righteous and the wicked (as noted already), this group of sayings also contains single proverbs and clusters of proverbs that deal with wealth and righteousness (10:2–3), diligence and laziness (vv. 4–5, 26), speech (vv. 6, 8, 10–14, 18–21; 11:9, 13), the wise and fools (10:8, 13–14; 11:12), hatred and love (10:12), the rich and the poor (vv. 15, 22), pride and humility (11:2), the talebearer or gossip (v. 13), counsel and guidance (v. 14), being a surety/security (v. 15), honor and riches (v. 16), mercy and cruelty (v. 17), the beautiful and unwise woman (v. 22), generosity (vv. 24–26), and seeking good and evil (v. 27).

In a few instances, verses are placed next to each other not because they share the same topic but because they both contain the same word. For example, both 10:6 and 7 contain the Hebrew word berakah (“blessing”), while both vv. 11 and 12 contain the verb “to cover.” Since the meaning of most wisdom sayings in these verses is clear, only a few isolated verses deserve further comment. That the rich find safety in their wealth but poverty brings ruin to the poor should be understood as descriptive rather than prescriptive (v. 15). That is, it is not advice, but simply an observation. In the second part of 11:7, some translations follow the Septuagint, which uses the Greek word asebōn (“ungodly”). The Hebrew text has the word ʾonim (“wealth,” “riches”). The meanings are similar: hope based on wealth will perish, and the hopes of the ungodly will also perish.

In 11:21, the expression yad leyad (lit. “hand in hand”), a Hebrew expression that could mean “be assured” or “certainly,” is sometimes translated as referring to the wicked “joining forces” (i.e., joining hands; see 16:5). Hence, 11:21 states the certainty of the rewards of the wicked and the righteous. Verse 30 also deserves some comment. The meaning of its first part is clear (i.e., righteousness results in a long life). The beautiful metaphor does not refer to the fruit of the tree but states that the tree is the fruit. However, the meaning of its second part is not as clear. Some translations render loqeahk nepshot as “he who wins souls.” Some have associated this verse with the modern expression that refers to evangelism or the proclamation of the gospel. But the Hebrew word nepesh can mean “life” rather than “soul.” In fact, the Hebrew verb laqakh (“to take”), coupled with nepesh (“soul,” “life”), normally means “to kill” or “to take life” (see 1:19; Ezek. 33:6; Jon. 4:3). In Proverbs 11:30, however, it could be that the Hebrew verb laqakh is being used in a positive sense. That is, just as righteousness results in a long life, so the wisdom of the wise, if listened to, gathers/saves life, both that of the wise themselves and of others (see 13:14 for a proverb with a similar message).

12:1—15:33. Miscellaneous Sayings. In addition to clusters of sayings whose common topic is primarily the contrast between the righteous and the wicked (12:5–7, 12–13; 13:5–6; 15:28–29), there are verses and clusters of verses that address topics such as wisdom and folly (see 12:1, 15–16; 13:1, 13–16; 14:1, 6–8; 15:5, 7), diligence and laziness (see 12:11, 24, 27; 13:4; 15:19), wise speech (see 12:14, 17–20, 25; 13:2–3; 15:1–2, 4, 23), wealth and poverty (see 13:7–8, 22–23; 14:20–21, 31), pride (see 13:10), the discipline of children (see v. 24), the fear of the Lord (14:26–27; 15:25–26, 29), strife (vv. 16–18), and the need for counsel/guidance (see v. 22).

Child Discipline in Proverbs

Some passages in Proverbs deserve to be briefly discussed because they have been understood as commanding corporal punishment. For example, 13:24 says that parents who spare the rod hate their children but those who discipline them demonstrate their love for them. Most of these passages use the word “rod” (Heb. shebet; 10:13; 13:24; 22:8, 15; 23:13–14; 26:3; 29:15). There are other passages that do not use the word rod but that may also refer to corporal punishment (see 19:18).

1. Contextual Considerations. Such passages must be read in the larger context of Proverbs and of the ancient Near East in general, where the use of corporal punishment was not only a parenting technique but a general form of punishment. For example, Proverbs also mentions corporal punishment applied to adults (see 10:13; 17:26; 19:29;

20:30; 26:3), which, incidentally, was sometimes administered with anger (22:8). In fact, corporal punishment was also applied to slaves even in NT times (see Luke 12:47–48). Though it may have been acceptable to beat or whip an adult wrongdoer in the ancient Near East, that does not justify continuing such a practice today (slavery was also common in the ancient Near East). Thus, a proper contextual application of passages concerning the rod teaches the need for age-appropriate discipline but does not prescribe the specific form of discipline.

2. Hebrew Terminology for Discipline. It is instructive to understand some of the Hebrew words used in combination with the rod. One of these is the word musar (“instruction”), which occurs thirty times in the book (see 1:8; 3:11; 13:1, 24; 15:5, 33; 19:20, 27; 22:15; 23:12–14; 24:32). This term is not limited to contexts referring to raising children (23:12) and may be used in contexts where physical punishment is involved (see Jer. 2:30; 30:14), but it primarily refers to oral instructions (see Jer. 17:23; 32:33; 35:13). It is accompanied by the verb “to listen” in Proverbs 19:27 (cf. 23:12), and it parallels Hebrew words such as torah (“teaching,” “law”; 1:8), ’etsah (“counsel,” “advice”; 19:20), and da’at (“knowledge”). The word “rod” (shebet) also occurs in combination with the Hebrew tokakhat (“reproof,” “reprimand,” “correction”; 29:15). The two words tokakhat and musar also occur in combination with each other (cf. 3:11; 15:5). Further, musar is a noun formed from the root yasar, which is also used in the context of parenting (see 19:18; 29:17; 31:1) and can mean either “to instruct” or “to discipline.” On the one hand, yasar in the sense of “to discipline” can refer to punishment (see Deut. 22:18) and can be translated as “chasten,” “discipline” (Prov. 19:18), “correct,” or “reprove” (9:7; 29:17, 19). Alternatively, however, yasar in the sense of “to instruct” can refer to teaching rather than punishment, such as the proverbs that King Lemuel’s mother “taught” him (31:1; see also Is. 28:26). Therefore, the passages in Proverbs that are relevant to parenting do not always deal with discipline or punishment (see Prov. 22:6), and what the book emphasizes more than discipline is the need for parental teaching and instruction. Thus, the application of “the rod” must always be accompanied by a loving explanation of what the parents are trying to teach the child. And happy is the wise child who accepts instruction without the need for discipline (19:25; 21:11).

In summary, Proverbs, read in its proper context, neither requires nor forbids corporal punishment in the upbringing of children but rather teaches the need for parental instruction, which on occasion may need to be accompanied by age-appropriate discipline.

In a few instances, sayings are placed next to each other because they both contain the same word or expression. For example, the Hebrew word tob (“good”) is the last word in 13:21 and the first word in v. 22. The word leb (“heart”) occurs at the beginning of both 15:13 and 14, and tob (here usually translated as “better”) again occurs at the beginning of both vv. 16 and 17. These two verse pairs are connected by v. 15, which contains both words in the Hebrew expression tob leb (“good of heart”), meaning “a happy mind” or “a cheerful/merry heart.” It is also possible that vv. 8 and 9 are placed next to each other because both verses contain the expression to’ebat Yahweh (“an abomination to the Lord,” “the Lord detests”).

A few sayings are related by both thematic and verbal links. For example, dabar (“word,” “instruction”) and mitsvah (“command”) occur in 13:13, and torah (“law,” “instruction”) occurs in v. 14. Thus, in addition to the fact that both verses share the common theme of the importance of listening to advice—a theme that is also reflected in some other sayings in this section (see vv. 10, 18)—they are also connected by the use of words with similar meanings.

A number of wisdom sayings are purely descriptive. For example, v. 12 states that delay in the fulfillment of a desire discourages the heart, but its fulfillment is like a tree of life. This is not an admonition but a psychological observation. It is possible that v. 12 is placed here because v. 11 speaks of gathering by slow labor. However, v. 12 deals with fulfillment versus nonfulfillment rather than gradual fulfillment. Other examples of descriptive sayings are found in vv. 7, 21, 23; 14:5, 10; 15:13. It is important to read 13:21 in the context of wisdom literature: the statement that evil pursues sinners but the righteous are repaid with good is not an inviolable rule but a general description of truth (i.e., it tends to happen this way, but exceptions do occur).

Though the meaning of most sayings is clear and needs no comment, it is appropriate to make some remarks concerning a few specific verses. In 12:4, the expression eshet hayil ("excellent wife," "wife of noble character," "virtuous wife") is the same Hebrew expression as in 31:10. The saying in 12:12 presents difficulties in interpretation, as can be seen in the various ways modern versions have translated it. Notwithstanding the technical problems, the verse states that the righteous will prosper. In v. 14, the word gemul can mean "recompense," or it can also mean "deed" or "work." The message is that both the fruit of the mouth and the deed of the hands (i.e., speech and actions) will bring their own consequences.

Another difficult passage is v. 26. Various suggestions have been made to read the Hebrew text differently. In its present form, the Hebrew word tur can be translated in such a way as to imply either the idea of the cautiousness of the righteous in choosing friends or the ability of the righteous to guide others well. The text contrasts being on the right path with being on the wrong one.

The saying in 13:8 has been variously interpreted since the Hebrew word at the end of the verse (ge'arah) can mean either "rebuke" or "threat." Accordingly, some suggest that the verse teaches that whereas the rich can pay their way out of trouble, the poor do not heed threats because they have nothing to lose.

The two lines in v. 19 seem unrelated and have been variously interpreted. One interpretation is that they provide the context for each other. In other words, since a fulfilled desire is sweet to the soul (first line), fools do not want to depart from evil (second line). If this interpretation is correct, v. 19 is descriptive rather than prescriptive.

The expression sometimes translated as "the wise woman" in 14:1 is similar to an expression found in Judges 5:29 that refers to the wisest ladies and, hence, could mean "the wisest women." However, because the rest of the sentence is in the singular, some have suggested correcting the Hebrew text to read "wisdom" instead of "wise ones" (i.e., "the wisdom of women"), but this is unnecessary since the contrast in Proverbs 14:1 is between wisdom and folly.

In v. 14, some translate me'alayv (lit. "from upon him") as "from above," but others suggest correcting the Hebrew text to read mimma' alayw ("by his deeds"). Again, such changes are unnecessary. The text is making a clear point, namely, that both the backslider and the good receive the consequences of their own actions.

Proverbs 15:19 contrasts the lazy with the righteous rather than the lazy with the diligent or the righteous with the wicked. The contrast between the lazy and the righteous also occurs in 21:25–26.

16:1—22:16

Second Subdivision

The exact place where the first subdivision of this section ends and the second one begins is not completely clear though, as already mentioned, there seems to be a difference between the two subdivisions in terms of the structure of the sayings. This second subdivision contains a few groups of sayings clustered around common themes. However, most of its sayings are best read individually rather than as part of a cluster. In addition to the few clusters of sayings, there are also individual sayings concerning good and bad speech (17:4, 9, 27–28; 18:4; 20:15, 19; 21:23; 22:11), false testimony (19:5, 9, 28; 21:28), riches and poverty (17:1, 5; 19:17; 21:17, 20; 22:1–2, 7, 16) being a surety/security (17:18; 20:16), disciplining children (19:18; 22:6, 15), honoring parents (19:26; 20:20), conflict (17:1, 14; 20:3; 21:9, 19; 22:10), anger (16:32; 19:11), friendship (18:19), diligence and laziness (v. 9; 19:24; 20:4, 13; 21:5, 25; 22:13), wisdom and folly (17:2; 21:22; 22:3), divine sovereignty (16:33; 19:21; 20:24; 21:30–31), the fear of the Lord (22:4), righteousness/honesty and wickedness (20:7, 10; 21:3–4; 22:5), justice (17:26; 18:5), kings (19:12; 20:2, 8, 26, 28; 22:11), the blessing of a good wife (18:22; 19:14), the grief of a contentious wife (19:13; 21:9, 19), drunkenness (20:1), vows (v. 25), adultery (22:14), and other topics.

16:1–9. Wisdom Sayings about Divine Sovereignty. This cluster of wisdom sayings consists of a group of independent sayings that share the theme of divine sovereignty. It is possible that this cluster actually begins in 15:33 since that verse also mentions the Lord (cf. 16:9). In 16:1, the heart stands for the internal processes, such as thoughts and plans, whereas the tongue stands for speech or, more broadly, that which eventually comes out. Hence, people may plan, but it is God who controls the outcome. The message of v. 2 is similar to 21:2; that is, we may think ourselves pure, but it is God who is the ultimate judge.

The saying in 16:3 states that God will honor and establish the plans of those who submit their lives to Him. Next, in v. 4, the text discusses the fact that the Lord has made everything for His ma'aneh. This word means “answer” or “purpose,” but some translate it as “for Himself,” which might convey some of both nuances. Most commentators prefer the idea of “purpose.” Thus, the statement that God made the wicked for the day of doom not only implies that they will not escape the judgment but also serves as an illustration of His sovereignty. The Lord uses all things, even the wicked, to accomplish His purposes (cf. Rom. 8:28).

The saying in Proverbs 16:5 condemns pride (on the expression translated as “joining forces” or “being assured,” see commentary on 10:2–11:31). The parallelism in 16:6 is interesting: the words khesed (“mercy,” “love,” “loyalty,” “steadfast love”) and 'emet (“faithfulness,” “truth,” “trust”) usually refer to attributes of God (see Gen. 24:27; Ex. 34:6–7; Deut. 7:9; Pss. 25:10; 26:3; 40:11), which Proverbs exhorts people to emulate (Prov. 3:3). If those terms refer to God’s character, then the basis for atonement is His mercy and truth. The second part of the proverb would describe the human response to divine atonement. The fear of the Lord is powerful enough to turn us away from evil. Proverbs 16:6 would remind us that forgiveness and atonement must coexist with a life lived according to God’s will. Though forgiveness comes through God’s grace and not through our good works, a changed life is evidence of that grace. An alternative interpretation, although perhaps less likely, would be based on the fact that the Hebrew word for “atone” (kipper) occurs only twice in Proverbs, here and in v. 14, where it refers to appeasing the king’s anger. It is possible that v. 6 may refer not to atonement in the sight of God but to reconciliation among people (i.e., acts of kindness help others forgive previous wrongs).

Verses 7–8 provide a contrast with v. 5. Instead of what is detestable/an abomination to the Lord (v. 5), vv. 7–8 describe the results of pleasing God.

Verse 9 is similar to v. 1, though the contrast here is between heart and steps rather than heart and tongue. Together, vv. 1 and 9 provide an envelope structure surrounding wisdom sayings focusing on God’s sovereignty.

16:10–19. Wisdom Sayings about the King.

These sayings are grouped together around the theme of the king. The placement of v. 10 may be due to the word qesem, which refers to some kind of a supernatural statement (see Jer. 14:14) that usually involves forbidden occult practices (Deut. 18:10). In this context, it does not refer to the occult but compares the king’s words to a divinely inspired verdict, which then becomes the reason why he is urged to pronounce just sentences. Thus, qesem connects the two clusters of sayings on divine sovereignty and on the king.

Proverbs 16:11 is not directly related to the previous verse but is placed here probably because honest weights/balances and scales are relevant to the king’s duty to carry out justice (vv. 10, 12). The placement of v. 11 may also be due to the fact that mishpat (“justice,” “judgment”) occurs in both v. 10 and v. 11 (there conveying the idea of “honest” or “just”).

Verses 12–13 use two words from the Hebrew root tsadaq (“to be right”): righteousness (v. 12) and righteous, implying honest speech (v. 13). A king who seeks righteousness detests wickedness (v. 12) but delights in words that are upright and honest (v. 13). Just as vv. 12–13 contrast what the king detests and what he delights in, so vv. 14–15 contrast the king’s wrath with his favor. In fact, the same Hebrew word (ratson, “pleasure,” “acceptance,” “favor,” “will”) occurs in both vv. 13 and 15. Verse 14 compares the king’s anger, which only the wise can appease, to a death sentence (cf. v. 6). In v. 15, the king’s favor is compared to the latter/spring rain. The early/autumn rain (around October/November) and the latter/spring rain (around March/April) mark the beginning and end of the winter rainy season. Both are important for the growth of crops (Deut. 11:14). The proper timing of the rainy season was seen as God’s blessing (Joel 2:23; Zech. 10:1), and the withholding of rain as His displeasure (Jer. 3:13; Amos 4:7). This section closes with a few miscellaneous wisdom sayings addressing the topics of wisdom’s surpassing value (Prov. 16:16), the upright path (v. 17), and pride and humility (vv. 18–19).

16:20–30. Wisdom and Speech. This cluster of sayings connects wisdom and wise speech. Verses 20 to 23 describe some of the benefits of wisdom. In v. 20, the Hebrew word dabar can mean “word,” “matter,” or “thing,” so alternative readings are “the one who heeds the word” or “he who is prudent [Heb. sakal, “to act with insight”] in a matter.” Either way, this parallels trusting in the Lord and results in finding that which is good and in being happy. Verse 21 states that those who are wise in heart are recognized by others as prudent/discerning, and from their lips flows a sweet increase of knowledge. Such sekel (“prudence,” “insight,” “understanding”) is like a wellspring of life for those who possess it. It enriches the quality of their lives (v. 22). This is contrasted with the correction of fools, which has been interpreted and translated as referring to the discipline that fools receive what they give. In the first sense, the proverb says either that it is foolish to discipline fools or that fools will be disciplined because of their folly. In the second sense, it means that the discipline/instruction that fools give amounts to foolishness. The understanding found in the heart of the wise teaches their mouths what to say and adds learning/instruction to their lips (v. 23).

True wisdom determines what will come out of a person’s mouth. The pleasant or gracious words coming from the mouth/lips of the wise are like honeycomb in that they make life (lit. “the soul”) enjoyable and the body (“the bones”) healthy (v. 24). That is, they enrich the whole being, not only the mind. Verse 25 is a repetition of 14:12 and deals with the way people choose to live their lives and the need of wisdom to avoid death. The thought of death leads almost naturally to the idea of self-preservation. In 16:26, the Hebrew word nepesh (lit. “soul”) is used in the sense of “appetite,” as it is sometimes translated. That is, a person’s hunger serves as motivation to work.

Verse 27 returns to the topic of speech. The ungodly are interested in searching for what is evil, and once they find it, it becomes like a burning, scorching fire on their lips, damaging both the speaker and the listener. The image worsens in v. 28, which describes a perverse person, a whisperer/gossip (from the Heb. ragan “to slander”) who spreads strife and damages friendships. The next proverb then turns from those who spread strife to the violent who entice others and lead them into an evil way of life (v. 29). This group of proverbs concludes with a reference to those who express evil intentions through body language, like winking or pursing/compressing their lips (v. 30).

16:31—21:2. Miscellaneous Sayings. These verses include wisdom sayings on a variety of topics (see commentary on 16:1—22:16). Since the meaning of most sayings is clear, the comments below focus primarily on verses that need clarification or explanation. As elsewhere in the book, some wisdom sayings are only descriptive rather than prescriptive. For example, 17:8 describes the effectiveness of a shokhad (“gift,” “present,” “bribe”). This is not an encouragement to resort to bribes but only an observation from the perspective of the giver. Other possible short-term benefits of bribes or gifts are mentioned in 21:14 (if referring to a bribe, this would also be descriptive rather than prescriptive), but bribes are also condemned directly because they are used to pervert justice (see 15:27; 17:23). Similarly, the “gift” in 18:16 could be understood as a “bribe” (see 21:14), in which case this is also a descriptive rather than prescriptive proverb.

Other descriptive sayings include the comparison between gossip and delicious food (18:8), the contrast between the rich and the poor (v. 23; 19:4, 6–7; 22:7), and the description of a buyer’s attitude (20:14). The word “heart” in 17:16 refers to “mind,” “sense,” “intention,” or “understanding,” and it is often so translated. Thus, the meaning of the verse is that there is no point in fools having money to buy wisdom since they have no understanding.

The sayings in 18:4–8 are loosely related. Verse 5 condemns improper verdicts in the context of court proceedings. Verse 6 is placed after v. 5 because of the Hebrew word rib (“argument,” “strife,” “contention”), which is often used in the context of litigation. Verses 6–7 convey similar messages (i.e., fools bring trouble on themselves by their words). They also have a chiasmic relationship: v. 6 has the sequence of lips then mouth, and v. 7 has the reverse sequence, mouth then lips. In addition, though vv. 4 and 8 are not directly related, both concern speech, namely, the speech of the wise (v. 4) and the words of a talebearer/gossip (v. 8). Since vv. 10 and 11 are placed next to each other, it is possible to read them in contrast to each other to say that the rich consider their wealth as their safety (v. 11), but it is the Lord who is the safety of the righteous (v. 10). However, it is best to see v. 11 as a descriptive proverb (see 10:15). Probably the main reason why 18:10 and 11 are juxtaposed is that the Hebrew verb sagab (“to be inaccessible/protected”) occurs in both verses, implying safety in v. 10 and height in v. 11.

The practice of casting lots was common in the ancient world (18:18; Lev. 16:8; Num. 26:55; 1 Sam. 14:41–42; Jonah 1:7; Acts 1:22–26). Since the Hebrew word goral also expresses the idea of destiny or fate (Is. 17:14; Dan. 12:13), casting lots was believed to be a supernaturally guided way of determining God’s will (Prov. 16:33). It was also used in secular settings as a way of making decisions (Joel 3:3; Obad. 11; John 19:22–24), similar to the modern-day practice of tossing a coin. This proverb suggests that some issues cannot be resolved without resorting to casting lots.

The sayings in 18:20–21 both figuratively describe a person's speech as the fruit of the mouth, which in turn is eaten by the speaker. Both proverbs teach the importance of wise speech. The exact meaning of v. 24 is not clear. In Hebrew, there is a play on the words re'im and hitro'ea', which some translate as "A man who has friends must himself be friendly." However, the second verb can be understood as "to smash together" or "break in pieces." Hence, some interpret it negatively to mean that those who have many friends may "come to ruin" or "be harmed" (by the friends). Others have suggested a slight change in the Hebrew text to read "to associate with." If so, the message of this proverb may be that there are different kinds of friends; that is, there are friends who simply "associate" with you, and there are friends who are closer than brothers.

The interpretation of 19:2 depends primarily on the meaning of the Hebrew word nepesh (lit. "soul"), which can have several possible meanings, at least two of which could fit this context. If the word is used in the sense of a "living being" (i.e., "person"), the proverb speaks of those who lack knowledge, whose haste results in sin. If the word simply means "desire," "craving," "zeal," or "passion," the proverb warns against ignorant passion. If so, the Hebrew word khata' (usually translated as "to sin") could be understood in the sense of "to miss the mark" or "to err." The idea then is that ignorant passion and haste result in making mistakes. In other words, "haste makes waste." The sayings in vv. 13–14 are not related but are juxtaposed because both verses mention father and wife. The proverb in v. 18 can be understood in different ways. It is possible to read it as advice to correct children but not so harshly as to cause their death. On the other hand, in light of similar passages in the book (see 13:24; 23:14), it is more likely that this proverb asserts that failing to correct children is like wishing for their destruction (cf. comments on vv. 12–14).

The Hebrew word khesed ("goodness," "love," "mercy"), used in 20:6, often has the connotation of "covenant loyalty." The contrast in this verse is between the large number who claim to be loyal and the few who are truly faithful. In v. 19, the last clause has been variously translated because the Hebrew verb patah could mean "to be simple/naïve" or "to be wide/open." Whether it refers to those who are naïve with their lips or those who are open with their lips, both possibilities fit the context and express the idea of avoiding either those who flatter or those who say too much. The message of v. 21 is very similar to that of 13:11, though the wording of the two proverbs is different. Both warn against the danger of wealth gained without honest labor.

The sayings in 21:1–3 all mention the Lord. Verse 1 asserts the Lord's sovereignty over kings. Verse 2, which is similar to 16:2, states that the Lord is the ultimate judge of the heart. Verse 3 says the Lord loves righteousness and justice more than sacrifice (cf. 1 Sam. 15:22; Mic. 6:6–8). This, in turn, initiates a cluster of wisdom sayings in which the contrast between the righteous and the wicked is very frequent.

21:3–29. The Righteous and the Wicked. This cluster of proverbs is similar to the first cluster in the first subdivision of this section (10:2–11:31) in that it contains a larger than usual concentration of sayings about the righteous and/or the wicked (21:3–4, 7–8, 10, 12, 15, 18, 21, 25–27, 29). However, as in the earlier cluster, there are also many sayings that do not directly mention the righteous or the wicked (vv. 5–6, 9, 11, 13–14, 16–17, 19, 20, 22–24, 28). The sayings in vv. 11 and 12 probably occur next to each other because both use the Hebrew verb sakal ("to have insight"). In v. 11, it refers to the instruction that the wise receive (or, according to some renderings, it refers to paying attention to the wise); in v. 12, it refers to observing/considering the house of the wicked. "The righteous one" is probably a reference to God (some translations imply this by either inserting the word "God" or by capitalizing "One"). If this is a reference to God, it is the only instance in Proverbs where God is called righteous.

The sayings in vv. 25–26 can be read either as two separate sayings or one long saying. Verse 25 describes the lazy, who have intense desires but refuse to work to achieve them, whereas v. 26 contrasts greedy desire with the generosity of the righteous. It is also possible to read the two verses as one wisdom saying, in which case there is a contrast between the lazy and the righteous (see also 15:19). The claim in the first line of 21:28 that a false witness will perish is clear, but there is some difficulty with the second line. The one who hears could be understood as hearing the false witness or simply as being a good listener, which is a trait of the wise (see 18:13). The word lanetsakh can mean "forever," "successfully," or "victoriously."

21:30—22:16. Miscellaneous Sayings. These verses include wisdom sayings on a variety of topics (see commentary on 16:1–22:16).

Though these sayings are independent units, some are placed next to each other because of common themes or words. The sayings in 21:30–31 both deal with divine sovereignty. Similarly, the sayings in 22:5–6 are probably placed next to each other because both verses speak of a “way” or “path”: the way of the wicked, those who are ‘iqqesh (“crooked,” “perverse”; v. 5), and the way that a child should go (v. 6). Some verses deserve a brief comment. The saying in v. 2 is similar to 29:13. Whereas 22:2 compares the rich and the poor, 29:13 compares the poor and the oppressor. Both passages teach that all are equal in the sight of God, and both may serve as a warning to the rich and powerful not to exploit the poor. In 22:6, the Hebrew word khanak (“train,” “start off,” “dedicate”) could also mean “to initiate” (Deut. 20:5; 1 Kin. 8:63). The proverb teaches that if parents “initiate” children in the way they should go (Heb. ‘al pi darko, lit. “upon the mouth of his way”), they will not depart from it even in old age.

22:17—24:22

THIRTY SAYINGS OF THE WISE

The wisdom sayings in this section consist of a mix of short sayings and slightly longer sayings. They are also miscellaneous in nature with no discernible overarching theme. The Hebrew expression used in 22:20 can mean “excellent things” or may, alternatively, mean “thirty sayings” (see below, “Excellent Things or Thirty Sayings?”). There is a general consensus that there are thirty sayings in this section, though there is some disagreement on how to divide them.

Excellent Things or Thirty Sayings?

1. Textual Problem. There is a Hebrew expression in 22:20 which has been translated as “excellent things” or “thirty sayings.” This may be explained as follows. First, the Hebrew word dabar (v. 17, assumed to be the referent in v. 20) can mean not only a “thing” but also a “word” or “saying.” Second, there is some uncertainty concerning another word which has occasioned both textual and translational questions. The main text of the Hebrew Bible reads shilshom, which has been translated by some as “the day before yesterday,” but shilshom carries that meaning only in the phrase temol shilshom (“yesterday and the previous day”; see Ex. 5:8). Besides, it does not seem to fit the context. There is a scribal reading tradition (preserved in the margin of the manuscripts) that assumes that the text is misspelled and corrects it to shalishim (lit. “the third man”), which designates “a military officer.” The translation “excellent” has been derived from this without any linguistic basis. In any case, this suggestion does not fit the context.

2. Possible Solution. Scholars usually modify the Hebrew text (changing only the vowels, not the original consonants) from shilshom to sheloshim (“thirty”). They argue that this is contextually supported because there are thirty sayings in this section of Proverbs. This modification of the Hebrew text was to some extent suggested by the discovery and publication of an Egyptian wisdom document called Instructions of Amenemope in 1922. Scholars began to notice similarities between Proverbs and the Egyptian document. Since the latter consists of thirty chapters and this section of Proverbs also consists of thirty sayings, most scholars conclude that the best reading of the Hebrew text is sheloshim, “thirty.”

Moreover, it is important to note that the translation “thirty sayings” is not completely dependent on the supposed similarities between Proverbs and Amenemope. First, the similarities between the two occur mostly in the sayings in Proverbs 22:17–23:11. There are fewer similarities in 23:12–24:22, though these may have similarities to other documents from ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature. In some cases the similarities are not convincing. Second, this solution was first proposed by Felix Perles in 1906, a decade and a half before the publication of Amenemope. However, Perles had in mind the thirty(-one) chapters of the book of Proverbs. In the final analysis, the suggestion to read “thirty” instead of “excellent” remains hypothetical, but it does clarify the contextual meaning of a difficult Hebrew phrase.

22:17—23:9*Sayings One through Ten

Proverbs 22:17–21 contains the first of the so-called thirty sayings and also serves as an introduction to them. The message of these verses consists of an exhortation to listen/pay attention (lit. “incline your ear”) to wisdom, meaning not only to pay close attention to it but to organize life accordingly. The end result of embracing wisdom is being able to trust in the Lord, whose wisdom is unfathomable, and gaining a clear understanding of the certain and reliable truth for the purpose of teaching others (v. 21).

The second saying calls for caring for and protecting the poor and afflicted by defending their legal rights (vv. 22–23). The primary motivation is that God cares for them and will take up their cause. Similar statements depicting the Lord as the defender of the defenseless can be found in 15:25 and 23:10–11.

The third proverb points to the danger of being friends with a person who is controlled by anger, lacks self-control, and is hot-tempered (22:24–25). Friendship with them would imply support for their behavior. Their influence ruins the lives of those who learn to behave like them.

According to the fourth saying, it is not wise to assume responsibility for the debts of others (vv. 26–27). If debtors do not pay, whose who guarantee their debts have to pay for them. As a result, what they have will be taken from them. The warning of this saying is similar to that of 6:15; 11:15; and 17:18.

The fifth saying is about respecting the landmarks/boundary stones that served as property markers (22:28). It was illegal to move these boundary markers, which would have been equivalent to stealing land (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; see also Prov. 15:25; 23:10–11).

Instead of stealing, the sixth saying commends diligence in work that enables the wise to serve/stand before those in the highest places in the land (i.e., kings; Prov. 22:29). Self-development is encouraged as a tool for effective service.

Proper behavior in the presence of those who rule is an expression of true wisdom, according to the seventh saying (23:1–3). Those who eat with rulers should control their appetite because the food is deceptive food (v. 3); that is, the person offering it may have some hidden agenda.

The eighth saying raises the topic of wealth and warns against making its acquisition a goal (vv. 4–5). Riches are like a mirage, seen one moment and then suddenly disappearing. They are like a bird that is here now and then flies away.

The ninth saying returns to the topic of food, counseling against accepting an invitation to eat with a person who is stingy or selfish (vv. 6–8). Such a host speaks hypocritically, causing the guest’s stomach to reject the ingested food. Even the good words expressed during the meal are wasted.

The tenth saying unpacks what is insinuated in the previous one (v. 9). It stresses the futility of giving counsel to fools, who despise words of wisdom and insightful thoughts (cf. 9:7, 8; Matt. 7:6).

23:10—24:4*Sayings Eleven to Twenty-One

The eleventh saying is similar to that of 22:28. Both proverbs encourage respect for the property of others, but the emphasis here is on taking the land of the fatherless/orphan (23:10). The reason given is that there is a mighty Redeemer/Defender who will take up their case in court (cf. 15:25; 22:22–23). The Redeemer/Defender probably refers to the Lord.

Similar to vv. 17–18 and 23:19, the twelfth saying is an exhortation to listen to the instruction that follows (v. 12). There is an interesting wordplay here. The Hebrew word musar (“discipline,” “instruction,” “correction”) is used in both vv. 12 and 13, which has caused some scholars to join v. 12 with vv. 13 and 14. But the use of the same word in the two verses justifies locating the proverbs one after the other.

The thirteenth saying, counsels giving correction, is presumably based on the instruction received in v. 12 (vv. 13–14). In light of the parallelism with v. 14, v. 13 does not mean that punishing children will not kill them. It means that it will rescue them (Heb. nepesh, “soul,” “life”) from the grave (see also 19:18).

Wisdom positively impacts not only those seeking it but also, as the fourteenth saying indicates, the parents or instructors (23:15–16). Wise children make their parents rejoice. Joy enriches the totality of a person. Nothing brings more joy to parents than to hear their children speaking what is right.

The fifteenth proverb teaches against envying sinners and assures a future reward for those who live in reverent submission to the Lord (vv. 17–18). This is one of the few places where Proverbs reveals a reality beyond the present, a future eternal life. The sinner may seem to prosper, but the time will come when those who hope in the Lord will triumph and the wicked will perish.

Verse 19 can be considered an exhortation introducing the sixteenth saying (vv. 19–21), which exhorts temperance when eating and drinking. Drunkenness and gluttony lead to poverty (cf. Deut. 21:20).

The seventeenth saying also begins with an exhortation to pay attention to the words that follow (Prov. 23:22–25). These words describe the joy that righteous and wise children bring to their parents (vv. 24–25). The motivation to listen to and appropriate truth, wisdom, and instruction is found in the joy that it brings to parents. Children are responsible for making the life of their parents as enjoyable as possible in the present life (see vv. 15–16).

As in the previous wisdom saying, the eighteenth begins with an introduction (vv. 26). The phrase “my son, give me your heart” renders the Hebrew expression tenah beni libbeka, which does not occur frequently. It is probably equivalent to the similar expression sim leb (lit. “to place the heart”), which means “to consider,” or “to pay attention” (see Deut. 32:46; Is. 41:22). In this case, an alternative translation would be “pay attention to me.” After the introduction, the main part of this saying warns against the potentially fatal temptation of prostitutes and adulterous women (Prov. 23:27–28; cf. 22:14).

The nineteenth saying contains a vivid description of the harmful effects of alcohol (23:29–35). It describes its negative social, physical, and psychological impact on the lives of those who drink it. The exhortation is so strong that it discourages even looking at it. Alcohol may appear attractive, but it is like a poisonous serpent. The condition of those under the influence of alcohol is described as pitiful. They hallucinate, and like a ship at sea or a person sitting at the top of the mast, they cannot control the movement of their own bodies. Such individuals are out of contact with reality and yet are ready to go out and drink again—a miserable life!

The twentieth saying exhorts against envying and wanting to be with evil people who seem to be doing well in life (24:1–2). The reason given is that they justify violence in their inner beings and then express their desire for violent behavior that disrupts proper social order (cf. 3:31).

Wisdom, according to the twenty-first saying, supports order (24:3–4). The example given is that of a house that is built with wisdom and that, consequently, is firmly established. In it will dwell pleasant richness. Here the house stands for the family that is guided by divine wisdom, understanding, and knowledge, which contribute to the development of the characters of its members in the fear of the Lord.

24:5–22

Sayings Twenty-Two to Thirty

The twenty-second saying describes the inner strength of those who have wisdom (vv. 5–6). Verse 5 does not exhort the wise to be strong but states that it is the wise who are strong (i.e., wisdom is more important than physical strength; cf. 21:22). The imagery of war in 24:6 could be understood as military advice, but it is more likely simply an illustration of wisdom’s superiority over physical strength. The emphasis on the importance of many counselors is similar to 11:14 and 20:18 and applies particularly to those in leadership positions.

The twenty-third saying states what was observable at the city gate, where the elders met to discuss issues of importance in the community (24:7). People assembled to listen to the wise talk, to conduct public transactions (see Ruth 4:1–12), and to have judicial decisions made (see 2 Sam. 15:2; Amos 5:15; Zech. 8:16). This proverb does not mean that fools remain completely quiet at the city gate (see Prov. 15:2) but that they cannot contribute anything of value in such a setting.

The main subject of the twenty-fourth saying is the reputation of fools (24:8–9). By describing their poor reputation, Proverbs discourages others from following their way of life. They are social schemers/troublemakers, abominations to others/detested by all.

The twenty-fifth saying encourages diligence in the face of adversity (vv. 10–12). The word “if” is not in the Hebrew but is supplied for the sake of clarity. The verb rapah (rendered as “faint,” “slack,” “weak,” or “falter”) expresses the idea of being lax in contrast to being diligent (see 18:9). The implicit call is to become strong through wisdom (see 24:5). The saying also admonishes rescuing those in mortal danger. In the context, the One “who weighs the hearts” (i.e., God) knows that the excuse of ignorance is not an honest one. When the moral fabric of society is failing, the wise should speak for those who cannot speak for themselves. The passage also affirms that the divine judgment will be based on our deeds. Although some scholars see a break between v. 10 and vv. 11–12, resulting in a divide that creates separate sayings, the content of the verses, as we have seen, holds them together.

The twenty-sixth saying emphasizes the exquisite nature of wisdom (vv. 13–14). It begins with an observable phenomenon: honey is sweet and delicious, so it should be enjoyed. This is then applied to wisdom, which is as sweet as honey. It is enjoyable and enriches life to such an extent that the hope for a better future is nurtured through it. Hope will prevail over disruption.

The twenty-seventh saying is a warning against doing violence to the innocent and is addressed to the wicked (vv. 15–16). The righteous may fall in the sense of experiencing disaster or calamity, but there is hope that they will prevail. The righteous will recover even if they fall seven times, but the situation of the wicked is hopeless.

The placement of the twenty-eighth saying here may be due to word association (vv. 17–18). That is, though the two sayings are not thematically related, the verb “to fall” occurs both at the end of the previous saying and at the beginning of this one. Although the wicked will fall, the righteous are exhorted not to rejoice in that fall because it will displease the Lord, and, consequently, He will turn His wrath away from those who deserve it.

The topic of envying the wicked is raised again in the twenty-ninth saying (vv. 19–20). The reason given is that there is no future for the wicked. Since they exist in hopelessness, why envy them?

The thirtieth and final saying of the so-called thirty sayings admonishes respect for the Lord and the king (vv. 21–22). Rebellion against them will result in calamity/disaster. The principle can be applied to having respect not only for the king but for all authority established by God (8:15–16; cf. Ex. 22:28). At this point, the Greek translation of the Old Testament (the Septuagint) adds a few extra lines and then skips to Proverbs 30 (see below, “The Organization of Proverbs in the Septuagint”).

The Organization of Proverbs in the Septuagint

1. Discrepancies. The Septuagint (LXX) is the Greek translation of the Hebrew Old Testament. Its translation of the book of Proverbs dates to around 200 to 150 B.C. In general, both the Hebrew and the Septuagint have the same order for the first three sections of the book (1:1–24:22). After that, the order of the passages in the Septuagint departs from the Hebrew as follows:

- IV. My Son, Fear My Words (30:1–14)
- V. Words to the Wise (24:23–34)
- VI. Things That Come in Fours (30:15–33)
- VII. Words Spoken by God (31:1–9)
- VIII. Sayings Copied by Hezekiah’s Men (chaps. 25–29)
- IX. The Virtuous Wife (31:10–31)

Though the order of the contents is different in the Septuagint, the individual wisdom sayings and their messages are not affected. However, the different organization does affect the section titles and their ascription of authorship. In the Hebrew text, the placement of the words of Agur and Lemuel (chaps. 30–31) at the end of the book results in their functioning as an appendix of sorts, whereas the Septuagint weaves those passages among the Solomonic proverbs.

2. Reasons for the Discrepancies. It has been suggested that the organization of the Septuagint may be due to the desire of the scribe/translator to maintain Solomonic authorship of the entire content of Proverbs. This may be supported by the translation of some of the section titles. The names of Agur and Lemuel are omitted. Instead of the title for Agur’s words, the Septuagint reads “My son, fear my words...” (30:1, LXX), and instead of the title for Lemuel’s words, it reads “My words have been spoken by God...” (31:1, LXX). Further, in 24:23, instead of additional words belonging to (i.e., “by”) the wise, the Septuagint has the words spoken to the wise (i.e., “These things I say to you who are wise that you may know them,” 24:33, LXX). The assumption of a single author (i.e., Solomon) for the entire book may also be the reason for the Septuagint’s omission of the title “Proverbs of Solomon” in 10:1. Hence, though the different order of the contents of Proverbs 24:33–31:31 in the Septuagint does not alter the message of the individual wisdom sayings, it may have been motivated by the desire to ascribe all of them to Solomon.

24:23–34*MORE SAYINGS OF THE WISE

This small collection consists of five wisdom sayings that may function as an appendix to the previous section (22:17–24:22). The title does not identify the author but simply says that they were written or collected by the wise. In the Septuagint translation, this section of the book is placed after 30:14 (see “The Organization of Proverbs in the Septuagint,” p. 785).

24:23–26*Verdicts and Honest Speech

The setting of the first of these proverbs is a court of law. Showing partiality in court is characterized as “not good” not only because of the moral outrage it raises but also because it disrupts the social order and damages the legal system. The basic issue is that making partial or biased legal decisions that cannot be supported by the evidence presented results in the court not operating the way it should. The saying contrasts illegal decisions and their results with proper, legal decisions and their results. The wicked/guilty should not be declared righteous/innocent. Whenever that happens the legal system will be hated by the people and the judge will be discredited. But when the judges convict/rebuke the guilty/wicked, they will be blessed and will enjoy the peace of knowing that they did what was right. Notice the shift from the singular to the plural. The implication seems to be that there are more judges doing what is right than those doing what is wrong. A nacoakh (“straightforward,” “right,” “honest”) answer implies a willingness to tell the truth (v. 26). This attitude is compared to a kiss, which in many cultures of the time was a sign of true friendship. The implication is that true friendship (or, for that matter, any type of social relationship) has to be based on transparency and not deceptiveness.

24:27–29*Plans, Witnesses, and Revenge

Enjoying life requires making plans for the future and prioritizing matters. Living is not just breathing but being in charge of one’s life. Having a home requires making plans and then following them. This passage admonishes preparing a field outside before building a house. This could mean obtaining the field and then preparing it for the building project. It could also mean making sure that the land is good enough to farm. The wise are those who do not leave things to themselves but who work with what they have at hand to achieve what is good.

Although vv. 28 and 29 may originally have been two separate sayings, placing them together implies that they should be read as one. Verse 28 warns that those who give false testimony against someone in court damage their moral fabric. Verse 29 admonishes against revenge. Coming after v. 28, it can also mean that God’s people should not seek revenge against those who give false testimony against them. They are not to render unto others according to their work. Only God should do that (v. 12).

24:30–34*The Lazy

These verses provide insights about how the mind of the wise functions. They observe a situation, analyze what they observe, and finally draw some objective conclusions that would benefit others. Here observing and analyzing the experience of the lazy leads to the conclusion that slumbering and inactivity results in poverty. The land needs the activity or involvement of a human agent in order to be fully fruitful. Otherwise, its future will be unproductive, and poverty will prevail (see 6:6–11).

25:1–29:27*HEZEKIAH’S COLLECTION OF SOLOMON’S PROVERBS

This section is a compilation of proverbs written by Solomon that were collected by the men of King Hezekiah and preserved here in the book of Proverbs (25:1). It shows Hezekiah’s interest in wisdom literature and thinking. The wisdom sayings in chapters 25–29 consist mostly of short, single-verse units. Although scholars have proposed a number of suggestions for a thematic or theological organization to this section, there is no consensus, and it is probably best to accept that the sayings in this section have no particular organizational center. Nevertheless, there is some agreement on the stylistic differences between chapters 25–26 and 27–29. One of these differences is the fact that there is a greater tendency for the sayings to occur in thematic groups in the first subdivision than in the second. Especially in the first subdivision, the wisdom sayings are often arranged in groups of sayings containing some type of verbal link.

These groups do not necessarily have a common message (see 26:4–5), but they are brought together because they mention a common word or topic. There are also some longer sayings that stand alone (see 27:23–27). In the Septuagint translation, this section of the book is placed between vv. 9 and 10 of chapter 31 (see “The Organization of Proverbs in the Septuagint,” p. 785).

25:2—26:28

First Subdivision

The wisdom sayings in this subdivision may be thematically grouped into proverbs about kings (25:2–7), judicial conflict (vv. 8–10), the value of wise words (vv. 11–15), dealing with others (vv. 16–28), fools (26:1–12), laziness (vv. 13–16), provocations that incite conflict (vv. 17–22), and deception (vv. 23–28). However, these clusters of sayings have no common overarching theme.

25:2–7. Kings. These proverbs are grouped together because they concern matters that relate to the king and the court. The king makes matters clear (v. 2), but those who stand before him must remember that they cannot read his mind (v. 3). The king must remove wicked advisors if he is to rule righteously (vv. 4–5). The wise do not promote themselves before the king but wait for the king to do so (v. 6). By extension, these wisdom sayings apply not only to kings but to all human authority by showing how to properly relate to authority in order to avoid conflict (8:15–16).

25:8–15. Judicial Conflicts and Words to the Wise. Verses 8 to 10 consist of two sayings that occur in the setting of a judicial lawsuit. Verse 8 counsels against being too quick to bring matters to court for fear of losing the case. In other words, it is important to evaluate the situation and the possible results of an action before making a decision. The second saying advises those already involved in a legal case to show restraint and willingness to resolve the conflict between those involved without creating more animosity (e.g., revealing another person’s secret). The application of these principles goes beyond lawsuits, encouraging restraint in interpersonal conflicts and respect for privacy in all settings.

The wisdom sayings in vv. 11–15 consist of a group of proverbs that advocate the value of wise words. Though vv. 11 and 12 are separate sayings, they are probably placed next to each other because the word “gold” occurs in both. Verse 12 states that a listening ear values reproof as much as gold, whereas v. 11 is more general, comparing words that are appropriate and fitting in various circumstances with apples of gold in silver settings (i.e., something very valuable and precious). Verses 13 and 25 are similar descriptive proverbs expressing the refreshing experience that comes from receiving good news. It revives the spirit of those who were probably depressed. Verse 14 is a warning against false claims and promises. Since rain is very important in the semiarid climate of the Holy Land, such boasting claims are compared with rainless clouds and wind. The proverb in v. 15 promotes the power of gentle, patient speech. The tongue (i.e., words) correctly used is harder than a bone.

25:16–28. Dealing with Others. The section in vv. 16–20 consists of a series of self-contained sayings that mostly relate to getting along well with others. The wise understand that social life can enrich personal life or make it miserable. Hence, this section contains instructions on how to correctly relate to others. Verses 21–22 teach the wisdom of forbearance (see Rom. 12:20). Proverbs 25:23–28 contains miscellaneous sayings on human relationships.

A few of the verses deserve brief comments. It is possible that the sayings in vv. 16 and 17 were originally separate (i.e., v. 16 advises moderation in eating and v. 17 not to visit friends too often). These sayings were then placed next to each other because the Hebrew verb sabaʿ (“to be sated,” “to be full”) occurs in both (though the word is usually translated differently in each verse because of the differing contexts). Their adjacent placement also possibly, though not necessarily, makes an interpretation that connects the honey of v. 16 with the friendship of v. 17. Verse 24 repeats 21:9 (see also v. 19). In spite of statements elsewhere that the righteous will never be mot (“shaken,” “removed,” “uprooted”; 10:30; see also 12:3), the proverb in 25:26 acknowledges that the righteous may falter. What should have been clean becomes polluted through bad influence.

26:1–12. Fools. Almost all the verses in this group of sayings share a common mention of fools. One exception occurs in v. 2, which is not about fools, though its structure is similar to v. 1. Hence, just as honor is not fitting for a fool (v. 1), so a curse without cause (i.e., that is undeserved) will not take effect (v. 2). Also, the last saying in this group is not about fools—though it does mention a fool—but is a warning against being wise in one’s own eyes (v. 12; see also 29:20).

Some brief comments on 26:4–5 are appropriate. The sayings in these two verses seem contradictory at first. Does Proverbs advise answering fools according to their folly or not? The two sayings may originally have been independent but were brought together because of their common topic and vocabulary, as is the case with the rest of the sayings in this section. There are various approaches to harmonizing the two sayings. For example, one approach is to suggest that the expression “according to” has different meanings in vv. 4 and 5. But the simplest way to harmonize the two is to acknowledge that Proverbs requires contextual application; that is, it is necessary to take the situation and circumstances into consideration in determining how each proverb is applicable. In addition, the fact that the saying in v. 5 is placed after v. 4 makes v. 5 a response to v. 4. Hence, the two verses in combination teach that, though in principle the wise should not lower their speech to the level of fools, there are times when that becomes necessary.

26:13–28

Laziness, Provocation, and Deception

Verses 13–16 contain four short proverbs that focus on the lazy, who seek reasons to justify their inactivity. They are so lazy that after placing their hands on their food, they will not perform the simple task of bringing their hands to their mouths. The saying in v. 13 is similar to 22:13, and the one in 26:15 is similar to 19:24. The lazy live in self-deception (26:16).

The wisdom sayings in vv. 17–22 warn against actions that provoke/incite conflict. Verse 17 warns against meddling in other people’s quarrels, vv. 18–19 warn against deception, and the three proverbs in vv. 20–22 warn against gossip and slander. In addition to the thematic link, these verses also share verbal links. The Hebrew word rib (“quarrel,” “fight”) is used in both vv. 17 and 21. The word madon (“strife,” “quarrel”) in v. 20 might also be used in v. 21. Textual variants indicate that it may be either the same Hebrew word (madon) or a closely related word from the same root (midyan, “contention”). All the proverbs in vv. 18–21 mention fire, vv. 20 and 21 contain the word “wood,” and vv. 20 and 22 mention the nirgan (“gossip,” “talebearer,” “whisperer”). The saying in v. 22 is a repetition of 18:8.

The wisdom sayings contained in 26:23–28 are self-contained units that share the common theme of deceptive speech or false friendship. The apparent exception occurs in v. 27, which mentions someone digging a pit. However, since a pit is a type of trap/ambush, this saying fits with the others that deal with deception. Further, digging a pit semantically parallels the act of deceptively covering hatred/malice in v. 26.

27:1–29:27

Second Subdivision

Except for 27:23–27, the wisdom sayings in this subdivision consist of short, self-contained units. There appears to be no clear unifying theme in them, though some are thematically connected.

27:1–27. Miscellaneous Sayings. Verse 1 warns those who would boast about what they could accomplish tomorrow that they have no control over the future. Those who have a reason for boasting should let others compliment and praise them (v. 2). The topic of wrath unifies vv. 3–4. The uncontrolled anger of fools is a heavy load, probably for those around them (v. 3). While anger is almost impossible to control, a jealous person is even worse (v. 4). What good is love if it is not expressed? At least rebuke shows some level of concern, but how much better it would be to simply express love (v. 5). In fact, the wounds inflicted by a friend are useful and much better than the deceitful kisses of an enemy (v. 6).

Many of the sayings are based on observable facts. For the hungry, even what is bitter tastes sweet (v. 7). Those who abandon their homes are like birds that abandon their nest (v. 8). Friendship is emphasized in vv. 9–10 because it enriches life and provides needed support. But blessing a friend loudly at the wrong time will offend others (v. 14). That people sharpen each other (lit. “a man sharpens the face of his friend”) signifies that constructive criticism helps sharpen the character of a friend (v. 17).

Wise children bring joy to their parents and enhance their reputation (v. 11). Verse 12 contrasts the prudent and the simple in terms of how they relate to evil: the prudent avoid it, but the simple become its victims. The relationship between spouses could be as annoying as the continual dripping from a leaking roof on a very rainy day, suggesting that it is much better to learn to live in peace (v. 15). However, achieving this end could be difficult (v. 16). Verse 18 applies the observable reality that those who protect their fig tree will eat of its fruit to the relationship of servants with their master. In order to be honored by their master, they need to care for and protect him or her (v. 18).

Human identity is a matter of concern for the wise. A person's true image is located in the heart—the thoughts and desires are found there (v. 19). Like death, a person's desires are never satisfied. Everyone always wants more and more (v. 20). As the quality of gold is revealed by the refining pot, a person's value is established by the opinions of others (v. 21). Fools have foolishness so deeply intertwined within their very being that it is impossible to remove it from them (v. 22).

The wisdom sayings in vv. 23–27 emphasize the rewards of caring for livestock. When other riches come to an end, livestock will provide for the needs of a family (v. 24). Therefore, it is important to provide for the well-being of livestock every day. The message of this saying can be extended in principle and applied to the need to prepare for life's uncertainties.

28:1—29:27. More Miscellaneous Sayings.

Chapters 28 and 29 consist of many short, self-contained wisdom sayings on various topics. Some have suggested that these chapters contain royal proverbs with instructions especially addressed to a prince or king. However, unlike typical ancient Near Eastern royal proverbs, an example of which may be found in 31:1–9, this section is not addressed to a king. Further, although many of these sayings mention kings and rulers, their teachings are appropriate for not only monarchs and others in authority but also for those in other situations. The various wisdom sayings in this section intertwine advice to kings and rulers (28:2, 15–16, 28; 29:2, 4, 12, 14, 26) with themes such as the contrast between righteousness and wickedness (28:1–2, 5–6, 10, 12–13, 15, 17–18, 28; 29:2, 4–6, 7, 10, 13, 16, 27), wisdom and folly (vv. 1, 3, 5, 8–9, 11, 15, 20), riches and poverty (28:3, 6, 8, 11, 19–22, 27; 29:13–14), and various other topics. Thus, it is best to characterize the wisdom sayings in these chapters not as royal proverbs but as miscellaneous proverbs.

The references to torah are especially interesting (28:4, 7, 9; 29:18). Since this Hebrew word means “law” or “instruction,” it may here refer to God's law or to instruction in general. It is used in the latter sense elsewhere in Proverbs (see 1:8; 3:1; 4:2; 6:20; 13:13; 31:26). In the context of the verses in question, while the rendering “instruction” is appropriate, the word can also be translated as “law” because it occurs in the expression “to keep the law” (28:4, 9; 29:18) and because there is a parallel in v. 18 between torah and revelation (Heb. khazon, “prophetic vision”), which may allude to the Hebrew Scriptures (i.e., the law and the prophets). The word khazon occurs in a similar expression in 1 Samuel 3:1, which refers to the rarity or absence of prophetic activity.

A few of the wisdom sayings in this subdivision are placed adjacent to each other likely because they share some common Hebrew vocabulary. The sayings in Proverbs 28:16–17 are probably two independent sayings that both use words from the root 'ashaq (“to oppress,” “burden,” “torment,” “exploit”). Likewise, vv. 25–26 consist of independent sayings that both use the word batakh (“to trust”). Similarly, the sayings in 29:19–20 address different topics but both use the term dabar, which in this context refers to speech or words.

The sayings in 28:19–22 seem to cluster around the theme of prosperity (i.e., riches and poverty). This is apparent from the occurrence of words and expressions referring to food/bread (vv. 19, 21), riches/wealth (vv. 20, 22), and poverty (vv. 19, 22). Also of interest are the proverbs that refer to discipline in 29:15–21. These verses teach that both children and slaves must be disciplined and corrected. Verses 15 and 17 advise using the rod and words of rebuke/reprimand to discipline a child. Similarly, v. 21 warns against requiring too little of slaves. Though the meaning of the first clause is relatively straightforward, involving a slave pampered from childhood, the meaning of the word manon in the second part of the verse is not completely certain, as is evident by the renderings provided by translators that range from the slave becoming a son/heir to the slave becoming insolent/arrogant/ungrateful. The basic idea of this proverb is that a slave that is pampered from youth and not taught to work cannot function well as a slave. Further, v. 19 teaches that words are not sufficient to correct a slave; the rod may also be necessary (v. 15; see also 10:13; 19:29; 26:3). Though slaves are not part of modern society, the principles of these sayings apply to management and leadership in general. That is, managers who expect productivity from their employees must use appropriate rewards and consequences. However, the connection between the treatment of slaves and the treatment of children is important (29:15, 17). Just as corporal punishment for slaves was acceptable in the ancient Near East but not in today's society, the application of the rod in the education of children may not necessarily involve a literal beating, but it does require age-appropriate discipline of other kinds.

An additional observation on the proverbs concerning the treatment of slaves in vv. 19 and 21 is that they serve as examples of how the counsels of this book are adapted to a fallen world. The word in these verses is the Hebrew 'ebed, which means “servant” or “slave.” But slavery was never God’s ideal, and the counsel of these verses on what is necessary to make slaves work does not reflect God’s ideal. In the NT, Paul instructs slaves to serve their masters in the fear of the Lord, as slaves of Christ (Eph. 6:5–8; Col. 3:22–23). He also instructs slave owners not to threaten their slaves (Eph. 6:9) but to treat them as fellow slaves of God (Col. 4:1), that is, as brothers (Philem. 15–16). Thus, God’s ideal is for His people to serve each other out of love, not out of fear of punishment or greed for rewards. That also means that God-fearing employers should treat their employees differently from the way other employers do. God Himself wants to be served out of love, not fear (John 15:12–17).

30:1–33

THE WORDS OF AGUR

Some have suggested that the last two chapters of Proverbs consist of a four-part appendix to the book, namely, the reflections of Agur (vv. 1–9), things that come in fours (vv. 10–33), the counsels of Lemuel’s mother (31:1–9), and the virtuous wife (vv. 10–31). This is especially possible since the content and organization of these units differ from one another. However, since 30:10–33 does not have a title, and since the poem in 31:10–31 is not introduced by a line ascribing authorship, this commentary adopts the traditional outline, which takes 30:1a as the title for chapters 30 and 31:1 as the title for chapter 31.

30:1–9

The Reflections of Agur

Some interpret the word massa’ (“burden,” “oracle,” “inspired utterance”) as the proper noun “Massa,” a place located in northern Arabia (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chr. 1:30). However, since the form of the Hebrew word would have to be modified to read “from Massa” or “Massaite,” it is best to understand it as the common Hebrew word for a prophetic oracle. Agur expresses inspired personal reflections. The identity of Agur and the other individuals named in Proverbs 30:1 is unknown. The Septuagint resolves this problem by translating all the names as regular words. It reads “Fear my words, my son. And when you receive them, repent. This says the man to those who believe in God. And I stop.” That is, Agur is translated as “fear,” Jakeh as “when you receive,” Ithiel as “those who believe in God,” and Ucal as “I stop.” However, the Septuagint presupposes a few changes to the letters in the Hebrew original. Besides, as explained above, the Septuagint reading may be influenced by its attempt to ascribe all of the proverbs to Solomon.

In these verses, Agur confesses his ignorance. The questions in v. 4 are rhetorical, since no human being could have claimed to have performed these actions. They may be compared to the rhetorical questions in Job 38. In contrast to human ignorance, God’s word is perfect. Though no one can bring knowledge from heaven, God does speak to human beings, and His revelation is reliable. Agur makes two requests of God: to be kept from practicing/speaking deception and to be kept from both poverty and riches. In effect, he prays to be kept from temptation in order to live a balanced life.

30:10–33

Things That Come in Fours

The sayings in this section seem to be grouped by the use of the number four, though they are interspersed with shorter sayings in between. The first saying condemns any malicious report against a slave (v. 10). Since slaves in the ancient Near East were defenseless, their only recourse would be to curse the wrongdoer before the Lord. Verses 11–14 contain four sayings about the wicked generation. The number four is not used, but the saying consists of four lines that each begin with the Hebrew word dor (“generation,” “period,” “dwelling”). Some translate this term as referring to some group of people in general; others, as a “generation.”

Verse 15 portrays a leech as the epitome of greed, and this is followed by a reference to four greedy things (vv. 15b–16). This is the first of several sayings that use the formula “three things...four.” The pattern of a graded numerical sequence is also found elsewhere, especially in wisdom literature (see 6:16–19; Job 5:19–22). The exact rhetorical purpose of the formula is not clear. In many instances the fourth item is the climax of the list (see Prov. 30:18–19), but this is probably not the case in the context of

vv. 15b-16. The list could also mean that there are many more than four and that these are examples. Since some of the sayings in this section contain four items but do not use the formula (vv. 11-14, 24-28), it is possible that the formula calls attention to the number rather than the last item on the list. The purpose is to highlight a list of things that can never consume enough or be satisfied. It seems that the idea is to learn to be satisfied because dissatisfaction is mainly associated with negative things.

Verse 17, like other proverbs, condemns contempt for parents. The first three items in vv. 18-19 refer to natural phenomena, whereas the fourth item refers to human relationships. Hence, the climax of this saying is the fourth item, the way of a man with a young woman/virgin (the Hebrew word means a young woman, whether married or unmarried). Some have explained this passage as referring to the wonder of human procreation, though it may also simply refer to love and courtship between a man and a woman. Verse 10 introduces another way: the way of an adulterous woman. The adulteress commits adultery and then denies having done wrong. One sin leads to another—an attempt to conceal the first.

The list in vv. 21-23 consists of events that violate the common order of society and that are disturbing to common sense. It is not clear whether or not there is a climax in this list. Verses 24-28 contain another numerical saying. Though not introduced by the formula “three things...four,” there are four things in the list. This wisdom saying consists of a list of small creatures that display wisdom: ants, shepan-nim (“rock badgers,” “hyraxes,” “conies”), locusts, and the semamit (“spider,” “lizard”). The verse does not specify how people should apply the behavior of these creatures to their own lives. In contrast to the previous list, the list in vv. 29-31 includes large creatures that display a stately, fearless stride (i.e., they walk with style): a lion, a zarzir (“strutting rooster,” “greyhound”), and a male goat. The fourth item of the list, a king, is undoubtedly the climax. Although there is some uncertainty concerning the exact translation of this clause, this proverb seems to focus on the impressive personality of the king.

The wisdom saying on folly in vv. 32-33 does not consist of a list of four items. Instead, a double “if” clause introduces the counsel for those who are proud and who plot/devise evil to put their hands on their mouths (v. 32). This is explained through three clauses that all contain the Hebrew word mits (“churning,” “pressing,” “twisting,” “squeezing”; v. 33). The point here is that foolish words and actions produce strife.

31:1-31

THE WORDS OF LEMUEL

Proverbs 31 consists of two main sections: instructions related to the behavior of a king (vv. 2-9) and a description of a virtuous woman (vv. 10-31). This commentary takes the title in v. 1, which attributes the sayings to King Lemuel’s mother, as the title for the content of the whole chapter.

31:1-9

The Counsels of Lemuel’s Mother

Although Proverbs elsewhere mentions the teachings of both mothers and fathers (see 6:20), this is the only passage that actually ascribes a wisdom saying to a mother. This wisdom saying contains a title (31:1), counsel on what a king should not do (vv. 2-7), and counsel on what a king should do (vv. 8-9). The message is that a king should use his power not to gratify his own desires but to serve the needs of those who are powerless. By extension, the principle also applies to anyone in a position of authority.

Proverbs 31:1 could serve as the title of only the first section, in which case the words that Lemuel’s mother taught him end in v. 9, or it could attribute the entire chapter to these words. As in 30:1 the Hebrew word massa can be understood as the word for a prophetic burden/oracle or as a proper name (i.e., “king of Massa”). The word mah in 31:2 can also be variously understood. It is usually a simple interrogative particle (“what?,” “why?,” “how?”). In some cases, it is an interrogative that implies an emphatic negation (Gen. 37:26; 1 Kin. 12:16; 2 Kin. 9:18-19), and in others it could serve as a negation (e.g., Song 8:4). Hence, the three occurrences of mah can be understood as an emphatic negation (“No...! No...! No...!”) introducing the counsel that follows. Alternatively, they could simply be a form of address (“O my son,” “Listen, my son!”) calling attention to the counsel that follows.

The passage admonishes the king not to waste his strength on women (Prov. 31:3) or on wine (vv. 4-7). The admonition is especially applicable to most ancient kings, who were proud of their virility (see Deut. 17:17). However, the second part of Proverbs 31:3 may indicate that the warning does not mean that the king should never love a woman, as if all women were bad, but rather that it is a warning against the kind of woman who ruins and destroys kings. Instead of wasting his strength on wine and women, a king should defend the cause of the powerless (vv. 8–9). He should open his mouth not to drink wine or beer but to speak on behalf of the helpless.

31:10–31

The Virtuous Wife

It is fitting that the book of Proverbs concludes with a portrait of a wise woman. Although wisdom is portrayed in the book as a woman and is often contrasted with an immoral woman, this passage presents the clearest, if not the only, portrayal of a wise woman. There are several ways to apply the message of this poem. The virtuous wife is the opposite of the immoral woman. Hence, this is the description of the ideal woman. On the other hand, it is noteworthy that this poem repeats some of the themes of the book. That is, the virtuous wife exhibits diligence (31:13–19, 24, 27), foresight (vv. 21, 25), wise speech (v. 26), generosity (v. 20), and the fear of the Lord (v. 30). At the same time, her actions bring to herself and her family the wealth (vv. 11–12, 24) and honor (vv. 23, 28–31) that wisdom promises. Thus, there is a sense in which the description of a virtuous wife is more than simply a portrait of the ideal woman.

Since wisdom is personified as a woman in Proverbs, the virtuous wife can also be viewed as the personification of wisdom, in contrast to the immoral woman, who is the personification of folly. By extension, then, the picture of the virtuous wife is a depiction of not only a wise wife but also a wise person (man or woman, married or unmarried). It should be noted in passing that the various levels of application do not deny the possibility that this poem may have been originally written to praise a specific individual (i.e., it could have been a praise poem composed by an unnamed husband for his wife).

The description of the virtuous wife is given in the form of a poem. However, the statements in the poem are not thematically organized. Instead, they are aesthetically organized to form an acrostic poem (i.e., the verses are arranged in alphabetical order, each verse beginning with the next letter of the Hebrew alphabet). Hence, apart from the first verse (v. 10), which introduces the topic of the poem, and perhaps the last few verses, the message of the poem is best understood in terms of the sum of its totality rather than by the way it is organized.

Some of the features of this poem, such as the characterization of this woman as a woman of strength (the Heb. word khayil can have several meanings and nuances; though it is usually translated variously as “virtuous,” “noble,” “excellent,” etc., it can also mean “power,” “wealth,” and “army”), have led some to suggest that the poem could be a heroic hymn, which was often written for military heroes. However, since not all aspects of the poem fit that type of poem, others suggest that it is better classified as an encomium). If so, it is not an encomium in terms of the classical rhetorical type (which includes a prologue, a narration of the person’s birth and upbringing, etc.) but in the general sense of a speech given in praise of a person, a type of person, or a character quality. Other examples of encomia in the Bible include Psalms 1 and 15 (see also Ps. 112; Is. 52:13–53:12; 1 Cor. 13).

There are several words or expressions in Proverbs 31:10 that deserve comment. The poem begins with the central character, an ’eshet khayil. The expression is also found in 12:4 and Ruth 3:11. As noted above, the word khayil means “strength” and can refer not only to physical strength but also to character. Boaz is also referred to as khayil (Ruth 2:1). As various translations indicate, there the expression could mean wealth, prominence, or noble character. Though the virtuous wife is not depicted in terms of military prowess (though there is a military metaphor in Prov. 31:11), she does possess physical strength (vv. 17, 25). Though she is not depicted as wealthy, she is a resourceful woman with business abilities that bring wealth to her family (vv. 11, 14, 16, 18, 24). Her greatest strength is her character, which displays diligence (vv. 15, 18, 27), foresight in providing for the future (vv. 21, 25), wise speech (v. 26), and generosity (v. 20). She is valuable to her husband (vv. 11, 23), her children (vv. 21, 27), and even her servants (v. 15). “Who can find?” in v. 10 is a rhetorical question that expects the answer “no one” (cf. 30:4). However, in contrast to the rhetorical question in Ecclesiastes 7:28, this question does not mean that such a woman does not exist but rather that she is precious because she is rare and difficult to find. Indeed, her value is far above rubies.

Another word in Proverbs 31:10 that deserves a brief comment is the word meker (“sale price,” “merchandise,” “value”). According to some, it refers to a dowry price. Although this interpretation is possible, it is probably better to understand it metaphorically in the sense of “value” or “worth.” A few remarks can be added to some of the remaining verses. In v. 23, the husband of the virtuous wife is described as a man of prominent status who meets with other leaders at the gate. The implication is that it is because of her virtuous character and behavior that he can achieve such success. The word khayil is used again in v. 10, where it is translated in a variety of ways that demonstrate the richness and range of meanings possible in the word: “done well,” “excelled,” “are capable,” “done virtuously,” “act competently,” or “done nobly.” It is not clear whether or not v. 30 continues the husband’s words begun in v. 29, but this does not affect the message of the poem.

Verse 30 contrasts physical beauty with wisdom. That does not mean that the virtuous wife is ugly or that beauty is bad, but simply that the beauty of character is far more important than physical beauty. By extension, the principle applies to both men and women in the sense that their relationship with the Lord is more important than looks, strength, or any other asset. Since the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom (1:7; 9:10), it is fitting that this picture of the virtuous wife includes the fact that she is a woman who fears the Lord. The final verse (31:31) is an exhortation to praise the virtuous wife but also functions as a restatement of the theme of the poem.

The journey through the book of Proverbs has been a search for wisdom. The search is in many ways never-ending. Wisdom speaks to all, the simple as well as the wise, challenging them to embrace her values and to keep on learning from her. The book communicates the importance of constantly looking forward for new and deeper expressions of God’s wisdom. The wise live in hope of the constant enjoyment of a never-ending life.

ECCLESIASTES

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The name “Ecclesiastes” is derived from the Greek word ekkle-sia, which means “assembly” or “church.” It is the Greek translation of the Hebrew word qahal, which refers to the “assembly of worshippers.” The word qohelet, “Ecclesiastes,” seems to allude to 1 Kings 8, where the word qahal occurs seven times to designate the assembly of worshippers who were gathered to be instructed and exhorted by Solomon. In a parallel manner, the word qohelet occurs seven times in the book of qohelet (Ecclesiastes) and thus refers to the one who instructs and preaches to the qahal, Solomon himself, hence the translation “the Preacher” in some Bible versions. This subtle allusion to the Solomonic authorship of Ecclesiastes in the title of the book is explicitly affirmed in the introduction of the book itself (Eccl. 1:1, 12, 16; cf. 2:7, 9) and is implied in the numerous reminiscences of the life and personality of King Solomon (2:1–2; 5:1–7).

Date. A number of Egyptianisms (in ideas, expressions, and literary features) suggest the antiquity of the book and support its association with Solomon, who was very much immersed in ancient Egyptian culture and wisdom (1 Kin. 4:30; 10:28–29; 11:1). Furthermore, the language of the teacher who often refers to himself in the past (“I was,” “I acquired,” and “I was king”) and his profound concern with death suggest that the author was old and approaching death, an idea that was also entertained in Jewish tradition. Therefore, the book may have been written in Solomon’s last years and before 931 B.C., the date of Solomon’s death.

Backgrounds. The historical setting of the book is well indicated, pointing to the time of Solomon (1:2), when the temple was still present (5:1–7) and Israel was still united under the same king (1:12). There are even specific allusions to particular critical moments in Solomon’s reign when he abused his power (4:1, cf. 1 Kin. 9:21; 12:4) or when his future was threatened by a potential successor (4:13–16; cf. 1 Kin. 11:26–40). Yet, the existential issues discussed in this book and its warnings and lessons transcend times and cultures.

Theology and Purpose. The keyword of the book is the Hebrew word hebel—“futile,” “meaningless,” or “vanity”—which appears thirty-eight times. This word refers to the ephemeral character of “vapor” or the emptiness of chaos and death, or it evokes the tragic fate of the frail Abel (in Hebrew, hebel), who came and disappeared like a vapor in contrast to his dominating brother Cain. Because this word is rendered in various ways by Bible translators (“pointless,” “meaningless,” “futile,” “vapor,” or “vanity”), this commentary will often use the single word “futile” unless there is a discussion of the particular significance of the Hebrew word hebel or its superlative form habel habalim (“vanity of vanities,” “absolute futility,” or “utterly meaningless”). The lesson that is emphasized throughout the book embraces all aspects and values of human existence. The book of Ecclesiastes questions the value of common activities or qualities such as work (2:4–11), joy (vv. 1–3), wealth (5:10–6:12), power (5:8–9), wisdom (2:14–15; 9:15), and even religion (5:1–6). They are denounced as futile insofar as they are the result of human achievements. Challenging questions and disturbing paradoxes can upset our easy serenity. Yet, instead of Ecclesiastes promoting skepticism or pessimism, as it has often been interpreted, the book confronts us with the tough reality of life and ourselves, inviting us to reassess our values and reorient our existence. We are thus called to be responsible before God in the heart of a complex world, where we encounter both the good and the bad. All is futile unless all is received as the gift of God. Only God's grace will save us from the vanity, futility, or meaninglessness of this world. The message of Ecclesiastes draws intensely from the early pages of the book of Genesis: the fall of humankind, the curse, sin, evil, death, the destinies of Abel and Cain, the reference to the angel/messenger of God. The book is thus universal and concerns everyone, as indicated in expressions such as "under the sun," "under [the] heaven[s]," "on [the] earth," "man/human (Adam)," and the use of the generic divine term 'elohim rather than the particular name of the God of Israel, YHWH. The book addresses a number of great universal theological issues, such as the Creation, judgment, righteousness by works, grace, sin, hope, inspiration and revelation, the state of the dead, prophecy, and the apocalyptic destiny of the world. In its own peculiar way, it speaks of hope in the context of a disoriented world. Amazingly, the book of Ecclesiastes confronts us with existential issues and even speaks to secular, nonreligious people, using philosophical language, and appealing to logic and existential reflections rather than to religious considerations. References to God are rare or implicit, as are references to the cult or to the temple. The discourse of the book resonates, then, with our postmodern times, as we have begun to realize that naive optimism and what appear to be coherent systems do not fit anymore. Shaking all our shallow securities, the book of Ecclesiastes obliges us to face the desperate condition of the world and to only hope in its cosmic and eschatological salvation. The final message of the book, which summarizes all its lessons (12:13–14), is concerned not only with the totality of human existence and wise counsels for the present life but also with a great warning of judgment and good news for the redemption of the world.

Literary Features. Although the structure of the book is not clearly delineated, the regular and symmetric distribution of the two Hebrew keywords, hebel, "vanity," "meaningless," "futility," and qohelet, "Preacher" or "Teacher," play a role in the structuring of the book. The use of the word hebel marks the two sections of the book: hebel appears mostly in chapters 1–6, rarely in chapters 7–12, and can be found in the expression referring to hebel and chasing the wind, which appears only in chapters 1–6. Likewise, the word qohelet, "Preacher" or "Teacher," appears in the beginning (1:1, 2, 12), in the middle (7:27), and in the end (12:8–10), thus paralleling the design in two sections suggested by the other keyword. The first half of the book is concerned with the problem of vanity, futility, or meaninglessness. It is characterized by a refrain (1:14; 2:11, 17, 26; 4:4, 16; 6:9) that refers to hebel, "vanity," "meaningless," or "futility," and chasing the wind, and it is characterized by the greatest concentration of the word hebel (twenty-four times out of the thirty-eight times in the book). The second half of the book is concerned with the problem of wisdom and is characterized by the greatest concentration of the word "wisdom" (khokmah), which occurs sixteen times in this section (versus eleven times in the first section). In addition, the beginning and the end of the book echo each other (a so-called inclusio) with the expression habel habalim—"vanity of vanities," "absolute futility," "utterly meaningless" (1:2; cf. 12:8) and with the same cosmic perspective linking the prologue (1:1–11) to the epilogue (12:9–14). All these literary features suggest a particular literary structure: Prologue: The Nonsense of Creation (1:1–11); The Problem of Futility (1:12–6:12); The Problem of Wisdom (7:1–12:8); Epilogue: The Sense of Creation (12:9–14).

COMMENTARY

1:1–11

PROLOGUE: THE NONSENSE OF CREATION

Following the superscription (v. 1), which identifies the author of the book as Solomon, the only son of David who was king in Jerusalem, the prologue is introduced by the phrase habel habalim ("vanity of vanities," "absolute futility," or "utterly meaningless"), which serves as the motto of the book (vv. 2–3). This is followed by a discussion and analysis of the absence of the new from God's creation (vv. 4–11).

1:2–3

Futility and Profit

The word hebel—"meaningless," "vanity," or "futility"—is used five times in v. 2. This repetition emphasizes the importance of the concept. The phrase habel habalim is a superlative suggesting the maximum of hebel. The word hebel designates the “vapor,” what is passing and has no substance, and may be identified as the unformed state of creation before the Creation week (Gen. 1:2; cf. Is. 49:4). If all is futile, it is pertinent to ask if there is any profit or gain under the sun (Eccl. 1:3). The word yitron literally means “the plus, the supplement” and is often translated as “profit” or “gain.” To the question “What is the plus; what has been gained under the sun?” the answer is already implied in the motto: it is hebel, meaning “nothing.” The expression “under the sun,” unique to the book of Ecclesiastes, echoes an Egyptian idiom and evokes the solar cycle, which refers to what is repeated on a “regular” and “daily” basis without producing any new thing.

1:2–11. Cosmic Movements. As the prologue appears to parallel Creation, the stage of formlessness and emptiness (Gen. 1:2) seems to be identified in Ecclesiastes as futility (Eccl. 1:2), after which cosmic movements are described. Generations of humans come and go, in contrast to the abiding earth (v. 4). The sun rises and sets and then goes back to its original place (v. 5). The wind goes to the south, then to the north, and then returns to its starting point (v. 6). The rivers go to the sea from where they originate, but the sea does not benefit from them and thus is never full (v. 7). Likewise, humans speak, see, and hear but are never satisfied (v. 8). From these observations Solomon concludes that there is no progress. In response to the question earlier raised of what profits, he proposes that there is no profit. “There is nothing new under the sun” (v. 9) implicitly suggests that there is no remembrance from one generation to another (v. 11), as if no one ever existed. All these vain movements of creation attest that creation has not gone beyond the stage of formlessness, the stage of futility, thus confirming the introductory programmatic statement: all is futility (v. 2).

1:12—6:12

THE PROBLEM OF FUTILITY

1:12–18

All is Futile, Utterly Futile

The first application of this truth concerns the search for wisdom. Solomon shifts from the third person in the prologue to the first person (vv. 12, 14, 16, 17). He will draw his lessons from his own thinking and personal experience of wisdom, and no longer from the objective movements of creation. Solomon verified the futility of wisdom both objectively in the object of wisdom itself and subjectively in the task of searching for wisdom.

1:12–15. The Object of Wisdom. The object of wisdom, the state of the earth, was so tragic that even wisdom would not improve its vain condition. Indeed, all these works done under the sun (v. 14) were in fact God’s works. The phrase “under the sun” alludes to the work of creation that had already been observed in the prologue and thus refers to God the Creator as the subject, an idea implicit in the passive form of the verb “done.” This principle is reaffirmed in v. 15—what is crooked cannot be straightened—which also implies God as the subject (v. 13). No one would be able to change a world that was under the curse of God (Gen. 3:17, 18).

1:16–18. The Search for Wisdom. The search for wisdom, even though a gift of God (v. 13), would not resolve the problems of the world.

Prologue and Creation Story Parallels

Note the parallels between the prologue (Eccl. 1:2–11) and the Creation story (Gen. 1:1—2:4a):

Ecclesiastes	Genesis
All is futile (1:2)	Shapeless and empty earth (1:1–2)
Under the sun (1:3)	Light; under the sky (days 1 and 2: vv. 3–8)
The earth (1:4)	Dry land/ground (day 3: vv. 9–13)
Sunrise and sunset (1:5–6)	Lights for days and seasons (day 4: vv. 14–19)
Rivers and sea (1:7)	Waters and seas (day 5: vv. 20–23)
Humans speak, see, and hear (1:8)	Creation of humans (day 6: vv. 26–31)
Past and future generations (1:9–11)	Historical record of generations (summary of Creation: v. 4a)

Solomon observes that the acquisition of wisdom, which he ironically could boast about (v. 16), increases the troubles of the world.

2:1–26

The Futility of Happiness

Solomon urges us to test his observation in the domain of life. The purpose of the test was to see what was good for people (lit. the “sons of adam”—Adam or “humanity”; v. 3). The word “good” is another allusion to the text of Creation, where it occurs seven times, and is also associated with the verb “see” (Gen. 1:4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31). Solomon’s test was to check whether there was something left from the “good” of creation. Echoing the Creation story, he repeats seven times the word hebel—“vanity,” “meaningless,” or “futility” (Eccl. 2:1, 11, 15, 19, 21, 23, 26). In other words, the good of creation had turned into hebel, the stage of pre-Creation emptiness and formlessness. It was as if Creation in its fullest sense did not happen; good had not yet been created. Solomon included all aspects of happiness in this test (joy, work, and even wisdom).

2:1–3. Joy. Looking at his own experience, Solomon proposes now to search for the meaning and the effect of these values (v. 1). These pleasures are qualified from the outset as futile (v. 1). The kind of joy Solomon describes is not external. It was Solomon himself who produced this joy and gave himself these pleasures. With the help of his wisdom, in all lucidity (v. 3), Solomon explains the mechanism of these pleasures and provides three reasons why he considers them futile. First, they are “madness” and do not make sense, just like laughter (v. 2), which is irrational and is triggered by a person who stumbles or by a stupid joke. Second, they are inefficient; they accomplish nothing (v. 2), just like the game or the movie that entertains us. They will leave no trace, like the vapor (hebel) in the air. Third, they are artificial, just like wine or a drug that creates a false sense of happiness in a world of illusion.

2:4–11. Work. Solomon refers to his own works of achievement: to building projects (v. 4), clearly pointing to himself as a great builder (1 Kin. 7:1–12; 9:15–28), to his wealth (Eccl. 2:7, 8; cf. 1 Kin. 10:23), to his acquisition of cattle (Eccl. 2:7), to his silver and gold (v. 8; 1 Kin. 10:14–29), and to his many women (Eccl. 2:8; cf. 1 Kin. 11:1). The sevenfold repetition of the verb “make” (‘asah) in this paragraph (Eccl. 2:4, 5, 6, 8, 11) may be another pointer to the Creation narrative where “make” is a keyword (Gen. 1:11, 12, 16, 25, 26, 31). The idea is that Solomon was acting as the Creator. Likewise, when he refers to his building projects, he seems to allude to the building of the temple by using the verb “build” seven times (1 Kin. 8:8–13), referring to himself as building for God, while in our context Solomon speaks of building for himself. These allusions to the building of the temple intended for God unveil the true intention of the builder. Even in building for God, Solomon was in fact working for himself and to his own glory. This is why he concludes that all of these works, acquisitions, and achievements, including the pious ones, are futile (Eccl. 2:11).

2:12–23. Wisdom. Then Solomon turns to what he considers the most valuable quality, namely, wisdom (v. 12), which refers to intelligence, science, and practical discernment in daily behavior (7:1–12; Prov. 24:3). He acknowledges the positive value of wisdom. It is better than folly (Eccl. 2:13) and thus allows one to see clearly and to walk in the light, while folly takes one into darkness (vv. 13–14). The language is reminiscent of ancient Egyptian beliefs according to which the wise walks in the light and is alive, while the fool walks in darkness and will die. For Solomon, however, both the wise and the fool have the same destiny: they will die (vv. 15–16). Therefore, he concludes that since all will die, the possession of all the works of wisdom amounts to nothing and life is not worth living (vv. 17–23).

2:24–26. Conclusion: The Gift of God. The discourse about the futility of joy, work, and wisdom is upsetting. Solomon puts these values in the right perspective. Although we are entitled to joy, work, and wisdom, these qualities are all futile insofar as they are the product of our doing. The only way to make these values fulfill their purpose and not become futile is to receive them as the gift of God. This idea is underscored four times in different ways. The first time is through an image that evokes creation as the good (or “enjoyment,” “satisfaction”) from the hand of God (v. 24), and three times through the use of the verb “give” (v. 26), a verb that also belongs to the language of creation (Gen. 1:29). To make his point even more acute, Solomon concludes with a paradox. God gives to whom he wants, that is to the man who is good or pleasing in His sight (Eccl. 2:26). This is another way of saying that who we are or what we do does not justify our beneficial reception of God's gifts, but that they are the gift of God. Only a life oriented by this perspective of God's grace is worth living and is not futile.

3:1–11

The Gift of Time

The first observation of grace is found in time. Unlike Greek philosophers, who saw time as a destructive power, the ancient Hebrews saw life in time. Thus, when Solomon says that there is a time for every event (v. 1), he does not mean that there is an appropriate moment for humans to act; neither does he mean that events happen without our control in a deterministic manner. The use of the preposition le ("to"), attached to the word "all," (to everything...) suggests instead that all these time-events, the times of human existence, are to be received as grace from God. This truth is then shaped in a poem balancing the opposites:

1. Birth/death; plant/pluck (v. 2)
2. Kill/heal; break down/build up (v. 3)
3. Weep/laugh; mourn/dance (v. 4)
4. Cast away stones/gather stones; embrace/refrain from embracing (v. 5)
5. Search (or "gain")/cease searching (or "lose"—lit. "destroy"); keep/throw away (v. 6)
6. Tear/sew (or mend); silence/speak (v. 7)
7. Love/hate; war/peace (v. 8)

The lesson of this poem is that all times, positive and negative, are God's gifts. He is the One who made everything (good and bad) beautiful (or "appropriate" or "fitting") in its time (v. 11). This idea is repeated to emphasize that God is always in control. It also affirms the monotheistic principle that there is only one God (Deut. 32:39; Is. 45:6–7). Even when things are bad, all will work out for good (Gen. 50:20; Esth. 4:14; Rom. 8:28). The seesaw movement between the two poles also contains a lesson of hope: when bad things happen, the good is around the corner.

3:11–14

The Gift of Eternity

In Hebrew thought, eternity is not the absence of time but the intensification of time that will last forever. God has put eternity in the hearts of human beings (v. 11). Just like time, eternity is God's gift. The verb "give" (natan) that is used here is variously translated as "set," "placed," or "put." Yet this gift is only in the heart. Humans have not been created eternal; they only have a sense of eternity. This gift of eternity, which humans have as an intuition, affirms the grace of God in time. This hope in eternal life helps us to see in our time, embedded in pain and under the constant threat of death, the presence of the Invisible. On the other hand, we are urged to enjoy the good we receive in our life (vv. 12–13). These good moments are the evidence we have now of this eternity. They are, like eternity, the gift of God (v. 13), and as such they are perfect; nothing can be added to them, and nothing can be taken from them (v. 14). This is a way of inculcating reverence in the human soul (v. 14). In passing, Solomon appeals for a life oriented by the fear of God, which is the sense that God sees everything and that we are accountable to Him for everything we do (v. 15).

3:16–22

The Gift of Judgment

Yet, Solomon's theology, which invites us to see "good" in everything, poses problems. Indeed, he observes that reality is otherwise, and things are not what they are supposed to be: instead of justice, righteousness, and judgment, there is only wickedness (v. 16). Faith is not blind. It has to confront evil in the world.

3:17. God Shall Judge the Righteous and the Wicked. The only solution to the problem of the world was in the future judgment of God, an event with a cosmic scope that concerns all. The Hebrew word kol, "all" or "every," occurs seven times in this passage (vv. 17–20). We have to face reality: all this crooked and absurd world is irreparable (1:15).

3:18–22. The Estate of the Sons of Men. To prove his point about the tragic condition of our human condition, Solomon refers to humanity's mortal nature, which is absolute and cannot be repaired. In regard to death, humans are like animals (v. 19), just as the wise is like the fool (2:16). All have the same breath, which is the vapor-breath (hebel; 3:19). All will die. From this hopeless description, Solomon concludes that the only and ultimate lesson for humans is to enjoy the gift of God (v. 22) and live in the perspective of His grace. As far as the future is concerned, Solomon simply encourages trust because we cannot control it. The cosmic scope of the passage, which embraces humans and animals, the wise and the fool—that is to say, everything—suggests an eschatological perspective.

4:1-16

The Case of the Other Person

Still preoccupied with the problem of human wickedness, Solomon discusses its manifestation in human relationships. Four cases are considered: the oppressed, the envious, the companion, and the usurper. Each case is introduced by the same formula in the first person, alternating between what he “returned” to consider (or considered “again”) and what he “saw,” referring to Solomon’s initiative to investigate.

4:1-3. The Oppressed. Solomon saw the tears of the oppressed, which are those who are lacking power and suffering injustice. The nature of the oppression is not explained. What primarily disturbed him was that these victims had no comforter (v. 1), which is another way of referring to God (Lam. 1:2, 9; Is. 51:12). This absence of God in the midst of unjust persecution is indeed troubling and challenges faith. Solomon, like Job (Job 3:11, 20), questions the sense of existence. He even goes so far as to “praise” (shabakh) the dead (Eccl. 4:2), using a verb that normally applies to God (Ps. 117:1; 147:12; 1 Chr. 16:35), as if God is no longer worthy of praises and is absent. Yet, the repetition of the phrase referring to the lack of a comforter, which alludes to God (Is. 51:12; 66:13), contrasts with the phrase referring to wickedness in the place of justice (Eccl. 3:16). This suggests by analogy that the divine Judge is here on the horizon. There is hope despite pain. Solomon shakes the traditional logic of success religion, which provides the automatic assurance of immediate gratifications. He knew otherwise and therefore promoted the true religion, which does not deny the reality of evil but perseveres in faith despite suffering.

4:4-6. The Envious. This time Solomon did not see the human face but only the hands or arms (v. 5) and the fists (v. 6). The one turning against us is our neighbor, who is comparable to us and thus can envy what we have. This attitude will ultimately lead to wickedness, stealing, and murder (2 Sam. 12:1-15). Solomon proposes that in such conditions it is better to be alone (Eccl. 4:6). A handful of “rest,” “tranquility,” or “peace” is better than production that chases the wind. All these hands and fists without faces convey a warning against the race for wealth and achievement at the expense of seeing the human face. It is better to stay alone.

4:7-12. The Companion. And yet, it is not good to be alone. Two arguments support this advice. First, it is simply not good to be alone (v. 8), for work is not gratifying. We are not satisfied (v. 8), for we do not use and enjoy what we have gained. If we have no one to give to, what we have amounts to nothing. Second, it is good to be with someone. In the Hebrew, the word “good” is repeated twice (“better” uses the root “good”; v. 9). We need the other when stumbling (v. 10), cold (v. 11), and fighting (v. 12). In conclusion, Solomon refers to a proverb that enunciates in paradoxical language the value of being two: if we are two, we end up being three. The proverb may refer to God, to the coming of a friend of our friend, or to the birth of a child to a human couple.

4:13-16. The Usurper. The fourth person is not described as a physical person. While the other three collectively have a face, hands, and eyes, this one is described simply as a poor, wise youth (v. 13) coming out of prison (v. 14), who would become king and thus take the place of the former king (v. 15). The scenario fits the sad story of Solomon’s succession. Like this fourth person, Jeroboam, Solomon’s successor, was poor (v. 13; cf. 1 Kin. 11:26), young, wise (Eccl. 4:13; cf. 1 Kin. 11:28), and very popular (Eccl. 4:15; cf. 1 Kin. 11:35). Solomon describes himself as old and foolish (Eccl. 4:13; cf. 1:17; 2:3, 9, 10), which is an indication of his repentance at the end of his life. The story, predicting that those who would follow the new king would not be pleased with (or “rejoice”) in him (4:16), also fits the case of Jeroboam (1 Kin. 15:34; 16:2, 19, 26; 22:52). The ending shows that Solomon was right. Even the young wise man, who succeeded the old fool, would grow old and foolish and finish in futility (Eccl. 4:16). Here we find a universal and paradoxical lesson to free us from the illusion of our own wisdom. Only the awareness of our own futility will save us from futility.

5:1-7

The Futility of Religion

Suddenly, the tone changes and becomes imperative. Until this point, Solomon had merely shared his reflections about the futility of life. Now, he speaks about religion in the first person and addresses his pupil in the second person, using ten imperative verbs that end with the command to fear God (v. 7).

Verse 1 begins with the admonition to “walk prudently” or “guard your steps.” The Hebrew text literally means “keep your feet.” The first imperative verb shemor, “keep,” belongs to religious language and generally indicates obedience to God’s commandments (Ex. 20:6; Lev. 18:26; Deut. 5:12). Solomon refers here to conduct in the house of God and to the way we worship. Our prayers, our singing, our moving around in church should be controlled and guided by a deep sense of reverence toward God. This command also applies to the way we live our religion and keep God’s commandments. We may stumble not merely in the refusal to observe God’s laws but also while attempting to keep them. The greatest profanations of religion are often performed in the very practice of religion. They offer the sacrifice of fools (Eccl. 5:1).

Religion is more about hearing, obeying, and receiving from God than about giving or speaking to Him (v. 1b). Two examples illustrate this aspect of the futility of religion. The first case concerns our words (vv. 2–3) uttered before God. We should not pronounce them hastily, for we may lose the sense of the distance of God: He is in heaven and we are on earth (v. 2). Solomon urges us, then, to use few words, for many words are, like dreams, futile (v. 7). The second case concerns our vows and our commitment to God. What is implied here is not so much our failure to fulfill our pious promises. Solomon has in mind the lies religious people tell in relation to religious matters. Such behavior shows that God is not taken seriously and may generate the annihilation of the very pious goal (v. 6). With this dramatic warning, Solomon concludes with the general principle of the fear of God (v. 7), which is another way of reminding the religious person of God’s capacity to see our motivations and judge the futility of our religion.

5:8–9

The Futility of Power

Solomon knew by experience the futility of power. The first illusion entertained by those in power is that they can do whatever they wish. This is based on the naive belief that there is no power above them. This futility is unveiled by Solomon by taking the reader down step by step until finally reaching the land/the earth, which represents the last and highest authority. The language of the parable is reminiscent of two other biblical passages. The first is the curse of Genesis (common words: “earth,” “land,” and “serve”), which enslaves humans to the earth (Gen. 3:17–18). The second text is found in David’s prayer (common words: “over all” and “earth”), which underlines God’s sovereignty (1 Chr. 29:11–14). While these two parallel passages emphasize the futility of power, they both contain a perspective of hope. In Genesis we find the promise of redemption, and in David’s prayer we find the assurance of the God who even controls and rules over all wicked powers.

5:10–17

The Futility of Wealth

What we observed in regard to power is similarly observed in regard to wealth. In both cases we experience futility and we end with nothing. Wealth, which begins with the positive account, ends systematically with a negative evaluation (vv. 9, 11, 13, 14). We always want more money (v. 10). Second, wealth will be taken from us (v. 11). Third, the value of wealth is denied; the rich are always worried and hurting (vv. 12–13). Fourth, we will end up as we came, which was with nothing (vv. 15–16). The lesson is that there is no profit in accumulating wealth (vv. 16–17).

5:18–20

The Gift of God

Solomon was not against wealth. His critique essentially concerns the way we see these material blessings. His message is that they should not be taken as inherently valuable. In fact, he insists that we should enjoy them. They are to be enjoyed because they are the gift of God. He affirms this lesson explicitly: God gives wealth and possessions (v. 19). This idea is reinforced by the use of the term kheleq (“heritage,” “portion,” “lot,” or “reward”) twice (vv. 18, 19) to signify God’s effective presence (Ps. 73:26; Deut. 7:9). The lesson is the same: all is futility except if it is taken as the gift of God. Only the gift of God is not futility.

6:1–12

The Futility of the Gift of God

This is the shortest chapter in the book and may function as the conclusion of the first part of the book. After having systematically demonstrated that all is futility except the gift of God, Solomon now finds the ferment of futility even in the gift of God. He calls this “great evil” (some translations read “common” or “prevalent”—the Heb. rab can mean “great” or also “much”; the latter leading to the rendering of “common”).

6:2. Lack of Satisfaction. Solomon next considers the case of a person to whom God does not provide the opportunity to enjoy all of His gifts. The thought was expressed in a positive way in 5:19. Now the negative alternative expresses the personal experience of Solomon. Like the person in the example, Solomon did receive riches, wealth, and honor (2 Chr. 1:12). Yet, the enjoyment of these gifts was limited to Solomon’s life (1 Kin. 3:13). Like the man in his parable, Solomon saw that they are consumed by a foreigner. This autobiographical allusion illustrates the point of Ecclesiastes, namely, that even the gifts of God, if we are no longer present to enjoy them, qualify as futility.

6:3–6. If a Man Begets a Hundred Children. While in the previous observation the quality of futility was drawn from the experience of death, now it is inferred from the experience of birth. Another autobiographical reference is implied here. Solomon had an ambivalent experience of birth: a positive one, for Solomon had many wives and must have begotten many children, and a negative one, since his birth was associated with the birth of David’s child with Bathsheba, who died immediately (2 Sam. 12:24). Looking at his long life (1 Kin. 3:14) and at the stillborn, Solomon reaches the conclusion that they both are futile. This hyperbolic presentation intends to prove that even without death things are bad. For the more we live, the more intense will be our experience of the futility of life, even if life is God’s gift.

6:7–12. The Wandering of Desire. This last paragraph resonates with the prologue concerning the longing (nepesh) that is never satisfied (v. 7; cf. 1:7). The Hebrew word nepesh (6:9), rendered here as “desire” or “appetite,” is often rendered in other contexts as “soul.” This “soul” (nepesh) is not a separate spiritual entity distinct from the body. The term refers to a living person who has spiritual (vv. 2, 3) as well as physical aspirations (vv. 7, 9). Every part of the person is involved in desire: the mouth (metaphor for the stomach, or appetite; v. 7), the eyes (metaphor for vision; v. 9), the foot (“walk”—metaphor for conduct; v. 8), and the full person (v. 2). To express this longing of the soul, Solomon uses an idiomatic expression: the wandering of nepesh (v. 9). It figuratively suggests the journey of a person (our own journey) to another place (2 Kin. 5:26). The soul, the whole person, longs for another place; it yearns for something that it does not have and cannot grasp. What is missing belongs to another order. In this connection, the wise is not more than the fool (v. 8). We are all visited by the same nostalgia and frustration; it is a thirst that will never be quenched (John 4:13–14). Solomon warns, then, that it is vain to try to explain it and systematize it. This thirst is beyond comprehension, and the more words we may utter to dissert on this mystery, the more vapor there will be and the foggier the result will be. Words are the many things that increase futility (Eccl. 6:11). The word debarim, translated here as “things,” also means “words,” which fits well here since the context implies the exercise of speech (v. 10 refers to naming and contending). Ecclesiastes concludes with a rhetorical question that implies a negative answer: who knows what is good for people (Heb. ’adam—“man” or “humanity”) in life (v. 12)? Solomon acknowledges his failure. The lost good of creation will always lie beyond human reach. He is alluding to Genesis 3:22, with which this passage shares common wording (“know,” “good,” “man” [’adam], and “life”). This allusion suggests that Adam’s loss of the good was really the loss of wisdom (1 Kin. 3:12). Yet, a second rhetorical question reveals that the answer belongs to the future: who can tell a man (’adam, “humanity”) what will happen after him, or them (Eccl. 6:12)? The second question parallels the first one and is related to it. Both questions are concerned with human destiny. The scope of these questions embraces human civilization. Similar to Gen. 3:22, Ecclesiastes ends (cf. Eccl. 6:12; 12:13–14) on a note of cosmic hope in an eschatological perspective.

7:1—12:8

THE PROBLEM OF WISDOM

7:1–18

The Ambiguity of Wisdom

This chapter begins the second half of the book. While the first half is concerned with futility, the second half is more concerned with wisdom. Solomon just concluded that no one knows what is good (6:12). Now, he focuses on the nature of this good (tob), a keyword in this passage (it occurs twelve times).

7:1–10. A Good Name Is Better (tob) than Precious Ointment (or Perfume). This statement parallels the observation that death is better than birth (v. 1). The following statements convey a similar lesson: mourning is better than feasting (v. 2), rebuke is better than song (v. 5), end is better than beginning (v. 8), patience is better than pride (vv. 8–9), and present is better than past (v. 10). Solomon's point is that often the "good" is found in places where one expects the bad.

7:11–18. Wisdom Is Good with an Inheritance. Wisdom works in the present only for those who have already received it and for those who have inherited it from the past (vv. 11–12). The preceding lesson was that good was found in the present. Now, the lesson is that good is also found in the past. Good is here but was also there. You cannot change a world that is made of both good and bad. Therefore, one will have to receive them both; there is good in both. The day of adversity will make one think, and the day of prosperity will make one happy (v. 14). This confirms Solomon: God has made (or appointed) the one as well as the other (v. 14). The corollary of this principle is that a fanatical obsession with righteousness is fatal. Solomon saw that (sometimes) righteous people perish in their righteousness, and wicked people prolong their lives in wickedness (v. 15). Consequently, he recommends that we not be excessively righteous, otherwise we will destroy ourselves (v. 16), and that we not be overly wicked, otherwise we will die prematurely (vv. 16–17). Instead, the good way is to grasp this and also that (v. 18). He is not promoting a compromise. This paradoxical statement means that balance is needed when applied to the good (Rom. 16:19). What justifies this unusual advice is that sometimes what we consider good or bad is not necessarily good or bad. We may not understand all of the ramifications or have enough knowledge to evaluate correctly.

7:19–8:1

The Elusiveness of Wisdom

It is not surprising, then, that wisdom is so difficult to find. The verb matsa' ("to find" or "discover") occurs seven times in this passage, indicating the struggle of Solomon in his search for wisdom. Two reasons are given to explain this trouble. The first has to do with the nature of wisdom itself, which is far beyond reach and is deep, mysterious, and profound (vv. 23–24).

The second has to do with the ambiguity of wisdom and its complex association with folly (vv. 25–26). The mingling of wisdom with folly makes it difficult to sort out the one from the other—to seek and find wisdom and the reasoned explanation of the scheme of things (v. 25). The word translated here as "reason," "explanation," or "scheme" (kheshbon) belongs in the realm of accounting and refers to the difficulty of sorting out the good from the bad and wisdom from folly. It is in the context of Solomon's frustration at not finding wisdom that we should understand his parable about a woman he could not find (vv. 27–28). He is not defending the idea of the superiority of men over women. The use of the word 'adam for "man" suggests that Solomon had in mind the generic idea of humankind (v. 29). The woman he speaks about represents wisdom (Prov. 8). He uses hyperbolic language to demonstrate that it is impossible to find wisdom. Let's assume that it would be possible to find one human among a thousand; it would still be impossible to find a woman (wisdom) among all these, meaning all humankind. This reference to adding one thing to the other to find out the reason (kheshbon; Eccl. 7:27) points back to the accounting that characterized the search for wisdom (v. 25). The conclusion of this essay on wisdom (8:1), which belongs more to what precedes than to what follows, is an ironic allusion to the priestly blessing—makes his face shine (Num. 6:25)—that is directed toward those who would claim to have found wisdom.

8:2–17

The Ambivalence of the World

The impossibility to know wisdom, hence the incapacity to distinguish between good and evil, leads to a world where the borders between right and wrong are not clear. The world is both right and wrong. Solomon finds symptoms of the ambivalence of the world in the exercise of authority and in the unfairness of retribution, and he proposes an ambivalent solution.

8:2–9. The Ambivalence of Authority. The preceding discussion could lead to anarchy. For if the king is not wiser than others, why should they submit to him? The first argument to support submission to authority, even though this authority is not intrinsically superior, is its connection with God: an oath to Him (v. 2). The language of Solomon is reminiscent of the story of Shimei, who was known for his lack of respect to the king (2 Sam. 16:5–13) and with whom Solomon had made a covenant under the “oath of God” (1 Kin. 2:43–44). The second argument is that submission to authority is in our own interest. He who obeys will not be harmed (Eccl. 8:5), which is also verified in the case of Shimei (2 Sam. 19:20). And even if the misery of a person increases, faith in God’s grace is still the answer, for there is judgment for every action, just as there is a time for everything (Eccl. 8:5; cf. 3:1). In addition to this transcendent judgment, Solomon warns that judgment already works here and now. As powerful as the wicked rulers may be, they will not have power over their own breath; they will die (8:8). For surely, continues Solomon, the king’s power will not save him from suffering from his own abuse of power (v. 8), just as the case was for Solomon in regard to Shimei (1 Kin. 2:46). In fact, ruling abusively is at the abuser’s own expense (Eccl. 8:9).

8:10–14. The Ambivalence of Retribution.

The honors that the wicked received at the funeral (v. 10) and their long life (v. 12) are not evidence of God’s blessing. This is deemed as futile (v. 10). The life of the wicked, no matter how long it may be, is insignificant and comparable to a shadow (v. 13). On the other hand, promises Solomon, the righteous remain in touch with the “good” (tob) of creation: it will be better (tob) for those who fear God (v. 12). The logic is, however, upset by the observation that the wicked seem to be rewarded while the righteous seem to be punished.

8:15–17. The Ambivalent Solution. Solomon reacts to the observation of this futility (v. 14) in two ways. On the one hand, he recommends the enjoyment of the good (tob) of creation and remaining grateful for the gift of God (v. 15). On the other hand, he is puzzled and seeks to find the wisdom that will help him understand (v. 16). Solomon does not try to make sense of the absurd condition of the world. He knows that he cannot find the wisdom to explain it. The section ends as in the preceding chapter, with the same acknowledgment of failure and the same unanswered question. Yet, Solomon insists that he has to strive to find the answer. The solution of the wise is then ambivalent. The wise will enjoy life even though he knows that he will never be happy, and he will search for wisdom even though he knows he will not be able to fully find it (v. 17).

9:1–18

Totality of Life

The ambivalent condition of the world was the basis for Solomon’s reflection. He considered all this (v. 1), referring back to all the preceding perspective. The word kol, “all,” is a keyword in the chapter (occurring fourteen times in the Hebrew). The perspective of Solomon was comprehensive, covering the totality of humankind, the totality of life, the totality of chance, and, in conclusion, the totality of wisdom.

9:1–6. Totality of Humankind. All human categories are included in Solomon’s analysis. The righteous and the wise, along with their actions, love, and hatred, are all in the hand of God (v. 1). They will all die. The list, referring to opposites, the good and the bad (v. 2), acknowledges that there is no privileged party. Death is total; it will affect the totality of humankind and will embrace the totality of the human person. No one and nothing will survive death. This description leaves no room for the idea that someone, the good one, will not die or that something of ourselves, our soul, will continue to live. Therefore, a living dog is better than a dead lion (v. 4). The unconscious state of the dead is explicitly affirmed: in contrast to the living who know, the dead know nothing (v. 5). All the spiritual faculties (memory, love, hatred, envy) have ’abad (“perish,” “vanish,” or “disappear”; v. 6). This verb implies total annihilation (Ex. 10:7; Deut. 4:10). The condition of the world is hopeless. Yet Solomon assures us that there is hope (Eccl. 9:4), a unique emphasis in the book. The Hebrew word for “hope” (bittakhon) implies trust in God’s action within a desperate situation (2 Kin. 18:19; cf. Ps. 22:4). This hope is connected to those righteous who are still alive (Eccl. 9:4; cf. Deut. 30:19).

9:7–10. Totality of Life. For this hopelessness of the human condition, Solomon recommends enjoying life. A series of imperatives describe the steps of this move.

Go (v. 7): This first verb introduces and contains all the others. The Hebrew verb halak is reminiscent of God’s order to Abraham (Gen. 12:1; cf. 22:1), which was a call to move from his place to live a life of faith and enjoy God’s gifts.

Eat and drink: Bread and wine are two basic products associated with the blessings of “grain and new wine” in the land (Deut. 33:28; Gen. 14:18). The wine Solomon refers to is “new wine” and is therefore nonalcoholic wine. This identification better fits the context of our passage, which uses the language of creation (tob, “good”; ma’aseh, “work”).

Feast (Eccl. 9:8): White garments and oil are the visible signs of feasting (2 Sam. 14:2; Ps. 23:5).

Live (Eccl. 9:9): The expression “live joyfully” or “enjoy life” literally means “see life,” implying that to see life with another woman (or man) is not an option. This attention, which concerns all the days of the life of futility, does not only mean faithfulness; it also helps in the endurance of the human condition.

Work with all your strength (v. 10): life with God is not passive. Humans are invited to be creative, like God. This phrase shares a common wording with the passage on the Sabbath in Genesis 2:1–3 and conveys a double lesson about work. First, it affirms the value of work; it is a sign of life. Second, it warns against abuse. Work should be controlled in proportion to our strength. The Sabbath, alluded to in this passage, puts work in the right perspective.

9:11–12. Totality of Chance. This poem confronts us with the unfair blindness of chance; time and chance happen to them all (v. 11). What we may interpret to be the result of our work—the race, the battle, the bread, the riches, the favor—is in fact undeserved. Chance is unfair, as is death; it strikes unexpectedly and unjustly, like a snare or trap for an animal (v. 12). This universal experience of the unfairness of chance paradoxically contains a universal lesson of grace: no one deserves what he or she gets.

9:13–18. Totality of Wisdom. The parable of the poor wise man, whose wisdom saved the little city and yet was forgotten (vv. 13–15), conveys an important lesson on the total value of wisdom. This is the conclusion of Solomon’s meditation on the unfairness of life: wisdom is better than strength (v. 16). Despite the rule of fools, wisdom remains sovereign. Yet, he regrets that one fool may ruin much of it (v. 18), thus anticipating the following section.

10:1–20

Fools Are Everywhere

Just as dead flies putrefy perfume (v. 1), fools may penetrate wisdom and affect its identity. The perfume loses its odor and wisdom is not wise anymore. Like fleas, fools are found everywhere: in schools, in the workplace, in public life, and even in government.

10:1–7. In Schools. Solomon begins with the last place where a fool should be found, the place of instruction. This syndrome of dead flies in perfume first affects the very institution respected for its wisdom (v. 1), the so-called academic authority that teaches a corrupt lesson (falsehood, racism, evolution, etc.). Unlike the wise, whose heart is on the right side and who can therefore think clearly and rightly, the fool teaches from the left side (v. 2), the side of deception (Judg. 3:15; 21:2). The fool lacks wisdom and yet accuses the others of being foolish (Eccl. 10:3). It is therefore expected that the fool is intolerant and abuses his power. Solomon recommends self-control and a conciliatory spirit, without compromising integrity (v. 4). For the fool is dignified by authorities (v. 6). Society reflects this lack of discernment since servants ride on horses and princes walk on the ground, an image showing the same value crisis as noted before (9:11).

10:8–10. In the Workplace. Fools who are placed in their positions not because of their skills will sooner or later be unmasked by the poor quality of their performance. They will fall in the pit they have dug (v. 8). The bad mason will be bitten by the serpent (v. 8). The bad quarryman will be hurt because of his clumsiness (v. 9). The bad woodcutter will waste his energies because he does not know how to use his ax (v. 10).

10:11–15. In Public Life. The fool’s foolishness will be revealed by his words. Thus, the fool is comparable to an amateur snake charmer who, for lack of knowledge, is bitten by the snake. He is unmasked as a fraud (v. 11). Their many words compromise them, and their lips will swallow them (v. 12). Fools are thoroughly fools (v. 13). Thus, they have no contribution to make. Their effect is limited to the present (v. 14). Solomon concludes his satire on the talkative fool by referring to the fool who was walking along the way, lacking wisdom, and calling everyone a fool. The fool is lost in the way and does not even know how to get to the city (v. 15). He cannot find help because he considers everyone else a fool. The mention of a city that cannot be found points to the earlier city, saved by the poor wise man (9:13–15). Yet this time, there is no wise man to save it.

10:16–20. In the Government. Wise men are no longer around. Only fools are left, and the result is catastrophic. An immature child is sitting on the throne (v. 16) and officers are continually feasting. While this situation is under the curse (“woe to you”), for a moment Solomon recounts the blessing of good leadership (v. 17). He describes a time of crisis when “the house” (the temple or the palace) is neglected because of laziness and the lack of responsible leadership (v. 18). The leaders are only interested in immediate pleasures, and they only value money, which they identify as their god; money answers everything (v. 19). The verb ‘anah (“answer”) applies normally to God (Ps. 3:5; 13:4). Solomon then turns to another group of people, which was implied before in the blessing (Eccl. 10:17), and he addresses them discreetly. Considering the pervasive presence of the fools, he urges this other camp to keep quiet and behave with great prudence: even their thoughts and words in their bedrooms must be guarded—the king and the rich have ways of finding out (v. 20). Against the rule of iniquity and foolishness, Solomon does not call for a revolution. Against the talkative and noisy fools, he only recommends the silence of faith.

11:1–10

The Life of Faith

The last words of prudence do not mean cowardice and passivity. The faith Solomon has in mind implies running risks. Each risk is promoted with a specific admonition: the risk of generosity toward others, the risk of hope in the future when there is no prospect, and the risk of enjoying life in the midst of troubles.

11:1–2. The Risk of Generosity. From words against people, Solomon moves to actions on behalf of people. It is interesting that the first admonition calling for the first act of faith is not directed toward God but toward the poor. The message is based on a proverb (v. 1). Casting bread upon waters means to risk losing bread. Similarly, giving to the poor is giving without the expectation of reward and giving out of grace (9:11). This act of generosity is therefore an act of faith. It is precisely this expectation of loss that will bring the bread back. The expression al pene hammayim (“on the surface of the waters,” “across the sea,” or “on the face of the waters”) is reminiscent of Gen. 1:2, when the spirit was “upon the waters.” The language therefore implies the promise of God’s act of creation, which will turn the futility, represented by waters, into existence and significance. In Ecclesiastes, the image of waters is also associated with the idea of return (Eccl. 1:7). There is therefore wisdom in the apparent folly of losing bread, an idea in tune with Solomon’s paradox that wisdom may be found in folly (see also Matt. 10:39).

The numerical parallelism of seven and eight (Eccl. 11:2), where the first number is followed by a higher number, is intended to express the idea of intensification (Prov. 30:29). An act of generosity should expand beyond a single act of charity. Liberality is encouraged here. The reason why we should give is not only justified with the promise that the bread will return; this act is also needed because we do not know what calamity will fall on the earth (Eccl. 11:2). Paradoxically, humanitarian activities will save us from a potential evil. Giving to the hungry will save the world from political and economic crisis.

11:3–6. The Risk of Hope. The second admonition is to sow seed. Here again the idea of not knowing is repeated three times (vv. 5 [twice], 6), but now the phrase is pregnant with hope. Instead of evil (v. 2), what is expected is the miraculous work of God. Our act of faithful “sowing” is motivated by the fact that “we do not know” how the clouds will produce rain (v. 3), where a tree will fall (v. 3), how (if) the wind will blow (vv. 4–5), or how human bones grow in the womb of a woman (v. 5). This is the faith of creation: we cannot know or understand the work of God who is the Creator of everything (v. 5). In parallel to the previous admonition, the call to sow is intensified; both morning and evening work is encouraged (v. 6). We should always sow because we do not know which seed will prosper. The last word (tob, “good” or “well”) reminds us of God’s grace. Our acts of grace are acts of creation, responding to the Creator’s acts of grace.

11:7–10. The Risk of Life. The third admonition is a call to rejoice in and enjoy life (vv. 8–9). The word tob is used again here (v. 7), evoking the context of creation. The idiom of seeing the sun means “to be alive.” This section is saturated with the language of creation (good, sun, light, living, man [‘adam]). The call to rejoice is based on our remembrance of both life, when light is sweet (v. 7), and death, the days of darkness (v. 8). This enjoyment applies to all sorts of things (11:8). It means that we have to enjoy everything of creation. The paradigm of youth implies the intensity of enjoyment. Solomon encourages us to take all the risks of life, and walk or live according to all our desires (according to all our thoughts, emotions), and according to the sight of our eyes—all that is proposed to us. This comprehensive grace reminds us of God speaking to Adam in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2:16). The key conjunction in Ecclesiastes 11:9 may be better understood as “and” instead of “but,” conveying not so much an implicit warning as a simple statement of fact, or even an assurance. All this enjoyment is thus reinforced, not discouraged, by the knowledge of the judgment of God, which points to the good news of God’s gift of salvation that is prepared for the righteous (3:17; 8:6; cf. Dan. 7:22). However, this grace is associated with a commandment just as the grace of God’s permission to eat of every tree in the Garden of Eden was associated with the commandment not to eat of one tree (Gen. 2:17). Solomon’s commandment is a call to remove ca’as (“anxiety,” “sorrow,” or “vexation”) from the mind and ra’ (“evil,” “pain,” or “trouble”) from the body—he is concerned with the inside as well as the outside. Solomon’s exhortation to refrain from sin is not a response to the fear of judgment but is instead a response to the grace of God.

12:1–8

Cosmic Catastrophe

Surprisingly, the Preacher/Teacher now places the emphasis on the future judgment, introducing an eschatological dimension in his discourse. Wisdom and eschatology stand side by side here.

12:1–4. The End of the World. The last message of Solomon concludes with an evocation of creation (11:7–9a) and the perspective of the future day of judgment (vv. 9b–10). The same association recurs in chapter 12, which begins with creation (v. 1) and ends with judgment (v. 14). However, the perspective has shifted from the limited scope of personal life (11:7, 10) to the cosmic scope of the world and human history (12:2–7, 14). From an allusion to old age (v. 1), Solomon moves to the description of a cosmic catastrophe. The eschatological language of the passage (“in that day,” “darkening of the sun,” “blossoming of the almond tree,” etc.) suggests that he is referring to an apocalyptic vision of the end of the world.

12:5–7. The End of Humankind. From an allusion to the death of a man (‘adam) going to his grave (v. 5), Solomon moves to the broader scene of the death of all humankind: the return to dust. This evokes the miracle of creation (Gen. 1:2; 2:7). In fact, creation (Eccl. 12:1) is related to the two cosmic eschatological events. The end of the world and the end of humankind are both introduced by the same expression “before” (vv. 1, 6).

12:8. The Motto Again. In the introduction, Ecclesiastes begins with the motto of habel hab-alim (“vanity of vanities,” “absolute futility,” or “utterly meaningless”; 1:2) followed by creation (vv. 2–11); the conclusion echoes in a chiasmic parallel the introduction of the book (AB // BA): the motto follows the reference to creation. At the end, the world returns, then, to the same state it was in before it started.

12:9–14

EPILOGUE: THE SENSE OF CREATION

12:9–12

The Words of Truth

In parallel to the destiny of the world, the book ends as it began, with an autobiographical note (1:1), but this time it focuses on the words of Solomon (vv. 9–12). His task was not only to teach the people but also to seek and sort out his heritage of wisdom (v. 9) and to find the true taste of the words (v. 10) in order to make sense of creation. The description of the written words as upright and true underlines their association with God (2 Sam. 7:28; Ps. 119:43), which is implied in the expression “One Shepherd” (Ps. 23:1). This short lecture on wisdom has a double function. First, it establishes the divine inspiration of this difficult message (it is like firmly set nails). There is a warning against anything beyond or in addition to this message that admonishes (Eccl. 12:12), which is therefore to be honored and received as holy Scriptures (Deut. 4:2; Rev. 22:18–19). It also prepares for the reception of the last and most important message (Eccl. 3:14).

12:13–14

The Day of Judgment

This is the conclusion and therefore the climax and goal of the book (v. 13). All humankind (kal ha’adam) is urged to make sense of life: fear God and keep His commandments. The reason for this call is the cosmic judgment, which covers everything, good and evil (v. 14). Note that this association of creation, judgment, and the fear of God reappears in the apocalyptic message of John (Rev. 14:7). This hope, which is part of the agenda of Ecclesiastes, is also shared and nurtured by those who wait on the Lord during the final judgment.

SONG OF SONGS

INTRODUCTION

Title. The title “Song of Solomon,” as known to centuries of English readers, is more technically understood to be “Song of Songs.” This title expresses the superlative, just like the parallel phrase “Holy of Holies” (for Most Holy Place), and thus may be translated as “The Most Sublime Song.”

Authorship. The first verse of this book not only provides the title “Song of Songs” but also adds the qualifier “of Solomon.” This is how authorship is expressed in other books in the Hebrew OT. In this way, then, Solomon is identified as the author of the Song. Numerous lines of external and internal evidence support the book’s self-assertion that the Song was composed by King Solomon: (1) 1 Kings 4:32 mentions Solomon’s 1,005 songs; (2) the name “Solomon” appears seven times in the book (Song 1:1, 5; 3:7, 9, 11; 8:11, 12); (3) all five “king” references (1:4, 12; 3:9, 11; 7:5) portray him in a manner consistent with the written account of Solomon; (4) terminology associated with a wedding (3:7–11) has been identified with Solomon’s wedding to the Egyptian princess (1 Kin. 3:1); (5) the profusion of flora (twenty-one varieties) and fauna (fifteen species) mentioned in the Song parallel the account of Solomon’s knowledge (1 Kin. 4:23, 33; 10:2, 10, 25); (6) an association can be made between the chariots of Pharaoh (Song 1:9) and the acquisition of horses from Egypt (1 Kin. 10:28) during Solomon’s reign; (7) throughout the Song a number of luxury goods are described (e.g., Song 1:12, 13; 3:6, 9), comporting with the written description of the wealth of Solomon (1 Kin. 10:14–23) and associated with the extensive trading that took place at that time (9:26–28); (8) references to Tirzah and Heshbon fit the time period of the united monarchy; (9) there are extensive linguistic parallels between this book and others (Proverbs and Ecclesiastes) that are traditionally attributed to Solomon; (10) contrary to scholars who posit a late date after the time of Solomon, the use of archaic grammatical and poetic features point to an early date for the book; and (11) numerous allusions to the Solomonic temple and palace can be found in the Song (e.g., Song 1:5, 16–17; 2:4; 5:15; 8:7, 9).

Date and Backgrounds. The weight of the evidence favors the traditional view that the couple in the Song are not merely literary figures existing in the author’s imagination but a historical married couple. Solomon is clearly the male lover in the Song. Besides the points mentioned above in which the book refers to King Solomon, he is explicitly identified several times as the groom in the wedding of the couple (3:7, 9, 11). The Song was probably written early in Solomon’s reign, circa 950 B.C., before he apostatized into idolatry and polygamy (1 Kin. 11:1–8).

The identity of the female lover in this book is a mystery that has yet to find a satisfactory solution that is widely accepted in scholarship. The various views posit, among other possibilities, that she may have been (1) Pharaoh’s daughter (the traditional view in the history of interpretation until the rise of critical scholarship; 3:1; 9:24); (2) Abishag the Shulamite (1:3, 15; 2:17, 21–22); (3) both Pharaoh’s daughter and Abishag; or (4) an unidentified woman from the village of Shulam (Shunam), an Israelite and not a foreigner (cf. 11:1–3). In light of the monogamous nature of the marriage relationship revealed in the Song viewed against the historical background of Solomon’s life (see below, Theology: number 3. Monogamy) and the reference to “Shulamite” (see commentary on Song 6:13–7:10), this commentary could favor either the first or the third option above, but the verse-by-verse commentary that follows does not depend upon accepting one of these options above the other.

Theology and Purpose. The Song of Songs is a return to Eden. It presents an inspired reflection and elucidation of the divine ideal for human sexual love within the context of courtship and marriage. This theology of sexuality may be summarized under ten subheadings.

1. Creation Order. Underlying the entire Song is the same high doctrine of Creation that is found in Genesis 1–2. Sexuality is assumed to be a Creation ordinance, given by God for humans to enjoy (see commentary on 8:5–14). At the same time, sexuality and divinity are radically separated; sexuality belongs to the Creation order, not the divine realm.

2. Heterosexual Marital Form. In the Song of Songs, consistent with the divine pattern in Genesis 2:18–23, we find a heterosexual love relationship described in the context of courtship and marriage.

3. Monogamy. In harmony with the monogamy set forth as the divine pattern for marriage in Genesis 2:23, the marriage relationship depicted in the Song is a monogamous one (see e.g., Song 1:7; 2:2, 3, 16; 5:1, 10; 6:3; 7:10; 8:6–7). The historical record also implies a monogamous marital relationship between Solomon and the wife of his youth (1 Kin. 3:1; 7:8; 9:16). According to this historical record, Solomon was married early in his reign to Pharaoh's daughter, and some twenty years later he brought her to the palace he had built for her in Jerusalem. No other wives or palaces for them are mentioned during this time period. This seems to imply that Pharaoh's daughter (who became a faithful follower of the true God, Song 8:6; cf. PK 53) was Solomon's sole wife during the time when he composed this Song in the early years of his reign. The biblical record indicates that Solomon remained faithful to God during this twenty-year period (1 Kin. 9:1–5; cf. 3:3–15). Ellen White writes that "for many years he [Solomon] walked uprightly, his life marked with strict obedience to God's commands" (PK 27).

Some have pointed to the record that Solomon reigned for forty years and that his son Rehoboam took over the throne at the age of forty-one (11:42–43; 14:21), implying that Rehoboam was born the year before Solomon became king. From such data it is inferred that Solomon had other wives before the Shulamite and was therefore polygamous at the time when the Song was written. But the LXX records in 1 Kings 12:24a (in an extended section not found in the MT) that Rehoboam was sixteen years of age when he began to reign (not forty-one), and that he reigned twelve years. The LXX may well preserve the correct chronological data since this data makes more sense of the statement in v. 8 that Rehoboam "consulted the young men who had grown up with him." The Hebrew term used for the "young men" means "boy," "[male] child," "youth." If those who grew up with him were called "boys"/"youths," then Rehoboam himself was a "boy"/"youth" when he became king, and this would not easily apply to a forty-one-year-old. But if Rehoboam was only sixteen when he ascended to Solomon's throne, there is ample chronological space for the twenty-plus years of Solomon's monogamous marriage to the Shulamite before he married Rehoboam's mother, and she gave birth to Rehoboam. As an alternate interpretation, one may note that according to 14:21 Rehoboam's mother was Naamah, an Ammonite. It is possible that Naamah had already given birth to Rehoboam by an Ammonite father before her political marriage to Solomon, and Solomon simply adopted Rehoboam as his own (eldest) son (a practice hinted at from around this very time in Ps. 2:7). David's bloodline in this case was to be passed on through Rehoboam's wife Maachah (the granddaughter of Absalom, David's son), who gave birth to Rehoboam's successor, Abijam (1 Kin. 15:1, 2; 2 Chr. 11:21).

Although later in life (after he composed the Song of Songs) Solomon fell into polygamy (1 Kin. 11:1–8), his later, dark history must not detract from the reality depicted in the narrative frame of the sublime Song. The Song has a happy, monogamous literary ending.

4. Equality within the Love Relationship. In parallel with Genesis 1–2, the lovers in the Song are presented as full equals in every way. The keynote of egalitarianism in mutual love is struck in Song of Songs 2:16: "My beloved is mine, and I am his." The Song of Songs begins and closes with the woman speaking; she carries the majority of the dialogue; she initiates most of the meetings and is just as active in the lovemaking as the husband; she is just as eloquent about the beauty of her lover as he is about her; she is as gainfully employed as he is. In short, throughout the Song the woman is fully the equal of the man.

5. Wholeness. The concept of wholeness in sexuality is highlighted in the Song of Songs by one of its key themes—the presence and/or absence of the lovers with/from each other (3:1–5; 5:2–8). Wholeness in the Song includes the holistic view of the human person as a sexual being. Sexuality in the Song is not just the sex act; it involves the whole indivisible human being: physical, sensual, emotional, and spiritual. Physical attraction includes the whole body—not just the sexual organs (vv. 10–16; 7:1–9)—and the expressions of praise often refer to inner (character) qualities of the one praised and not just physical beauty.

6. Exclusivity. As in Genesis 2:24 man is to “leave”—be free from all outside interferences in the sexual relationship—so in the Song of Songs the lovers are unfettered by parental prearrangements and are in love for love’s sake alone. The exclusivity of the couple’s relationship is apparent from numerous references in the Song (e.g., Song 2:2, 16; 6:3, 9; 7:10).

7. Permanence. As in the Genesis model (Gen. 2:24), man and woman are to “cleave” to each other in a marriage covenant so the Song of Songs climaxes in the wedding procession, ceremony, and wedding night (Song 3:6–5:1; see Literary Features below). As in Genesis 2:24, the fidelity, loyalty, and devotion of the partners and the steadfastness and permanence of their love is revealed in the Song (see esp. Song 2:16; 6:3; 8:6–7).

8. Intimacy. The Song of Songs as a whole may be considered as nothing less than an ode to intimacy. As in Genesis 2:24, where the “one-flesh” union follows the “cleaving,” so in the Song of Songs sexual intercourse occurs only within the context of the marriage covenant. At the time of the wedding, the Shulamite is a garden “locked” or “enclosed” (Song 4:12), which refers to her virginity. The lyrics of Solomon in the Song also seem to indicate his virginity at the time of the wedding (2:2; 6:9; 8:5). The Song moves sequentially through the entire historical scope of the relationship between Solomon and the Shulamite. There is a consistent pattern of maturing intimacy, appropriate to each stage of their relationship.

9. Sexuality and Procreation. The Song contains no reference to the procreative function of sexuality. As in the Creation account of Genesis 2, the sexual experience within marriage is not linked with the utilitarian intent to propagate children. Lovemaking for the sake of love, not procreation, is the message of the Song. In the Song sexual union is given value on its own, without the need to justify it as a means to some superior (procreative) end.

10. The Wholesome Beauty and Joy of Sexuality. In the Song of Songs, as in Genesis 1–2, sexuality (along with the rest of God’s creation) is portrayed as “very good [beautiful]” and is to be celebrated and enjoyed without fear or embarrassment (cf. Gen 2:25). A plenitude of intertwining themes and motifs in the Song highlight this wholesome beauty and goodness of paradisaal sexual love. Paradisaal love is presented as stunningly beautiful (e.g., Song 1:15, 16); wonderfully sensuous (e.g., 4:16; 5:1); an exuberant celebration (e.g., 3:6–11); a thrilling adventure (e.g., 1:4; 2:8, 10); an exquisite delight (e.g., vv. 3–4); marked by strong sexual desire (e.g., 5:1–6); unashamed and uninhibited (e.g., 7:2, 8–9, 11–13; 8:2); yet also restrained and in good taste (e.g., 2:7; 3:5; 5:8; 8:4); light-hearted play (e.g., 1:7–8; 7:9); romantic love (e.g., vv. 10–13; 8:5–7); powerfully passionate (e.g., 6:12; 7:4); and an awe-inspiring mystery (e.g., 6:4, 10).

A whole book of the Bible is devoted to celebrating the wholesome beauty and enjoyment of human sexual love. The Song of Songs in its literal sense is not merely a “secular” love song but is already fraught with deep theological significance. God reveals His love for humanity in the enjoyment and pleasure that He designed for lovers to find in each other in the marriage context.

The echo of God’s names resonates in the dominant recurring refrain of the Song (see commentary on 2:6–7), and the actual voice of God resounds from the Song’s central literary summit (see commentary on 4:16–5:1). But when one moves to the Song’s thematic climax and conclusion, the great paean to love (8:6), the actual name of Yahweh makes its single explicit appearance in the book, and His flaming presence encapsulates the entire theological message of the Song: “Its [Love’s] flames are flames of fire”—the very flame of Yahweh (see commentary on 8:5–14 regarding this translation).

Since human love is described as a gift from God, a flame of Yahweh, the love displayed between Solomon and the Shulamite not only depicts wholesome human sexuality but points beyond to the love of Yahweh Himself. The various characteristics and qualities of holy human love that have emerged from the Song—selfless mutuality and reciprocity, joy of presence, pain of absence, exclusivity (yet inclusiveness), intimate oneness, disinterested and enduring covenant loyalty, wholesomeness, beauty, goodness, and so on—all reflect the divine love within the very nature of God’s being. Furthermore, the Song is not only a love song about human lovers but ultimately points (typologically) to the love relationship between God and His people. Far different from the allegorical approach, which regards the literal, historical meaning as the husk to be discarded in favor of a fanciful interpretation that is alien to the text, the typological approach upholds the literal sense by acknowledging what the Song already indicates—that human love typifies the divine.

In the Song of Songs, we have come to the supreme OT statement on the theology of human sexual love and the divine-human love relationship, even (as Rabbi Akiba put it) to “the Holy of Holies”!

Literary Features. For fifteen centuries the allegorical method for interpreting the Song of Songs was predominant in the Christian church. Influenced by pagan Greek philosophers, Christian allegorists posited a dichotomy between things of the flesh and things of the spirit, and all expressions of bodily pleasure—including sexual expression—were considered evil. The literal sense of the Song—the human love relationship between Solomon and the Shulamite—constituted the literal reading to be stripped away allegorically to find the intended spiritual meaning, which was the love relationship between God and His church or the individual soul. The reformer John Calvin moved away from this interpretation and interpreted the Song of Songs as an inspired song of human love. In modern scholarship, the plain-reading approach has become the consensus method for understanding the Song.

The Song of Solomon is a literary masterpiece. It is set within nature, which provides a backdrop of sensuous beauty portrayed through exquisite poetic language laced with figures of speech. The lovers in the Song celebrate the beauty of married sexual love. There are numerous parallels between the Song of Songs and Egyptian love poetry. But unlike the lengthy monologues of the Egyptian songs, the two lovers in Solomon’s Song of Songs are continually interacting in speech. The Song also frequently employs the literary form of the wasf (Arab., “description”), a term used to describe the extravagant praise of the physical charms of the bride and groom in modern, rural Syrian wedding customs.

The basic building block of the Song, in common with other Hebrew poetry, is poetic parallelism, including chiasm (reverse parallelism, ABB’A’ pattern) and block parallelism (or panel writing, ABCA’B’C’). The macrostructure of the Song contains twelve sections (demarcated by refrains) comprised of both chiasm and block parallelism, forming a double-seven pattern (including the two-verse central climax) as follows:

- A 1:2—2:7 Mutual love
- B 2:8—17 Coming and going
- C 3:1—5 Dream I: Lost and found
- D 3:6—11 Praise of groom, I
- E 4:1—7 Praise of bride, I
- F 4:8—15 Praise of bride, II
- G 4:16 Invitation by bride
- G’ 5:1 Acceptance of invitation by groom and divine approbation
- C’ 5:2—8 Dream II: Found and lost
- D’ 5:9—6:3 Praise of groom, II
- E’ 6:4—10 Praise of bride, III
- F’ 6:11—7:10 Praise of bride, IV
- B’ 7:11—8:4 Going and coming
- A’ 8:5—14 Mutual love

Although the Song of Solomon is not a full-blown drama, a basic story line emerges from the dialogues involving Solomon, the Shulamite, her brothers, and her female companions (the daughters of Jerusalem). Numerous recent literary analyses have pointed out the presence of narrative progression or plot throughout various sections of the Song. A three-part historical progression of the Song has been suggested: the courtship (1:2—3:5), the bridal procession and wedding (3:6—5:1), and the life of love after marriage (5:2—8:7). In this commentary the analysis is further refined, suggesting seven acts. These acts are interlinked with members of the symmetrical macrostructure (as presented above), which often subdivide these acts into separate scenes. The basic story line of acts is as follows:

- I. Mutual love: Courtship (1:2—2:7) = Member A
- II. Betrothal and dream of lost and found (2:8—3:5) = Members B and C
- III. Wedding procession and wedding service (3:6—4:7) = Members D and E
- IV. Wedding night in the bridal chamber (4:8—5:1) = Members F, G, and H
- V. Marital conflict and resolution (5:2—6:10) = Members C’, D’, and E’
- VI. Maturation of marriage (6:11—8:4) = Members F’ and B’
- VII. Mutual love: Mature reflections on love’s meaning (8:5—14) = Member A’

This narrative structure does not consist of a detailed plotline but rather presents a collage or kaleidoscope of scenes encompassing the historical scope of the relationship between Solomon and the Shulamite. There is a consistent pattern of more restrained sexual imagery (without reference to sexual intercourse) in the scenes before the wedding, and an intensification of sexual imagery (with frequent allusions to sexual intercourse) after the wedding. The Song provides practical theological insights pertaining to each stage of the love relationship.

COMMENTARY

1:2–2:7

Act I. Courtship/Mutual Love

As noted in the introduction, the superscription of the Song indicates that it is “the most sublime Song” among the 1,005 songs written by Solomon (1 Kin. 4:32), or it may even suggest that this is the “most sublime Song” (about love) of all time. The first act is formed by eight different scenes and opens with the statement “Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth” (Song 1:2). This poetic line strikes the keynote of the entire Song—intimate romantic love. The sublime Song begins with the lovers already well into what we today may term a courtship relationship. This first act presents a collage of scenes from the courtship of Solomon and the Shulamite, involving both northern Israel (the home of the Shulamite, where Solomon comes to visit her) and Jerusalem (the home of Solomon, where the Shulamite comes to visit him). A close look at the clues of each scene provides hints that the seven major scenes of this act alternate symmetrically between northern Israel and Jerusalem:

Scene 1. Song 1:2–4	Jerusalem
Scene 2. Song 1:5–6	Northern Israel
Scene 3. Song 1:7–8	Northern Israel
Scene 4. Song 1:9–11	Jerusalem
Scene 5. Song 1:12–14	Jerusalem
Scene 6. Song 1:15–17	Northern Israel
Scene 7. Song 2:1–3	Northern Israel
Scene 8. Song 2:4–5	Jerusalem
Refrain. Song 2:6–7

1:2–4. Scene 1. The Shulamite unabashedly expresses her longing for romantic kisses from Solomon (v. 2). The first poetic line of the Song begins in a third-person address (perhaps more distantly to draw the audience into the scene) but then segues to the more intimate second-person direct address to Solomon in the next line: “For your love....” The Hebrew word for “love” here (see also v. 4; 4:10; 5:1) describes physical display of affection or lovemaking without specifying the level of intimacy. In context, here it is Solomon’s kisses that are sweeter than the sweetest wine!

In her expression of love for Solomon (1:3), the Shulamite compares Solomon’s external desirability (his kisses and his fragrant oils) with his inner being—his name, which stands for his character (cf. Ex. 34:5–7). The Song upholds the importance of wholistic love, encompassing the entire person, and especially emphasizes one’s character qualities and good reputation. After telling Solomon that her unmarried female companions admire him, she energetically invites her lover to come draw her away (Song 1:4). The maidens (probably part of a group called the “daughters of Jerusalem” later in the Song), respond spontaneously that they will hasten after her. Solomon brings the Shulamite and her female companions into his palace chambers in Jerusalem (vv. 4–5; cf. Ps. 45:13–15). The plural “chambers” refers to the whole palace of the king, and not just his bedchamber. Sexual union is not described in this courtship scene.

1:5–6. Scene 2. The scene changes, probably to northern Israel in the surroundings of the Shulamite’s home (Shulam), where King Solomon has come with shepherds to examine his royal flocks, bringing with him some daughters of Jerusalem (who had perhaps become acquainted with the Shulamite earlier while she was in Jerusalem). From the Shulamite’s conversation with her female companions from Jerusalem (vv. 5–6), it seems that she was not a native of Jerusalem, but grew up working outside in the hot sun, taking care of the vineyards, by order of her overbearing brothers (lit. “her mother’s sons,” perhaps implying a second marriage and stepbrothers). There is no mention of her father here or elsewhere in the Song.

1:7–8. Scene 3. Still in northern Israel, the Shulamite speaks to her beloved Solomon, and for the first time in the Song, Solomon replies. She learns about the king’s occupation as a shepherd (probably to be taken literally as overseeing his flocks of sheep or possibly also figuratively as the king tending to his business as shepherd of the people of Israel), and a connection is made because she is also a shepherd. The Shulamite is worried about being regarded as a prostitute as she wanders around looking for Solomon among Solomon's shepherds, and Solomon wisely advises her to follow the footsteps of his flock, implying that then she will find him.

1:9–11. Scene 4. In still another scene in the collage of courtship, Solomon's voice is heard expressing words of endearment likening her to his mare among Pharaoh's chariot horses, which were beautifully decorated (see Song of Songs: Introduction). Solomon's mare and the war chariots imported from Egypt were probably located in Jerusalem; and the young women's offer to make ornaments for the Shulamite give us another hint that this scene is back in Jerusalem where the young women would have access to materials with which to make the ornaments (v. 11).

1:12–14. Scene 5. In this fast-changing collage of scenes, the courtship now highlights the meal fellowship of Solomon and the Shulamite at the king's table (in Jerusalem), with her perfumes giving forth their fragrance and causing her to imagine him like a pouch containing a bundle of myrrh lying between her breasts all night and like a cluster of henna blossoms in the vineyards of En Gedi. The henna, not the king, is in the vineyards of En Gedi, and likewise it is the pouch, not the king, that is literally between her breasts all night.

1:15–17. Scene 6. Another vignette depicts Solomon and the Shulamite exchanging short expressions of praise for each other's beauty (vv. 15–16) as they walk in the forest, an idyllic outdoor setting (probably in northern Israel) with tree branches serving as rafters or a roof. They sit down under the forest canopy on a couch or bed of green with fir and cedar trees as the roof or beams of their forest house (v. 17).

2:1–3. Scene 7. Still in northern Israel, the Shulamite acknowledges her singular, special status like a shushan—variously interpreted as “lily,” “crocus,” or “lotus flower”—among the others in the valleys (2:1), and Solomon confirms that she is indeed like a lily among thorns (v. 2). Then the Shulamite compares Solomon to an apple tree among the other (non-fruit-bearing) trees of the forest and expresses her delight in sitting (not lying, no sexual intercourse implied) under his shade (v. 3). The Hebrew verb for “take delight” is in the intensive form, which may be translated as “take great delight over and over.” This description involves not just a pause for a moment in her beloved's presence but personal contact such as sitting down in joyful companionship with him. Such intimate communion between human lovers typifies the blessed fellowship Christians may have with Christ in their times of personal devotions.

2:4–5. Scene 8. In the final scene of this courtship collage, which is back in Jerusalem, the intimate communion is intensified as the Shulamite is brought to Solomon's banqueting house with his banner of love over her (2:4). The tasting of his “fruit,” when viewed in context with what precedes, is a metaphorical reference to the sweet and sustained fellowship, just as the “love banner” is metaphorical, and not an allusion to sexual intercourse. In v. 5 the Shulamite asks the daughters of Jerusalem to sustain her with cakes of raisins and apples, for she is lovesick—or faint/weak with love.

2:6–7. Refrain. The first act ends with a refrain (2:6–7) that appears again (with slight modifications) in 8:3–4. Verse 6 may be taken as either in the indicative mood, expressing reality, as rendered by most versions, or in the optative, expressing a wish. The word for “embrace” in these passages has been interpreted by some as “fondle” or “stimulate [the genitals].” However, this Hebrew word in all of its other OT occurrences outside of the Song never carries these meanings but consistently denotes the act of embracing, and there is no contextual reason to suggest a different meaning in the Song. Since the narrative approach considers v. 6 to be during the courtship period, in the context of growing intimacy but not sexual intercourse, the term implies intimate affection and loving support even though these same phrases indicate the opposite after marriage (8:3–4). In other words, in this model this could be understood as a wish, whereas vv. 3–4 is the fulfillment of that wish.

The refrain concludes (2:7) with the Shulamite adjuring her unmarried female companions not to stir up love “until shettekhpatz.” This has been variously translated as “until it pleases,” “until it so desires,” “until she pleases,” or “until the appropriate time” (3:5). Using the language of the formal oath, the Shulamite “swears” by animals whose names not only refer to beauty (the same word is used for “gazelle” and “beauty”) but sound similar to the names of God (“gazelle” sounds like “[Lord of] hosts,” and “does of the field” sounds like “El Shaddai [Almighty God]”) thus bringing together the beauty of their love relationship (symbolized by the animals) with the blessing of God Himself.

In the collage of courtship, there is a period for the development of various kinds of intimacy, all at the appropriate stages of the relationship: romantic (1:2, 13; 2:6); recreational (1:4, 16–17; 2:3–4); occupational/work (1:6–8); aesthetic (vv. 8, 12, 15–16); intellectual (v. 9; 2:2); creative (1:11); meal (v. 12; 2:4); communion (v. 3); celebrative (v. 4); emotional (v. 5); and communication (1:9–10, 15–16).

2:8–3:5

Act II. Proposal of Marriage (Betrothal) and Dream of Lost and Found

This second section is frequently taken as a continuation of the deepening relationship between Solomon and the Shulamite during the courtship, with visits to the countryside illustrating a healthy dating relationship. However, a closer look at the clues in this section strongly suggest that this is no casual countryside date on the part of the couple.

2:8–17. Scene 1. Coming and Going: Betrothal/Engagement. The cumulative effect of the various lines of evidence emerging from vv. 8–17 can be seen as pointing toward a covenant-making (betrothal) setting for this stanza of the Song. Sublime Hebrew poetry forms the “musical” backdrop for a beautiful springtime betrothal between Solomon and the Shulamite. Some of the major lines of evidence supporting this conclusion are the following:

(1) “Behold/Look” (vv. 8–9) calls attention to something special to come, giving the aura of eager and breath-taking excitement.

(2) Solomon comes to the Shulamite’s house (v. 9), as was the biblical custom in arranging for a betrothal or marriage.

(3) The expression “come for yourself” or “come away,” which by repetition brackets Solomon’s poetic song to the Shulamite (vv. 10, 13), is in Hebrew the same expression (except in the masculine), which occurs elsewhere only where it brackets God’s covenant with Abraham (Gen. 12:1; 22:2), and implies a break from outside interferences so as to enter into or maintain a covenant relationship.

(4) Various kinds of imagery (Song 2:10–13) describe that winter is over and spring has come. The ripening of the figs and blossoming of vineyards are metaphors for the maturation of the Shulamite and her readiness for marriage.

(5) In the inaccessible places (rock clefts and cliff) Solomon invites his dove the Shulamite to respond to his proposal (v. 14). He calls her out of her inaccessibility in the sense of inviting her to accept his proposal of betrothal. The imperative “let me see” or “show me” is an allusion to the same construction in Hebrew (except in feminine) used by Moses when he asks Yahweh for the opportunity to see His glory (Ex. 33:18) immediately before Yahweh reveals Himself and enters into a covenant with him (34:10–28).

(6) The reference to the foxes that ruin or spoil the vineyards (Song 2:15) no doubt alludes to Samson’s experience in connection with obstacles to his wedding covenant (Judg. 15:1–5) and is probably a statement of mutual agreement by the couple to count the cost and determine to belong exclusively to each other, undistracted by things that might jeopardize their covenant faithfulness and intimacy.

(7) The Shulamite uses explicit covenant language as she proclaims, “My beloved is mine, and I am his” (Song 2:16). This wording is similar to covenant formulas of God with His people (e.g., Gen. 17:8; Lev. 26:12; Hos. 2:23). This may reflect the Shulamite’s acceptance of Solomon’s marriage proposal, and thus she eagerly proclaims the reality of their covenant relationship in betrothal.

(8) “Until the day breaks” (lit. “breathes”; Song 2:17) is a phrase that not only refers to the beginning or ending of a regular day but in this context echoes covenantal and eschatological figurative language. “The day” can sometimes refer to times of trouble and judgment; this usage is found already in the time of Job (Job 20:28; 21:30; 38:23) and is also used this way by David (Ps. 20:1; 59:16) and Solomon (Prov. 6:34; 11:4; 16:4). The Hebrew verb for “breathe” (puakh) not only refers to the arrival of the morning or afternoon cool breeze (cf. Gen. 3:8 for usage in a covenant lawsuit setting) but can also denote the testimony of a witness in a legal (or covenant-making) setting (Ps. 27:12; Prov. 6:19; 12:17; 14:5, 25; 19:5, 9). In the Song this phrase probably alludes to the future eschatological legal assize—the day of judgment.

(9) The reference to the fleeing shadows (Song 2:17) not only alludes to the end of a day filled with the loving relationship between the betrothed couple but ultimately has connotations of the eschatological end of time or the end of a human’s existence when life departs as a “shadow” (Job 14:2), the equivalent to our modern vow or promise to love “till death do us part.” The Shulamite is vowing to be forever faithful to her covenant with Solomon.

(10) The covenant-making (betrothal) setting is suggested by the Shulamite's reference to the mountains of bether. In Hebrew the word bether denotes "cleavage/separation" and probably has several layers of meaning in this verse. While the phrase may refer both to a literal mountain cleft named bether and to the cleavage of her breasts, it ultimately refers to the "mountains of the covenant," as some translations recognize. The Hebrew word bether is used to describe the separation of the covenant-making animals in Genesis 15:17 when God made a covenant with Abraham, and Isaiah 53:8 uses this term (alluding back to Gen. 15) in predicting the covenant-sealing death of the suffering Servant. The Shulamite alludes to this covenant ceremony in Abraham's history (foreshadowing the new covenant) and applies it to her covenant relationship with Solomon, in other words their betrothal or formal engagement, which will be consummated in the marriage that is described in the next stanzas of the Song. The Song affirms the important stage of a love relationship in which the couple makes a life commitment to each other in betrothal/engagement.

3:1–5. Scene 2. Dream 1, Before the Wedding.

This scene occurs sometime after the previous scene depicting the betrothal, with which it is connected by numerous terminological links. In its position in the Song just before the wedding procession (vv. 6–11), the scene may portray a situation very near the time of the wedding. The Shulamite is apparently in the city of Jerusalem visiting Solomon, perhaps to plan their wedding now that they have become betrothed.

The Shulamite had what might be a recurring night dream (v. 1; the word "night" is in the plural), either on different nights or during different parts of the night's watches. Anticipating her imminent wedding, the Shulamite had lost her lover and searched anxiously for him. The theme of seeking and finding—absence and presence—highlights the need for mutuality and wholeness, as with the first couple in Eden. As in the Garden of Eden, the lovers in the Song need each other so as to be whole.

The Shulamite went about the city (probably Jerusalem) looking for Solomon, especially in the market streets and town squares where townspeople gathered. The night watchmen who were patrolling the city found her. The Hebrew order of the sentence in v. 3 heightens the sense of drama and urgency: "The one whom I love—have you seen?" With no introductory phrase such as "I asked the guards..." the pace of the narrative poetry is quickened.

No sooner had she left the watchmen than she found her lover (v. 4). She held him in her embrace; the shift in the Hebrew tense implies her continuing to hold on to him in her present time and on into the future. In this verse the Shulamite transitions from her dream to a statement of the present situation. She announces to the daughters of Jerusalem (likely at a time other than during the night) her intention to bring her lover to her mother's home, which is still also her own home until she gets married. She may be alluding to the time of the imminent wedding, when Solomon would come to take her in his royal palanquin (i.e., his enclosed litter, suspended by poles and carried on the shoulders of several men) to the wedding ceremony in Jerusalem.

This account captures some of the conflicting emotions as the wedding approaches: eager expectation mixed with reservations and thoughts of life in her mother's house up to this time. She finds herself poised on the threshold of a new married life with her lover, yet she experiences reluctance to leave home and family. It has been suggested that she only dreamed of bringing her lost lover into her mother's room (v. 4), which would anticipate the consummation of the marriage in the near future, rather than describing a real experience of sexual intimacy with him before the marriage, as would be understood by a cursory reading of the text. The refrain (see 2:7) admonishes the daughters of Jerusalem (and by extension, the readers) not to stir up love until shetekhpatz. As noted in the comment for v. 7, this has been variously translated as "until it pleases," "until it so desires," "until she pleases," or "until the appropriate time" (3:5). The scene ends with the same refrain that ends the first section of the Song (2:7) and is the refrain in 8:4, except that there is no mention of the intimate embrace of the Shulamite and Solomon (cf. 2:6 and 8:3). This could be explained if the Shulamite was not actually present with Solomon but only in a dream, which she related to her female companions.

3:6—4:7

Act III. Wedding Procession and Wedding Service

The symmetrical structure of the unified Song finds its apex in the central sections, which appear to describe the royal wedding of Solomon to his bride and their wedding night.

3:6–11. Scene 1. Wedding Procession: Praise of Groom I. It has been suggested that scene 1 portrays the wedding procession of Solomon “on the day of his wedding” (3:11). The description of this lavish wedding procession is strong evidence that what is taking place is not just a simple wedding between commoners who take on the title of “king” and “queen” for a day, as some scholars have suggested, but rather a description of the royal marriage of Solomon. Commentaries are divided over who is riding in Solomon’s palanquin. Is it Solomon, the Shulamite, or both? In light of v. 11—where the daughters of Jerusalem are admonished to observe King Solomon—it seems clear that at least Solomon is in the palanquin and that the focus in this section is upon him. At the same time, evidence within the passage, contextual indicators, and intratextual parallels with 8:5, appear to indicate that the Shulamite is also involved in the procession. In this commentary we suggest that this scene portrays Solomon bringing his bride from her home in northern Israel to Jerusalem by way of the Jordan Valley, up through the wilderness of Judea to Jerusalem for the wedding ceremony. In fact, in ancient times the bringing of the bride from her house to the house of the groom may have been part of the wedding ceremony (cf. Gen. 24:67; Ps. 45). Solomon may have traveled all the way to Shulem in northern Israel to escort his bride throughout the entire journey of several days, or he may have sent the armed guard and royal entourage to Shulem to escort the bride and then come down from Jerusalem himself on the day of the wedding to meet the Shulamite and join the formal procession up from the wilderness to Jerusalem.

The word for crown in Song 3:11 can refer to a “garland,” “crown,” or “diadem.” Later Jewish weddings may illuminate this verse, as both groom and bride wore wedding crowns on their wedding day, a practice continued until the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. The crown that Bathsheba, Solomon’s mother, placed upon Solomon’s head was not for the occasion of his coronation as king (predating his wedding to the Shulamite) but for a special crowning on the occasion of his wedding.

4:1–7. Scene 2. Wedding Ceremony: Praise of Bride I. This scene appears to encompass the wedding ceremony itself. The groom sings a wedding wasf (song describing the beauty of his bride) in which he lauds the Shulamite’s beauty. In light of our analysis of Song of 2:17, where the statement “until the day breaks and the shadows flee” was seen to constitute the Shulamite’s covenant vow at the time of her betrothal to be faithful “till death do them part,” the use of precisely the same covenant language at the end of this section (4:6) appears to serve a similar function in the groom’s marriage vow to love and cherish his bride “as long as they both shall live.” The wedding ends with the groom repeating (v. 7, as an inclusio with v. 1) his summary admiration of the beauty of his bride.

Allusions to the sanctuary and its services and setting are more concentrated in this passage than in any other stanza of the Song. Note the references to dove (v. 1), goats (v. 1), sheep (v. 2), scarlet (v. 3), mouth (v. 3, a Hebrew word that elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible means wilderness, and a cognate word that refers to the Holy of Holies), veil (vv. 1, 3), pomegranate (v. 3), lilies (v. 5), myrrh and incense (v. 6), and being without blemish or flaw (v. 7)—all of these are related to the sanctuary elsewhere in Scripture! An aura of sanctuary holiness is thereby drawn over the bride, who is extolled in the wedding service by the groom. The wedding service, and yes, marriage itself as an institution, are cast as sacred, as made holy (see 5:1) by the presence of God’s presiding over the service, as in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2:22–23).

4:8–5:1

Act IV. Wedding Night in the Bridal Chamber

Only in Song of Songs 4:8–5:1 does Solomon address the Shulamite as his bride (4:8, 9, 10, 11, 12; 5:1). The wedding has taken place and now it is the wedding night. This section encompasses the foreplay of the couple in the bridal chamber on their wedding night.

4:8–15. Scene 1. Wedding Night in the Bridal Chamber: Praise of Bride II. In 4:8 Solomon invites his bride to come with him from Lebanon, Amana, Senir, and Hermon. These mountain peaks were some distance away to the north and thus might serve as symbols of her character (cf. 2:14). Solomon is inviting her to come with him, to descend from this inaccessible state to one of accessibility and intimacy. He is inviting her to make love. She has kept herself pure as a virgin (a locked garden, an enclosed spring, and a sealed fountain, 4:12), inaccessible to any sexual advances, but now following the wedding, Solomon and the Shulamite are free to engage in foreplay in the wedding chamber, leading up to sexual intercourse, all the while as Solomon describes her ravishing beauty (vv. 9–15).

4:16—5:1. Scene 2. Consummation of the Marriage in Sexual Union. These two parallel verses appear in the exact middle of the Song (111 lines or 60 verses on either side), thus clearly designed by the Song's artistic composer to form the central, climactic verses of the entire symmetrical structure of the Song. These verses represent the consummation of the marriage in the marriage bed. The groom has compared his bride to a garden (4:12, 15), and now the bride invites her groom to come and partake of the fruits of her (now his) garden (v. 16) and the groom indicates that he has accepted her invitation (5:1). The identity of the speaker for the last portion of v. 1 is unclear. It may be best to understand that the marriage covenant having been solemnized, the authoritative Voice—Yahweh Himself—extends the divine approbation, while the bride and groom drink deeply in the consummate experience of sexual union (v. 1).

5:2—6:12

Act V. Marital Conflict and Resolution

After the wedding night, the remainder of the Song describes the life of love between Solomon and the Shulamite during their marriage. Act V portrays marital conflicts that arise after the wedding and models of how the resolution of such conflicts may take place.

5:2–8. Scene 1. Dream 2, After the Wedding: Marital Conflict. It is possible that there are nocturnal dream scenes (3:1–5 and 5:2–8), one coming before and one after the wedding. If so, they reveal a historical progression in the relationship by intensification in sexual intimacy. In what has been proposed as Dream 1, the woman wanted to hold him and not let him go (3:4), while in this proposed Dream 2, the husband comes by night to her boudoir, clearly for the purpose of making love (5:2), possibly with the double entendre of lovemaking embedded in the dream description.

Verses 2–8 utilize some of the same literary techniques as employed in 3:1–4, but here the eagerness is further underscored by recording the man's bold actions and words and the woman's inner feelings of desire for the presence of the beloved. In 5:2, the man "knocks repeatedly" (this is the force of the Hebrew grammar). Solomon is not just timidly tapping on the door! And he calls out—using the imperative—for her to open for him. He then addresses her with one of the longest strings of endearment terms anywhere in the Song: "my sister, my love/darling, my dove, my perfect/flawless one!" (v. 2). His heart is overflowing with eagerness for her.

She, in turn, is reluctant to respond, making excuses to herself (v. 3). But when he perseveres in his expressions of desire for intimacy, her deep emotional desire to be with him is stirred (vv. 4, 6, 8). But by the time she responds, her husband has already turned away (vv. 5–6). What follows appears to take place in a dream. She is so intense and even frantic in her search for her lover that apparently the watchmen mistake her for a harlot and try to physically restrain her (v. 7). But she manages to adjure her female companions to tell her lover how lovesick she is for him, should they find him (v. 8).

It may be inferred from this account that adjustments need to be made in their newly married life together. Two issues seem to come to the fore: the husband's late-night arrival home from work (v. 2, describing his head as covered with dew of the late night), and the wife's indifference or lack of interest in sexual intimacy (v. 3). She realizes anew how much she loves Solomon and wants him to know her deep feelings for him. The Song is realistic; every marriage relationship will inevitably involve challenges, calling for action on the part of husband and wife to face them together.

5:9—6:3. Scene 2. Resolution of Marital Conflict: Praise of Groom II. After the Shulamite adjures her female companions to tell her lover, should they find him, how lovesick she is for him (5:8), the daughters of Jerusalem question her concerning what sets him apart (v. 9), and this query calls forth from the Shulamite a flowery song (wasf) expressing praise of his handsomeness and sterling character qualities (vv. 10–16). Her attitude and action change as she focuses her attention on his many wonderful attributes. There is also an intensification of intimacy in this description of Solomon compared to the matching praise of the groom earlier in the Song of Songs (3:6–11). This section ends with a double entendre that intensifies similar language used earlier in the Song before the wedding: before, Solomon had "grazed" among the lilies (2:16; cf. vv. 1–2 where she herself is a lily), but here the married Solomon not only grazes but actually gathers the lilies (6:2–3, NJPS), that is, experiences sexual activity with his wife.

6:4–12. Scene 3. Resolution of Marital Conflict: Praise of Bride III. In this scene Solomon shows no resentment for his wife's earlier indifference to sexual intimacy and for her insensitivity as he extols her exquisite and awesome beauty, highlighting her unique inner qualities (vv. 4–10), which may indicate that part of that was indeed a dream. He avoids sexual imagery here, perhaps because he does not want to give her the impression that he only desires her in a sexual way. The Shulamite and Solomon enjoy quiet fellowship together after their conflict resolution (vv. 11–12).

When Solomon looks at the Shulamite, he sees such an awesomeness revealed that he likens her to two awesome cities in Israel (v. 4). Not content with one such statement about the impressiveness of her appearance that likens her to soldiers on parade, he repeats it a few verses later (v. 10). In these passages, the term for “awesome” has the connotations of “fear/dread/awe” and “majesty.”

Solomon also describes his wife as perfect and unique (v. 9) compared to the sixty queens, eighty concubines, and virgins without number. The mention of sixty queens and eighty concubines need not necessarily refer to Solomon's harem (1 Kin. 11:3), as many have supposed. Solomon does not say “I have...” but “There are... [queens, concubines, and virgins without number]...and my beloved is the only one [for me]” (Song 6:8–9). Furthermore, the Hebrew word for “queen(s)” in this passage is never used elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible for the wife of a Hebrew king, but only for the wife of a non-Hebrew king. In light of the evidence shown elsewhere in the Song that the relationship between Solomon and the Shulamite was a monogamous one (see Song of Songs: Introduction), it can be concluded that Solomon seems to have been proclaiming that however many other women of whatever status there may be around (at their wedding or in general), his beloved wife is his one and only. This interpretation is consistent with the typological meaning of the Song in which God enters into an exclusive covenant relationship with His people.

The final verse of this scene depicts the Shulamite as one who looks like the dawn of the morning, is as fair as the moon, is as bright and clear as the sun, and is as awesome and majestic as a procession (interpreted and translated variously as being one of “stars” or “banners”; v. 10), a description that John seems to allude to in Revelation 12:1 when describing in symbolism the pure woman representing God's true church.

6:13—8:4

Act VI. Maturation of Marriage

6:13—7:10. Scene 1. Praise of Bride IV Followed by Lovemaking. In this section the Shulamite went down to her garden and vineyard to see what was ripe, and while lost in contemplation, her mind seems to have wandered back to her roots, and there is an enigmatic reference that is best rendered as “chariots of my noble/royal people” or “chariots of Amminadib” (6:12). If the wife of Solomon in the Song is Pharaoh's daughter, as suggested as a possibility in the Introduction, this phrase could be linked to the Shulamite's royal Egyptian lineage and the famous chariots of Egypt (cf. 1:9).

The women of Jerusalem interrupt her contemplative experience, apparently inviting her to join a special dance, called the dance of the two camps (Mahanaïm; v. 13), perhaps alluding to a group of dancers that dance in a formation of two lines and/or alluding to the historical experience of Mahanaïm (see Gen. 32:1–3).

In Song of Songs 6:13, the daughters of Jerusalem use a name for Solomon's wife that only appears here in the Song: “the Shulamite.” The grammatical form of this term usually refers to a person's place of origin and thus probably denotes a woman “from [the village of] Shulam.” Shulam is an alternate spelling for the city of Shunem in northern Israel, the town from which Abishag the Shunamite came (1 Kin. 1:3, 15; 2:17, 21–22). Those positing the views that “the Shulamite” of the Song is either Abishag or another (unnamed) woman from the village of Shunem in northern Israel find support for their view in this verse. The alternate spelling may have been used because “Shulamite” allows a play on words with the name “Solomon” and may serve as the functional equivalent of “Mrs. Solomon” or “the Solomoness.” The use of this name with this spelling also makes possible a three-way play on words with the word shalom, meaning peace/contentment (see Song 8:10–11).

Song of Songs 7:1 seems to transition from a public dance to a private one in the (exclusive) presence of Solomon while he sings to her of her stunning beauty. He expresses his desire for intimacy with her (vv. 7–8), and the scene climaxes with an allusion to their making love together, involving deep kissing and/or other intimate sexual activity (v. 9). As the scene comes to a close, the Shulamite expresses the egalitarian nature of their relationship: she belongs to her beloved, and his desire is toward her (v. 10). This is an allusion to Genesis 3:16, but the “curse” is reversed. Whereas in Genesis 3:16 the “desire” of the woman was for her husband, the Song announces that God longs for couples to return to the Edenic ideal before sin (Gen. 2:24), where there was full equality and mutual desire between husband and wife.

7:10—8:4. Scene 2. Going and Coming: Married Sexual Adventure in the Countryside. After the resolution of marital issues, with renewed confidence and comfort in their relationship, the Shulamite invites Solomon to make love to her, as she did on the wedding night (4:16). At her suggestion, they go for a vacation into the countryside. They continue to enjoy an ever-deepening intimacy as their marriage matures. The paired pictures of going and coming to the countryside (2:8–17 and 7:10—8:4) present another example of intensified intimacy including sexual intercourse after the couple is married. The various kinds of fruits (7:12–13; 8:2) denote the delicious aspects of the lovemaking process, including old and new sexual explorations and delights between the lovers.

The scene (and stanza) ends with the same refrain as found in 2:6–7. In its usage in the parallel stanza of 1:2—2:6, the context can be understood as one of a restrained physical relationship during courtship and wishing for fulfillment, whereas in this context of marriage (8:3–4) the same words can be understood as a reference to lovemaking culminating in intercourse.

8:5–14

Act VII. Mutual Love: Mature Reflections on the Meaning of Love

In this concluding stanza of the Song, the Shulamite reflects on her love relationship with Solomon from its beginning to the present. Her wisdom statements reveal that she is a believer in the true God of Israel. She describes the enduring quality of love that comes from Yahweh (v. 6). Love is nothing less than a shalhebet yah.

This term has often been translated as either expressing a superlative construction using the divine name—“a most vehement flame”—or as referring directly to Yah—a shortened form of Yahweh—the divine name, in which case the term would be referring to the very “flame of Yahweh.” There is substantial evidence indicating that this expression is best translated as “flame of Yah[weh].” Coming at the thematic climax of the entire Song, this verse reveals that Yahweh is the Source of human love, and thus provides the basis for the typological interpretation of the Song (see Song of Songs: Introduction).

The Shulamite also reviews her life from the time of her puberty (v. 8), when her brothers protected her from sexual predators (v. 9), and she determined to remain a pure virgin, thus finding shalom, “peace,” in her husband’s eyes (v. 10). She then describes the current ongoing and growing love relationship with her husband Solomon (vv. 11–12). The final stanza (and the entire Song) ends as it begins, with the couple exuberantly in love. In fact, the final refrain that concludes the Song (v. 14) parallels almost exactly the refrain that concludes the courtship/betrothal part of the Song (2:17). The man longs to hear her voice (8:13; cf. 2:14), and she invites him to a thrilling adventure (8:14; cf. 2:17). The Song ends with the same sensual and tantalizing ambiguity that we see so often elsewhere in its stanzas: the Hebrew word used in v. 14, barakh—“to hurry,” “to flee,” “to come away”—may also mean to “penetrate.” The passionate, romantic love of Solomon and the Shulamite does not lessen in intensity as they continue to enjoy married life together. The conclusion of the Song instructs us that a marriage filled with divine love will only become more joyous and beautiful as the years go by. Typologically, in the deepest dimension of our hope, the love relationship between God and His people will grow more intimate and glorious throughout eternity—ablaze with the flame of Yahweh!

PROPHETIC BOOKS

INTRODUCTION TO THE PROPHETIC BOOKS

The writing prophets, whose messages are preserved in the biblical canon, ministered from the eighth century B.C. to around the middle of the fifth century B.C. The work of these canonical prophets occurred during the divided Israelite monarchy, during the Exile of both Israel and Judah, and during the period after the Exile when God's remnant returned from Babylon (2 Kin. 14:25; Jon. 1:1; Mal. 3:1). The messages of the prophets contain inspired evaluations of Israel's responses to God's revelation of His love, holiness, justice, and hope for all humanity through the promised Messiah. The prophets functioned within the historical shift of nations and spoke to (and beyond) the concerns of their time.

PROPHETIC VOCATION

True biblical prophets were never self-appointed but were considered mouthpieces of God. Their messages at times disrupted, affirmed, challenged, engaged, and even enraged their audiences. The preclassical prophets (e.g., Elijah and Elisha; ca. tenth and ninth centuries B.C.) provide examples of how prophets operated in and outside Israel. In those settings, several terms were used, often interchangeably, to refer to the prophet. The terms seer (Heb. ro'eh; Is. 30:10) and visionary (Heb. khazeh, from khazah "to see a vision"; Amos 7:12) imply that the prophets received divine insight into their present circumstances that was unknown to others. In 1 Samuel 9:1–10, Samuel the "seer" was expected to know where the lost donkeys had gone. The "man of God" (Heb. 'ish ha'elohim; Deut. 33:1; 1 Kin. 13:1; 17:18; 2 Kin. 1:9) was God's special servant who proclaimed His will. Similarly, the prophet/prophetess (Heb. nabi'; Is. 38:1) was one who was called to proclaim God's message.

A brief profile of the prophets allows readers to see parallel motifs that recur from time to time in the descriptions of their prophetic ministries. The prophetic call of Moses (Ex. 3–4) is paradigmatic for other call narratives. God called persons of varied backgrounds and life experiences (e.g., Amos 7:14). Many times, the prophets include autobiographical information as they respond to the divine call. They respond with anxiety from being overwhelmed by the sheer magnitude of God's presence; at times they protest their inadequacy or reticence for their mission (cf. Isaiah [Is. 6:5], Jeremiah [Jer. 1:6], and Ezekiel [Ezek. 1:28; 3:16; 3:23–27]). This is often followed by the divine reassurance of empowerment and fitness for the task (cf. Is. 6:6–13; Jer. 1:7–10; Ezek. 2:1–3:15). Prophetic calls often come unexpectedly, and the person feels overwhelmed by it and by the magnitude of the task. Ultimately, the prophets realized that the One who called them would also empower them to complete the task.

A variety of life experiences shaped the ministry of biblical prophets. Their background, previous vocation, education, and most importantly, their relationship with God all influenced how their interactions with kings, leaders, and the general populace occurred. Amos informed Amaziah, the officially sanctioned priest serving at Bethel, about his prophetic call and appointment and pointed out that he was not a prophet or the “son of a prophet” (possibly a reference to the school/company of the prophets; cf. 1 Kin. 20:35; 2 Kin. 2:3–4; 4:1, 6:1; Amos 7:14–15). God uses an intriguing story about Hosea’s life and marriage to express Israel’s unfaithfulness. Micah came from a small town but was soon seen as an authoritative prophet (Jer. 26:18). Isaiah, a member of the royal family, had easy access to kings Ahaz and Hezekiah. Jeremiah and Ezekiel were priests, but apparently they did not minister in the temple in Jerusalem in the typical and expected way. As they received the divine messages, the language and imagery that each prophet used to communicate them were drawn from their familiar surroundings, vocations, and life experiences. Though persons of deep theological conviction, the prophets were subservient to God’s directives no matter what.

God often called the prophets to engage in symbolic actions that, in some cases, exposed them to ridicule: Isaiah’s required nakedness (Is. 20:2); Hosea’s marriage to a harlot (Hos. 1–3); Jeremiah’s donning of an ox’s yoke (Jer. 27); and Ezekiel’s miniature models, haircut, cooking forays, and extended repose (Ezek. 4). Through these means, God was attempting to awaken His people out of their spiritual stupor. As Judah moved closer to the Exile, the critique of the state apparatus (kingship, priesthood, prophets) became bolder and often brought the prophet into conflict with the ruling administration. By the time Ezekiel described Israel’s history and crises of leadership, the imagery was extremely graphic, somber, and seemingly hopeless.

The prophets operated in Israel within a covenant relationship between God and the people. The heartbeat of God’s covenant relationship with Israel is expressed through variations of the fundamental covenant promise that He would be their God and they His people (Gen. 17:7; Jer. 7:23; 11:4; 30:22; Ezek. 36:28). Springing out of this relationship, God’s plan for Israel to be a light to the nations was to teach them to live out His selfless character (Is. 60:1–4). This plan necessitated Israel’s restoration from sin in all its forms and a revitalization that would ultimately lead to mission (Ps. 96:1–6). The needs of the community of faith were met by the prophetic guidance of God’s Spirit (Num. 24:2; 1 Sam. 10:10; 2 Sam. 23:2). Imbued with His presence as servants of the Lord of history, the prophets continually pointed to God’s acts of mercy and grace in Israel’s past as well as the instructions He had given to sustain them on their journey of faith.

Within this framework the prophet’s role included at least five functions: (1) God’s preachers of His revealed will in line with the revealed law of Moses (Is. 2:3; 42:21; 51:4; Mic. 4:2; Mal. 4:4); (2) God’s messengers to summon the people to repentance (Is. 31:6; 44:22; 55:7; Jer. 3:12; 15:19; 18:11; Ezek. 14:6; Hos. 14:2); (3) God’s social (covenant) reformers pointing to God’s desire for justice and righteousness in the covenant community (Is. 1:17; Jer. 7:5–7; Amos 5:24; Zech. 7:9–10); (4) God's representatives to the nations (Is. 42:1; 49:22; Jer. 1:5; Zech. 2:8; 9:10); and (5) God's announcers of a judgment and a future hope (Is. 40:31; Jer. 14:7–9; 17:13; Hos. 12:6).

PROPHECY FROM CREATION TO THE MONARCHY

After the Fall, God called for Himself a special people (election) with whom He would have a special relationship (covenant) to make His will known to humanity. This required that His people reflect His holiness within their community and to their neighbors. This special relationship with His people also meant that they were not to take up the “prophetic” (often occult) practices of the nations surrounding them in order to understand the past, present, or future (Deut. 18:9–14). As the Creator of all, God identified Himself as the source of true prophecy (Is. 46:10; cf. 41:22–23; 44:7; 45:21). Thus, eschatology (the study of the end of all things) is intimately connected to protology (the study of the origin of all things; cf. Is. 65:17; 66:22–23). For the prophets, Israel's eschatological hope was grounded in Creation, covenant, and redemption. The very language of the opening book of the Pentateuch, Genesis, suggests that God's plan for His people was embedded in the revelation given to Moses, God's prophet (Deut. 34:10).

First, time played a significant role in biblical prophecy. The phrase be'akharit hayyamim (“in the last days” or “in days to come”; Gen. 49:1), used by Jacob concerning the future of Joseph's sons, is a prophetic expression designating the last days or the end of time, the coming of the messianic King, and eschatological salvation (cf. Is. 2:2; Jer. 23:20; 30:24; 48:47; Ezek. 38:16; Dan. 10:14; Hos. 3:5; Mic. 4:1). This phrase has been recognized as a key structural indicator for the entire Pentateuch. It is found in the introduction to messianic poems (Gen. 49:1; Num. 24:14; Deut. 31:29; see “Introduction to the Pentateuch,” p. 120). The forward-looking character of the Pentateuch serves as a prophetic eschatological precursor of God's divine design for humanity. Its eschatological structure and ethos would be proclaimed by the prophets in light of God's additional revelation and historical developments.

Second, the major themes of the prophetic messages are already operative in the period under discussion. The storyline seen throughout Genesis (Creation–Fall–judgment–redemption) is paradigmatic for the prophets in light of God's lordship over all creation. The prophet's messianic hope stems from the original promise to our ancestors (Gen. 3:15; cf. Dan. 9:25–26). This hope was continually expressed through a promised Seed (Gen. 12:7; 16:11–12; 18:9–10; Gal. 3:16). The notion of universal judgment is first found in the Flood narrative (Gen. 4–7; Jer. 25:33; Ezek. 38–39; Zeph. 1:7–18; cf. Matt. 24:37–38; 2 Pet. 2:4–10). The hope of a remnant who were saved from worldwide destruction is found in speeches that request God's providential leading (Ex. 33:13; Judg. 6:17; Acts 7:46). The subsequent hope of restoration or re-creation sprang forth from God's renewal of the earth after a worldwide destruction (Gen. 8:21; 9:11). The promise of a renewed earth was strongly connected with the renewal of the people's relationship with God (Is. 11:3–5; 35:1–2; 41:18–20; Ezek. 34:25; Hos. 2:16–23). Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob's election contained a promise of land

(Gen. 12–24; 50:22–26). This correlation of the gift of land as an inheritance from God played a key role in the prophets' calls to faithfulness (Jer. 3:18–19; Ezek. 47:13–14).

The covenant is a bond established by God with human beings that is (1) given by grace; (2) described in explicit promises; and (3) conditioned on the human response of faith, love, and loyalty (Ex. 20:1; Lev. 19:18; Deut. 6:4–6). The basis upon which the prophets give their stinging rebukes stems from Israel's penchant for breaking the bond of love that God established as well as following after their lustful desires and selfish ways. God's judgments against His people were both retributive and restorative and came in the form of covenant curses (Lev. 26:14–39; Deut. 28:15–68). The people of God were initially made up of the direct descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Gen. 49:1–27; Ex. 1:1–4), yet God's plan was always to reach out and include those from all nations who yielded to His lordship (cf. Josh. 2; Ruth 1:15–18; Is. 2:1–5; 19:16–25). The people of God were addressed as people with responsibilities based on their covenant relationship with God (Jer. 2–6; Hos. 1–3; Amos 2:6–3:8). The nations (Gen. 10–11; 25:23) are often mentioned, and several of the prophetic books contain a collection of oracles of judgment against them (cf. Is. 13–23; Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 25–32; Amos 1–2), indicating God's concern for them as well as His judgment.

Third, there is the dynamic of the Spirit and prophecy. From the initial promise to Abram to establish a people set apart through whom the promised Messiah would come (Gen. 12:1–7; Gal. 3:16), God's plan was to bring a knowledge of His name to the world through the indwelling of His Spirit in His chosen instruments (prophet, priest, and king) as well as in the construction of the sanctuary, the place where He would make His name and presence known (Ex. 31:1–11). The expression of Israel's status as God's elect, the people among whom He would dwell, was enlarged, enriched, and made more explicit from the time of the patriarchs to Israel's entrance into the land of Canaan (Ex. 25:8, 40). The Spirit of prophecy moved among His people to lead, guide, and correct. We see God's purposes and the Spirit of prophecy working through Abraham (Gen. 20:7), Aaron (Ex. 7:1), Miriam (Ex. 15:1), Eldad and Medad (Num. 11:27–29), Moses (Deut. 34:10), and a future prophet like Moses—Christ (Deut. 18; Acts 3:20–26).

As Israel transitioned into the promised land, God revealed His standards for the prophetic witness. Not only was the fulfillment of a prophecy important but so too was its effect in leading to trust in the Creator, Yahweh, and faithfulness to His lordship (Deut. 13:1–11). The spirit of God would give the needed divine guidance while Israel's dependence was to rest in God's wisdom and not the spiritualistic activities of the nations. As Israel transitioned from a unified tribal group to a monarchy under the Lord's kingship (Judg. 8:23; 13:9), they were to depend on His revealed will found in His Torah (Genesis through Deuteronomy) as well as the prophetic leading of His Spirit.

PROPHECY FROM THE MONARCHY TO THE EXILE

The theology of the historical books (Joshua through 2 Chronicles) reflects God's revealed will for Israel's mission on the international scene and is expressed during the centralization of the Israelite monarchy, the division of the kingdom, and the dissolution of both kingdoms. These books contain a prophetic evaluation of Israel's history from the conquest of the promised land to Judah's Exile in Babylon. The endings of both the Pentateuch and the historical books close with hope. The Pentateuch ends as they anticipated entering the land with the expectation of a prophet like Moses. The historical books end with the anticipation of returning to the land with the release of the exiled king, Jehoiachin, as a visible reminder of the Davidic promise. In both instances, a figure of hope sustained Israel as it transitioned from the land to exile and back to the land.

The place of kingship and prophecy appears after Samuel's prophetic ministry during Saul's failed kingship. Nathan, God's spokesman, delivered God's dynastic promises to David (2 Sam. 7), confronted David dramatically with his gross violation of God's covenant (2 Sam. 12), and served in the expanding role of prophets who were involved in the transition of dynastic succession (1 Kin. 1:11–40). According to the author of Chronicles, Nathan also assisted, in tandem with Gad the prophet, in David's arrangements for ritual worship and music (2 Chr. 29:25). Though Nathan served the king, his primary responsibility was to express God's authority through words of encouragement and criticism. This expansion of the prophetic role during the monarchy served as a pattern for the involvement of the classical prophets (ca. eighth through sixth centuries B.C.) in Israel's political, cultic, and social affairs.

The appearance of the classical prophets (all the OT canonical prophets pointed to the Babylonian captivity) was prompted by God's providential dealings with Israel and the broader historical and political events of the ANE. The period of the classical prophets covered more than three centuries (ca. 760–460 B.C.) and underscored two catastrophic events. The first writing canonical prophets appeared about fifty to sixty years before the fall of northern Israel (722 B.C.) and after the conclusion of a century-long entanglement with the Arameans—a conflict whose results can be correlated with the vast societal division between the economically destitute masses and the wealthy few. In a little more than a century, all would experience the ravages of deprivation following the destruction of Jerusalem (586 B.C.). Within this period, three major empires successively dominated the world scene: Assyria, Babylon, and Persia.

Foundational for understanding the context in which the prophets ministered is the centralization of Israel's united monarchy under David. He continued the model of listening to the guidance of the Spirit through the prophetic office that was particularly operative during significant transitions in God's plan for His people: Moses during the establishment of the national sanctuary service, Samuel during Israel's transition to kingship, and then Nathan during the centralization of the temple, ritual worship, and kingship in Jerusalem. Sadly, even with such great promises given to David and the prosperous reign of Solomon, God's plan to work through the united Israelite monarchy was frustrated after the reign of these two kings. In the momentous time of the fracturing of the kingdom, the prophet Ahijah delivered God's message, and subsequent events eventually led to the Exile and dissolution of the Northern Kingdom, which had an impact even up to Jesus's day (1 Kin. 11:29–39; Luke 10:25–37).

From Jeroboam I to Jeroboam II (1 Kin. 12:16—2 Kin. 14:23) references to prophets are restricted to the Northern Kingdom. The events that eventually led to its dissolution and Exile began during the time of the first major nonwriting prophet, Elijah, who ministered in the Northern Kingdom during the Omride dynasty (Omri, Ahab, Ahaziah, Jehoram; 1 Kin. 15:21—2 Kin. 10:17). During this period, Israel devolved into state-sponsored idol worship (1 Kin. 18). The authoritative prophetic revelation was often introduced by the phrase, “The word of the LORD came to...,” indicating God's direct revelation expressed in the prophetic proclamation (1 Kin. 17:2).

Another well-known nonwriting prophet, Elisha, ministered with Elijah and then further into Jehu's dynasty. This prophetic period of Israel's history focused on the polemic of the Lord's superiority over Baal. Elijah and Elisha's personal miracle experiences emphasized God's care for His people (1 Kin. 17:1–7, 8–16; 2 Kin. 4:1–7, 38–44), His control over nature and fertility (2 Kin. 4:8–17), His healing power (2 Kin. 5), and His power over death (1 Kin. 17:17–24; 2 Kin. 4:18–37). Shortly after the death of Elisha, the first writing prophet appears in the historical books. The prophet Jonah continued to minister to the Northern Kingdom (1 Kin. 14:23–29) during a time of prosperity for Israel. Jeroboam II (ca. 786–746 B.C.) successfully reestablished the northern borders as they were in the days of David's rule and fulfilled a prophecy of Jonah at a time of great economic and agricultural prosperity (2 Kin. 14:25, 28).

Material prosperity and enlarged borders did not translate into a more profound faith. As Israel's fortunes rose, her moral core continued to crumble (e.g., the apostasy amid prosperity described in the books of Hosea and Amos). Israel's territorial expansion and agricultural production attracted the attention of the surrounding nations. Israel's prosperity should have been used as an opportunity to glorify God before the nations, but selfishness and unconverted hearts misused power and exploited the weak and vulnerable. Even in light of God's previous prophetic warnings (2 Kin. 10:30; 15:12), the kings of Israel did not repent. Instead they sank further into rebellion and murder, and worst of all, they turned away from God's providential wisdom to make covenants with foreign nations to protect them or to establish unauthorized coalitions to reduce the threat of external aggression (2 Kin. 15:8—17:6). The prophets warned Israel and Judah to turn from their wickedness back to God's principles in the Torah (2 Kin. 17:12–13).

Classical prophecy arose and reached its pinnacle during the rise and fall of world empires. Daniel prophesied of world empires up to the coming of Christ (Dan. 2; 7–12). The age in which these great empires rose bears witness to the providence and foreknowledge of God declared through the prophets. The prophets foretold of the rise and fall of each nation up to the period of Israel's restoration to the land and interpreted world-significant events in the light of God's continued preparation for the advent of the Messiah. As the Lord of history, He is the director of the theater of world history. His changing cast included renowned historical figures: Sargon, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, and Cyrus. However, His attention was constantly focused on Israel. In Scripture, figures find their importance only insofar as God sought to reveal Himself to them and through them to others even as agents of judgment for and against His people.

In addition to calling for surrender to God's redemptive purposes and lordship, the prophets supplied answers to the why of destruction and the how of future restoration, and they offered future generations the hope of One to come who would restore all that had been broken and would rule in justice and righteousness. A common notion in the ANE was that the defeat of a nation meant the defeat of its deity. However, classical prophecy teaches that Israel's defeats did not show the Lord's weakness but His strength, wisdom, and especially His foreknowledge. The play and interplay of God's predictive pronouncements, Israel's response, and world affairs are revealed through the prophets.

One of the initial examples of a long-range prophecy is the one made by a "man of God" from Judah to King Jeroboam I concerning the work of reformation that King Josiah would undertake. A special sign was given to confirm the accuracy and authenticity of the prophetic word (1 Kin. 13:1–3; 2 Kin. 23:15–20). God's sovereignty, foreknowledge, and providential acts directed affairs toward the fulfillment of this prophecy. From sustaining young Josiah on the throne with godly aides (2 Kin. 22:1–2), to the discovery of a scroll containing the Torah by the high priest Hilkiah (2 Kin. 22:8–13), to the prophetic guidance of the prophetess Huldah (2 Kin. 22:14–20), which led to the reforms that included the breaking down of the altar at Bethel (2 Kin. 23:1–25), God was fulfilling His prophetic word (see 2 Samuel: Introduction). God also continued working on the international scene. The death of Assyrian King Ashurbanipal (627 B.C.) and the ensuing civil war and general strife in Assyria provided a respite from Assyrian hegemony over and aggression against Israel. Several of Assyria's vassal states openly asserted their independence—Judah under King Josiah, Babylon under its new Chaldean dynasty, as well as the Medes.

PROPHETIC LITERARY FEATURES

Three major characteristics of prophetic poetry and narrative emerge from Scripture. They include the use of different types of literature, literary styles, and structure. These are important features insofar as they express the dynamism and beauty of God's message and serve to control speculative and fanciful interpretations.

Types of Literature

Distinct literary categories express a mode of communication that can generate an emotion, a set of expectations, and a general context for hearing the message. Among them we find laments (i.e., funeral dirges; Amos 5:1), oaths (Is. 5:9; 14:24), lawsuits (i.e., legal controversy; Is. 3:13–15; Mic. 6:1–16), salvation and judgment speeches or oracles (Mic. 3:9–12), and hymns of praise (Is. 12). Prophetic oracles largely occur in two major types: (1) salvation oracles, which are pronouncements of the Lord's intent and power to save, redeem, and restore His people or, in some cases, the nations (Is. 41:8–16), and (2) judgment oracles, which are pronouncements of the Lord’s judgment against the people of God or other nations on account of their sin and rebellion (against God’s people: Is. 2:6–4:1; 28:14–18; Jer. 2–10; against the nations: Is. 13–23; Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 25–32; Amos 1–2; see “God’s Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981).

Other genre types include messenger speeches and vision reports. Messenger speeches are oral messages delivered by a messenger in which the words uttered by God are proclaimed by the prophet to the recipients. The prophet serves as the Lord’s messenger relaying authentic messages sent from God to Israel (Is. 6:9; 43:1). Springing out of the messenger speeches are messenger formulas, standard expressions that introduce or conclude sayings, such as oracles, identifying them as words of the Lord for various purposes, such as evoking God’s authority or certainty for what is said. These include the ’amar formulas, which refer to what the Lord says (e.g., Is. 49:5); the ne’um formulas, which refer to the proclamation of the Lord (e.g., Ezek. 5:11); and the dibber formulas, which refer to the word that the Lord had spoken (e.g., Joel 3:8). Vision reports are autobiographical accounts of a prophet’s revelatory experience received by seeing objects or events, often involving images that require explanations (Is. 1:1; Jer. 1:11–19; 24:1–10; Amos 7:1–8:3; Zech. 1–6).

Literary Styles

The literary style is expressed in prophetic narratives and prophetic poetry. Prophetic narratives are engaging and dramatic portrayals of the prophet’s interaction with God, God’s people, or the nations. They typically offer background information to prophetic oracles and reports. Time applications of prophecies typically can be broken up into three states: present, future, and distant future. The time of the application of prophecies that occur during the prophet’s lifetime or shortly after that are usually found in the descriptions of the prophet’s mission (call narratives: Is. 6:1–8; Jer. 1; Ezek. 1:1–3:27; prophetic encounters: Is. 39:1–8; Jer. 28; Amos 7:11–17; Jon. 2–4; or phrases that accentuate the nearness of God’s action: Is. 38:5; Hab. 1:6). The time of the application of prophecies that were to occur in the people’s future regarding the nearness of the Exile or the return to the land is marked by temporal expressions referring to the day, days, or time when the prophecies would be fulfilled. The last and more distant eschatological future tended to focus on the messianic reign over the nations or the distant future (Is. 24–27; Zech. 7–12).

Prophetic poetry is similar in structure, imagery, and meter and rhythm to poetry found in other parts of the Bible (including the Psalms). Its most significant characteristic involves parallelism (see “Introduction to Hebrew Poetry and Wisdom Books,” p. 614).

Literary Structure

Literary structure is the most significant guide to discover the main point of any passage. This requires careful attention to a larger section defined by patterns and parallelism. This necessitates that the reader pays close attention to the text to understand how its content is organized.

Almost every biblical book in the OT exhibits chiastic structures (i.e., a concentric structure patterned ABCB'A', with C being the central thought) or parallel symmetric patterns (ABCA'B'C'). Many of these are identified and discussed in the relevant commentaries.

FACING FALSE PROPHETS

In the prophetic books, it is as crucial to receive the divinely inspired message as it is to recognize the toxic and devastating effect of false prophets. God's prophets were chosen to proclaim His word faithfully. Sometimes that meant words of comfort and sometimes words of rebuke. Unfortunately, Judah's fascination with false prophets is well documented in the Hebrew Bible (cf. Jer. 6:13–14; 8:11; 14:13–14; 23:17; Ezek. 13:10–16; Mic. 2:6–11; 3:5, 11). While most of the Minor Prophets rebuke false leaders and prophets (see especially Amos 7:10–17; see also the story of Micaiah in 1 Kin. 22 as an illustration of the conflict between true and false prophets), the Major Prophets of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel give a sustained refutation of this practice and its practitioners.

In Isaiah, God's rebuke was more generalized and applicable to nations beyond Israel's borders. It dealt with the problems of (1) the source of knowledge of the future (i.e., occultism; Is. 8:19; 19:3); (2) equating creation with the Creator (Is. 40:18–31; 41:21–29; 44:6–8); and (3) unbelief in God's clear message (Is. 6:9–8:22). During Jeremiah's ministry God was very specific about false prophecy and warned against its deceptive and inauthentic nature (Jer. 29:8–9). Judah's last kings rebelled against God's counsel and accepted messages from false prophets, such as Hananiah (Jer. 28:1–17) and Shemaiah (Jer. 29:24–32), that encouraged them to think that geopolitics was the answer to their problems. The influence of these false prophets and their messages was so pervasive, both in Judah and among the exiles in Babylon, that Jeremiah sent a letter to Babylon containing God's condemnation of the false prophets in the exiled community in Babylon (Jer. 29:1–23).

In Ezekiel, the words that characterize these false prophets' visionary experiences (Ezek. 13:1–16; Heb. shaw', "false"; qesem, "divination"; kazab, "lie") describe the type of messages that come from private and, in this case, pernicious interpretations of events (Heb. millibbam, "from their own heart/imagination," Ezek. 13:2; cf. 2 Pet. 1:20–21). Having an understanding of the times (1 Chr. 12:32) is crucial to know how God is leading in order to encourage the faithful. Yet two different reactions emerged against a faithful prophet's messages: (1) he was seen as a doomsayer and alarmist—some people were saying that Ezekiel's words would come to nothing since nothing had happened yet (Ezek. 12:22; cf. 2 Pet. 3:3–4); and (2) people intimated that prophecy was irrelevant for them since they claimed that his messages were only for the far distant future and not for them (Ezek. 12:27). This second class of naysayers does not doubt biblical prophecy is real but rather decides that its fulfillment is so far away that it is of little consequence to their immediate lives. However, God vindicated His prophets, and the historical fulfillment of their predictions demonstrated their veracity. At times God gave, through His prophets, short-term prophecies that were soon fulfilled in order to demonstrate who was speaking for Him (Jer. 28:15–17).

READING THE PROPHETS CHRONOLOGICALLY

Reading the prophets in their chronological sequence helps to focus on three notable historical eras that highlight Israel's relation to the nations.

Preexilic Prophets—Main Goals of Their Message

The first historical era during which the classical prophets functioned was the Neo-Assyrian (745–612 B.C.). During this period there were strong calls to repentance with the threat and promise of exile as a restorative measure. The prophets who ministered during this period include Hosea, Amos, Isaiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, and probably Joel.

The prophets addressed their message to their contemporary situation. In Israel Amos ministered during the time of Jeroboam II before the rise of Tiglath-Pileser III and the Neo-Assyrian Empire (745 B.C.). His warnings foretold the eventual Exile and destruction of Israel without specifying that it would be Assyria who would be God's agent of judgment. Hosea, a contemporary, also ministered to Israel and foresaw its destruction. His book shows an awareness of both pro-Egyptian and pro-Assyrian factions (Amos 7:11). Turning to Judah, Isaiah's call came at the time of the crowning of Assyrian dominance. Isaiah called Assyria the rod of God's anger (Is. 10:5) and preached his message in the context of the choice between the Lord's help and Assyria's (Is. 7:1–9). Isaiah filled out more of the prophetic picture by describing the fall of Assyria as well as the nations who would follow it: Babylon and Persia (Is. 13; 36–39; 45). Isaiah's contemporary Micah also pointed to the Assyrian menace and addressed the lethargic spiritual atmosphere stemming from Uzziah's material gains in Judah. Nahum prophesied the eventual fall of Assyria. Contemporaries Zephaniah and Habakkuk both ministered after the fall of the Northern Kingdom, during the reign of King Josiah (640–609 B.C.), when Hilkiah found the book of the law (622 B.C.), and the rise of Babylon up to the fall of Assyria (626–612 B.C.).

Exilic Prophets—Main Goals of Their Message

The second historical era involved the period of the Neo-Babylonian Empire (606–539 B.C.). The primary prophetic emphasis during this period was the calls to accept God's plan and the threat of destruction and exile. The prophets Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Obadiah ministered to God's people with these messages in Judah and Babylon. Jeremiah received his call to ministry in the year the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal died (ca. 627/626 B.C.), and he confirmed what Isaiah had prophesied, equating the enemy described as a nation from the north with Babylon. While Jeremiah does not specifically mention Persia as the successor to Babylon, he portrays the eventual defeat of Babylon and affirms the word of Isaiah as he utilizes his earlier image of a nation from the north. Jeremiah's call to accept the Exile was intended to be encouraging as he prophesied that it would last only a short time of seventy years, after which the people would be brought back to Jerusalem (Jer. 29:10). The majority of the leaders of God's people failed to heed Jeremiah's word. Ezekiel ministered during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, and he too announced the fall of Babylon. Jeremiah and Ezekiel bore witness to the fall of Judah and, along with Daniel and Obadiah, are the last voices to the people of God before the first exiles returned to Jerusalem in 538 B.C.

Postexilic Prophets—Main Goals of Their Message

The third historical era within which the biblical prophets proclaimed God's message of hope was the Persian period (539–331 B.C.), at the beginning of which the people of God returned from exile. During this time there were prophetic calls to reestablish God's temple and His Torah as well as the announcement of the coming Davidic kingship. The prophets who guided the people of God in this time of high expectations included Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. Almost two centuries before, Isaiah had prophesied that it would be Cyrus, king of Persia, the Lord's anointed, who would help restore the people back to the land (Ezra 1:1–4; Is. 44:28; 45:1).

COMMON THEMES AND PERSPECTIVES

The prophetic books are marked by a unity that brings to light a number of shared themes and perspectives. For example, Isaiah through Malachi shine a light on the various nuances of the theme of the Day of the Lord in its positive and negative contexts (Is. 13:6, 9; Jer. 46:10; Ezek. 13:5; 30:3; Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11, 31; 3:14; Amos 5:18–20; Obad. 15; Zeph. 1:7, 14; Mal. 4:5). The Major Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel) and the twelve called Minor Prophets (Hosea-Malachi) all express a theological concept pointing to a time of great hope. The key themes that connect the message of the prophets include (1) the Day of the Lord, (2) the destiny of the wicked, (3) the hope of the remnant, (4) God's control over the succession of the nations (from Assyria to Babylon to Persia), and (5) the promise of the hoped-for Davidic King.

A structural reading emphasizes the cohesive nature of revelation, salvation, and hope in the prophets from which NT writers drew. Hearing the prophets together makes God's comprehensive message of hope ever relevant, for it exposes an aspect of God's grace that is typically overlooked. The God of the OT is often thought of as vengeful and full of wrath. On the contrary, His love, grace, pity, and mercy are clearly visible in all three major categories of the OT (Law, Prophets, and Psalms). He desired the restoration of land and people and the reestablishment of the faithful Davidic kingship, which would help to set things right through His restored rule over the nations. This was the hope of Israel into which Jesus was born; this was the hope that was more fully expressed in cosmic terms in the apocalyptic visions of Daniel and Revelation.

Finally, tracing God's prophetic word to His people historically and geographically is a fruitful method of hearing the message of the prophets. Comparing the prophetic books' descriptions of what was happening in the Northern Kingdom (Israel) and the Southern Kingdom (Judah) allows us to see the interplay of prophecy and history, and the information in the books of the Kings helps us in that task. All but three of these prophetic books indicate the king who was reigning at the time. Of the prophets who ministered to Israel, Jonah was from the north while Amos and Hosea were from the south, and though they were from divided kingdoms, their messages were similar and displayed conceptual unity (Jer. 30:3; 33:14–16; 50:4; Ezek. 37:15–28). These prophets wrote from the time of Jeroboam II to the destruction of Israel, which was exiled to Assyria in 722 B.C. (2 Kin. 14:23—17:41; Hos. 1:1; Jon. 1:1), and detailed the conditions that led up to Israel's demise (2 Kin. 17:6–23). Special mention is even made of the prophetic ministry to God's people in the Northern Kingdom, offering a direct connection between history and prophecy (2 Kin. 17:13).

The prophets who ministered to Judah (Joel, Isaiah, Micah, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Jeremiah) wrote from the days of Jotham to Judah's Exile in Babylon, including also a special note on the release of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from prison (Jer. 52:31–34; Mic. 1:1). As a collective group, their emphasis focused more toward the nations, mainly because of Judah's dependence on the nations rather than on the Lord. Two books address nations other than Judah: Obadiah was a messenger of the Lord to Edom (Obad. 1), and Nahum wrote concerning Nineveh (Nah. 1:1). Both books gave hope and comfort to Judah that her enemies and, in fact, all of God's enemies would be judged (Obad. 10; Nah. 2:2). The prophets who ministered to God's people in the Babylonian Exile—namely, Ezekiel and Daniel—use imagery and descriptions familiar to their exilic overlords, presumably as a way to minister to them as well as to God's people.

The postexilic prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi paint a clear picture that because of the response of the people and the nations to God's sovereignty, many of the beautiful pictures of restoration for Israel and the nations were not going to be fulfilled in their lifetime or in the way they expected. Hope still reigned as Malachi closed out the prophetic voice with a beautiful picture of renewal (Moses and Elijah) until John the Baptist would reignite that prophetic hope.

CONDITIONALITY OF PROPHECY

Although God's final intention for humans is salvific, He respects human freedom, and consequently many of the prophecies found in the OT contain an element of conditionality. While the faithful have always constituted the true people of God, within the larger body of professed believers the call to faithfulness was always tied to God's blessings or curses (Deut. 27–28). In biblical prophecy, there are two types of God's communicative activity in relation to the more immediate and the distant future: classical and apocalyptic prophecy. In their own way, these types of prophecy reveal important characteristics that help the reader recognize them and establish their differences.

Classical prophecies are generally (1) local in space and time, referring to Israel's contemporary situation during the monarchy, Exile, and return to the land; (2) eschatologically focused on Israel's national, geopolitical, and ethnic framework; and (3) connected, in most cases, to the covenant response of the people. Classical prophecy expresses three major categories of prediction: (1) messianic prophecies, (2) oracles for/against the nations, and (3) covenant-centered kingdom prophecies. The messianic predictions were unconditional in the sense that the Messiah would come because God determined from the beginning that the hope of humankind rested upon the coming of the Seed of the woman to defeat the enemy of righteousness (Gen. 3:15; Deut. 18:15, 18; Pss. 2; 110; Is. 53). The other two categories of prediction are primarily conditional because their specific fulfillment required a human response to the Lord's threats and promises (typically seen in calls to repent; Is. 44:22; Jer. 3:12, 14, 22; 18:11; Ezek. 18:30; Hos. 14:2). In the case of Israel, most of the promises and judgments were determined by their commitment to or lack of covenant faithfulness. The specific fulfillment was determined by the human response. In such cases God announced the judgment in terms of covenant curses while calling the people to repent, return to Him, and renew their covenant commitment. Prophecies against the nations were in some cases conditional on their response to the Lord (see Jonah), but in other cases they were unconditional. God in His sovereignty and foreknowledge announced the final collapse of nations and the rise of others. These nations fall in order for God to fulfill His plan for the human race.

Comparing classical and apocalyptic prophecy, one typical distinction between them is that the apocalyptic prophecies of Daniel and the apocalyptic sections found in Isaiah 24–27, Ezekiel 38–39, Joel 2–3, and Zechariah 9–14 reflect God's plan for humanity, but they are not contingent on human response; that is to say, they are not conditional. In these prophecies, God's word is decisive.

Nevertheless, the relationship between classical and apocalyptic prophecy reflects the same goal: God's redemptive purposes and the vindication of His justice and righteousness. Briefly, taking Isaiah as a case study, while the features among the local-immediate/historical judgment of the nations (Is. 13–23; 28–33) and the universal-eschatological judgment of the world (Is. 24–27) differ in their relationship to their temporary fulfillment, they both express how the principles of God's kingdom cohesively operate, whether referring to the immediate circumstances of the biblical text or to the future eschatological hope of the people of God. The justice of God works to right the wrongs of sin in its personal, public, and cosmic dimensions. The relationship between Isaiah 13–23 and 24–27 is akin to the relationship between Isaiah 44:24–45:4 and Daniel 2:39; 7:5; 8:3, 20. Isaiah's proclamation of hope was set within the context of Israel's return from exile as God worked through Cyrus. Daniel's proclamations were in the context of God's sovereignty and foreknowledge over history that pointed to the end of earth's history as we know it when Jesus comes for the second time. The fulfillment of these two texts, the former understood as classical and the latter as apocalyptic, is seen in Ezra 1:1–2.

The plan for God's people during the time of the classical prophets is seen in the kingdom prophecies. The promise of the land given to Abraham and the promise of the perpetuity of the kingdom of David are fundamentally nonconditional. They were part of God's eternal covenant with His people. Yet it is paradoxical that their fulfillment was related to the faithfulness of the people to God. However, their unfaithfulness did not bring to an end God's faithfulness to His promises. God always remained faithful to all of His promises (see Josh. 21:41; Rom. 3:1–4). He had determined to fulfill them through a faithful remnant within Israel and, more specifically, through His future faithful King, the Messiah. It is in and through Christ as the Messiah that the kingdom prophecies will now be fulfilled in a powerful and magnificent way (Dan. 7:13–14, 27; Matt. 28:18). In the NT this future hope is clearly spelled out as transcending geographical and ethnic limitations and finds in the book of Revelation its ultimate proclamation in cosmic dimensions. God was always able to preserve a faithful remnant who became the carriers of all of His election promises—promises that will be fulfilled through His Anointed One.

ISAIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. As far we know, Isaiah 1:1 served as a title for the original scroll of Isaiah. Some Bible translators translate it as “the book of Isaiah” or “Isaiah” for practical purposes. The author of Chronicles refers to it as the “vision” of Isaiah the prophet, who was the son of Amoz (2 Chr. 32:32). Each component in Isaiah 1:1 is found among other superscriptions of prophetic books. As a whole, however, it has a vital distinctiveness, implying that it is not a late addition to the book, as believed by some, but part of several features that make the book of Isaiah a literary whole.

The superscription in Isaiah 1:1 gives the identity of the seer (Isaiah, son of Amoz), the mode of revelation (vision), the main topic of the book (Judah and Jerusalem), and the approximate time in which the revelations were received (during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah). Isaiah’s name (yeshā’yahu), whose form is attested on ancient seals, means “the Lord’s salvation,” “the Lord is [my] salvation,” or even “the Lord has given salvation” (cf. 12:2–3; 49:26; 60:16). The meaning of the name confirms the central message of the book.

Isaiah, the son of Amoz of Jerusalem, received the book’s foundational divine revelations (1:1; 2:1; 7:3; 13:1; 20:2–3; 37:2, 6–7; 38:1; 39:3). His father, Amoz, is otherwise unknown. The book assigns no occupation or official function to Isaiah except for the epithet “the prophet” in chapters 37–39. The Lord referred to Isaiah as His “servant” or “messenger” (20:3). His wife was a “prophetess” (see 8:3). They had at least two sons, Shear-Jashub (7:3) and Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz (8:3). Their names have symbolic meanings, “a remnant shall return” and “speed the spoil, hasten the plunder,” relating to both salvation and judgment. Isaiah’s own name may have a similar symbolic function.

An OT prophetic book is normally the fruit of a process of revelation, memorization, oral or literary communication (i.e., speech or public reading), and preservation. Five steps may be implied in the process that has given us the book of Isaiah: (1) God’s message was made known to Isaiah (e.g., 6:1–13; 7:3; 8:1, 5, 11). God was the Author-Originator, and Isaiah the recipient. (2) As author-mediator, Isaiah expressed divine insight in a language known to the intended audience; God was speaking through the inspired prophet, whether in explicit quotations or in implied paraphrases (e.g., 7:10–17). (3) In a dialogue between God and the prophet, God’s words are distinguished from the prophet’s words (e.g., 6:1–13), but both were recorded by the prophet-narrator; (4) Borrowed material was previously written by other authors but selected by the prophet (e.g., 36:1–22; 37:8–14; 38:9–20). (5) Prophetic messages were delivered orally—either by speech or by being read aloud in a public or private setting. Written prophecy preserved the message, and Isaiah made a point to preserve predictions that would be fulfilled in a distant future, which compelled the audience to wait and see the fulfillment in real events (e.g., 29:11–12, 18; 30:8–11; 34:16). Isaiah undoubtedly wrote some prophecies himself (8:1–2; 30:8–11), but he may have used scribal assistance, which was the usual way of producing books (cf. Jer. 36:1–4).

Isaiah subordinated himself to the will and power of the Lord. Dwelling on himself was not part of his mission. However, some information on his social role in the environment of Jerusalem may be inferred from the book:

1. Family Head. Isaiah’s family had a “prophetic” function. He and his wife were prophets, and both Isaiah’s name and the names of his sons communicated prophetic messages (Is. 7:3; 8:1–4). In keeping with common practice, he passed on prophetic wisdom and scribal skills to his sons (cf. 38:19b). A part of this was commonly accomplished by reading and learning to write (copy) Scripture.

2. Counselor. As a prophet, Isaiah belonged to the circle of royal counselors. The wisdom and counsel of the Lord is occasionally contrasted with that of His human opponents (e.g., 3:2-3; 8:9-10; 14:24-27; 19:1-4). In fact, the Lord announces that the wisdom of those who consider themselves wise will come to an end (29:14). The prophet opposed the wise because his counsel was based on prophetic revelations from the Lord and differed from the empirical observations of the wise (cf. 5:19). What Isaiah said required faith and trust in the Lord, not human and political schemes. His concern was not to eliminate the wisdom-oriented theology itself but to remind the wise of God's standards for their work.

3. Teacher. Isaiah brought the Lord's instruction to His people in Israel and Judah. Following the Assyrian destruction of Israel (733 and 722 B.C.) and Judah (701 B.C.), the temple was the only remaining institution of religious teaching with legitimacy and credibility. Priests and prophets were particularly linked to the temple (Lam. 2:20), and teaching and counseling were their main functions (Deut. 33:10; cf. Jer. 18:18; Ezek. 7:26; 44:23; Hos. 4:6; Mic. 3:11). God had Isaiah use the Torah for instruction concerning the sacrifices in the temple (Is. 1:10-17). His emphasis on the revealed prophetic word as "instruction" (torah) from the Lord implies a teacher's typical concern with what students hear (cf. 50:4). Isaiah had interactions with priests (8:2; 37:1-4), discussing priesthood (61:6; 66:21) and the temple (6:1; 44:28), and some have even suggested that he may have been a priest like Jeremiah (1:1) and Ezekiel (1:3) though there is not enough evidence to know this with any degree of certainty.

4. The Mouthpiece and Servant of the Lord. The book indicates that there were "prophets" (nebi'im) in Jerusalem and Judah (3:1-2; 29:1, 10; 30:10). However, only Isaiah bears the title "prophet" (nabi') in the narrative section of chapters 36-39, a section which is almost the same as 2 Kings 18:13-19:37. He never calls himself "prophet." The book gives the impression that his ministry was not determined by a prophetic office but by what the Lord had said to him: it was the word of God that mattered.

5. Scribe. Books had become common in Isaiah's time. They were read by scribes or by persons with scribal education. A mass audience such as the children of Israel would have heard the word being read. Thus, Isaiah knew that the words of his book would be heard and seen (Is. 29:18). He was an educated person who had the ability to write and edit his book, but scribal assistance is not to be ruled out. His book is fundamentally a record of the words of the Lord waiting for future fulfillment, which makes it dependent on the future work of the Lord, who in His time would confirm His counsel or plan as revealed to Isaiah. In this book, the writer's identity is not the most important thing; what matters is the word of the Lord.

Date. His commission in "the year that King Uzziah died" (6:1) occurred sometime in 740 B.C. King Ahaz ruled (735-716 B.C.) during the Syro-Ephraimite crisis, when Isaiah had revelations from the Lord and functioned as a prophetic counselor (7:1-17). At the time that he was commissioned, he may have been a very young man, like Samuel and Jeremiah (1 Sam. 3; Jer. 1:6-7).

Isaiah likely survived Hezekiah and continued his ministry in the days of Manasseh, who was king from 697 to 643 B.C. (2 Kin. 21:1). It is not known how far into Manasseh's reign Isaiah continued his ministry. A tradition attested in the apocryphal book of the Martyrdom of Isaiah claims that Isaiah was killed by Manasseh, who opposed his prophetic ministry. Ellen White accepted this tradition, which is possibly reflected in Hebrews 11:37 (see ST, Feb. 17, 1898). Scattered signs in the book make it plausible that Isaiah continued his ministry up to the first half of Manasseh's reign.

Following the practice of OT prophetic books, Isaiah did not date all of his prophecies. Establishing the dates, therefore, depends on the literary unity and historical setting of the book and on the relationship between prophetic predictions and historical fulfillments. The view taken in this commentary is summarized as follows:

1. No Indications of Different Authors. Recent studies have shown that chapters 40-66 never existed independently of chapters 1-39 and that the book has a remarkable internal unity.

2. The Editor and the Author Are One. The book of Isaiah is a planned composition. The thought in the small units corresponds with that of the larger blocks of material, suggesting that the prophet handled the overall editing of the text.

3. Use of the Name Isaiah. "Isaiah" is used only sixteen times, in three superscriptions (1:1; 2:1; 13:1) and in three third person narratives (7:3; twice in 20:2-3; ten times in chaps. 37-39). In comparison, the name "Jeremiah" occurs 131 times in his own book. The existing name references provide a central role in the book to the person of Isaiah. Thus, being mentioned in 1:1, he speaks in 1:2–31 without any other introduction. The text merely implies that the prophetic voice is his. This technique is consistent in the book. Governed by v. 1, the other references to his name mark Isaiah as the implied speaker in the following sections: 2:1 marks Isaiah as the prophetic speaker in 2:2–6:13; 7:3 in 7:1–12:6; 13:1 in 13:2–27:13; 20:1–6 in 20:1–35:10; and 36:1–39:8 in 40:1–66:24. This feature suggests that the book we have today was written for people who knew Isaiah as prophet and author, with the Lord as the primary speaker (cf. 40:8; 55:10–11). The use of his name indicates that Isaiah was the recipient of a divine communication addressed to a particular initial audience. Only the seer of the vision was personally involved in shaping the text. Only Isaiah son of Amoz had the authority, knowledge, and skills to produce the final form of the text.

4. The Book's View of Itself. The book of Isaiah claims to be a reliable witness to the Lord's salvation of Zion and Israel, an idea which strengthens the conviction that the Lord's promises can be trusted. It is therefore our conviction that Isaiah—who had “seen” the things of the Lord—committed his vision to writing.

5. Final Product in Manasseh's Reign. During Isaiah's ministry, and increasingly toward the end of his life, the destiny of God's people became a burning issue. Assyria's grip on Jerusalem tightened, and the persecution of the prophets and the gross apostasy under Manasseh's reign confirmed that Israel's judgment would continue (cf. 1:2–31). The faithful remnant needed hope to find the strength to wait on the Lord. This is a plausible setting for the consolation and messages of restoration in the second part of the book of Isaiah (chaps. 40–66). Hypothetically, the final form of the book may be assigned to the first half of Manasseh's reign.

Backgrounds. Isaiah's commission as prophet coincided with Assyria's rise to sovereignty over the ANE. The reign of Tiglath-Pileser III (745–727 B.C.) began a century of the greatest expansion of the Assyrian Empire. It brought disorder and upheavals through fear and hopelessness, it brought the destruction of nations and peoples, and it forced the mixing of peoples and their cultural practices. The resultant religious syncretism and lack of faith in the God of their ancestors was especially problematic for Israel and Judah (cf. 2 Kin. 17:24–41). Isaiah addressed these threats, teaching faith in the Lord by revealing His plan for Israel, His elected people, and for Zion-Jerusalem, His elect city.

The word of the Lord to Isaiah regarding Assyria was complex. Assyria was to be God's instrument for punishing Israel and Judah for their unfaithfulness to Him. But Assyria was also made the object of God's punishment in order to maintain His sovereignty and to deliver His people from oppression.

1. The Role of Babylon. In the time of Tiglath-Pileser III (745–727 B.C.), Babylon was the religious and cultural center of Mesopotamia. It was the source and center of civilization and a religious shrine of the highest sanctity. Assyria therefore needed Babylon's prestige to keep its power over its conquered kingdoms. Tiglath-Pileser, therefore, created in 729 B.C. a close bond between Assyria and Babylon. He captured the king of Babylon, gave himself the title “king of Babylon,” and turned Assyria into a dual monarchy. Babylon constantly sought to gain the upper hand in the empire and finally succeeded when Nabopolassar (Nebuchadnezzar's father) conquered Nineveh with the aid of the Medes in 612 B.C. Consequently, Isaiah referred to the Assyrian power not only as “Ashur” but also as “Babylon” and to the “king of Ashur” as the “king of Babylon” (cf. e.g., Is. 14:4, 22–23, 24–27). Thus, not all of Isaiah's sayings concerning Babylon refer to the Babylon of the Judean Exile in the sixth century B.C.

2. The Syro-Ephraimite War (734–732 B.C.) and Judah's Assyrian Vassalage. The initial incident that brought Isaiah into confrontation with Assyria was the Syro-Ephraimite war. A coalition of vassal states including Syria and the Northern Kingdom of Israel coerced Jotham's son Ahaz (ca. 735–716 B.C.) to join them against Assyria. Although Ahaz did not join the coalition, he failed to heed Isaiah's warnings (7:10–13) and instead sought help from Assyria (2 Kin. 16:7–9). In 733 B.C. the Assyrian king annexed Galilee and the area east of the Jordan, establishing these regions as the Assyrian provinces of Megiddo and Gilead. The Northern Kingdom of Israel was restricted to the remnant state of Ephraim. In keeping with Assyrian practice, the urban upper classes were deported to Assyria.

3. The Destruction of Israel in 722 B.C. When King Hoshea of Israel renounced his allegiance to Assyria while conspiring with Egypt (2 Kin. 17:3–4), Shalmaneser V (727–722 B.C.) took immediate action and besieged Samaria. Shortly before his death and the reign of Sargon II (722–705 B.C.), Samaria succumbed and Israel was made into the Assyrian province of Samerina (722 B.C.). The first major consequence was the deportation of the people of Israel from the promised land (2 Kings 17:6). The land was lost, and the "seed of Abraham" was scattered far and wide. Another consequence was that, following the Assyrian practice, non-Israelites were brought into the land of Israel from Babylonia and Syria, which led to widespread idolatry and foreign cult practices in the promised land (2 Kin. 17:24–41). A third consequence was that numerous refugees from the north took refuge in Jerusalem. As Isaiah therefore addressed the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem, he also included references to the Northern Kingdom (Is. 8:14; 28:1–29; "Ephraim" was the appellation for Israel as a whole) and to the remnant of Israel and those of the house of Jacob who had escaped (8:14; 10:20–22; 28:1–29; 46:3).

4. Sargon II (722–705 B.C.) Proclaimed King of Babylon. The Chaldean Merodach/Marduk-Baladan (known outside the Bible as Marduk-apla-iddina II) secured a formal alliance with the kings of Susa and Anshan and seized the kingship in Babylon in 721 B.C., which he kept for about ten years. The military support of Elam (i.e., Anshan and Susa) held the Assyrians back for a decade, and the dual monarchy was suspended. Sargon later came against Babylon and deposed Merodach-Baladan. Like his predecessors, Sargon held the kingship of Babylon in 709–705 B.C. and restored the dual Assyro-Babylonian monarchy.

5. Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.), Babylon, and Elam. Under Sennacherib, the dual Assyro-Babylonian monarchy continued as a demonstration of power and prestige aimed at securing the loyalty of the vassals. When Sargon died in 705 B.C., however, Merodach-Baladan raised Babylon in rebellion and took back the title of king of Babylon. The title returned to Sennacherib when he forced his opponent to escape in 703 B.C. Merodach-Baladan resumed his subversive activities in southern Mesopotamia, but Sennacherib forced him to escape to Elam with his idols and even the bones of his ancestors (cf. 43:14–15).

For several years, the kingdom of Elam attempted expansion and proved a well-organized enemy of the dual monarchy of Ashur-Babel. Elam was initially a dual kingdom comprising Anshan in the highlands and Susa in the lowlands. When Susa was destroyed by the Assyrians in 646 B.C., Anshan had been independent and growing since the 690s under a powerful new dynasty founded by King Teispes. The son of Teispes was Cyrus I, and his great grandson Cyrus II. In 689 B.C. Sennacherib captured Babylon, killed the recent usurper of the throne, and ruthlessly destroyed the city. Some passages in Isaiah may be referring to this attack against Babylon (e.g., 13:6–9, 12–19; 14:22–23; 21:1–10). The capture of Babylon by Cyrus II in 539 B.C. was "peaceful."

6. Sennacherib, Judah, and Siege of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. King Hezekiah of Judah (716–687 B.C.) broke with the syncretism of his father, Ahaz, and initiated a complete reform of religious life (2 Kin. 18:1–16). But against Isaiah's prophetic warning, he joined an insurrection of coastal cities in 701 B.C., which was backed by Egypt. His purpose was to restore the kingdom of David. However, Sennacherib defeated all the allies and, turning to Hezekiah, subdued forty-six cities and deported over two hundred thousand people. A large part of Judah was given to obedient Philistine kings. Hezekiah himself was besieged in Jerusalem, and his annual tribute was increased (2 Kin. 18:13–16). Jerusalem was miraculously spared, and Hezekiah, despite his central role in the rebellion, continued to rule. Isaiah had twice conveyed the word of the Lord that the king in Jerusalem had no reason to fear because Sennacherib would not enter Jerusalem but would return home where he would fall by the sword (Is. 37:6–7, 21–38).

7. Esarhaddon (681–669 B.C.) and the Divided Kingship of Ashur and Babylon. Sennacherib's son Esarhaddon restored Babylon and assumed the titles of king and priest of Babylon in 680 B.C. He deported King Manasseh of Judah to Babylon (2 Chr. 33:10–13) and recognized the growing power of the Medes and Elamite Anshan. Babylonians and Elamites were settled in the territories near Samaria (2 Kin. 17:24; Ezra 4:9–10), and the Israelites were settled in the cities of the Medes (2 Kin. 17:6; 18:11) and Elam (Is. 11:11). Elamite Anshan was therefore not unknown in Jerusalem in Isaiah's days.

8. Elamite Anshan, the Medes, and the Persians. Isaiah saw that the powers of the nations from the mountains east of Mesopotamia, the Medes and the Elamites (esp. Anshan), would be used as the Lord's tools to punish Babylon (13:1–5, 17–19; 21:2). He was shown that the rise to power of the Medes and Elamite Anshan would coincide with the decline and fall of the Assyro-Babylonian Empire. The Medes seized Ashur (614 B.C.) and Nineveh (612 B.C., in alliance with the Chaldeans of Babylon), and Cyrus II (a Persian), king of Anshan, captured Babylon in 539 B.C.

The Medes and Persians were associated tribes settled in the Zagros Mountains to the east of Assyria and Babylon. Many of them migrated to the southern and central areas of Zagros, where they became integrated in the Elamite kingdom of Anshan in the seventh and sixth centuries B.C. Anshan was therefore a growing kingdom in Isaiah's time. Elam was divided into lowland Susa (also called Susiana; modern Khuzestan) and highland Anshan in the Zagros Mountains to the east and southeast. The title of the king of Elam was "king of Anshan and Susa." As a name imposed by Assyrians and Babylonians, "Elam" could have been used for highland Anshan. Thus, when Isaiah speaks of "Elam" (11:11; 21:2; 22:6), he may be including the kingdom of Anshan, the home of Cyrus I and Cyrus II.

Theology and Purpose. In times of extraordinary crises and change in the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, Isaiah's purpose was to convey God's plan, which he had "seen." This plan is the unifying and structuring feature in the book and is conveyed by instruction, warning, exhortation, and comfort. Israel had apostatized, and the Lord used the Assyro-Babylonian Empire as an agent to chastise and purify them until (1) a faithful remnant of Israel would survive (i.e., Abrahamic and Sinai covenants restored), (2) royal Zion-Jerusalem would be glorified (i.e., Davidic covenant restored), and (3) the nations would acknowledge the Lord as Ruler of the world (i.e., the everlasting covenant with humanity at Creation and with Noah would be restored). As this program is laid out in the book, some key theological perspectives may be considered.

1. The Lord is Sovereign, the God of Truth and Faithfulness. Against mounting doubts in the Lord's power and will to save His people (cf. 20:6; 40:27–31; 49:14–50:4), the book of Isaiah points to His sovereignty as Creator and Lord of history and of nations and kings (40:12–31). He is the true God (65:16), just, reliable, and trustworthy (cf. 9:7; 10:20; 16:5; 25:1; 26:3; 42:3; 43:9; 61:8), whose word accomplishes His will (40:6–8; 55:8–11), whose plan cannot be obstructed or changed (14:24–27; 46:10–11), and whose faithfulness to His covenant promises is firm and reliable (cf. 1:26; 11:5; 25:1; 40:27–31; 49:7; 64:4–5). His plan is implemented by His word. It predicts judgment and future salvation, which He has the power to make happen, unlike the false gods and idols (e.g., 5:12, 19; 41:22; 42:9; 43:9, 44:26; 46:9). One of the greatest sins that Isaiah mentions, therefore, is contempt for the word of God (5:24; cf. 8:16, 20), for only the word of God brings salvation to the world

(2:3). In the short term, God's word and purpose should be believed because of who He is and because of His past acts of salvation (6:1–13; 7:4–9; 41:2–4, 25–26; 51:9–11). In the long term, the evidence of the continuing fulfillment of the written prophetic word proves that the word of God abides forever (40:8). God's faithful people must wait on Him as an expression of faith (8:17; 25:9; 26:8; 30:18; 42:4; 51:5; 64:4–5).

2. God Is Holy. God is the Other, completely different from any human or other part of His creation (57:15). His thoughts and ways are higher than those of humans (2:22; 55:8–9). He is exalted (2:11) and pure (6:5–7), and the earth is full of His glory (v. 3). His holiness is marked by the epithet "the Holy One of Israel," which is first and predominantly attested in Isaiah and is used throughout the book (e.g., 1:4; 5:19; 37:23; 41:14; 54:5; 60:14). Worshiping Him requires respect for His holiness, which makes humans feel unworthy or unclean (cf. 6:5–7). God's holiness is an ethical holiness (5:16). His holiness is integrated with justice, righteousness, and love (1:16–17; 5:16; 45:19–25; 58:6–7; 61:1–3). His salvation of penitent Israel expressed a love for His people that was rooted in the covenant and the election (cf. 41:8–14; 43:1–4). Although Israel had not fully repented, the Lord still offered salvation and forgiveness to His people (33:24; 43:25–26; 48:1–11; 54:6–7). His love and acceptance were extended to the nations (2:2–4; 18:1–7; 53:6; 55:6–8) because as Creator He is the God of the whole earth (54:5). The message of the Lord's mercy and abundant pardon is central in chapter 55, one of the high points of the book. God's holiness implies that He is passionate in judgment as well as in salvation. His passion in anger against sin and criminal offenses is reflected in an array of terms for anger, fury, and wrath (see "The Wrath of God," p. 918). The Lord's compassion is compared to that of a mother for her children (Is. 49:14–15; 66:13).

3. The God of Israel, Zion, and David. Isaiah's prophetic messages about Israel's apostasy and restoration are founded on the covenant (cf. "Covenant," p. 905). Israel's election, the covenant with Abraham, the Exodus and Sinai, and the promise of the land of Canaan to Abraham and Jacob are all referenced in this book. There are frequent appeals to covenant laws as models of righteous behavior. Israel's God was intimately connected with Zion, which was His dwelling and resting place, His throne, and His place of worship (e.g., 1:11–12; 2:2–4; 6:1–3). Historical circumstances associated with King David linked the temple with the king and the royal palace. The covenant with David and his dynasty (9:7; 16:5; 29:1; 55:3; cf. 2 Sam. 7; 23:5) was neglected under apostate kings like Ahaz and Manasseh. This Davidic covenant was the ground for Isaiah's predictions of an ideal royal Savior: Immanuel (Is. 7:14–8:10), the Davidic Prince (9:2–7), and the Rod/Shoot from the stem/stump of Jesse (11:1–10). It was also the ground for the promise of a future glorification of David's dynasty in an everlasting covenant (55:3–5).

4. The Lord Is Creator and the God of the Nations. In Isaiah, the theological foundation for seeing God as the God of the nations is the "everlasting covenant" between the Creator and human beings (24:5; 54:9–10), which established the fundamental order of the world of creation (Gen. 9:16). This covenant implies that the Creator has granted life and sustenance to every being on the earth (Is. 9:11, 15–17). God is the Creator and, compared to Him, the nations and their idols are worthless (40:12–26). It is part of God's plan, however, to gather not only Israel but also those who worship Him from the nations (2:2–4; 56:6–8). This is part of His claim to world sovereignty, which means that He, as Creator of all peoples, would restore the everlasting covenant.

5. A Message of Hope. The hope proclaimed by Isaiah was based on God's claim that there is no other god besides Him, a thought developed in 44:6–46:13 (cf. 45:5, 14–25; 46:5) and through the work of the Holy Spirit (63:10–11, 14), who is identical with the Lord (11:2; 30:1; 34:16; 40:13; 42:1; 48:16; 59:19, 21; 61:1; 63:10–14). He cooperates with the Lord God and with the promised Davidic King (11:2). The coming salvation of Israel through this King is associated with the outpouring of the Spirit (42:1–9; 48:16; 59:20–21; 61:1–3). God had a plan, and Isaiah was the first prophetic book that emphasized it through the use of the term 'etsah, which not only meant "counsel" but also "[determined] plan." This word constitutes a central concept in Isaiah's prophetic ministry (5:18–19; 19:17; 28:29; 40:14; 44:26; 46:10–11; cf. 30:1). God's plan would not fail in spite of the sins of His people because He would preserve for Himself a remnant. In the book of Isaiah, the concept of "remnant" represents the faithful among God's people who would enjoy His blessing when He fulfilled His promises. A remnant from the nations would also join them (see "The Remnant," p. 843). This shows that the hope of salvation was not exclusively for Israel and Judah but was also offered to all nations. As Creator, God cares for the nations and desires to be their God (e.g., 2:2–4; 52:13–53:12; 56:6–8; 66:19–24). It is a universal salvation in that it is offered to all.

God's plan would reach deep into the future and would include the resurrection of the dead, announced by the prophet in no uncertain terms (26:19; cf. v. 14), and even the destruction of death (25:8). Isaiah announced the coming of a future world; the creation of a new heaven and a new earth by the power of God. In this new everlasting creation there would be neither sin nor suffering (65:17; 66:22–23; cf. Rev. 21:1–4).

But it would be through the work of the Messiah that hope would reach its theological summit. The passage in Isaiah 52:13–53:12 speaks about a suffering and righteous individual who would atone for the sins of the nations of the world. Only Jesus Christ has fulfilled this prophecy by His life, teaching, suffering, death, and resurrection. God's plan and control of history mean that Isaiah provided a prophetic timeline of future events, beginning with his time and leading up to the full consummation of the Lord's plan (see commentary on 6:5–13; 10:5–19; 11:1–16).

6. The Sacred, Prophetic Writing. Beyond the revelation to the prophet and its subsequent communication to readers and hearers, Isaiah assigned a distinct value to the preserved, written prophecy as evidence of the power of the word of the Lord. It was to be a preserved record that could be seen and verified by its historical fulfillment (30:8; cf. 8:16–17). The predictive word of the Lord would necessarily wait for fulfillment because of its testimony to the truth of God's sovereign knowledge of history. Isaiah's authorship of the text, therefore, has important theological implications because it proves the issuing of God's predictions before His fulfillment of them. In fact, one of the ways in which the Lord demonstrates that there is no other God like Him is by announcing from the beginning what will take place even in the distant future. And His predictions happen (see 34:11–35:2; cf. 29:11–12, 18; 45:1–8; 46:8–11). The command to search the book/scroll of the Lord and read it (34:16) was most probably given so that readers would confirm the veracity of God's prophecy (cf. 46:10–11; 48:3). They were then invited to be His witnesses by hearing and seeing the prophecy's fulfillment (43:9–12; 44:6–8; 66:19). Thus, Isaiah's book has an eschatological function connected with the fulfillment of the Lord's plan of salvation: it predicted a time when faithful Israel would "hear" the prophetic word and “see” its fulfillment (29:18); that is, the book would prove its relevance even in the distant future.

Literary Features. The book of Isaiah took shape in a literary setting where writing and books experienced a significant revival. Its literary genre may be defined as prophetic book (i.e., the literary presentation of the words of the Prophet Isaiah). The book is also in a sense a long sermon or a didactic-hortatory speech designed to persuade its hearers and readers to remain faithful, or repent and return, to the Lord. Thus, the book of Isaiah may be defined as a divine revelation functioning as a persuasive discourse. It contains literary features that imply an advanced level of learning and literary skills. Within a unit of speech, Isaiah has a wide range of literary forms associated with a lawsuit: accusation, witness statements, verdict, judgment, and argumentation. It also has lamentation, instructions, hymns, and didactic material like proverbs. There is a rich variety of metaphorical imagery, plays on words, artistic arrangements, chiasmic structures, repetitions, and so on.

The book is a carefully planned composition as indicated by the prophet’s continuing insights from “seeing” and “hearing” the Lord’s messages. The material is fitted into a grandiose vision of the Lord’s world sovereignty, which is based on prophetic predictions and divine fulfillments that provide the arguments for instruction, paraenesis (advice or counsel), and exhortation. It opens with a title (1:1) and a prologue (vv. 2–31). The rest is divided into two major parts, chapters 2–33 and 34–66. This division is marked in the oldest complete manuscript of the book, which dates to the early part of the second century B.C. In one of the complete Dead Sea Scrolls copies of Isaiah (1QIs<sup>a</sup>), there is a space of two lines after chapter 33.

The prologue in 1:2–31 describes the fundamental issue of the whole book. The covenant people of Israel—here exemplified by Judah after the Assyrian destruction in 701 B.C.—continued to disobey the covenant despite their severe punishment (vv. 4–9). This implies that Israel would face a long time of punishment until a purified remnant remained in Zion because the Lord would act with justice and righteousness (v. 27).

Chapters 2–33 outline the Lord’s plan to establish His worldwide sovereignty at Zion-Jerusalem (its fulfillment is described in 2:2–4). Chapters 2–4 summarize the thematic structure of the book of Isaiah. They announce the Day of the Lord (2:10–21), to which chapters 2–66 repeatedly refer, and describe the Lord’s purification of Israel for their role in His plan—by predicted judgment (3:1–4:6), by words of hortatory instruction (2:5–10, 22; 3:10–12), and by a prediction of the deliverance of His remnant people (4:2–6). This core message is then developed in chapters 5–12, 13–23, 24–27, and 28–33.

The second part, chapters 34–66, begins announcing judgment to the nations (34:1–4) and the day of recompense for the cause of Zion (v. 8). This new phase in the Lord’s plan meant that He had ended the purification or chastisement process of His people by foreign powers (chaps. 2–33) and would prepare His faithful remnant for the restoration of Zion and His everlasting covenant with Israel (chaps. 34–66). However, this aim involved the salvation of the nations (52:13–53:12; 56:6–8; 60:1–22; 66:19–24) and the gathering of scattered Israel and the nations to worship the Lord at Zion (60:1–62:12; 66:5–24). The intimate tone of the Lord’s appeals to His people in chapters 40–55 suggests that He was beginning to implement His plan by persuading them to become the restored covenant community in Zion. Chapters 34–54 form the foundation of the central invitation in chapter 55, which is further developed by instructions concerning a restored Zion and her citizens, and is marked by the chiasmic inclusio in chapters 56–59 (A), 60–62 (B), and 63–66 (A’). The details of this compositional structure are provided in the commentary.

COMMENTARY

1:1–31

TITLE AND PROLOGUE

1:1 Title

The title consists of several parts. The type of text stands first and is determined by what follows:

1. Type of Text. The book of Isaiah records the “vision” (khazon) from God that Isaiah “saw” (khazah). The technical term khazon affirms the supernatural nature of the vision (cf. Num. 24:3–4, 15–17; Job 4:12–16; 33:14–16; Hos. 12:10). Isaiah emphasizes the divine source of his message by repeatedly using nouns derived from the same Hebrew root (Is. 21:2; 22:1, 5; 28:18 [here khazut is rendered as “agreement” in most translations; 29:7, 11). The term belonged to the circle of seers, where it was associated with the supernatural revelation of divine words.

2. Identity of the Seer. The vision was given to Isaiah the son of Amoz. The Hebrew form of Isaiah’s name is yeshā ‘yahu, which involves yahu as the Lord’s name. The later and abbreviated form yeshā ‘yah is used as a book title in early codices. The name is attested on ancient seals and means “the Lord’s salvation,” “the Lord is [my] salvation,” or even “the Lord has given salvation” (cf. 12:1–3; 49:6; 51:6).

3. Mode of Revelation. The vision was determined by what Isaiah saw. To “see [khazah] a vision [khazon]” is a rare, technical expression that implies a visionary experience involving the reception of God’s words (cf. 2:1), as exemplified in Isaiah’s commission account (6:1–13). It is rooted in the prophetic experience of the Lord speaking through visions (cf. Num. 24:3–4, 15–17; Job 4:12–16; 33:14–16; Hos. 12:10). Ezekiel uses a similar Hebrew phrasing (Ezek. 12:27; cf. 13:7, 16) to speak about prophecies for a distant future. Isaiah’s use of the same terminology implies the presence of predictions of events in a distant future.

4. Topic of the Book. Isaiah 1:1 also indicates that Isaiah’s vision would impact Judah and Jerusalem. The book’s intended recipient is not specifically mentioned in the title; only the city and those in power, who would be involved with and impacted by the vision, are mentioned. Thus, the title announces its relevance to any recipient but keeps Israel, the people of God, and especially Zion-Jerusalem close to the heart of the message (see 66:10–14).

The designation “Judah and Jerusalem” (cf. 2:1) may function as a synecdoche or pars pro toto, namely, a figure of speech in which the part “Judah and Jerusalem” represents the whole of “Israel” as the people of God. The designation had certain political connotations. Jeroboam’s rebellion in the tenth century B.C. led to the secession of the Northern Kingdom of Israel with ten of Israel’s twelve tribes. Judah and Benjamin became the Southern Kingdom of Judah when Israel broke off (7:17). “Judah” therefore alludes to the separation of the kingdom of Israel from the kingdom of Judah (e.g., 11:12–13), while “Jerusalem” symbolizes the unification of the two kindred peoples by the common God worshiped there (note “the house/temple of the God of Jacob” in 2:3; cf. 10:20–23; 59:20; 65:9).

5. Time of Isaiah’s Vision. Isaiah’s vision was seen during the approximate time span of the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. However, his predictions about the future of Judah and Jerusalem went far beyond the time of those reigns. “Kings of Judah” brings to mind the dead rulers of Judah and Jerusalem. They are contrasted with the King of Zion-Jerusalem (2:2–4; 6:1–5), that is, the Lord. References to the reigns of kings in the supercriptions of prophetic books provide approximate dates (cf. Jer. 1:1–3; Hos. 1:1; Amos 1:1). Thus, the wording of Isaiah’s title does not preclude the possibility that his ministry continued until the reign of Manasseh.

1:2–31

Prologue: Restoration of Jerusalem/Zion

This well-defined passage functions as a prologue to the book of Isaiah. It reflects the Lord’s plan to chastise and purify Israel and redeem the remnant of Zion. This grand work of restoration characterizes the whole book. The unity of the passage emerges when the whole is taken as an extended lawsuit: a calling of witnesses (v. 2); a complaint against Israel for covenant crimes by the plaintiff (vv. 2–3); a complaint supported by a witness statement (v. 4); a review of the nation’s moral status to ascertain the necessity or nonnecessity of further judgment (vv. 5–8); a witness statement regarding the remnant of Zion (v. 9); a further complaint against Jerusalem concerning false worship and a divine instruction offering a remedy (vv. 10–17); an offer of settlement by an arbitrator (vv. 18–20); a further complaint against Jerusalem’s leaders (vv. 21–23); a predicted judgment followed by a purge and a restoration of Jerusalem; and a redemption of Zion with justice and righteousness (vv. 24–31). This summary of chapter 1 provides the essence of the Lord’s plan, which is further developed in the whole book.

Chapters 1 and 65–66 form an inclusio that unites the book of Isaiah. Twenty-five Hebrew words or phrases in 1:2–31 are repeated in 65:1–66:24, and some of the less common ones in English are “ox,” “bull” (1:3; 66:3); “sacrifices” (1:11; 66:3); “hear the word of the LORD” (1:10; 66:5); “not delight”/“displease” (1:11; 66:4); “burned incense”/“burned sacrifices” (1:13; 65:7); “New Moons, Sabbaths” (1:13; 66:23); “sword” (1:20; 66:16); “rebellious/obstinate,” “rebels” (1:23; 65:2); “my enemies/foes,” “his enemies/foes” (1:24; 66:14); those who “forsake the LORD” (1:28; 65:11); “chosen” (1:29; 66:3); “gardens” (1:29; 66:17); and “quench” (1:31; 66:24).

Several themes are also common to chapters 1 and 65–66: the nation, the people, and the offspring/descendants (1:2–6; 65:1–9); the destruction and the saving of a remnant (1:7, 9; 65:8–16); the survivors of Zion and the restoration of Jerusalem (1:8–9; 65:8–10, 18–19); the disapproval of worship that is not matched by righteousness (1:10–20; 66:1–4); the apostates having chosen that in which they, and not the Lord, delighted (1:11, 29; 66:3); the punishment of Jerusalem and the Lord's enemies (1:21–26; 66:5–6); the liberation of Zion and the faithful, and the destruction of Zion and the Lord's enemies (1:27–28; 66:7–16); the apostate cult in the gardens (1:29–31; 65:3; 66:17); the apostates being “ashamed” (1:29; 65:13); the judgment of the apostates by fire (1:31; 66:15–16); the apostates destroyed together (1:31; 66:17); and the unquenchable fire consuming the apostates (1:31; 66:24).

1:2–9. Rebellious Children and the Remnant.

Isaiah appealed to the heavens and the earth as witnesses to verify the truth of what he said (Deut. 30:19; 31:28; 32:1; cf. Job 20:27). This belonged to the lawsuit genre (cf. Mic. 6:1–2), where those who witnessed the making of a covenant were called to witness the settlement of covenant crimes. Using two metaphors, God brought His complaint against Israel. The first used the case of a parent who had raised children (lit. “sons”; Is. 1:2c; cf. 38:19; Job 31:18). Parents instruct their children so that they “know” and “consider”/“understand” (Is. 1:3). Children's rebellion against their parents was regulated in the covenant law and led to a court proceeding involving the elders at the city gate (Deut. 21:18–21). God's claim in Isaiah 1:2 that His children had rebelled against Him means that they had abandoned their covenant loyalty (cf. 2 Kin. 1:1; 3:5, 7).

The second metaphor was that the ox knows its owner and the donkey its owner's feeding (Is. 1:3), which echoes a proverbial wisdom saying. The animals' faithfulness to their owners should have been a model for Israel's attitude to the Lord, but the people lacked knowledge and understanding. Both metaphors adduced commonsense arguments from social life.

The Lord's complaint in vv. 2–3 is supported by the prophet's witness statement (v. 4). The statement is followed by a review of Israel's moral status and past judgment to ascertain the necessity or nonnecessity of further judgment (vv. 5–8). The interjection hoy, “alas” or “woe,” in 1:4 is associated with laments for the dead.

In this context it was used to call attention to the people's reprehensible conduct toward the Lord—in support of the complaint in vv. 2–3. The people were addressed as a sinful nation, a people weighed down with iniquity/guilt (v. 4a–b). “To sin” (khata') literally means to “miss the way,” that is, overstep divine laws. The term for ‘awon, “iniquity” or “rebellion,” expresses the idea of a wrong mindset that is opposed to God's will. Both of these terms are used in Isaiah for the wrong action (e.g., 5:18; 31:7; 43:24), the guilt caused by the wrong (e.g., 1:18; 59:3), or the punishment for the wrong (53:12).

The vocabulary used in describing Israel's crimes is rooted in covenant texts (1:4; cf. Deut. 31:20; 32:16). The reference to Israel turning away (Is. 1:4) implies that when the covenant was made, Israel was loyal to their Lord. This thought returns in v. 26: the promise was that God would restore the city's rulers as they were in former times. Israel had offended “the Holy One of Israel” (v. 4). This divine epithet is used with particular frequency by Isaiah. It occurs throughout the whole book and supports its unity. It is particularly common in passages describing a violation of divine majesty (e.g., v. 4; 5:19; 31:1) or a turning to the Lord as a powerful Savior (e.g., 10:20; 17:7; 29:19; 41:14; 45:11; 55:5), which is closely associated with the idea of creation (e.g., 43:15; 45:12; 54:5). The epithet identifies the Lord as the God of Israel, the people of the two kingdoms (cf. 5:7).

The image of Israel as a sick body (1:5–8) reflects both their moral deficiencies and their punishment for disloyalty. The ruined nation is symbolized by a body covered with wounds, bruises, welts, and open, putrefying sores that had not healed for want of care. Both Israel and Judah were broken by sin and judgment, but this had not led to humility and repentance. A further witness statement testifies to the Lord's salvation of the remnant of Zion (v. 9), designated as “Daughter Zion” or “the daughter of Zion” (v. 8). The representation of a city or a people by the figure of a woman is common OT poetical imagery (cf. 3:16–4:1). The statement indicates that Zion's survival was the work of the Lord (see 36:1–37:38; note the concept of “remnant” in 37:4, 32). In the lawsuit context of 1:2–9, however, v. 9 confirms Israel's guilt and punishment (like Sodom and Gomorrah; cf. Gen. 19:24–29) but with the caveat (as in Gen. 19:29) that yahweh tseba'ot, the Almighty, Sovereign Lord of armies, had left a surviving remnant (see “The Remnant,” p. 843). This title is linked to the Jerusalem temple in the OT (as well as here in chap. 1); it also alludes to the Lord's role as a Warrior and the Defender of His people (see "Yahweh Tseba'ot," p. 912).

The speakers in Isaiah 1:9 are a community of survivors created by the Lord of Hosts. Isaiah associates himself with them by using the first person plural (vv. 9–10). The speech in v. 9 is therefore the climactic point of vv. 2–9 and shows that in the midst of apostasy and judgment, God's plan of salvation had been (and would be) accomplished through the remnant of Zion.

1:10–17. Worship, Justice, and Righteousness. This passage is a complaint against Jerusalem concerning false worship, but with an added divine instruction offering a remedy. This "word of the LORD" and "law [or instruction, Heb. torah] of our God" zooms in on a central part of Israel's covenant crimes in Isaiah 1:2–4: their impure and blasphemous worship of the Lord in the temple of Jerusalem (see "The Temple in Chronicles," p. 541). The passage involves charges particularly against Jerusalem, which had committed crimes that defiled both temple and city. The crimes of rulers and people are described figuratively as involving hands full of blood, a description that points toward the need for purification (Is. 1:15–17).

The designations of Sodom and Gomorrah in v. 10 indicate that the people were corrupt and deserving of judgment (cf. Gen. 19:1–29). The Lord's initial rhetorical questions (Is. 1:11–12) pave the way for His ethical instructions (vv. 16–17). If the God who was worshiped in the temple was asking such questions, it could only mean that the worshipers did not know Him. What the Lord wanted was primarily an ethical purity of the heart to turn the religious practices into true sacrifices given with a contrite heart.

The people were told to stop bringing empty sacrifices and holding meaningless assemblies (vv. 13–14). The religious observances were not to be abolished. The repeated references to "your sacrifices," "your hands," "your festivals," and "your gatherings" (vv. 11–16) indicate that what God was rejecting was the hypocrisy of the worshipers. He turned against the multiplication of sacrifices, rituals, and festivals because they reflected the idea that "the more you offer, the more you get." The instruction does not indicate that the Lord was abolishing the weekly Sabbath, which has an important function in Isaiah (56:2, 4, 6; 58:13; 66:23). In fact, 66:23 indicates that the Sabbath was to be kept after the return from captivity and beyond. What the Lord was inveighing against was the combination of rebellion and sacred assemblies, in other words, the people's wickedness and their attempts to hide it behind a sanctimonious attitude. The Lord would not hear the prayers of such persons (1:15).

Injustice is symbolized by a reference to hands filled with blood—the blood of people who had been victimized by the community (v. 15). "Blood" denotes the blood guilt that the people had incurred by their actions. Verses 16–17 are a profound criticism of a type of worship that satisfies itself with formal and temporary cultic rituals and rites but is blind to justice. "Justice" (Heb. mishpat) in this context refers to the right judgment that would give what was legally right to all—especially the poor, the needy, and widows. This justice is one of the Lord's characteristics (Deut. 32:4). Justice should express itself in the life of the worshipers, who are exhorted to seek it

The Remnant

The terms sarid (used here in 1:9) and she'ar (elsewhere in Isaiah), both meaning "remnant"/"survivors," originally referred to the physical survival of any group of people after disasters, such as floods, famines, and war, but in Isaiah they are used in a theological sense with reference to the community of Israel, following the Assyrian disasters in the eighth century B.C. The remnant became the purified and faithful community, the Israel of faith. Isaiah used this concept in reference to Judah (7:3), Israel (10:20–23), a group in Jerusalem and on Mt. Zion (4:3; 28:5; 37:4, 32; cf. 14:32), or all the scattered communities of Israel once deported or having escaped to foreign nations (11:11, 16; 24:6, 12; 46:3). Of the faithful remnant of Israel, God's plan was to build a new nation through the return of scattered Israel (cf. 49:8–50:3) and the restoration of Jerusalem (cf. 52:1–12) and culminate with the glorification of Zion (cf. 59:21–62:12). In the book of Revelation, the concept of "remnant" or "rest" is used to designate the faithful people of God at the end of time (Rev. 12:17).

(Is. 1:17). Closely linked to this admonition is the demand to remove evil deeds, desist from doing evil, and learn to do what is right (vv. 16–17). Thus, the basic principles of the Lord's judgment and salvation are justice and righteousness (cf. vv. 21, 26–27). "Righteousness" is the fulfillment of the demands of goodwill in a relationship and may be associated with faithfulness, justification, and salvation, which also characterize the Lord (Deut. 32:4). This word pair is central in the whole book of Isaiah (e.g., Is. 1:21; 5:7; 9:7; 51:4–5; 56:1; 59:14).

The instruction in 1:16–17 implies that the people had ethically defiled themselves and needed cleansing (cf. v. 25). This admonition was rooted in the Lord's holiness, and as an offer to settle the dispute, it implies an offer of forgiveness to the penitent. The point in this torah/instruction is that true worshipers must reflect the essence of the will and nature of the God they seek. Jesus made the same point in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:21–26, 43–48).

1:18–20. Call to Settle the Lord's Complaint.

The Lord's formal offer to settle the dispute was to yakakh, "argue" or "settle"/"decide," sometimes translated as "reason," with the people. The word conveys the idea of arguing in court in order to settle a dispute (cf. Job 23:7); the Lord as the plaintiff and Israel as the accused could argue against each other. The Lord expressed the desire to purify His people from their sins (Is. 1:18). His settlement offer was the blotting out of the blood guilt of which their hands were full (v. 15). The result of making themselves clean would be that even if their sins were like scarlet, they would be as white as snow, and even if they were red like crimson, they would be like wool (vv. 16, 18). This offer was, however, conditioned by the people's choice between two ways: either they would obey the instruction (vv. 16–17), which meant that they would eat the good produce of the land, or they would continue in rebellion, which meant that they would be "devoured by the sword" (vv. 19–20). The offer would lead to a separation between righteous and unrighteous (vv. 27–31), which was needed in the purifying judgment and the redemption announced in vv. 25–27. This theme is picked up again in 2:1–4:6 and at the end of the book. The gift of salvation comes with a choice that everyone has to make, but those who accept this gift will repent of their old way of life and depend completely on the Lord through the enabling of the Spirit.

1:21–31. Restoration and Redemption. The people's choice is implied in vv. 21–31. It resulted in a division of the people into Zion's faithful penitents (v. 27) and Jerusalem's apostate leaders (vv. 21–26) and their followers (vv. 28–31). The faithful would be redeemed and delivered (v. 27), but the apostates would be destroyed. The penitents of Zion would eat the good produce of the land (v. 19), but the apostates would be "devoured by the sword" (v. 20). The epithets yahweh tseba'ot, "Lord of Armies," "Lord Almighty," "Sovereign Lord," or "the Mighty One of Israel," are used in Isaiah to emphasize the Lord's power in defeating enemies and protecting His faithful people (v. 24). In order to have justice and righteousness in Jerusalem, the apostate leaders had to be replaced by faithful judges (vv. 26–27). This would restore the city to what it was in the beginning.

The apostate religion included trees (alternatively understood and translated as either "oak" or "terebinth") and gardens (v. 29). The strength and vitality of these trees made them symbols of fertility gods, and rites of fertility were carried out under them (see 57:5; Jer. 2:20, 23–27; 3:6; Hos. 4:13). In gardens with such trees, sacrifices were offered (Is. 65:3) and various rites of purification were used to prepare the worshipers for cultic activities (66:17). The seductive attraction of this cult is implied by the verbs "desire"/"delight" and "choose," but the Lord's judgment would change this admiration to disgrace (1:29). The apostates would themselves become like the oaks (or terebinths) and gardens where they worshiped, but they would be without water (v. 30). The restoration of the city by faithful officials (v. 26) and the redemption of the penitents of Zion (v. 27) form the climax of the prologue. The Lord's actions, described in vv. 24–31, would resolve His complaints mentioned earlier in the chapter.

2:1–4:6

PREPARATIONS OF ZION-JERUSALEM FOR GOD'S UNIVERSAL KINGDOM

This literary block concerns God's preparations for His universal kingdom by purifying His people Israel and His city Zion-Jerusalem and by demonstrating His sovereignty over the nations, particularly Assyria. This section of the book outlines the essence of God's plan for His universal sovereignty. It is defined by its internally coherent ring structure, in which the end is announced at the beginning—the events in 2:2–4 were to follow those of 4:2–6. The beginning is marked by the title in 2:1–2, and the end by the new unit in 5:1–30. The passage contains many links with the rest of the book, some of which are noted in the commentary. Major connections exist with the prologue in 1:2–31.

2:1–4

The Word, the End, the Nations

When associated with a prophet, the term dabar, “word”/“thing”/“matter” (some translations leave it untranslated here; v. 1) designates the conventional genre of “prophecy” (cf. Jer. 18:18; Ezek. 7:26). The formula “in the latter/last days” is best understood here as referring to the remote future or the end of a certain but indefinite period of time: “at the end of the days.” The subtitle in Isaiah 2:1–2a could be translated in such a way as to connect the end of v. 1 with the beginning of v. 2 (“The word that...which shall come to pass at the end of the days”). It establishes a large time span between Isaiah’s time and “the end of the days.” This time span applies to all “the days” in chapters 2–66, which will lead to the ultimate events in 2:2b–4. Therefore, vv. 1–2a announce the temporal framework of the great plan of “the God of Jacob” to assume universal sovereignty.

The nations would acknowledge the Lord’s sovereign kingship. The “mountain of the Lord’s house/temple” refers to the throne of the Lord (cf. 6:1; 66:1; Pss. 9:4; 47:8), and the verb “established” refers to the unchallenged confirmation of a royal reign, kingship, or throne (e.g., 2 Sam. 7:16–26). The term ro’sh may be translated “head”/“highest”/“chief”/“top”—here related to the mountains. The language here may imply God’s sovereignty over the nations and their gods. The actions by all nations will affirm God’s royal kingship (cf. Is. 33:17–22; 52:7). The translation “shall flow/stream to it” builds on the term nahar I (“to flow”/“stream”). Another option would be to build on nahar II, which means “to make the face shine,” “be radiant with joy,” or “rejoice.” This fits Isaiah’s own usage in 60:5 (see also Ps. 34:6; Jer. 31:12; 51:44). On this premise, the text may be translated “And all nations will shine with joy toward Him.” Such an act of joy by a king’s subjects was traditionally part of the acclamation of a king.

Many peoples would decide to accept God’s rule, follow His ways, and encourage each other to go up to the Lord’s temple mountain, a description which signifies a pilgrimage to the temple (see Ps. 122:4); this was usually done to bring gifts, fulfill vows, participate in festivals, pray to the Lord, praise the Lord, or “seek the Lord.” The peoples would encourage each other to obey the Lord (i.e., to “walk in His paths”). The temple is called the house/temple of the God of Jacob. “Jacob”/“Israel” is the ancient name of God’s elected people as a whole and includes both Israel and Judah (cf. Is. 5:7; 8:14). The phrase “the God of Jacob” occurs only here in Isaiah, but it was used in the temple worship (e.g., Ps. 46:7, 11). References to the descendants of Jacob (lit. “house of Jacob”) are rather frequent in Isaiah (e.g., 2:5–6; 8:17; 14:1; 46:3; 58:1).

The law (or instruction) or the word of the Lord would go out from Zion-Jerusalem because His kingship would be acknowledged by the nations, which would result in world peace. The Lord as King would judge and decide cases (2:4), something also characteristic of the prophesied messianic righteous King (11:4). In both passages the outcome would be world peace. In view of 9:2–7 and 11:1–10, “Wonderful Counselor” and “Prince of Peace” refer to the work of the Lord’s messianic agent through whom the law/instruction would go out from Zion and the Lord’s word from Jerusalem (2:3).

2:5–10

Idols Removed

This hortatory passage addressed the people of Jacob (lit. “house,” meaning descendants). Its purpose was to persuade them to end their widespread devotion to foreign gods and turn to the God of Jacob (v. 3). The Lord showed Isaiah what the future pilgrims to Zion would say, and this is followed by an invitation to the contemporary house of Jacob from a speaker in their midst. The invitation is to join him in walking in “the light of the LORD.” The phrase “the light of the LORD” is a unique expression. “Light” is a symbol of the Lord’s saving and merciful presence in the temple (Pss. 27:1; 37:6; 97:11; 112:4; Mic. 7:8). The Lord’s people “walk in the light” (Is. 2:5) of His presence because “righteousness and justice are the foundation” of His throne, and khesed, “mercy,” “love,” or “covenant faithfulness,” and ’emet, “truth” or “faithfulness,” go before Him (Ps. 89:14–15). Verse 6 could be also translated “For you [house of Jacob] have forsaken your people, O House of Jacob!” In other words, through its unfaithfulness the house of Jacob is no longer part of the true people of God, identified here as “your people.”

The rest of the passage provides the evidence needed to support the charge.

The accumulation of objects, practices, and idol worshipers listed in 2:6–9 is contrasted with their removal on the Day of the Lord (v. 18–21; 3:1–7; 3:16–4:1). The people had adopted foreign idolatrous practices from the east and west, including (in the latter case) divination in the manner of the Philistines. The people were too closely connected with foreign, pagan influences. The silver, gold, and treasures (2:7) may reflect an accumulation of riches or material for making idols (cf. vv. 8, 18–21), or it may reflect human pride. Horses and chariots may refer to military power, the symbols of sun-worship at the entrance to the house of the Lord in Manasseh's time (2 Kin. 23:11), or both. The house of Jacob was full of idols of silver and gold. The people worshiped and bowed down to the work of their own hands (Is. 2:8–9b; cf. 17:7–8; 31:7).

The people were being exhorted to turn away from idols and humble themselves before the Lord's powerful glory (2:11–21). This served as a warning in view of the coming of the Day of the Lord.

2:11–22

The Day of the Lord

In Isaiah's time, the Day of the Lord was understood to be the day when God would come to save His people and defeat their enemies—the title yahweh tseba'ot, “Lord of Hosts,” “Lord of armies,” or “Lord Almighty” (v. 12), was specifically linked with Zion-Jerusalem and God's royal power. The Day of the Lord is a point of reference for the phrase “in that day/time,” which occurs about forty-five times between 2:11 and 31:7. The description of God's judgment during the Day of the Lord moves from a local situation to a universal one (cf. 2:21). The central Day of the Lord in vv. 12–16 is framed by an inclusio in vv. 11 and 17. This arrangement draws attention to the fundamental contrast between God and the human idol makers. By His terrifying power and holy majesty, the Lord would supersede all and would humble humanity (v. 12). The enumeration of symbols of human pride (vv. 13–16) involves a movement from north to south and expresses totality: from the cedars of Lebanon and the oaks of Bashan, through mountains, hills, and cities with towers and walls, to the trading ships of Tarshish in the Gulf of Aqaba in the south.

In the light of how “Lebanon” is used in Isaiah, the “cedars of Lebanon” and the “oaks of Bashan” (v. 13) may metaphorically refer to the proud people of the house of Jacob, who saw themselves as living in the fruitful and protected garden/mountain of God (i.e., Zion). But as a result of a humiliating encounter with the Lord (vv. 11–17), the idolaters would end up in holes, rocks, and caves (vv. 18–19). They would cast away their idols to moles and bats as they desperately hid themselves in caverns and rocks before the frightening revelation of the Lord's power and majesty (vv. 20–21; cf. v. 10).

An idol was the work of human hands/fingers (vv. 8, 20), beautifully crafted in order to attract the admiration of human eyes (vv. 9, 11). Humans would prostrate themselves to the ground to worship the idols (v. 9). But on the Day of the Lord, people would be bowed down and humbled because of the fear of the Lord, and they would reject their idols (vv. 11, 17); only the Lord would be exalted (vv. 10–11, 17, 19, 21). Based on his condemnation of idolatry, Isaiah admonished the house of Jacob to cease trusting in human beings (esp. idolaters), and he reminded them that human life depends on the breath in the nostrils, given by God (v. 22; 42:5; Gen. 2:7). The exhortation in Isaiah 2:22 prepares the way for 3:1–4:1 that predicts the removal of three things: (1) all bread/food and water, exposing human neediness (3:1); (2) all human officials in Jerusalem and Judah (vv. 2–7) who oppress the poor and needy (vv. 8–9, 12–15); and (3) the insignia of high office, symbols of the abuse of power and foreign practices (3:16–4:6). Idolatry, pride, and injustice have no place with the Lord.

3:1–4:6

Cleansing and Restoration

The prologue in 1:2–31 predicts that the Lord would purge the apostate leaders of Jerusalem and restore it as a faithful and righteous city (vv. 24–26). In this section the purification of Jerusalem and Judah is dealt with in further detail.

3:1–7. God Removes Leaders. The reminder of human neediness in 2:22 is the foundation of 3:1–7. God was going to remove all means of support for Jerusalem and Judah and would send a famine, removing all traces of bread and water (v. 1). The cause of the famine is not stated, but the references to warriors and the mighty (v. 2a), as well as their men, falling by the sword in battle (v. 25) suggest that the cause would be a siege. The reference to the captain of fifty (v. 3a), which is possibly a figure of speech (synecdoche) for the whole army, points in the same direction.

Once the wicked leaders had been removed, children would be princes and rulers, which would result in an upheaval of the social order (vv. 4–7). The utter lack of human leadership is illustrated in vv. 6–7. Having a piece of clothing (lit. “mantle” or “cloak”) would be enough for one to be asked to lead the clan, which implies that leadership requires some kind of insignia of authority, in this case a mantle. This idea is fully developed in the removal of the finery of the women (lit. “daughters”) of Zion in vv. 16–23.

3:8–15. Oppression of the Poor. The reference to the stumbling and falling of Jerusalem and Judah summarizes the effect of the judgment and describes the coming disaster as having already taken place. The mention of the look (the noun hakkarah) on their faces (v. 9) is related to an expression using a similar verbal form (nakar, “to regard”) that is used in an idiomatic expression (“to regard faces”), which means to “show partiality” (Deut. 1:17; 16:19; Prov. 24:23–24; 28:21). In this context it could be referring especially to judges making unjust verdicts in return for bribes (cf. Is. 1:23; 5:23). The ruin of Jerusalem and Judah would be the working out of the fundamental law of retribution—the righteous are rewarded and the wicked punished (3:9–11; cf. 1:19–20).

Two legal processes are merged here: the oppression of the poor in the courts by wicked judges and elders and the Lord’s future lawsuit against them, which would restore justice to God’s people (3:13–15; cf. 1:23). In the context of the implied law of retribution, crimes would be punished according to the actions suffered by the victims. The crimes of the wicked judges, princes, and elders included (1) partiality in judgment (vv. 17, 23); (2) false teaching that had mislead the people and caused them to veer from the correct paths (v. 12); (3) gleaning and eating up their vineyards without leaving some produce for the poor (v. 14); (4) keeping the plunder of the poor in their houses; and (5) crushing God’s people (v. 15). The punishment of the judges, princes, and elders stands in proportion to their crimes: loss of the Lord’s support and all supply of sustenance for life (v. 1d), loss of authority and honor as leaders (3:2–7), loss of pride and tokens of honor and dignity (3:16–4:1), and loss of human life, which would make the city desolate (3:25–26).

The first “woe” (v. 9; cf. v. 11a) flows from the description of the indisputable evidence against the wicked (v. 8–9c). The exhortation to tell the righteous (v. 10) stands between two woes against wicked judges. According to Proverbs 24:23–25, the verdict pronounced by judges and elders was central in legal proceedings. Judges were admonished to speak the right verdict, as they are also here. The second “woe” (Is. 3:11) repeats the point of v. 9. In v. 12 the Lord was addressing His people and acting both as prosecutor and defender (cf. vv. 8–9, 14–15). Verse 12 has been understood in different ways. Some suggest that “children” is not the best translation for the Hebrew me’olel and that it should rather be translated as “gleaners” (cf. “graze the vineyard” in v. 14) or “those who inflict or maltreat” (as in Lam. 1:22; 2:20). In this case the basic meaning of the text would be “the oppressors of My people are gleaners/exactors”—oppressors who share nothing with the poor (see Lev. 19:9–10; Deut. 24:18–22; cf. Jer. 6:9). However, if the majority of translators are correct that the meaning is “children,” the text would be conveying the idea that the people were so weak that they were allowing those who were acting like children to oppress them.

The word nashim has also been debated. The LXX takes it to be pointed with different vowels as noshim, which means “usurers, extortioners,” and on this reading it would parallel the first part of the verse according to the first interpretation given above, as well as introduce a topic that is resumed in Isaiah 3:14 (cf. Ex. 22:25; Lev. 25:36–37; Deut. 23:19–20). Based on these observations, Isaiah 3:12 may be translated as “My people’s oppressors are gleaners/exactors, and extortioners rule over them.” It could also be that the MT is correct in regard to the word nashim, which means “women.” In this case, the parallel would be with the second reading mentioned above, in other words, “Children oppress them, and women rule over them.” In this case, the meaning would be that the people of Israel were so weak that they were allowing men who were acting like women and children to oppress and rule them.

The mention of those who were leading the people refers to teachers and counselors who were failing to reproach or warn the people concerning their ways (cf. Prov. 24:25). On the evidence of open wrongdoings and according to the law of retribution (Is. 3:8–12), the Lord was (as it were) rising to plead His case in court and to judge the peoples. The legal proceedings were against the elders and leaders/princes of God’s people (vv. 14–15). The action is literally described as “the Lord will come before the court of justice” (cf. Job 9:32). The elders (cf. Is. 3:2) were local rulers and dignitaries who could also be called leaders/princes (cf. Job 29:8–10). The accusations are summarized in Isaiah 3:8–15: the vineyard in v. 14 is meant to feed the poor, but the elders and princes had “grazed” it, revealing a lack of compassion for the poor by not leaving behind any gleanings of their fruit trees. Such compassionate acts were stipulated in the covenant (Lev. 19:9–10; Deut. 24:18–22; cf. Jer. 6:9). The plunder of the poor (Is. 3:14) had been obtained by usury or extortion (v. 12a) and bribery in the court proceedings (cf. 1:23; 5:8, 23). The verbs “crush” and “grind” have almost the same sense, suggesting an oppression that destroys the poor (cf. Prov. 22:22–23). The latter word, “grind,” is a very strong expression that conveys the idea of afflicting the poor by bribery and the perversion of justice (Is. 1:23; 3:8–15; 5:23).

3:16–23. From Pride to Humiliation. The Lord’s accusation against the women (lit. “daughters”) of Zion (vv. 16–17) is explained (v. 16) and would result in a complete reversal from pride to humiliation (vv. 18–24). The daughters of Zion are often taken to be the women of Jerusalem (as in Song 3:11). Another possibility would be to take the expression as a figurative reference to Jerusalem and the cities of Judah (see Is. 3:26; 4:1, 4). One could take the list of the leading classes in 3:2–3 as corresponding to the list of the daughters’ finery in vv. 18–23, the scene of the people seeking a ruler (vv. 6–7) could parallel the seven women seeking a husband (4:1), and the references to food and clothing in 3:7 and 4:1 both function as the minimum tokens of authority. The combination of “daughters” and the name of a city usually referred to daughter cities. In administrative contexts, the entire territory of Judah contained about 115 cities with their villages under the capital Jerusalem (e.g., Josh. 15:20–63). It could be that the reference here to daughters of Zion refers to the dependent cities, towns, and villages of Zion-Jerusalem in Judah. Obviously, the message was for the leaders.

The list of items in Isaiah 3:18–23 is constituted of insignia of authority for the officials in Jerusalem and Judah (cf. vv. 1–7), luxury items linked to pride and wealth obtained by the abuse of power and the oppression of the poor (cf. vv. 8–15), and magical items, implying crimes against the covenant (cf. 2:6–22). Thus, the leading officials of the cities of Jerusalem and Judah, fittingly symbolized by the finery of the high class ladies of the city (the daughters of Zion), are described as proud, self-seeking, rebellious, and abusing their authority (as already indicated in detail in 2:6–3:15). The accusation in 3:16 implies their figurative behavior as harlots or unfaithful wives (cf. 1:21; Ezek. 16:15–43). The punishment would consist of disgrace and shame in proportion to their crimes (Is. 3:17, 24).

The Hebrew word for finery (tip’eret) in v. 18 does not refer only to women’s adornment but indicates that which brings glory and honor to a person, including dress and ornaments functioning as insignia of office or marking rank (e.g., 28:1, 4–5; 52:1; 62:3; 63:12, 14–15). The meaning of some items in 3:18–23 is uncertain, but a wealth of archaeological material now gives us a better understanding. At least several of the items were exclusively used by women, and others had magical associations: jingling anklets or bangles for protection against evil (v. 18); crescents, in the shape of the waxing or waning moon (v. 18); perfume boxes and amulets in the shape of the sun that were related to the cult of the dead (v. 19); and charms or amulets for religious purposes (v. 20). All can be classified as luxurious tokens of pride, idolatry, or riches unfairly obtained.

3:24—4:1. Lament and Mourning. The leaders’ authority, pride, and beauty would be turned into slavery, shame, and ugliness (3:24), illustrating God’s sovereignty, justice, and righteousness. The historical fulfillment of this prophecy was possibly the Assyrian destruction of forty-six cities in Judah and the siege of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. (see Isaiah: Introduction). The references to stench, rope, baldness, sackcloth, and branding may all be associated with captivity, mourning, and disgrace.

The woman who would sit desolate on the ground while her gates lamented and mourned represents Zion-Jerusalem. Her garb of pride and beauty would be exchanged for the garb of mourning and sorrow (see 61:3). The mourning of the mother city would be caused by the death of her men at war (3:25–26). Such a loss of men in war (v. 25) would result in humiliation and lack of people. Since Zion-Jerusalem would lose her men in war, seven women (4:1) would marry one man with the sole request of being called by his name (i.e., to belong to him). They would dispense with the husband’s customary duty to provide his wife with food and clothing (Ex. 21:10) because their main desire would be to remove their disgrace as desolate (and barren) women (cf. the disgrace of widowhood in Is. 54:4).

4:2–6. The Branch and the People. The climax in the chain of events in that day (2:11—4:6) would be the reward of the faithful remnant, namely, those Israelites who would escape and remain in Jerusalem (4:2–3). The reference to all who were recorded among the living in Jerusalem refers to those who were inscribed on the register of the citizens of Zion (cf. 63:1–66:24). The apostate leaders of 2:6–4:1 were to be replaced by the Branch of the Lord, the promised King (for “Branch” as a messianic term, see 11:1; Jer. 23:5; 33:15; Zech. 3:8; 6:12). His reign would be beautiful and glorious—in contrast to that of the apostates. The marvelous fertility of the soil in the messianic age is a favorite theme in Isaiah (Is. 30:23; 32:1, 16–19). The fertile land would yield fruit and life, and the Branch of the Lord would bring justice, righteousness, and peace.

The summary in 4:2 is explained in more detail in vv. 3–6, with an emphasis on God’s purification of people, land, and city (vv. 3–4) and on His protection of the worshipers against cold, heat, and storms (vv. 5–6). The emphasis in vv. 2–6 is on the holiness to be restored to God’s people and on the anticipated permanent peace and protection of the faithful. It is an appropriate preparation for the fulfillment of the vision of many nations ascending to the temple to walk in permanent peace in the Lord’s paths (2:2–4). The Lord would ultimately accomplish this through the Branch, the Davidic Prince of Peace, whose work would bring hope to the nations.

5:1–12:6

ISRAEL, ZION, AND THE DAVIDIC KING RESTORED

This section of Isaiah explains in more detail the Lord’s plan to establish His universal sovereignty as outlined in chapters 2–4. Chapter 5 contains the vineyard song and its interpretation. The plan of God is set in the context of the commission of the prophet (6:1–13), who announced the coming of Immanuel as a sign (7:1–8:15). The prophet characterizes his family as also being a sign for the people (8:16–9:7). The judgment against Israel is described as a warning to Judah (9:8; 10:4), and the section includes announcements of the defeat of Syria, the coming of the second David, and the restoration of Israel (10:5–12:6).

5:1–30

The Song of the Vineyard

The song itself is found in vv. 1–7; it is followed by woes against the upper classes (vv. 8–23) and judgment by a foreign nation (vv. 24–30).

5:1–7. The Song. The Song of the Beloved is a parable in which the bride, in keeping with ANE customs, is compared to a vineyard. In reality, however, the song is an accusation in the name of a disappointed and betrayed lover. Isaiah speaks, at first, as the friend of the bridegroom who acted as an intermediary in wedding arrangements and who could have presented any complaint on behalf of the bridegroom. From v. 3, Isaiah presents God as calling upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah to recognize His justice and announcing His verdict against them.

Isaiah presents his song on behalf of the one he loved (v. 1), followed by the Lord’s response about His vineyard, whose identity is not revealed until v. 7. The Hebrew preposition le in 5:1 has been variously translated as “to” or “for.” These have some linguistic basis, but “concerning” may better fit the context. Isaiah sings a song concerning the One he loves with regard to His vineyard. The Lord complained that He had done everything possible to receive good grapes, but His vineyard had brought Him only “wild,” “bad,” or “worthless” ones (v. 2). The inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah were being asked to judge between the Lord and His vineyard (v. 3). Since the answer to the Lord’s question was self-evident, He proceeded to the judgment announcement: the protection of the vineyard would be removed (vv. 5–6).

5:8–23. Proclamation of Woes. Isaiah finally and clearly identifies the vineyard as the house of Israel and the people of Judah (v. 7) who had violated the principles of justice and righteousness (cf. 1:10–27; 3:8–15; 5:8–23). The statement of woes follows. The first reproaches the rich for accumulating houses and land while ignoring the coming judgment when many impressive houses would be desolate, and vineyards and fields would yield meager fruit (vv. 8–10). The second woe concerns those who drink wine and dance from early until late (v. 11) while disregarding the Lord’s doing (v. 12; cf. v. 19). The third woe touches on Isaiah’s conflict with the wise teachers (vv. 18–19). They were metaphorically pulling evil with cords of shav’, “deceit,” “dishonesty,” or “falsehood,” which often referred to a false witness (Ex. 23:1; Deut. 5:20; Job 15:31; cf. Ps. 24:4). The parallel metaphor goes even further and refers to their sin as being so massive that a cart rope was needed to pull it.

The rebellious people mocked the Lord and Isaiah’s prophetic ministry by sarcastically implying that there was no reason to believe that the Lord would hasten to fulfill His predictions (i.e., “His work”) or that His purpose could be known.

The fourth woe is directed against those who remove justice and righteousness by distorting the truth (Is. 5:20). The fifth pleads for humility and rebukes those who are wise in their own eyes. This is a common negative assessment in the wisdom circles (e.g., Prov. 3:7; 26:5, 12; 28:11). The last denunciation is directed against judges and elders with minds so affected by intoxicating drinks that they justify the wicked for a bribe and deny justice to the righteous (Is. 5:23; cf. 3:9d–15).

5:24–30. Judgment by a Foreign Nation.

Because of the rejection of Isaiah’s instruction, the Lord’s anger was aroused against His people. He had already struck them with His hand (i.e., power) with disastrous effects, but a still greater disaster was to come (vv. 26–30). The words for the Lord’s anger are metaphorical expressions of His attitude toward sin, injustice, unrighteousness, and pride. They are closely connected with the holiness of God, which is a central concept in Isaiah. The OT uses at least ten different terms for anger, and Isaiah uses eight of these.

The description of an invading army, which the Lord would call as an agent of His punishment from a distant nation, underlines their speed (v. 26), the preparation of the soldiers (v. 27), the efficiency of their weapons (v. 28), and their frightful roaring like young lions (v. 29) when the prey would be taken. It would be like the roaring of the sea (vv. 30; cf. 17:12). The people of Israel would be carried away with nobody to save them (5:29), and there would be darkness and anguish (v. 30). The banner that would be lifted up for the nations would be set up on a hill to call the warriors to assemble either for attack or defense (v. 26; see 11:10).

6:1–13

The Lord’s Plan and Isaiah’s Commission

This chapter reveals the Lord’s plan for apostate Israel and reaffirms Isaiah’s prophetic ministry (PK 307–308). In this intimate dialogue between God and His prophet (cf. Gen. 18:22–33; Amos 3:7) the prophet saw or perceived (Heb. ra’ah) and heard God’s word (Jer. 23:18). According to his commission account, Israel would refuse to be converted (vv. 9–10), and judgment would come. In the end only a holy remnant would emerge (vv. 11–13).

6:1–4. The Lord in His Temple. Isaiah’s commission account is connected with the first king mentioned in 1:1, which states, “in the year that King Uzziah died” (around 736 B.C.). At this time the Assyrian threat under Tiglath-Pileser III was already evident. The scene of the vision was the earthly temple. Isaiah was standing at the entrance to the temple building, perhaps in the vestibule looking into the Holy Place. In the vision the doors to the holy of holies were opened, and he saw the Lord enthroned “between the cherubim” (1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Kin. 19:15; Ps. 80:1; Is. 37:16). The ark of the covenant in the Most Holy Place was probably understood as a throne with golden images of cherubim.

The occasion of Isaiah’s vision may have been the Day of Atonement, when God passed judgment on Israel and atonement was made for their sins, thus cleansing them (Lev. 16:1–34; 23:36–42; Num. 29:7–11). It was the time of the year when God appeared in a cloud above the cover of the ark, often called the “mercy seat,” in the holy of holies (Lev. 16:2). Only the high priest was allowed to go into the holy of holies with the appropriate offerings on behalf of the people. Thus, Isaiah functioned as a priest, perhaps as an assistant of the high priest, who stood in attendance at the entrance to the temple. The Lord’s enthronement in judgment is essential in the context of Isaiah 6:9–13, and the concept of a judgment that purifies Jerusalem and Judah is meaningful in view of 1:21–26 and 3:1–4:6.

The robe is an insignia of the Lord’s royal dignity. He is clothed with honor and majesty and covers Himself with a garment of light (Pss. 93:1; 104:1–2). That the train of His robe filled the temple shows the limitless character of His glory and majesty (cf. 1 Kin. 8:27). The Jerusalem temple was usually called “house” (bayit), but here the word is hekal, which could refer to a “fine building” or “temple.” It was separated from the Most Holy (debir or qodesh qodashim) by a wall with doors of olive wood (1 Kin. 6:31–32). Isaiah saw the Lord sitting on His throne in the Most Holy Place, the train of His robe spilling through the open doors and filling the Holy Place. The Lord’s heavenly council was comprised of a multitude of beings singing His praise and ready to serve Him. The seraphim (Is. 6:2) probably represented all the heavenly beings (1 Kin. 22:19). The seraphim hovered above the Lord’s robe on both sides of the throne, flying with two of their six wings and covering their eyes and feet with the other four as an expression of humility and respect (Is. 6:2; cf. Ezek. 1:11).

The Bible mentions the seraphim only here. Their name and nature are unclear. They are represented as winged human beings with faces, voices, hands, and feet. This makes them entirely different from the winged serpent figures around the throne of Pharaoh, which may have been known at least by name to Isaiah (Is. 14:29; 30:6). Another point of contact with “seraph” is the sarap (lit. “fiery”; contextually translated as “poisonous” or “venomous”), the serpent of bronze that Moses made in the desert (Num. 21:6–9; Deut. 8:15) and that remained in the Jerusalem temple until the time of King Hezekiah (2 Kin. 18:4). Thus, Isaiah possibly knew the term “seraphim” in the sense of “fiery ones with wings” and applied it to heavenly beings that he had not seen before. They were closely connected with the concept of the Lord’s holiness (Is. 6:3), which is central in Isaiah and intimately associated with fire and burning (e.g., 5:16–24; 10:17; 30:27–29).

The threefold proclamation of the Lord’s holiness by the seraphim results in the temple being filled with smoke from the incense altar (v. 4). The reference to the seraphim calling to each other may imply that they were two in number, but the phrase may also have a collective sense. The emphatic threefold repetition of the word “holy” (v. 3) conveys the sense of “most holy,” but it also reflects a fixed formula in the temple cult (Ps. 99:3, 5, 9). The holiness of the Lord of Hosts (or Lord Almighty) means that He is transcendent, powerful, and sovereign beyond what any human can imagine. He is perfectly pure and genuine in His very being.

That the whole earth is full of God’s glory (Is. 6:3) is a central statement in the Lord’s plan for universal sovereignty (cf. 11:9). The Lord’s “glory” is the manifestation of His person, especially of His holiness, light, and majesty. As the train of His robe filled the temple, His glory fills the whole earth. Since His glory represents His presence, it may be said to fill the temple (6:1; cf. Ps. 63:2). It is then depicted as a cloud (1 Kin. 8:10–11; 2 Chr. 5:13–14; cf. Is. 4:5–6; 6:4). Zion-Jerusalem was considered the “center of the land/earth” (Ezek. 38:12). The localized holy presence of God in the temple anticipated the moment when the whole earth would be conquered through His holiness.

6:5–13. The Prophetic Commission. The threefold emphasis on the holiness of the Lord of Hosts, the implied relationship between temple and earth, and the need for a ritual cleansing of human sin (vv. 3–7) are all central concepts linked to the temple. Isaiah exclaimed that he had seen the King, the Lord Almighty (v. 5). After he was purified from sin (vv. 6–7), he dialogued with the Lord and expressed a deep sense of unworthiness and fear (v. 5). Israel’s apostasy and sinfulness had rendered them unclean before God’s holiness. With unclean lips, their prayers for mercy would not be heard (cf. 1:15; Ps. 17:1), but the purification of Isaiah’s lips removed his guilt and sin and enabled him to speak to the Holy One. Human messengers of the Lord are not without sin: He forgives, cleanses, and empowers.

The Lord’s plan had been decided, and He asked whom to send to announce it. Isaiah’s reply indicated his readiness to serve the Lord. His mission was part of the Lord’s plan concerning “this people” (Is. 6:9)—an expression implying contempt and disfavor (8:6, 12; 9:16; 28:11, 14). Israel is described, in proverbial style, as a people who heard and saw but chose not to understand and know because they had rejected the Lord as their God (6:9–10). God’s words in v. 9 allude to 5:12, 19 where Israel is accused of ignoring His counsel and disregarding His work. The Lord’s commission is stated as a command (6:10). The verbal links with the characterization of the people in v. 9 are picked up, but now there is an emphasis on the human organs of hearing, seeing, and understanding. This is arranged as a chiasm: heart, ears, eyes//eyes, ears, heart (v. 10).

The people would not return to God to be healed. There was no longer any mercy for Israel; what remained was judgment. Isaiah’s mission was to continue instructing Israel with warnings and predictions of judgment, but God knew that they would continue to reject Him. The command was not a denial of their freedom of choice but a way of saying that the more Isaiah would plead for conversion, the more they would choose to remain disobedient, and the judgment would therefore no longer be averted. Isaiah’s question “How long?” belongs to the laments of the people (6:11; e.g., Pss. 74:10; 79:5; 89:46; 90:13; 94:3), in the hope that the judgment would not be God’s final work but that in view of His loving-kindness, there was salvation in sight. The question comes from the faithful ones who wait for the Lord and trust/hope in Him (Is. 8:17). These ideas are key themes in the whole book.

The Lord’s answer (6:11–13) described a series of future events for Israel. There would be destruction and deportation (vv. 11–12), comparable to the downfall of the Northern Kingdom of Israel caused by the Assyrians in 722 B.C. The holy seed (cf. 4:2–3; 11:1), which would eventually grow out of the stump or stem of Jesse, would be the remnant in Jerusalem, namely, those who would patiently wait for the Lord. Based on His loving-kindness, the Lord would not completely destroy His people: a restored Israel would be established from the remnant (cf. chaps. 60–62).

7:1—8:15

The Immanuel Sign

A sign from the Lord may (1) impart knowledge (e.g., 19:20), (2) produce faith (e.g., 7:9c, 11–16), (3) confirm a prophet's authority (e.g., 38:7, 22; cf. 2 Kings 20:8–11), or (4) reinforce the message by a symbolic act (e.g., Is. 7:3; 8:1–4, 8, 18; 20:3). It may be a miracle (38:7–8) or an event that fulfills a prediction (55:13). The Immanuel sign is a mixture of these functions. The setting of chapter 9 is the Syro-Ephraimite crisis in 734–732 B.C. (see Isaiah: Introduction). King Ahaz of Judah and his people were stricken with fear due to an imminent attack by Syria and Israel.

7:1–12. Isaiah and the King. God told Isaiah to bring his son Shear-Jashub (meaning “a remnant shall return”) and give a message to the king. He encouraged Ahaz not to fear because the schemes of Syria and Israel would fail. The admonition to not fear was often used to reassure someone in trouble and was intended to alleviate fear (of death) and to strengthen resolve (vv. 8–9). The meaning of the elliptic formulation of vv. 8–9, substantiated in 8:5–10 (cf. 7:4, 8), is that Syria and Ephraim/Israel were at the time intact and their kings secure, but very soon Syria would be ruined and Ephraim diminished, and within sixty-five years Ephraim would be so broken and shattered that it would not be a people. Ephraim/Israel was destroyed by a massive Assyrian deportation in 722 B.C., but the prophecy of ceasing to be a people was fulfilled when Esarhaddon (680–669 B.C.) repopulated Israel and Samaria with many foreign colonists (Ezra 4:2; cf. 2 Kin. 17:24–41).

Ahaz was warned that if he did not firmly trust in God's promises, he would not be established (Is. 7:9). This concluding message to Ahaz implied that Judah, too, would be broken unless he and his house trusted the Lord (cf. 10:20; 26:3–4; 30:15–18; 31:1). There is a Hebrew wordplay in 7:9. The Lord told Ahaz that if he did not 'aman, the hiphil form of the verb, meaning to “believe” or “trust,” he would not 'aman, the niphal of the same verb, meaning “to stand,” “be confirmed,” or “be established.” Faith in the Lord, which implies trusting and relying on Him, is all that He requires from His people. Ahaz failed to trust the Lord and contacted the Assyrians with a request for help against the Syro-Ephraimite coalition, resulting in foreign cult practices in Judah and disastrous consequences resulting from the Assyrian “protection” (2 Kin. 16:10–18).

The Lord invited Ahaz to ask for a sign—from the depths or the heights (7:11). It would be miraculous because it would affect anything in the realm of creation. It would produce faith (v. 9), and it would confirm that the Lord's promise of salvation would be fulfilled (vv. 3–9). But Ahaz refused the offer (v. 12). His pretentiously pious reason, that he did not want to test the Lord, followed the covenant principle in Deuteronomy 6:16, but in reality he had already decided to rely on the power of Assyria. Isaiah then reproached the house of David (Is. 7:13), which implies that the disobedience of the Davidic kings to the Lord was a major reason for the Assyrian judgment. God promised David that He would establish his house forever (2 Sam. 7:11–16). It was founded on the Lord being “with” David (2 Sam. 7:3, 9). This implied God's protection of David and peace for Israel (2 Sam. 7:9–10). The relationship between the Lord and the Davidic king was defined as a father-son relationship (2 Sam. 7:14). This Davidic covenant also contained the idea of mercy in the context of judgment (2 Sam. 7:14–15). This covenant is implied in the sign of Immanuel: 'im (“with”) and 'anu (“us”) and 'el (“God”; Is. 7:14–16).

7:13–25. Promise of Immanuel. The translation “the virgin” is based on the LXX (cf. Matt. 1:23), but the Hebrew 'almah designates a young woman of marriageable age. To mean “virgin,” Hebrew uses the word betulah. However, 'almah is flexible in meaning and can refer to a virgin. It is usually suggested that 'almah probably referred to the unknown mother of Immanuel in the time of Ahaz. The NT would identify the fulfillment of this prophecy with the miraculous birth of Jesus, the true Immanuel (Matt. 1:25).

Immanuel means “with us God” and alludes to the ideological foundation of the house of David (2 Sam. 7:3, 9). Immanuel implies the Lord's presence, blessing, and protection and functions as a guarantee of peace. Even if God chastised the Davidic kings with the rod, His mercy would not depart from them. But the sign would not function without the king's faith in God. It is connected to the Davidic, messianic Prince of Peace in Isaiah 9:6–7 and to the righteous Branch of the stem/stump of Jesse in 11:1–10 (cf. 4:2).

The simple diet of curds and honey would be eaten in times of hardship by those remaining in the land (7:22), implying survival in humble conditions. Like the “stump” or “stem” in 11:1, the diet figuratively describes the lowly state to which the house of David would be reduced as a result of Ahaz’s disobedience.

Before the age of knowing to refuse evil and choose good, the child would eat curds and honey. This refers to the time when the Assyrians would turn Judah into briars and thorns (7:18–25). However, Syria and Israel would fall before that time (vv. 1–9; 8:1–10). Thus, Isaiah drew a timeline: (1) his crisis at the time of writing (7:1–9; in 734–733 B.C.); (2) the Assyrian punishment of rebellious Syria and Israel, as the Lord predicted (v. 16b; in 732 B.C.); and (3) an Assyrian invasion of Judah, which would humiliate the house of David but not completely destroy the country (vv. 10–25; in 701 B.C.; cf. 6:11–13).

Ahaz’s rejection of the Immanuel sign would have disastrous consequences over a long time. The Lord would bring the king of Assyria upon Ahaz, his people, and his family (v. 17). Ahaz’s subjection of Judah to Assyrian protection brought the Assyrian army into Judah, resulting in the subjugation of Jerusalem to Assyrian overlords. Isaiah states that this would bring back the days when Ephraim departed from Judah, which resulted in the Davidic dynasty suffering a significant loss of land and people. Assyria and Egypt would be called upon to execute judgment against Judah (vv. 18–20). The mention of all those who would be left in the land refers to a remnant after death and deportation, when the available food would be curds and honey. This is a figurative reference to the humble circumstances of Judah and the Davidic dynasty in the future as a consequence of Ahaz’s rejection of the Immanuel sign. God commanded Isaiah to write Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz on a scroll. The name literally means “speed, spoil, hasten, plunder” or “quick to the plunder, swift to the spoil.” The Hebrew word gillayon can mean “scroll” or “tablet” (of wood, stone, or leather). The reference to the kheret ‘enosh, literally meaning “human engraving tool,” presumably meant writing in a script that was legible to the people (cf. Hab. 2:2). That it was to be a large scroll or tablet may mean that it was fixed in a public place where it could be seen by all or that the text was extensive. Isaiah took faithful, reliable witnesses (Is. 7:2) to prove the authority and time of the prediction (cf. comments on 8:16). Notice that Isaiah’s wife was a “prophetess” (nebi’ah). It was not a practice in ancient Israel to refer to a wife by the profession of her husband. No other biblical prophet named his wife “prophetess.” Thus, Isaiah’s wife was likely an active prophetess. The name Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz means that the wealth of Damascus and the plunder of Samaria would be taken by the king of Assyria, confirming the prophecy in 7:3–9.

8:1–15. Assyria Captures Israel and Judah.

The prediction of Assyria’s capture of Syria and Israel in v. 4 continues in vv. 6–10, but with Syria replaced by Judah, making Israel and Judah the targets of the Assyrian attack. Two contrasting metaphors relating to “water” are used: the gentle, flowing waters of Shiloah (i.e., the Davidic dynasty under the Lord’s protection of Zion) are contrasted with the torrents of the Euphrates (lit. “the River”)—the king of Assyria in all his splendor (vv. 6–7). Isaiah quotes the Lord saying that because “this people” (i.e., the Northern Kingdom of Israel) had refused the waters of Shiloah and had instead rejoiced in Rezin and Remaliah’s son, the Lord would bring the king of Assyria against them.

Assyria would first capture Israel (8:4; 2 Kin. 15:29; 17:5–6), but would then pass through Judah and overwhelm it (Is. 8:8). Here the Lord addressed Immanuel and said that the outstretched wings of the king of Assyria would cover the whole land. This is a way of saying that although Assyria would overwhelm Judah, Jerusalem would be spared because Immanuel was the Lord’s sign confirming His faithfulness to His covenant with David. The prediction may, therefore, concern Sennacherib’s destruction of Judah in 701 B.C., when the Lord spared Jerusalem and the Davidic king (cf. 1:4–9). The judgment against Judah turns here to salvation (8:9–10), for the Lord issued orders against the aggressors, and the people could say, “God is with us”—Immanuel. The Lord instructed Isaiah concerning “this people,” including both Israel and Judah (vv. 11–15). As confirmed by the sign of Immanuel, the faithful needed to hold on to the Lord (v. 13). He would be a sanctuary or holy place (i.e., a refuge and place of rest) for the faithful but a stone of stumbling for the apostates (vv. 14–15).

8:16—9:7

Isaiah’s Family: A Sign

In this section, Isaiah’s predictions concerning the defeat of Syria and Israel were confirmed (cf. 7:1—8:15). The dark aftermath for Israel and Judah (8:21—9:1) would be changed by the messianic Prince of Peace (9:2–7).

8:16—9:1. Law and Testimony. The “testimony” and the “law” (or instruction) have been taken by some as two words expressing one thought, which in this case is another way of designating the word of God written on a large scroll or tablet (8:1–2) containing the Lord’s judgment against Syria and Israel (v. 4). But their use in v. 20 indicates that we are dealing with two different things. The “law” refers to the written revelation of God and the “testimony” to the prophetic word as the standard by which falsehood is distinguished from truth. In Isaiah, the Hebrew word torah often means not only the “law” but especially “instruction,” which is at times in parallel with the “word of the Lord” (1:10; 2:3; 5:24; 8:16, 20; 30:9; 51:4, 7). But it can also refer to God’s law as preserved in the Pentateuch (5:24; 24:5). The sign of the testimony and the law indicates that God’s word, both in His law and in the prophetic voice, is true, and yet Israel and Judah rejected both.

Literally, a “sealed” scroll was one that had been signed and witnessed legally. Metaphorically, however, it was “sealed” in the sense that its content was inviolable and to be preserved. What the people rejected—the law and the testimony—was as valid as if it had been sealed. It was also to be “sealed” or “preserved” in the sense that it was to be written in the heart of the “disciples”—those who accepted and practiced the law and the testimony (see Prov. 3:3; 6:20–21; 7:2–3; cf. 2 Cor. 3:2). In the case of Isaiah, the sealing of the testimony could refer to the validity of his prophecy that had been proven true by real events, thus confirming the reliability of God’s word through him. The Hebrew verbs usually translated as “bind up” and “seal” could also be translated as “the testimony is bound up, and the instruction is sealed.” The phrase “among my disciples” would then keep its literal sense “in my disciples.” The house of Jacob was already under judgment (Is. 8:17). Isaiah continued to wait for the Lord and hope in Him, expecting the promise of salvation through Immanuel to be fulfilled. He would totally depend on God’s revealed will.

Isaiah affirms the Lord’s call (cf. 6:8). He speaks of his literal children, for children as “a gift of God” had deep roots in ancient Israel (Pss. 113:9; 127:3–5; 128:1–6; 144:12). Isaiah and his children were God’s signs and wonders (or symbols) for Israel. They, and their names in particular, were evidence that God was still active within His people to move them to believe in Him.

The tragic fate of Israel served as a warning to Judah (Is. 8:19—9:1). Ahaz thought he could save his kingdom by seeking help from the Assyrian overlords, but as a result of his lack of faith in God, Judah would suffer the same fate as Israel. The law and the testimony (8:16) and the children of Isaiah (v. 18) invited the people to seek God and reject deception. But instead of listening to the written law of God and to the prophetic word, some of the people were asking mediums and wizards/spiritists for help (Deut. 18:9–14; 1 Kin. 22:5). Verse 20 contains an important hermeneutical principle: the law and the prophets are to be used to establish what is from the Lord and what is not (cf. Matt. 5:17). “They” refers to any false counselor who led the people away from their God and His word. The rejection of God’s revelation would leave them in total darkness (Is. 8:21–22).

In v. 21, “they” refers to the people of v. 19 who were not seeking the Lord for help. Afflicted by hunger and oppression, the people would be enraged, cursing their king and their God (v. 21c). In desperation the people would look upward and to the earth (i.e., everywhere; v. 22a) for help, but they would be disappointed. However, there is something better (9:1a): the condition of the land would change because the state of darkness would not be permanent.

Although 9:1b is difficult, the general meaning is quite clear. There is a contrast between the former condition of the land on account of the sin of the people and what God would do to it in the future. The “land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali” are the Israelite names for northern Israel, while the second set of names refers to the three provinces that the Assyrians created when Tiglath-Pileser annexed northern Israel in 732 B.C.: “the way of the sea” refers to Dulru (Dor), the land “beyond the Jordan” to Gal’azu (Gilead), and “Galilee of the Gentiles” or “nations” to Magidu (Megiddo). Thus, the two enumerations refer to the same areas of land but with Israelite and Assyrian names—one refers to the time before the Syro-Ephraimite war, and the other to the time thereafter.

9:2–7. Prince of Peace. In the future the Lord would bring the Davidic Prince of Peace, Immanuel, to the land to reunite the two houses of Israel. The promise of Immanuel (7:14–16; 8:8–10) reaches its climax in the promise of the Davidic Prince (9:2–7; see Matt. 4:12–16). The light of the Lord’s salvation would replace the darkness (9:2) of the Assyrian occupations, which resulted from the people abandoning the Lord (8:21—9:1) by following the instructions of mediums and wizards/spiritists (8:19–20). However, the Lord's future plan was to break the yoke of the people's burden, the staff or bar on their shoulder, and the rod of their oppressor (9:4; cf. 10:24–27) and bring war to an end (9:5; cf. 2:4). The "great light" (9:2) is a symbol of life, joy, and salvation (cf. 42:6; 49:6; Num. 6:24–26; Job 3:20; Ps. 36:9). They rejoice because God would be victorious over the oppressor, grant them everlasting peace (vv. 3–5), increase the nation (v. 3), and give it a secure future (note the contrast between the joy of harvest in v. 3 and the hunger and curses in 8:21). But more specifically, the joy derives from the announced birth of a Davidic Prince and Savior (9:6–7).

The passage in vv. 6–7 is an announcement of the birth of a unique child who would be officially elevated to the status of Crown Prince and proclaimed as the future Ruler. He would rule with just judgment and righteousness on the throne of David and over his kingdom (v. 7). War and strife would be no more, for He would end oppression from without and injustice from within (cf. 2:2–4; 4:2; 29:18–20; 30:20–22; 32:16). The statement that the government would be upon the King's shoulder alludes to the symbol of a scepter borne on the shoulder (cf. staff and rod/bar in 9:4; and cf. 14:5; Gen. 49:10; Ps. 110:2; Ezek. 19:14) as sign of power (Num. 24:17; cf. Ps. 125:3). It is contrasted with the oppressive shoulder yoke and staff mentioned in Isaiah 9:4 and indicates a shift from the oppressors to the Davidic Prince. In Israel the scepter implied that the king was a "son" of God—he was a vassal of the Divine Overlord (cf. 2 Sam. 7:14)—suggesting a very intimate relationship between the Lord and His earthly representative, the king. However, the list of names found in Isaiah 9:6 was never applied to the kings of God's people. We are dealing here with a unique king. The first two names concern the King's attributes, the second pair the character of His rule. The two words "wonderful" and "counselor" are one component (lit. "wonder of a counselor"). Counselor applies to a Ruler who, like the Lord, plans wonderful and amazing things (cf. 28:29).

"Mighty God" ('el gibbor; 9:6) could literally be translated "God of a Warrior," "God is a Warrior," or "Warrior God." Although this name does not by itself demonstrate that this messianic king is divine, in light of 10:21 we can claim that He is divine. There the title "Mighty God" ('el gibbor) is used to identify God. This qualification enables the King to overcome all enemies (cf. 11:1–10). The Child is revealed as both divine and human (the Mighty God born of a woman).

Everlasting Father ('abi'ad) literally means "Father of Eternity." Although the dynasty and kingdom of a faithful king were thought to continue forever (2 Sam. 7:16; Pss. 21:1–4; 72:5, 17; 132:11–14), no king in Israel was called by this name. The reference to the messianic "son" as also being the "eternal Father" is not a confusion of the persons of the Trinity. The language of fatherhood could be applied to the Messiah because He brought His people into existence, redeemed them, and has treated them as a loving father would, with care and mercy (cf. Is. 22:21; John 1:1–3; 1 John 2:29). The passage also bears witness to the fact that the Messiah has always been—He is eternal.

The "Prince of Peace" (sar shalom) is a surprising title in the context of titles that imply the power of this King. This new name shows that His power expresses itself in peace. He protects and safeguards peace by His wisdom, justice, and righteousness (cf. Is. 11:1–3; Ps. 72:3, 7). Isaiah's prediction of a royal Savior in Isaiah 9:6–7 remained unfulfilled until the coming of Jesus of Nazareth. He is called the Light (John 1:4–9), and His coming to Capernaum in Galilee, in the regions of Zebulun and Naphtali, in order to preach the imminence of the kingdom of God, was a literal fulfillment of Isaiah 9:1–2 (Matt. 4:12–17).

9:8—10:4

Israel's Chastisement: A Warning to Judah

This passage adds further background to the judgments against Israel and Judah (cf. 5:1–30; 7:17–25; 8:1–10), a review of past cases, and a warning to Judah.

The first case under review is that of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. It had been punished because of its "pride and arrogance of heart." The "heart" in Hebrew was the seat of the will and intentions, where decisions were made and the word of God was heard (i.e., understood and obeyed). A proud and arrogant heart (6:10) is often associated with idol worship (cf. 2:6–22; 3:16–23). As a whole, the proverbial saying in 9:10 expresses the pride that led to Israel's secession in the tenth century B.C. (cf. 7:17; 1 Kin. 12). References to building refer metaphorically to the people. Bricks of clay and beams of sycamore (Is. 9:10) were used by people in general, whereas hewn stones and cedar wood were used by the upper classes for palaces. The refrain in v. 12 applies the lesson of history to Judah: God's anger had not been appeased, and more disasters were to come (cf. 5:25). "For all this" summarizes the people's crime and the punishment resulting from the Lord's anger, yet His anger was still not turned away.

The second case concerns false rulers and teachers (9:15–17). The consequences for Israel and Judah would be the suffering of the innocent and great loss of life. If all Israel would have turned back to the Lord (v. 13; cf. 8:19–20), His anger would have been turned away (9:17). But since they rejected Him (v. 13), He would cut off both head and tail in Israel in one day (v. 14). In the metaphor, the head (v. 15; cf. 19:15; Deut. 28:13, 44) refers to the elders and honorable dignitaries (i.e., the political rulers), and the tail signifies the prophets who were teaching lies, in other words, the religious teachers (9:15). As representatives of two extremes, they signified totality (cf. 3:1–3). The rulers led the people astray (9:16; cf. 3:12), and every one of them was profane and evil (9:17).

The third case under review is about evil that destroys fraternal bonds and breeds its own punishment (vv. 18–20; cf. 3:9–11). The metaphor of wickedness as a consumer of the briars, thorns, and forest thickets (i.e., the apostates themselves; cf. 5:6) is explained in 9:18–19. The people's wickedness had elicited the Lord's wrath, leading to the Assyrian invasions that burned up the land and the people. The invasions would cause social chaos and civil strife (9:19d–20d). People would not spare each other, and there would be tribal warfare between the tribes of Israel (vv. 20–21). To eat the flesh of someone is a figure of speech for a bitter hostility toward them (Ps. 27:2; cf. Job 19:22). The historical background for Isaiah 9:21 was the ongoing power struggle between Manasseh and Ephraim. Roughly between 750 and 722 B.C., the struggle for the throne was mainly between these two tribes. In the Syro-Ephraimite war, Ephraim and Manasseh turned against Judah (2 Kin. 15:37; Is. 7:1–8:15). In summary, Isaiah 9:18–21 warns that if Judah were to continue in apostasy, the same fate that befell Israel would fall on Judah.

The fourth case addresses the royal officials of Judah, holding them accountable for the past and present conditions (10:1–4). Isaiah speaks regarding enactors of evil statutes and oppressive laws, who have the authority to produce documents that legalize their social injustices. The protection of the rights of the poor, the needy, widows, and orphans was the special responsibility of the king (e.g., Ps. 72:1–4; Prov. 29:14). Compliance with this responsibility revealed the king's willingness to be loyal to the Lord. The crimes mentioned (Is. 1:17, 23; 3:14–15) elicited God's anger and judgment (10:3–4; cf. 9:17). Three rhetorical questions in 10:3 describe the judgment. For the refrain in v. 4, see 9:12.

10:5—12:6

Assyria Defeated, a Second David, and Israel

Within the frame of God's plan for Zion, He had chastised and cleansed His people through Assyria's invasions (5:1–10:4), but now He would restore His universal kingdom through a remnant of Israel and a righteous Davidic King (10:5—12:6).

10:5–19. Assyria Is Judged. The Lord chose Assyria as His agent to chastise Israel, but the woe had become directed against Assyria because of its arrogance. Isaiah quotes the Lord's decision to commission the king of Assyria as His instrument. Assyria's task was to remove Israel's pride in material goods and to humble them. But the Assyrian king distorted his task and, instead of chastising and purifying Israel, sought to destroy nations as he strove for power (vv. 7–14). God rejected the imperial goals of the Assyrian king, accusing him of excessive destruction, robbery, arrogance, and claiming world power for himself.

The king expressed arrogance in two ways. First, it was his plan to destroy Jerusalem as he had destroyed Samaria, but this was not God's intention (vv. 8–12). Second, through his arrogance and claim to world power, the Assyrian king (vv. 13–14) challenged the Lord's sovereignty. In all his self-praise in vv. 7–14, the Assyrian king never mentioned the Lord. The Lord's announcement of the punishment of Assyria opens with a set of four metaphors (v. 15). The ax, saw, rod, and staff/club are merely instruments in the hands of power. Some of these metaphors may be related to the royal insignia of rod and staff/club (v. 5), implying that Assyria's royal power was granted by God, who alone sets kings and removes them.

Another set of metaphors occurs in vv. 16–19. First, the Lord would send emaciation on the well-fed people (i.e., the people of Assyria would lack food, and the well-grown vegetation of the land would fade away; v. 16). Second, under his (the king's) glory/pomp the Lord would literally "burn a burning like burning of fire.” The Light of Israel and his Holy One are terms for the Lord Himself. The fire would burn and destroy Assyria’s thorns and briars in one day, as a retribution for what Assyria had done to Israel (9:18–19). The Lord would avenge His people.

10:20–34. The Remnant of Israel. Assyria at this point stands as a symbol of the fall of God’s enemies, and the prophecy moves from the time of Assyria to the coming of the Messiah and the final restoration of the earth. The first consequence of the fall of Assyria—representing the fall of God’s enemies—is that a remnant of Israel would be converted (vv. 20–22) when God inflicted His punishment upon Israel (vv. 23–27). The people in Zion were encouraged not to fear Assyria (v. 24). Although it would strike Israel as God’s rod and staff/club (cf. vv. 5–6), God’s wrath would eventually turn against Assyria (v. 25). He would save His people through signs and wonders as He had done when He destroyed Midian and delivered His people from Egypt (v. 26).

The second consequence of Assyria’s fall would be the replacement of the proud human king by a righteous Davidic King (10:27–11:10). Assyria stands for the fall of the kingdoms of the earth at the coming of the Messiah. The destruction of Assyria’s yoke (10:27) and the Lord’s humbling of proud, mighty Assyria (vv. 33–34) frame the central passage on the arrogance and threat of the Assyrian king (vv. 28–32). The phrase mipne shamen (lit. “because”/“before”/“by the face of the oil”/“fat”) has been understood in various ways. Some take it to refer to the shemen, “fat” or “oil” (i.e., “fertile,” “fruitful,” “plenteous”; cf. 5:1; 25:6; 28:1, 4, where the same Hebrew word is used) which indicated the prideful wealth of Assyria. Others understand it as a reference to the anointed king—Hezekiah or David (for whose sake God would defeat Assyria [37:35]), and by extension the Messiah (Heb. the “anointed One”), who was associated with the breaking of the yoke in 9:4–7. The focus is on the destruction of the yoke itself, Assyria, which stands for all of God’s enemies.

During his western campaign of 720 B.C., Sargon moved quickly south to deal with the Egyptians, who supported the rebellious Philistine city of Gaza (10:28–34). By marching by Jerusalem, he intended to discourage Judah from joining the rebellious states. However, Sargon would shake his fist against Jerusalem (v. 32). This would be an act of blasphemy against the Lord comparable to the later threat by Sennacherib in 701 B.C. Jerusalem survived on both occasions. The predicted punishment of the Assyrian king and his people is recorded in vv. 33–34.

11:1–16. The Stem of Jesse. Isaiah’s announcement of a Davidic King follows rather abruptly after the account of the downfall of the Assyrian king (10:33–34), which might suggest the downfall of Assyria as a microcosm of the fall of all of God’s enemies. Chapter 11:1–10 resumes and elaborates the announced coming Savior as the “Branch of the LORD” (4:2), the sign of Immanuel (7:10–16; 8:5–10), and the Davidic Prince (9:2–7). The stem of Jesse refers to the father of David (1 Sam. 16:1). The future Davidic King would not be subordinated to David but would be, in typological terms, a second David (cf. Is. 9:7; 16:5; Jer. 23:5–6; 30:9; Ezek. 34:23–24; 37:24–25). The point of the image is that the royal Savior would come from humble beginnings after the disappearance of the royal house in Jerusalem (cf. Is. 39:5–7), just as it happened with Jesus of Nazareth.

“The Spirit of the LORD” (11:2) equipped leaders with divine power (e.g., Judg. 6:34; 1 Sam. 11:6), wisdom, and knowledge (Ex. 31:1–5; Is. 42:1–4; 59:21; 61:1–3; 63:10–14). Three pairs of words describe the gifts of the Spirit bestowed on the ideal messianic King (11:2): (1) wisdom and understanding refer to His judicial office (cf. vv. 3–4); (2) counsel and might refer to His role as a military leader (cf. vv. 4–5); and (3) knowledge and fear of the Lord indicate His relationship with the Lord (cf. vv. 6–9). He would delight in the fear of the Lord (v. 3), which would be necessary for making righteous judgments (v. 4). His attributes and divine values of righteousness and faithfulness are pictured as His military armor (cf. 59:17; Eph. 6:14). This description of peace among the inhabitants of Zion would impact the nations of the earth: they would come to have knowledge of the Lord (Is. 11:9). The rule of the promised messianic King would be established on “the fear of the LORD” (v. 3a) and “the knowledge of the LORD” (v. 9b). This would certainly be the ultimate result of the work of Christ.

The third consequence of Assyria’s fall (see 10:20) would be the future recognition of the Davidic King and Savior by the nations (11:10). The peaceful reign of the coming King, with righteousness, faithfulness, and justice, would bring the nations to Him (v. 10). Verse 10 can be literally translated “A Root of Jesse who is standing as a banner of the peoples—to him will the nations turn” (see John 12:32). The “banner” or “standard” was a sign indicating a point of assembly in a military setting. The peoples’ attention would be drawn to the Davidic King by His ethical attributes (v. 2), quality of government (vv. 3–5), and the peace of His reign. Finally, the earth would be full of the knowledge of the Lord (vv. 6–9). The implication is that this King, identified in the NT as Jesus Christ, would not depend on military might, executive power, or material glory.

The Gentiles would seek Him (v. 10). The act of the nations would be a religious activity. They would turn to the Davidic King (gather around Him), the Savior and Lord, to obtain His teaching and blessings (cf. 2:2–4). The “resting place” is associated in the ANE with the temples that functioned as the resting places of the gods. Similarly, the Jerusalem temple is portrayed as God’s resting place in Isaiah (18:4; 66:1; cf. 28:12; 30:15; 32:18; Ps. 132:14).

The fourth consequence of Assyria’s fall (see Is. 10:22) would be the future restoration of Israel under the messianic King (11:11–16). As the Lord had once delivered Israel from Egypt (vv. 15–16), He would now also save the remnant of His people (cf. 43:3–7, 16–21; 48:21). The countries listed in 11:11 reflect the idea of “the four sections of the earth” (v. 12; cf. 43:5; 49:12). The “banner” (11:12) has been identified as the messianic King (v. 10). The “nations” either include the remnant of the Lord’s people from foreign lands or those who would be summoned to escort or bring the exiles back to Israel and Judah (cf. 49:22; 60:9; 66:18–21). The background for 11:13–14 seems to be the schism and secession of Israel from Judah, which was a severe blow to the Davidic dynasty. In 7:17 it is suggested that the split was mainly blamed on Ephraim’s envy, which made them hostile to Judah. As the tribes of all Israel reunited, their archenemies would be subdued by the glory of the messianic kingdom.

The concluding passage describes the future return from exile as a new exodus from Egypt (11:15–16; cf. 42:15–17). The first part of v. 15 alludes to the Red Sea, where it is called (lit.) the “tongue” (i.e., the gulf) of the sea of Egypt, which the Lord miraculously parted so that the Israelites could cross (Ex. 14). Here it is a symbol of the power that God would display during the new exodus. The expression “seven streams” may refer to passageways through the river that God’s wind, ‘ayam, variously translated as “mighty,” “scorching,” “powerful,” or literally “glowing,” would make for the returning remnant (cf. Ex. 14:22, 29).

12:1–6. Hymn of Praise. The downfall of God’s enemies would move the remnant to sing a hymn of praise to God (vv. 1–6), a hymn serving as a conclusion to chapters 2–12. The reference to what they would say on “that day” is repeated in v. 4 to introduce another hymn of praise (cf. 11:10–11). The hymn opens with words that reflect the faithful attitude of the speaker. It consists of thanksgiving, prayer, confession, and affirmation of salvation (cf. Pss. 6:9; 22:19–24; 56:13). God’s last word is not of anger, and consequently the petitioners would testify of God comforting them. There is no complaint against the Lord, only faith and thankfulness. Isaiah’s text contains a message of comfort, telling them that they would “draw water from the wells of salvation” (Is. 12:3), that is, there would come a day when they would experience God’s salvation and draw the water of life with joy from the wells of salvation. Indeed, the messianic King, Jesus, is the water of salvation (John 4:13–14).

The second hymn of praise (Is. 12:4–6) announces that “in that day” the redeemed would burst into collective praises to the Lord for His acts. The Lord’s wonders for His people would be made known to the nations so that they would turn to the “Root of Jesse” (11:10) and to the word of the Lord and His law/instruction (2:2–4). The vision of the coming messianic kingdom of peace is saturated with a hope that has sustained and continues to sustain God’s people in the midst of the unrest of the nations of the earth.

13:1—23:18

PREPARATION OF THE NATIONS FOR THE LORD’S KINGDOM

This block of prophecies against twelve nations (13:1—23:18) describes the future removal of those opposed to God’s sovereignty and prepares the readers for the establishment of the Lord’s reign as the King of the world in 24:1—27:13.

13:1—14:27

Utterance Concerning Babylon

The superscription mentions only “Babylon,” but the utterance itself concerns Babylon and Assyria (13:19; 14:4, 22, 25) because the Assyrian emperor had dual kingship (see Isaiah: Introduction).

13:1–5. Preparation for Battle. The Hebrew massa has been variously translated as “burden,” “prophecy,” or “oracle.” It could also mean something like “utterance” (as in Prov. 30:1; 31:1; cf. Is. 14:4). Babylon is placed first in chapters 13–23 because it is the primary representative of the evil, wickedness, iniquity, arrogance, and pride of the earth, which the Lord would punish on the day of His wrath. Assyria was also “Babylon” in the sense that it relied on Babylon’s enormous prestige and power, its unique and leading role in religion, and its learning and culture. The Assyrian kings were kings of both Ashur and Babel.

“Babylon” is associated in Isaiah with human arrogance and rebellion against God (13:1–14:23; 47:7–8; cf. Gen. 11:1–9) and with divination, sorcery, astrology, and idolatry (Is. 21:9; 47:9, 12–13; cf. 41:21–29). Babylon was widely thought to be the “gate of God.” In the Lord’s plan for world sovereignty, therefore, the removal of Babylon was of first importance. God commands the army leaders to summon their warriors using a banner, a vocal summons, and a gesture. The Lord musters the troops, formed by soldiers from far away countries, that will attack Babylon. They are the weapons of God’s wrath to destroy all the land (13:5).

13:6–22. The Day of the Lord for Babylon. The fall of Babylon is described using the images and language of the Day of the Lord. What the Lord would do to Babylon would cause upheavals of cosmic dimensions, and there is accordingly an eschatological flavor to the prophecy. The people were commanded to wail for the coming of the Day of the Lord, which would bring destruction, fear, pain, and sorrow. The Lord’s holy anger would destroy His enemies. It would be a cruel day of wrath, and it would create great commotion, for it would desolate the land and destroy the sinners in it (v. 9). The cosmic order would also be upset when the cosmic lights would go dark and leave the land in obscurity (v. 10). The Lord would punish the world and human evil and arrogance (v. 11).

The massive military attack would almost exterminate humans from the land. The reference to fine or pure gold illustrates precious value. Only a few human survivors would be left in the land—and they would be rarer than precious gold (v. 12). The prophet returns to the cosmic upheaval that would shake the heavens and the earth, giving to the prophecy a universal perspective that would reach beyond the experience of Babylon to the time when God would overcome all His enemies. The war against Babylon would include the extermination of men, women, children, and houses (vv. 14–16).

Finally, the prophet identifies the enemy that would destroy Babylon: the Medes. There would be no way to escape the Medes because they would reject gold as a ransom for human life (v. 17). They would mercilessly kill the young, the unborn, and children. They would reduce Babylon to the condition of Sodom and Gomorrah. The city and its land would be desolated, and never again would it be inhabited; it would become a wild land (vv. 20–22).

14:1–4. Mercy for Jacob. Right in the middle of the message against Assyria-Babylon we find a message of comfort for Jacob. God would have mercy on Jacob, choose Israel again, and settle them in their own land (v. 1). Amazingly, foreigners would join them and become attached to the “house” (or descendants) of Jacob. The name “Israel” implies a reunited Israel as in the times of David (cf. 11:11–16) that would also include the nations turning to the Lord (e.g., 2:2–4; 11:10; 49:8; 54:5; 55:5; 56:6–8). The nations would help in the Lord’s mission of gathering the dispersed Israelites back to the promised land (cf. 11:10, 12; 49:22; 56:6–8; 60:1–16; 66:19–24).

But there would be a role reversal: they would make captives of those who had held them in captivity (14:1–2). And finally, Israel would be guaranteed peace and well-being, and the nations would join them in worshiping the Lord (cf. 56:6–8). Then they would all enjoy rest from their pain, sorrow, turmoil, and hard labor (14:3), which was caused by being separated from the promised land, and would worship the Lord in His dwelling place in Zion-Jerusalem.

14:4–11. Taunt Song and Babylon. This taunt song illustrates the disastrous fate of the wicked (cf. Job 15:20–35; 20:4–29; Pss. 7:14–16; 37:1–40). Specific details may be connected historically with Sargon II (14:8, 18–20), who was both king of Assyria and king of Babylon. The term marshal, which is sometimes translated as “proverb,” refers here to a taunt song. After finding rest (vv. 1–4), Israel would look back at the past pride and death of the king of Assyria-Babylon to deride it. The dirge accuses the dead tyrant of wickedness and tauntingly pictures his punishment (vv. 5–6). The Lord has broken the staff or rod of the wicked and the scepter of the rulers (v. 5; cf. 9:4, 6). The king had ruled peoples and nations in anger (14:6). The last part of v. 6 has been understood in differing ways. Some translations imply that the description is still referring to what the king of Babylon had done in persecuting the nations, others imply that the king was now himself the object of persecution or aggression. This last suggestion is contextually more appropriate. The cypress or juniper trees and the cedars of Lebanon (v. 8) symbolize people, particularly kings and the rich. The whole land (or earth) is at rest and in peaceful quietness when the tyrant is dead (v. 7), but the trees celebrate since the woodsman is no longer coming (cf. the metaphor of trees in 10:17–19, 33–34).

The prophet sarcastically describes how the dead kings of the nations receive the tyrant in Sheol, the realm of the dead (14:9). Sheol is a poetic term used for the tomb, the realm of the dead, but here it is personified. It is astir and excited to meet the dead king, and the repa'im are agitated (v. 9). The term repa'im (perhaps meaning “the fallen ones”) is used in the Bible to designate an ethnic group (Gen. 14:5), a geographical location (Josh. 15:8), and the dead in poetic texts (Is. 26:14, 19; Ps. 88:2). In v. 9, it is often translated as “the dead” or “spirits of the departed” who lack the vitality of life (v. 10). The language of the passage is highly poetical. The trees are personified and rejoice at the death of the king. The grave is also personified and rises up to meet the new dead king and to wake up the dead, the repa'im, to greet him. In an ironic tone they tell the king that he is now one of them, weak and covered by maggots and worms. The language is metaphorical, not literal. The poem is an excellent piece of literature in which a powerful person is mocked by a figurative description of what happens when he reaches the grave. It presupposes that the dead are in the grave in total unconsciousness. It is not describing the shadowy existence of human beings in the tomb. There is much biblical evidence that death is an unconscious, sleep-like state (e.g., 1 Kin. 2:10; Ps. 13:3; Eccl. 9:5; Acts 7:60; 1 Thess. 4:13–18).

The metaphorical description continues as the dead kings of the nations (such as Og, king of Bashan; Deut. 3:11) tauntingly address the tyrant (14:10b–15). In death, he will be as weak as all the other dead kings and his former glory will be gone. Death eliminates social distinctions, and the king is, like all of those in the tomb, covered by maggots. At long last, the enemy of God's people, represented by Assyria-Babylon, comes to his end.

14:12–17. King of Assyria-Babylon and Lucifer. The king lying on maggots is contrasted with his desire to ascend into heaven, elevate his throne above the stars of God, sit enthroned on the mount of assembly (i.e., the heavenly temple), and make himself like the Most High (vv. 13–14). His humiliation is illustrated by the contrast between his desire to reach the heights of the north (zapon) and his final abode in the lowest depths of the pit (vv. 13, 15). The passage uses the language of the origin of evil in heaven through a fallen cherub to describe the human aspirations of the king (embodying the intentions and feelings of the fallen cherub). This angel or cherub became proud and sought to put himself in God's place but was cast down (cf. Ezek. 28:12–19). The book of Revelation expands this theme of the cosmic conflict (Rev. 12:7–9) and identifies the fallen cherub as Satan, the enemy of God and the cause of all evil on earth (17:1–18:24; 19:11–20:10; see Job: Introduction and “Evil and the Fallen Cherub,” p. 1008).

The Hebrew name of the tyrant is helel ben shakhar, which literally means “shining one, son of the dawn,” referring to the morning star, the planet Venus. The name “Lucifer” does not occur in the Hebrew text. It was introduced by the church father Jerome in his translation of the Bible into Latin (i.e., the Vg.) as a name for the morning star, literally meaning “light bearer.” The naming of the tyrant as “the shining one, son of the dawn” mocks his desire to elevate his throne above the “stars of God” (Is. 14:13). It names him after the star known for rising up in the early morning sky, but this is followed by the star's sudden descent without completing its orbit. The OT refers to “morning stars” as “sons of God” or angels (Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7). They belong to the heavenly council (Job 1:6; 2:1; Ps. 82:1), and Satan was prominent among them. Isaiah described the pride of the king of Babylon and his disastrous end in terms of what other biblical passages relate regarding the fall of the cherub who became Satan (see commentary on Ezek. 28:11–19). Isaiah 14:16–17 pictures living beings gazing in unbelieving amazement on the tyrant at his death (in the pit of Sheol), bringing to mind the final destruction of Satan (Rev. 20:10).

14:18–27. Final Fate of the King. The emperor's fate is, however, worse than that of other kings. Each of them rests in glory in his own tomb, literally “house” (v. 18), but the oppressor is thrown out of (Heb. min) his grave—the preposition min indicates that “he was thrown out without his own grave” (i.e., there was no tomb for him). To be unburied was the ultimate fate of the wicked. The tyrant's corpse would not even be buried with the dead warriors because he had destroyed his land and killed his people (i.e., he had betrayed the principles of God's government; v. 20).

The traditional fate of the wicked was that their descendants would never be named (v. 20d; cf. Job 18:16–19; Ps. 37:28, 35–36, 38; Prov. 10:7). The tyrant's children would perish, and no member of his dynasty would rise to inherit the land and populate the world with cities. The mocking dirge for the dead king of Assyria-Babylon is followed by the fall of Babylon (Is. 14:22–23) and Assyria (vv. 24–27). The Lord would eliminate their survivors, their name, and their descendants (v. 22). The city would become desolate and given to porcupines and marshes (cf. 13:17–22).

Isaiah 14:24–27 is a summary-appraisal of 13:1–14:23 that is formed by two parts: the Lord's oath concerning Assyria (14:24–25) and its application to all nations (vv. 26–27). The oath literally says, "I will break 'ashur" (v. 25), which includes the god, city, and nation. God's land and His mountains refer to the promised land (cf. 49:11; 65:9). God would trample Assyria, thereby humiliating them and demonstrating His sovereignty. His ultimate purpose is the removal of Israel's yoke/burden (14:25). God intended the removal of Assyria's yoke to benefit the whole earth and all the nations (v. 26). The Lord delivers His people from the enemy, and this ultimately means the destruction of the enemy.

14:28—16:14

Messages against Philistia and Moab

This section is composed of two messages unveiling the destruction of Philistia (14:28–32) and Moab (15:1–16:14) and the reason for it.

14:28–32. Utterance concerning Philistia.

The Philistines were the traditional enemies of Israel in Canaan. In this brief utterance, Isaiah warned Philistia and gave an assurance of salvation to the remnant of Judah. This particular message is dated to the year when Ahaz died, around 715 B.C. The Lord advised Philistia not to rejoice because of the downfall of Assyria—the rod that struck them. In the arena of international politics, another oppressor, a fiery (or poisonous) flying/darting serpent would follow the first (v. 29). He would besiege Philistia's cities with famine and leave no surviving remnant (v. 30). Therefore, Philistia was summoned to wail because smoke would come from the north, and all Philistia would melt (v. 31). The end of v. 31 has been translated variously. The literal Hebrew is essentially "no one is separated from his appointed place," and this probably refers to the army approaching in closed, organized ranks with no one missing. Meanwhile, the royal court in Jerusalem must provide an answer for the messengers (ambassadors) from a nation seeking alliance with Judah because the Lord had founded Zion and His people, and 'ani, "poor" or "afflicted," would find refuge there (v. 32; cf. v. 30).

15:1—16:14. Utterance Concerning Moab.

This lamentation over the destruction of Moab concerns one of Israel's archenemies across the Jordan River. On the term massa', "burden," "oracle," or "prophecy," see 13:1. The cause for the lament was a devastating foreign invasion. The description of the events moves from the north (15:2–4) to the south (vv. 5–7) to include all of Moab by mentioning its borders and including Eglaim and Beer Elim to the south and north of the River Arnon (vv. 8–9). The section concerning the north mentions the armed soldiers of Moab (v. 4), while the section on the southern locations mentions Moab's refugees (vv. 5, 7). The main Assyrian attack in 733 B.C. was north of Arnon, which agrees with vv. 4–7. The practices mentioned in vv. 2–3 were customary signs of mourning. Verse 6 pictures a famine brought on by drought and pictures mourning after an enemy invasion.

Isaiah advised Moab's "ruler of the land" (16:1) to send a peace offering to the mount of Daughter Zion (or Daughter of Zion). The reason was the fleeing of the daughters (perhaps a reference to the cities) of Moab across the Arnon, like birds scattered from their nests, apparently looking for refuge in Zion. Translations and commentators differ in regard to who is being addressed in vv. 3–5. Some suggest that Isaiah was advising the Moabites to be a shelter for God's outcasts (i.e., the people from Israel), while others suggest that either God or Moab's messengers were telling Israel to accept the refugees from Moab. Another issue is the unique word pelilah. Though usually translated as "judgment," "decision," or something similar, it is thought by some to be derived from tepillah, "prayer," and thus this would convey the idea of making a petition. If this is the case, and the text is referring to Moab's words to Israel, the meaning would be that Moab was to petition Zion to hide its refugees, allow them to live in Zion, and shelter them from the destroyer (or devastator). This advice was motivated by God breaking Assyria's power in the world (v. 4; cf. 10:5–34; 14:24–27) and would lead to the Messiah's kingdom when He would sit on the throne in the tabernacle of David (16:5). Once more the prophet has taken us from the local situation to the eschatological consummation in the messianic kingdom. Nations, as seekers of refuge in Judah and her God, would receive blessings.

The prophet acknowledges the news of Moab's downfall (vv. 6–8). Moab's pride, self-exaltation, and insolence were proverbial in Judah (cf. Jer. 48:29–30). The final clause of Isaiah 16:6 literally means “[we have heard of] the errors of his boastings.” Proud Moab was to wail for itself (vv. 6–7), for it was like a vine with branches that stretched out and went over the sea (v. 8). This might be a reference to the export trade in wine or to the opulence of Moab's vineyards (cf. Jer. 48:31–33).

In 16:9–12 the prophet wails because the shouts of joy over Moab's summer fruit and harvests have ceased (some render hedad as “battle cries” rather than “shouting” or “shouting for joy”). Gladness and joy are removed from the plentiful field or orchard: the singing and shouting in the vineyards at the time of the harvest and the treading of grapes in winepresses have ceased. Praying at the sanctuary will not help. Then a new word of the Lord is added (vv. 13–14). In three years—not one moment more (time counted as in the situation of a slave who wants to leave once the debt is paid)—an enemy attack or famine would heavily reduce Moab's population.

17:1—18:7

Syria and Israel

The title includes only Damascus, and the passage provides a warning example of how the Lord punishes a proud and disobedient nation. Damascus was allied with the kingdom of Israel in the Syro-Ephraimite war (734–732 B.C.) and was ruined by Assyria.

17:1–14. Desolated Cities. Israel lost the city of Aroer to the Syrians and then to the Moabites, and it was finally destroyed by the Assyrians. This loss was a sign of the consequences of Israel's disobedience, which is the theme in vv. 4–6. Verse 2 has a common image of flocks of sheep grazing or resting in a ruined city to symbolize abandoned cities. The reference to the remnant of Syria (Aram) being like the glory of Israel means that they would perish in the same way that the political glory of Israel perished because of their sin. According to vv. 4–6, the glory of Israel would decrease and weaken as a result of punishment. The mention of gleaning refers to the very poor remnant of the people who would survive the punishment (v. 6).

Isaiah says that a time would come, after the punishment, when humanity would recognize the Holy One of Israel (v. 7). Consequently, they would reject their idols and altars because they were the work of their hands (v. 8; cf. 2:8, 20; 5:12). But at that present time there was judgment because Israel had abandoned God, their Savior and Stronghold (17:10). The planting (end of v. 10) of foreign seedlings or imported vines may refer to fertility cults (cf. 1:29–30; 65:3). Such rebellion would make the harvest—not blessed by the Lord—into a heap of ruins on the day of grief. The woe to the multitude of many nations or peoples marks the beginning of their rebuke (v. 12). The peoples are first compared to the roar of the seas and the rushing of mighty waters. They would flee away like the chaff that is chased away by the wind during the harvest grain threshing (v. 13).

18:1–7. Distant Nations. The prophet announced that distant nations would recognize the Lord of Hosts on Mount Zion (v. 7), while Israel would reject the Lord and seek alliances with Egypt (17:1–11; 18:1–2). Israel would, therefore, be “trimmed” by the Lord (vv. 4–6). Ethiopia, or Cush (territory of modern Sudan), maintained diplomatic relations with the Near East by sea, or perhaps the Nile (v. 2). Israel and Judah occasionally considered the option of striking deals with Egypt when Cushite dynasties ruled. The speech in v. 2 seems to have been made by a king of Judah or Israel who sought to establish diplomatic relations with the nation south of Egypt. But at some point in the future, the nations of the earth would recognize the Lord. All the people in the world would see and hear the Lord's rallying signs (v. 3). As Lord of the world, He would review all nations from His heavenly temple (v. 4). Before the harvest the Lord would “trim” the buds and grapes and cut off the shoots and take away the branches (v. 5). Like the wasted parts of the vines, Israel would be cut off because of its apostasy (vv. 7–8). It would become like Damascus (17:1–3), which is what happened to Israel in 722 B.C. However, in contrast to Israel, the nation of Cush would represent all the nations from afar who would turn to the Lord (18:7).

19:1—20:6*Egypt

The message poetically describes the Lord's manifestation in the land of Egypt and its damaging effects on the nation. He would stir up civil conflicts (19:2) and destroy Egypt's spiritual guidance that was obtained through idols, charmers, mediums, and sorcerers (v. 3). He would hand them over to Assyria (v. 4). Pharaoh's counselors would not know what the Lord had devised against Egypt (v. 12). Therefore, they would give foolish counsel and make their princes into fools. Human wisdom does not save, and it would not save Egypt. The judgment of God would have five consequences (vv. 16–25). First, Egypt would fear what the Lord had determined against it, and it would also fear Judah (vv. 16–17). Second, five cities in Egypt would speak the language of Canaan (probably because they would be inhabited by Israelites who speak Hebrew), swear by (or pledge allegiance to) the Lord of Hosts, and honor Him as the true God (v. 18). Third, there would be an altar to the Lord in the land of Egypt and a pillar or monument to Him at its border as a sign and witness to the Lord. These would remind the Egyptians of the Lord's punishment, their suffering under oppressors, and the Lord's healing. The punishment would cause Egypt to turn to the Lord; they would pray to Him, and He would heal them. His healing consists in sending them a mighty Savior to deliver them (vv. 19–22). Fourth, a highway would unite Egypt and Assyria, and Egypt would serve or worship with Assyria (v. 23). Fifth, the Lord would bless the three nations: Egypt would be called God's people, Assyria the work of His hands, and Israel His inheritance. They would all belong to the Lord when He would rule the world (vv. 24–25). In this and other oracles, the prophet offered the nations an eschatological hope that could only be realized by the coming Messiah. The consequences listed in vv. 18–25 suggest that the Lord's plan not only exposed the weaknesses of Egypt but also included healing and salvation for the nations.

Isaiah 20:1–6 is a brief narrative dealing with events that occurred in 713–711 B.C., when the Assyrians conquered the Philistine city of Ashdod (for Tartan, or Sargon, see 2 Kin. 18:17). The Lord's command to Isaiah (Is. 20:2) and His explanation (vv. 3–6) tell of a symbolic action that would be a sign and a witness to Egypt and their neighbors to the south (cf. 18:1b–2, 7; 19:1b–25). Isaiah had walked naked and barefoot (i.e., the condition of those taken into exile, which probably conveys the idea of being without adequate clothing [Is. 58:7]) for three years. This act symbolized the coming captivity of the Egyptians and those to the south who had been subdued by Assyria (19:3–4).

21:1–17*The Wilderness, Dumah, and Arabia

The three utterances on Babylon, Dumah, and Arabia belong together. When Babylon rebelled against Assyria, it often had Arabian allies.

21:1–10. The Wilderness of the Sea. This expression designates the tribal borderland ruled by Merodach/Marduk-Baladan, king of Babylon (cf. 39:1–2). In a disturbing vision, Isaiah saw an enemy from a terrifying land approaching like a whirlwind through the desert. He heard of treachery and destruction. The poetic Hebrew construction used here is also found in similar forms in 24:16 and 33:1. The Lord would make Babylon's lamentation cease by the coming event revealed in the vision. There would be no hope for the attackers' victims (21:3–4).

There is a sarcastic command urging Elam and Media to defend their ally Babylon by attacking the approaching Assyrian army (v. 2). Merodach/Marduk-Baladan's primary allies in the defense of Babylon were Elamite Susa and Anshan. Isaiah's reference to Elam and Media likely meant Elam and allies from the Zagros mountains, including Anshan. The vision predicted Babylon's fall (vv. 6–9). The prophet heard a command to the military officers to prepare for battle (v. 5)—an oiled shield would resist arrows better and would therefore be used on the walls of a fortified city.

A watchman, carefully watching and listening (v. 8), saw a charioteer shouting that Babylon had fallen and the images of her gods lay destroyed on the ground (v. 9; cf. Rev. 14:8; 18:2). This news is the focal point of Isaiah 21:1–10, indicating the loss of the power of Babylon and her gods. The passage ends with an address to those being threshed like grain, that is, the people in Judah who had put their hope in an alliance with Babylon but who would suffer the wrath not only of Assyria but later of the Medo-Persians (v. 10).

21:11–12. Utterance Concerning Dumah. This passage records a watchman's report that there was no news from Dumah, implying that it had fallen and that there were no survivors. If Dumah was an ally of fallen Babylon, the passage may be taken as a warning against foreign alliances. Dumah refers to the fortified religious center of Adummatu (i.e., Dumat al-Jandal in the Wadi Sirhan), which controlled the major Arab trade routes between Syria and Babylonia. The reference to “Seir” (v. 11b) indicates the eastern direction from which one would inquire concerning news about Dumah. In the passage, Isaiah is both the implied speaker of the text and the watchman (“He calls to me out of Seir”). The repeated question for news from Seir was put to him (v. 11). The answer was that the morning would come and also the night (v. 12), but no news had come. The person asking the question is told to inquire again later and to return.

21:13–17. Utterance Concerning Arabia. The intention of Isaiah’s message is, as in vv. 1–10 and 11–12, to warn against reliance on foreign allies and to confirm that the Lord is in command of events. The Dedanites and Temanites are asked to assist the refugees in Arabia, who were fleeing to them from battle, by giving water to the thirsty and offering food to the hungry (vv. 14–15). The Lord had spoken to Isaiah concerning the decimation of Kedar’s people and its destruction within a year. Kedar was the second son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chr. 1:29) and the eponym of an important Arab tribe.

22:1–25

Utterance Concerning the Valley of Vision

“The Valley of Vision” is a unique name. It may signify the Kidron Valley to the east of Jerusalem, which could be seen both from the city walls and from the slopes of the Mount of Olives, where the Assyrian army had taken its stand in the siege of 701 B.C. Shebna’s magnificent tomb was located on the eastern side of the Kidron Valley where high officials were buried during the reigns of the Davidic kings (vv. 15–16). During the Assyrian siege, Shebna’s tomb—a symbol of his pride—was in Assyrian hands. The Kidron Valley therefore visually represented the fate of Jerusalem’s disobedient people (i.e., the yoke of Assyria).

22:1–14. Message Against Jerusalem. There was noise in the city, but not of rejoicing. Warriors had died, not in battle but while trying to escape. Sennacherib’s records confirm that many of Hezekiah’s troops deserted him. The city was under siege, the people were weeping, and there was no reason for comfort. What they were facing was chaos and destruction, the safety of the city determined by the people’s faithfulness to the Lord and not by the inviolability of Zion as the dwelling of God. There would be trampling and terror and people crying to the mountains (v. 5). There has been some discussion over the translation of the latter part of the verse, but most have rendered the text as “breaking down of walls.” The approach of the Assyrian army is illustrated by the troops provided by Elam and Kir (vv. 6–7). After his defeat of Merodach/Marduk-Baladan and his Elamite allies, Sennacherib reported taking thousands of Elamite captives and a great deal of military equipment, such as chariots and horses.

The Assyrian army would spread out across the valleys of Judah. Before besieging Jerusalem, Sennacherib conquered forty-six cities and countless villages in Judah and deported around 200,000 people. Isaiah states that the Lord eliminated Judah’s defenses (lit. “uncovered the covering of Judah”; v. 8). When Jerusalem got the news of Judah’s destruction, the people looked to the armor and weapons of the Forest Palace (v. 8; lit. “House of the Forest”) and to Hezekiah’s efforts to fortify Jerusalem and secure the water supply, but they disregarded the Lord. This palace was one of the buildings erected by Solomon near the temple (1 Kin. 7:2; 10:17) and may have been used as an armory. Here it refers to the house of David. Hezekiah’s fortifications caused great damage to the city of David, and he broke down houses to fortify the wall (Is. 22:9–10). The mention of the lower pool seems to refer to the tunnel Hezekiah made under the city to gather water from the spring of Gihon in the Pool of Siloam (2 Chr. 32:2–4).

When Judah was destroyed and Jerusalem besieged, the Lord called for mourning, baldness, and sackcloth (Is. 22:12). However, the people failed to understand the significance of the Assyrian siege. God wanted them to repent and return to Him (v. 4). Instead they celebrated and said, “Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die!” (v. 13; cf. 1 Cor. 15:32). There would be no atonement for such iniquity (Is. 22:14). Atonement can be given only when humans repent of their sins and humble themselves.

22:15–19. Servant Shebna. Before the Assyrian siege, Shebna was the king’s master of the house. The Lord’s message about him was derogatory, in contrast with His acknowledgement of Eliakim as His servant (v. 20). Isaiah’s description of the status and function of the master of the house (vv. 20–24) reflects the Lord’s designation of Eliakim and summarizes his investiture. Isaiah’s question to Shebna implies that they had met at the tomb before the Assyrian siege. In the accusation, Shebna's tomb represents pride linked to a high office. He was self-sufficient and concerned with preserving the future honor of his name and the security and honor of his descendants (v. 25), thereby ignoring Isaiah's warnings that the Lord would punish pride (cf. 2:11-16; 3:1-3, 16-18). He had sought security by making a place for his burial in a rock (22:16) rather than seeking refuge in the Lord.

Utterance Concerning Tyre

The predicted punishment of Shebna was that the Lord would hurl him away violently by seizing him, wrapping him firmly, and throwing him like a ball (vv. 17-19; lit. "winding He will wind you up [with] a winding like a ball"). Shebna would end up dying in obscurity in a large, foreign country. Thus, he would not be buried in his magnificent tomb in Jerusalem. His magnificent chariots—the sign of his high position and honor—would become the shame of his master's house. Shebna may have been deported to Nineveh as a captive, either as Sennacherib's prisoner or as part of Hezekiah's generous tribute (see 2 Kin. 18:13-16).

22:20-25. Servant Eliakim. This remarkable passage focuses on Eliakim the son of Hilkiah. His office was related to the following: (1) God who appointed him (vv. 20-21); (2) the people of Jerusalem and Judah to whom he would be a father (v. 21; "father" is an honorific title or term of respect; e.g., 2 Kin. 2:12; 6:21; 13:14); (3) the household of the king (he would receive the key of the house of David, symbolizing his administrative authority to make decisions; v. 22); (4) his own posterity (Eliakim's position would be secure, that is, he would have an enduring name; vv. 23-24). The simile of the peg involves one fixed in the wall with vessels hanging on it (v. 24; cf. Ezek. 15:3). The fact that it could be unfastened forewarned that Eliakim's security, like that of every other human, depended on his faithfulness to the Lord. Eliakim would also be honored by his descendants, for he would elevate them to a position of glorious distinction. Isaiah 22:25 is difficult: some have taken it to refer to Shebna as being a different "peg" from Eliakim—Shebna and all who depended on him for support would fall. Since v. 25 continues the metaphor as well as the description of the glorious descendants of the previous verses, others have viewed it as referring to Eliakim. The phrase "in that day," used in v. 20 to designate the exaltation of Eliakim, is now used to designate the moment of his or Shebna's fall.

This lamentation over Tyre and Phoenicia relates to Sennacherib's capture of Tyre's mainland settlement in 701 B.C. Tyre was a neighboring trading partner with Judah situated in the southern part of Phoenicia on a small island.

The passage presents six appeals by the prophet for a communal lamentation over Tyre and Phoenicia (vv. 1-14). The first call addressed the ships of Tarshish. The luxurious cargos of these large ships made them symbols of wealth and luxury (cf. 2:16; 1 Kin. 10:22; Jer. 10:9). The motivation for the lament was the destruction of the home harbor. The second call addressed the coastal inhabitants and the merchants of Sidon (Is. 23:2-3). The reason was the loss of Sidon's commerce, which was the marketplace of the nations. The third call addressed Sidon. The reason was that the sea no longer provided sustenance (vv. 4-5). The report on the condition of Tyre would cause agony in Egypt, an important trading partner. The fourth call addressed the coastal inhabitants, who were told to cross over to Tarshish, a distant but unidentified port (vv. 6-9). Amazement is expressed at the downfall of the joyous, ancient, and far-reaching Tyre. The Lord had determined to humble the proud and honorable (cf. 2:11-17).

The fifth call addressed the daughter (of) Tarshish, the distant Phoenician colony (cf. vv. 1, 6). Verse 10 has been translated and interpreted in various ways: some read the verb 'abar, "to pass over," as meaning "to till" or "cultivate." The LXX has "cultivate your land; for ships will no more come out of Carthage"—that is, their supply source would be removed. Others understand 'abar to mean that the people of Tarshish should go through their land and look for another harbor since Tyre would no longer be available. Still others read 'abar as "leave," "abandon" (see 29:5; 31:9; 40:27; Job 6:15; 30:15). It seems better to understand it to mean that at that time Tarshish would be as free as the river (the Nile). There was no longer any restraint (lit. "belt," mezakh) upon Tarshish (v. 10). Mezakh, "belt," is sometimes rendered as "strength" (an image of restraint; cf. Ps. 109:19)—the motherland had fallen, and the colony was now free to leave Phoenicia. Some render the term here as referring to the "harbor" of Tarshish. The downfall of Tyre was part of the Lord's plan (Is. 23:11). He had granted Assyria sovereignty over many kingdoms, commanding the Assyrians to destroy the fortresses of Canaan, including Phoenicia. The Lord's command to Sidon to cross over to Cyprus (v. 12) happened when King Luli of Sidon escaped from the Assyrian army. Phoenicia's downfall paralleled that of Babylon/Chaldea (v. 13)—both were part of the anti-Assyrian rebellion with Judah and Philistia. The sixth call to wail addressed the ships of Tarshish (v. 14; cf. v. 1b) because they could not any longer rely on Tyre's ma'oz, "place of refuge" or "fortress," sometimes rendered as "strength" (i.e., military and financial power).

Tyre would be forgotten for seventy years (vv. 15–18)—corresponding to a normal lifespan (v. 15). The mortal wound of Tyre would be healed, and it would behave like a harlot. Since Tyre's chief deity was the fertility goddess Astarte, which was related to temple prostitution, the city's trade is metaphorically described as a return to her hire as she prostituted herself with all the kingdoms of the world (v. 17; cf. Rev. 17:2). At the end, however, her financial success would benefit Judah—it would be set apart for the Lord and would provide His people with food and clothes (Is. 23:18). The implication appears to be that Tyre would join God's people and would thus be blessed.

24:1—27:13

THE LORD'S NEW WORLD ORDER: THE NATIONS AND ISRAEL

The message of the Lord's sovereignty over the nations (13:1—23:18) culminates with a prediction of His new world order and His blessing on Israel and the nations.

24:1–23

Law and Rule of God over the World

Having established His world sovereignty (vv. 1–22), God proclaimed that He would reign on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem (v. 23). In the process, He would devastate the earth and scatter all its inhabitants (vv. 1–2) because the earth was defiled by crimes against the laws of the Holy One (v. 5). The punishment would remove the contaminants, and the earth was to be entirely emptied or laid waste (v. 3). The "everlasting covenant"—expressed in the laws and the ordinances or statutes (v. 5)—refers to the agreement between the Creator and humans (cf. Gen. 9:16–17), and its violation disrupts the divine world order. The coming judgment would end rejoicing in the city of tohu, "formlessness" or "emptiness," sometimes translated here in Isaiah 24:10 as "ruined" (tohu is the same word used for the primordial state of earth before it was filled with life; Gen. 1:2). The unidentified, nameless city would be broken down, and all its houses closed (Is. 24:7–13).

At the announcement of the fall of the evil city, people from different parts of the world would erupt in praises to God, acclaiming Him to be righteous (vv. 14–16). But the prophet spoke, knowing that the end had not yet arrived, and he exclaimed that he was ruined and wasting away. He knew that evil was coming upon the earth because of the violation of the Creator's world order (vv. 17–18). His word heralded an eschatological judgment of cosmic proportions (vv. 18–20). At that time the Lord would punish the powerful ones in heaven and the kings of the earth (v. 21) because He is Ruler of all—the moon and the sun were deities worshiped by the nations (vv. 22–23b). The significance of vv. 1–23 is captured by the conclusion that the Lord of Hosts would gloriously reign on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem (v. 23; cf. 2:2–4; 60:1—62:12).

25:1–12

The Lord's Blessing

The restoration of the Lord's world order through judgment (24:1–23) would result in universal blessings (25:1–12), which would include the restoration of Israel (26:1—27:13). The collapse of the universal, evil city would be followed by the praises of the people and the blessing of the Lord. This communal song of praise is grounded, first, in the fact that the Lord had done "wonderful things," proving that He had been faithful and sure in His purposes from long ago (v. 1). Second, the song notes the Lord's ruin of a mighty city that symbolized resistance to God's sovereignty (note its various names in 24:10; 25:2–3; 26:5). Third, the song recognizes the Lord, a good king, as the protector of the poor and the needy (i.e., Jerusalem; 25:4–5).

The Lord would respond to the nations' acknowledgment (v. 3) by making a feast on Mount Zion for all the peoples (v. 6). He would destroy or remove the covering or veil over the nations (v. 7). This symbolizes the Lord's revelation of Himself to the peoples. Among the Lord's blessings for the peoples of the earth is the extraordinary announcement that He would "swallow up death forever" and wipe away tears from all faces (25:8a; cf. 26:19; 1 Cor. 15:54–55; Rev. 21:4). As reigning Lord, He would remove the curse of death that resulted from the rebellion in the Garden of Eden. This hope is central to the Christian faith.

Another blessing is directed particularly to Israel: He would remove the disgrace of His people from all the earth (25:8). Israel's response would express (1) loyalty: they had waited for God and trusted in Him (v. 9; cf. 8:17; 12:1–6); (2) confession: “this is our God” and “this is the LORD”; and (3) acknowledgment: as Savior and as the source of joy (25:9). What a wonderful description of the Second Coming of Christ!

The prophet asserted that the hand of the Lord would rest on “this mountain” (i.e., He would protect Zion from harm; v. 10; cf. 4:6; 31:5–7; 33:20–24; 51:16). The prediction of the demise of Moab was a contrast and a warning. Here Moab represents nations that were invited to seek refuge in Zion but did not accept (16:1–4). Their notorious pride would be turned into utter humiliation (cf. 2:6–21; 16:6).

26:1–21

Song of Thanksgiving

In this song of thanksgiving, as Judah asks the Lord to deliver them from their enemies, the singers express joy in their strong city (v. 1), made secure by the power of the Lord. This is the righteous city. Their praises mingle with admonitions to trust in the Lord forever (v. 4) and praise Him for having defeated and humiliated the lofty city and those dwelling on high (vv. 5–6). Jerusalem's gatekeepers were commanded to open the gates to let the righteous nation (i.e., the redeemed Israel) that is true and faithful enter (v. 2). A faithful one is the person who is constant and trusts in the Lord. The Lord keeps the faithful in “perfect peace” (v. 3). They had waited for the Lord by keeping His principles and had confessed that their deep desire was for the Lord (vv. 8–9). The believer knows that when the Lord's judgments are upon the earth, the world will learn righteousness, but the wicked do not learn righteousness or see the majesty of the Lord (v. 10).

Pointing to the unwillingness of the wicked to see and learn (v. 10), the petitioners ask that they be ashamed and destroyed by fire of the Lord (v. 11). The Lord is asked to establish peace for the people because everything they had accomplished was actually done for them by the Lord and His power (v. 12). This preliminary request is extended through reflections on the past (vv. 13–15). The Lord had acted against lords or masters who, alongside Him, governed the people (v. 13). Because of their removal, the Lord increased the nation and expanded all the borders of the land. By these actions, He was glorified (v. 15). The petition ends with the Lord's comforting answer announcing the resurrection of the dead (v. 19). This verse literally translates as “They shall live, your dead, my corpse; they shall arise.” Since it is the Lord who is speaking, “my corpse” refers to the corpses of those who trusted in Him (the singular is collective). The Lord's dew gives life like the dew of the morning gives to herbs, and therefore the earth would repa'im tapil, literally “cause the fallen ones to fall”; the verb napal (“to fall”) expresses here the idea of “to cause to cast out” (on the word repa'im, see commentary on 14:4–11)—a poetic way of stating (as most translations indicate) that the dead would rise (cf. 25:8).

Meanwhile, the people are admonished to enter their quarters, shut their doors, and wait for the Lord to bring about what He had promised (26:20–21; cf. 10:25). They are to wait patiently for ultimate deliverance during the Lord's punishment of the earth (cf. 24:1–23). The promised resurrection would bring justice: as the faithful would be raised from the dead, the bloodguilt of past atrocities and murders would be disclosed.

27:1–13

Restoration of Israel

The destruction of the city will happen on the same day that the Lord destroys all the spiritual powers that have opposed Him, powers used by the fallen cherub (14:12–15) and represented by the figure of the Leviathan (27:1; see “Leviathan,” p. 654). By destroying Leviathan, the Lord will restore order and justice in the world. This victory is followed by a song about the restoration of Israel. The new vineyard allegory (27:2–6) is interpreted in vv. 7–13 (cf. 5:1–7). On that eschatological day, God will announce that His anger has passed and will offer Israel peace (27:4–5). If they accept, His people will take root, blossom, bud, and fill the surface of the earth with fruit (v. 6). The vineyard song is explained in an exhortation to the Lord's dejected people. They are asked whether they are not better off than their completely destroyed oppressors (v. 7). The meaning of v. 8 is not clear. The first word appears to be a repetition of the unit of measure, se'ah. So, it is taken by some to mean that God's judgment of Israel was “measured”—it was not overwhelming. Others read the first part of the verse as referring to warfare and exile. Still others see a continuation of the tree metaphor in the verb shalakh, “to send away,” and thus translate it as “shooting forth.” The basic sense is that God disciplined His people in the Exile but not to the extent of completely destroying them; Israel will spring back to life again.

The effect of scattered Israel’s suffering is stated in v. 9: Jacob’s sins would be atoned for—the experience of the Exile has a redemptive goal, but repentance, manifested in the rejection of idolatry, is required from the people. There would be fruit from this taking away of sin: the purification of the land through the destruction of idol worship. Ultimately, the suffering of scattered Israel would not atone for their sins and purify the land and the nations, but the Suffering Servant of the Lord would (cf. 52:13—53:12).

Because He is a God of justice and righteousness, the Lord carried away those Israelites who did not know Him (27:10–11). However, in the day of salvation, the Lord would thresh (i.e., separate the wheat from the chaff) and gather scattered Israel from the flowing channel of the river (i.e., Assyria) to the brook/wadi of Egypt (v. 12). The great trumpet would be blown as a signal to those who were about to perish in Assyria and those who were exiles in Egypt to come and worship the Lord on the holy mountain in Jerusalem (v. 13).

28:1—33:24

THE LORD’S PLAN FOR JERUSALEM

Isaiah has been showing Israel that the nations are unreliable and will come to an end under the power of God. The prophet continues to encourage God’s people to trust in Him as their only dependable refuge. This section concludes the first part of the book that began in chapter 2. We find here five passages concerning the Lord’s plan for Jerusalem, culminating in the vision of the Lord as King (33:17–24).

28:1–29

The Lord’s Purpose for Sending Assyria

In this passage, Isaiah admonishes the leaders of Jerusalem to seek to comprehend God’s plan. Otherwise, they would fall like the leaders of Ephraim.

28:1–13. Learning from Ephraim. The Ephraimite leaders are described as having had a prideful wreath or crown and as having been drunkards—note the contrast with the Lord as a glorious crown and a beautiful diadem in v. 5. Isaiah says their prestige as leaders of the fertile land is like a fading flower (v. 1). Their intoxication was a sign of their lack of the knowledge of justice (cf. 5:11–13, 20–23). The Lord had sent Assyria to punish Ephraim’s leaders, and they would be trampled underfoot (v. 3). But to the remnant of His people, the Lord would bring glory and beauty. He would be a spirit of justice to the judges and strength to those defending the city (vv. 5–6).

The transgressions of Ephraim’s leaders should have been a lesson to Jerusalem (vv. 7–13). Their spiritual leaders were corrupt; the priest and the prophet erred in vision and stumbled in their judgments. The image of drinking bouts and orgies at a banquet may be associated with the original Canaanite practices of contractual celebrations that often led to orgiastic excesses. Isaiah’s description in vv. 7–8 is not an exaggeration. The refusal of Ephraim’s leaders to hear and understand the word of the Lord is illustrated by a didactic comparison: (1) they are like ignorant babies (v. 9), and (2) they lack knowledge and understanding (v. 10). Isaiah quotes a peculiar sequence of single-syllable words that may have been a school exercise for learning to read and write. The first two parts of the sequence may be divided up to say “[the letter] tsade [and the letter] waw [unite] into tsaw [meaning ‘rule’]” and “[the letter] qop [and the letter] waw [unite] into qaw [meaning ‘line’]” (i.e., a reading exercise). The last part, in Hebrew ze’er sham, may then refer to the small space that separates each word “here and there.” The point is that the leaders were children learning elementary things. (3) They also rejected the comforting word of the Lord (v. 12). He therefore spoke to them with la’eg, “mocking,” “foreign,” or “stammering” lips and a foreign (lit. “another”) tongue (v. 11). By rejecting God’s invitation to find rest and refreshment in Him (v. 12), the Ephraimite leaders brought judgment upon themselves (v. 13).

28:14–29. Warning to Judah’s Rulers. This passage is a warning to the rulers of Judah. The Hebrew term for mockers (v. 14) and the concluding admonition not to be mockers (v. 22) contain the same Hebrew root, meaning “to scorn.” The Assyrian punishment was caused by Jerusalem’s covenant with death or the agreement with Sheol—the grave. Some suggest that this refers to some kind of anti-Assyrian alliance; others, that it refers more generally to the complacent, proud, and deceptive (as the rest of the verse mentions) attitude of the rulers. They evidently conceived of themselves as impervious to the threat of death and had come to believe that the deceptions which they had inculcated would protect them. They proudly assumed that they could not even be reached by God's providence and punishment. The lies and falsehoods that served as the leaders' refuge were the mistaken beliefs that the Lord's punishment could be avoided by political alliances and fortifications.

Instead, the Lord said that He laid a cornerstone for a sure foundation in Zion. The Lord—not the establishment in Jerusalem—would set the measuring line for true security in justice and righteousness (vv. 16–17, 21). The metaphor of God as a Rock or Stone occurs frequently in the OT, especially in the context of salvation (e.g., Gen. 49:24; Deut. 32:4, 15, 18; Pss. 18:2, 31, 46; 28:1; 31:2–3; 62; 95:1; Is. 17:10; 51:1). The NT writers found references to Christ as the Rock in these verses. He was the Rock of Israel (1 Cor. 10:1–4), the rejected (Ps. 118:22; cf. Is. 53) and tried Stone upon which God would build the foundation of His church (Eph. 2:20; 1 Pet. 2:1–6). Placing one's faith and trust in God as the Rock became an important indication that faith, not meritorious works, is the instrument by which God's salvation can be grasped (Rom. 9:30–33). Pride is the opposite of the humble trust admonished here. Thus, the proud deceptions of the leaders would not avail because the covenant with death would be swept away (Is. 28:17c–19). The people were warned not to mock God's prophecy, or else their fetters would be made stronger (v. 22). Wise persons see the whole picture, as illustrated by the farmer who gets his food by working in various stages for various complementary needs according to correct principles taught by God (v. 26). Although the farmer's work is initially destructive, it does not result in the destruction of the crop but in its survival. Israel was chastised to prepare it for the time when the Lord would restore righteous leaders to the land (vv. 5–6). The temporary judgment would be followed by comfort and salvation. The Lord is wonderful in His plan and magnificent in His wisdom (v. 29; cf. 9:6).

29:1–24

The Lord's Purpose for Ariel/Zion

The Lord would cause the threat of Assyria against Ariel (vv. 2–8), but its dissolution would have a positive outcome for Israel (vv. 22–24).

29:1–10. Message for Ariel. This threat was to be directed against Ariel, the city where David lived and a symbol of Mount Zion and Jerusalem, the city of David (vv. 1, 7–8).

The Lord announced His intention to lay siege to Jerusalem and bring it down (vv. 3–4). Its people would lie prostrate on the ground before their conqueror, like one dying and, figuratively speaking, would whisper from the dust like an 'ob—"necromancer" (some translations have "ghostlike" or "spirit"; v. 4)—this simile does not endorse spiritistic beliefs, for Isaiah condemns the practice of necromancy (8:19; 19:3), as did the covenantal law (Lev. 19:31; 20:27; Deut. 18:10–11).

The scene of the punishment of Jerusalem is immediately moderated by the description of the destruction of those who had attacked Jerusalem. They would not enjoy their success for very long. They would not be satisfied but would have their short-lived dream of victory interrupted by the reality of their defeat (Is. 29:5–8). The addressee is instructed to reflect upon the significance of the assault on Jerusalem. How could it happen when God had promised to protect Zion from the attacks of the nations? The prophet's answer raises the people's unwillingness to understand the message in vv. 2–8. They were not understanding because the Lord, on account of their sins, wanted first to chasten them and then to open their eyes.

29:11–24. The Need to Understand. The vision of the Lord's plan is compared to the words of a book that cannot be read because it is sealed or because the reader is illiterate (v. 12). In this illustration, the "whole vision" refers primarily to the revelation concerning Ariel in vv. 1–8, but it could also include the whole vision of the prophet (1:1). It would be heard and seen "in that day" when the Lord would fulfill His plan (29:17–21). The Lord would deal with Jerusalem's inability to understand His plan by removing the wisdom of the wise (v. 14; cf. 5:18–19). But the Lord's plan would soon be implemented (29:17). The oppressor would be brought down, and the oppressed would flourish. This is expressed metaphorically: Lebanon—known for its dense forests and therefore a common symbol of mighty Assyria (10:18–19, 33–34)—would be turned into a fruitful field (karmel) that would appear like a forest. Lofty Lebanon-Assyria would be humbled, and the humble Israel (karmel) exalted.

"In that day" the Lord's wisdom, counsel, and plan would be seen and understood by the deaf and blind (29:18–19). Those who had waited for the Lord would be saved, but the unfaithful would be cut off, especially the unjust and unrighteous officials and judges condemned by Isaiah (vv. 20–21; cf. 1:16–23; 3:1–3, 12–23; 10:1–4). Those who ensnared defenders in court, literally the one who “decides in the gate,” were appointed, impartial participants in a court setting who were supposed to put things right between contenders (cf. 1:18–20). In vv. 22–24 we find a concluding assurance from the covenant God, who redeemed Abraham, concerning the house or descendants of Jacob (i.e., all the children of Israel). Assyria’s assault on Ariel would be a temporary, short-lived threat, for the Lord would resist the attackers and punish the abusive leaders. He would restore the house of Jacob, and all Israel would eventually worship the Lord in His temple at Zion. The faithful followers of the Lord would have their fate reversed when He visited them in due course.

30:1–33

The Lord’s Delay

This chapter opens with a serious charge against the rebellious, obstinate children who were executing plans of their own, not of God’s Spirit (v. 1). The problem was that ambassadors were going down to Egypt (v. 2; i.e., reversing the Exodus when God delivered them) without consulting the Lord (lit. “without asking My mouth”). They were seeking their strength and protection in Pharaoh and placing their trust in the shadow or shade of Egypt (v. 2). But Pharaoh would be Israel’s shame, and their trust in Egypt their humiliation (v. 3). Egypt would not be of help against Assyria (vv. 6–7).

Since the people were rebellious, the Lord commanded the prophet to write His word or message (vv. 12b, 15) on a tablet or a scroll, so that it might be remembered for the times to come, forever. The people were rebellious and wanted the prophets to tell them only “smooth” or “pleasant” things (vv. 8–12). Consequently, the Holy One of Israel announced judgment against them (vv. 12–17). Their punishment would come “suddenly, in an instant”—illustrated by several similes in vv. 13–14. The Lord’s word of salvation was clear: they could be saved in repentance or returning to Him and in resting in Him (v. 15). But since the people had declined the Lord’s invitation, Assyria would punish them. The reliance on horses would prove futile (v. 16), and the promise made to Israel at the Exodus would be reversed (v. 17; cf. Lev. 26:8; Deut. 32:30; Josh. 23:10). Israel would be decimated until they would be left as a pole or flagstaff on the top of a mountain, or as a banner upon a hill (Is. 30:17). A small remnant would endure further suffering until the Lord’s justice would be fulfilled (v. 20).

The Lord would indeed deliver a purified remnant of Israel because He is a God of justice and grace (v. 18). He would be patient with them (lit. “the Lord waits”) and be exalted in the display of His justice and mercy. Since the Lord was “waiting,” or “longing,” from khakah to deliver the remnant of Israel, the prophet blesses all those who wait for (or hope/trust in, from khakah) Him (v. 18; cf. 8:17; 25:9; 33:2; 40:28–31; 49:23). It is a blessing to patiently wait on the Lord; waiting encourages the faithful to remain hopeful that the Lord will reverse their fate and turn their mourning into a dance, according to His plans. The Lord would ultimately defeat Assyria. He would approach her from afar in anger, with His lips full of indignation, His tongue like a destroying fire, and His breath like an overflowing torrent that would reach to the neck (30:27–28). His intervention would mean deliverance for Israel and joy for the remnant.

31:1–9

Egyptian Support Against Assyria

The people were instructed to trust in the Lord because He would protect Zion and defeat Assyria. The prophet directed a woe against those trusting in foreign alliances and military force (Egypt) but failing to seek the Holy One of Israel (v. 1) in whom is wisdom (v. 2) and divine power (v. 3). God promised that He would descend to fight for, protect, and deliver Jerusalem (vv. 4–5). Two similes are used: the Lord would fight for Jerusalem like a lion, and He would protect the city like a mother bird protects its young in their nest. But the people were to return to God, against whom they had revolted (v. 6; cf. 30:1–11, 13–17). On the Day of the Lord, the people would throw away their idols of silver and gold and reject them (31:7; cf. 2:7–9, 18–21; 30:22)—the sin made by their own hands. The return of Judah to their God was to trigger the ultimate defeat of Assyria (31:8–9). The sword of the Lord would devour him (cf. 30:30–33); God would summon the armies that would cause Assyria’s downfall.

32:1—33:24*The Lord as King and Savior

Judah's hope was not to be found in Egypt but in the Lord. The instruction is about the nature of the righteous versus the wicked ruler (32:1–20) in order to indicate that only in the Lord would there be a future for His people. This is followed by a prayer (33:1–24).

32:1–20. The Righteous King. This passage is a reflection concerning the king and his officials in Jerusalem, and it prepares the way for the account of the Lord's kingship in chapter 33. It is about ruling in justice and righteousness, the fundamental ethical basis for kings and leaders, rooted in the Lord Himself. The initial hen, which can mean "behold," "see," "indeed," or introduce an "if" or "when" construction, is common in the reflections of the wise (e.g., 54:15; Job 9:11–12; Hag. 2:12). If Isaiah 32:1 is the condition, it is followed by the effect (vv. 2–4), clarifying the meaning of the passage (vv. 1–2; cf. 4:5–6). Attention is given to the people who would be ruled in justice and righteousness. The example of the righteous ruler is then contrasted with that of the wicked. The full range of the wickedness of the Lord's opponents was to be exposed, while the righteous would stand (32:5–8).

A righteous ruler was to contribute to the land's fertility and peace, which were essential for survival. A righteous ruler would bring the Lord's blessing upon the people and their land, while a wicked ruler would bring a curse. In the absence of righteous leaders, complacent women (v. 9) are summoned to mourn because the harvest would fail (v. 10). The land and the cities were desolate and showed signs of a curse (thorns and briars; vv. 13–14; cf. 5:6; 7:23–25; 27:4). Such are the conditions under a wicked ruler. However, the Spirit would be poured out upon the people through a righteous ruler from on high (32:15; cf. 11:2), and the wilderness would become a fertile field (32:15). Justice and righteousness being upheld, fertility would be joined with peace (vv. 16–19). Those sowing their seed beside all places of water and allowing their oxen and donkeys to roam freely are those who faithfully wait for the Lord and hope in Him (v. 20).

33:1–9. A Prayer of Distress. A prayer for salvation stands at the center of the passage (vv. 2–6), framed by a word of woe against a foreign enemy (v. 1) and a description of the tyrannical rule (vv. 7–9). The enemy is not named, but certain code words in the passage point to Assyria. Isaiah portrays the oppressed community of Israel praying that the Lord may be gracious to them because they have waited for Him. In Isaiah, patiently waiting for the Lord's intervention characterizes the faithful (cf. 8:17; 25:9; 26:8; 40:28–31; 49:23). The next part of the prayer is a petition for God to be the strength of the people (lit. "their arm"; 33:2). The motivation for the supplication was the Lord's power and past victories. The prophet instructed the people concerning their relationship to the Lord as a condition for receiving His salvation. They were reminded that the Lord is exalted (v. 5; cf. 2:11, 17; 12:4) and that although He dwells on high, He is the One who filled Zion with justice and righteousness, that is, with His personal presence (cf. 32:1, 15–17). The prophet admonished them that God and His wisdom and knowledge would provide a stable foundation for their times and that reverence for Him is a great treasure (33:5–6).

33:10–16. Fall of the Oppressor. The Lord told the oppressor Assyria that He would destroy him. His victory meant that He would be exalted among all the nations—when they heard about His actions, they would acknowledge His might. Assyria is mocked as a nation that is like chaff and stubble; it would be annihilated (vv. 10–13). The prophet presents the Lord creating fear among the sinners and hypocrites in Zion through their recognition of the eternal results they would experience in the destroying fire or everlasting burnings (v. 14). The Lord's plan was to purify Zion by removing the sinners (1:28; 4:4). Out of the purified remnant, the Lord would create citizens of the new Zion (cf. vv. 2–6). The reward of the righteous is that they would enjoy security from attack (cf. 4:6; 31:5; 32:17–19) and freedom from want (30:23–26; 32:17). They would dwell in the elevated places with the Lord (33:14–16).

33:17–24. Triumph of God and Zion. Those left in Zion and those seeing from afar (i.e., scattered Israel) would see the King in His beauty (v. 17). With the establishment of the kingdom of God, He is recognized as Judge, Lawgiver, and King. Israel's salvation comes from Him (v. 22).

There is an underlying joy over the disappearance of the oppressor who wrote letters of blasphemy (cf. 37:8–20), weighed the tribute (cf. 2 Kin. 18:14–16), and sought out their tower defenses (Is. 33:18; cf. 2:15; 23:13). Zion would again be a secure and peaceful place with the Lord enthroned there as King. It is called the city of our festivals, or our appointed festivals (Heb. mo'adenu—from mo'ed)—all Israel would gather at the temple to worship the Lord. It would be a secure residence for scattered Israel returning from the nations (33:20). The Lord would forever dwell with His people in Zion. According to some translations and interpreters, it is the city of Jerusalem that would be like a “place of broad rivers and streams,” or a place where these would flow. According to others, this metaphor applies to God Himself. Unlike the rivers in Assyria, no powerful ships or galleys with oars would pass by.

The concluding vision is of Zion's deliverance from pain and suffering and of its impregnability. Since the Hebrew word khebel does not only mean “cord” but can also be related to “pain,” another possible translation of v. 23a is “Your [Zion's] pains are gone; they [the oppressors] shall not seize the socket of the flagstaff; a banner shall not be spread out.” This translation better fits v. 23b, which describes the people in Zion taking much spoil from the oppressors. Besides, there would be no illness in Zion, and the sins of its inhabitants would be forgiven. The Lord is the Savior of His people. His actions express His wisdom, justice, righteousness (vv. 5–6), power (vv. 10–13), forgiveness, and love for His people (v. 24). The victory of the Lord over the enemy is an assurance that the believer will share in this victory.

34:1—66:24

THE LORD'S PLAN TO RESTORE ISRAEL AND RULE THE NATIONS

Chapters 34–66 aim at moving Israel to seek the Lord by understanding His prophetic word and seeing its ongoing realization in history. The nations would witness the divine salvific power on behalf of God's people (34:1—35:10) and His defeat of the threat of Babylon (36:1—39:8). God would reveal His faithfulness to Israel, Zion, and the nations (40:1—55:13). The word of exhortation is centered on chapter 55, a summons to Israel to become citizens of restored Zion. This invitation is complemented by the requirements for citizenship (chaps. 56–59), the vision of restored Zion (chaps. 60–62), and the selection of citizens (chaps. 63–66). Thus, a new phase of Isaiah's presentation of the Lord's plan is opened. It develops the theme found in chapters 1–33 that the Lord's anger would cease and that He would act as the Restorer of Zion and as the wonderful Savior of His people. This work would involve saving the nations (52:13—53:12; 56:6–8; 60:1–22; 66:19–24) and gathering scattered Israel on Zion (60:1—62:12; 66:5–24).

34:1—35:10

The Nations, the Lord's Power, and the Return of Israel

The purpose of this section is to convince the audience of the Lord's sovereign power over all nations (vv. 2–4) and provide the setting of a court proceeding (v. 8) for dealing with Edom's crimes and Zion's recompense.

34:1–7. Calling the Nations as Witnesses.

Isaiah sets the scene as a universal “hearing” in which the Sovereign Lord of the world would act. The witnesses are summoned to come near, hear/listen, and give attention (v. 1), due to the Lord's anger or fury against the nations (vv. 2–4). In particular, the summons is caused by the Lord's judgment against Edom, which represents the rebellious nations devoted to destruction (v. 5). The Lord's sword symbolizes His tool of punishment (vv. 5–6; cf. 1:20; 27:1; 31:8). It would be drenched in heaven (v. 5), probably caused by the overthrow of the hosts of heaven or the pagan gods (34:3–4; cf. 24:21). The Lord's punishment is described as a sacrifice in Bozrah (the capital city of Edom) and a great slaughter in Edom. The clean sacrificial animals would be lambs, goats, rams, wild oxen, bull calves, and strong bulls. These would represent the inhabitants of Edom that would perish with their leaders (34:6–7).

34:8—35:10. Day of the Lord's Vengeance.

The court proceeding would be the Lord's day of vengeance against Edom and the year of retribution or recompense for the cause of Zion. The proceeding, aiming for Zion's deliverance (35:1–10), was to include witnesses (v. 1), punishment (vv. 5–17), and recompense for the victims (vv. 1–2). No specific offense by Edom is mentioned, but it symbolized arrogant and oppressive nations because of its opposition to the sovereignty of the God of Zion and its lack of compassion toward Israel and Judah (see Obadiah: Introduction). It would be filled, not with people but with unclean animals (34:11, 13–15). The result would be confusion, the breakdown of social order, and the overthrow of Edom's palaces and fortresses (vv. 11–13). Verse 10 is alluded to in Revelation 14:11 in regard to the final punishment of the wicked worshipers of the beast and its image. Isaiah 34:10 shows that the language of smoke rising forever poetically conveys the idea of total and eternal destruction, not eternal torment.

The nations (including Israel), witnesses to the Lord's power (v. 1), are instructed in Isaiah to search the book/scroll of the Lord and read (v. 16). Twelve desert animals would occupy Edom after the Lord's punishment (i.e., everything prophesied in the book would happen). The nature of this book or scroll is a matter of debate. It could designate the prophetic writings or refer to God's workings and plans that would be fully comprehended someday. It would then be clear that everything occurred according to the will of God—what He had commanded (i.e., His word) and what His Spirit had gathered (i.e., His work). The call to "search" changes the role of the nations from being mere witnesses to actually knowing who the Lord is, namely, seeing the glory of the Lord, the majestic splendor of God (35:2).

In vv. 3–10 the idea of the recompense of Israel, announced in the court proceeding (34:8), is further developed with the intention of instilling hope. It begins with an instruction to comfort the weak and the fearful (35:3–4). The weak would be restored, the land would be watered and become fertile (vv. 6c–7), none of the redeemed would go astray, and Israel would no longer be threatened by foreign nations—symbolized by the lion and the ravenous beast (vv. 8–9). The ones the Lord had saved and redeemed would return with singing and everlasting joy; there would be no more sorrow or sighing (v. 10; cf. 51:11). These words have been of great hope and comfort to God's people over the centuries, and they provide hope during times of doubt, persecution, and loss (cf. Rev. 21:1–4).

36:1—39:8

The Lord's Power and the Threat of Babylon

This section will demonstrate that Isaiah's prophetic word is true, that the Lord has sovereign power over the kings of the nations (even over the Assyrian emperor), that He is able and willing to save those who seek Him, and that, following Hezekiah's reign, a time would come when the treasures and descendants of the Davidic house would be carried to Babylon.

36:1—37:38. The Lord and Assyria. This narrative reflects events in 701 and 681 B.C. Hezekiah had rebelled against Assyria, and Sennacherib had devastated Judah as punishment and was threatening Jerusalem from the captured fortress of Lachish. As usual, the Assyrian attack was preceded by negotiations for surrender. The participants on the Assyrian side were Sennacherib, the Rabshakeh, a high royal official, and some messengers. On Judah's side were Hezekiah, Eliakim the master of the house, Shebna the scribe, Joah the recorder or herald, and Isaiah the prophet. They met by the aqueduct from the upper pool on the highway to the Washer's Field (36:2), which was where Isaiah met King Ahaz (7:3).

In his first speech (36:4–10), the Rabshakeh, or field commander, quoted Sennacherib. The fundamental argument was that the Lord had no power to save the Israelites because He was just like the gods of the other nations who could not save them from Assyria (vv. 18–20). Hezekiah sent a message full of regret and remorse to Isaiah, asking for his counsel (37:2–5). His request was not one that normally would have been directed to a prophet but rather to a priest.

The word of God concerning Sennacherib, as proclaimed to Hezekiah, appears in vv. 21–35: (1) The accusation in vv. 23–25 describes Sennacherib's reproach and blasphemy of the Holy One of Israel. Sennacherib had forgotten that it was the Lord who appointed Assyria as a conqueror of cities and peoples (vv. 26–28). (2) The judgment against Sennacherib appears in v. 29. The Lord would turn him back by the way he had come (cf. v. 34). (3) A sign related to the coming harvests was given to Hezekiah to guarantee that the prophecy would be fulfilled (vv. 30–32). And (4) the passage ends with a word of salvation for Jerusalem: Sennacherib would return to Assyria by the same way that he had come (vv. 33–35).

The fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy against Sennacherib is summarized in 37:36–38. An angel of the Lord killed many men in the Assyrian camp. The miraculous event has some resemblance to the tenth plague of the Exodus from Egypt (Ex. 12:23, 29) and to the Philistine capture of the ark (1 Sam. 5–6). Assyriologists have estimated that in a general call-up across the Assyrian Empire, a mustering of troops in the hundreds of thousands was possible. The record of Sennacherib's death in Isaiah 37:37–38 refers to events in 681 B.C., twenty years after Isaiah's prophecies.

38:1—39:8. The Sickness of the King. Faced with a life-threatening illness, Hezekiah turned to the Lord in prayer (vv. 2–3; cf. 37:15), pointing to his faithfulness and obedience. The Lord had compassion on the king and granted him another fifteen years to live. In this time the Lord would defend Jerusalem and deliver the king and the city from the Assyrians (38:4–8). A sign was given to guarantee this promise (v. 8). It consisted in bringing the shadow of the sun ten steps backward on the sundial of Ahaz—alluding to Ahaz's disobedience (7:10–13).

The events recorded in 38:1–10 followed the healing and recovery of Hezekiah but preceded the confrontation with Sennacherib in 36:1—37:38. These events took place before 701 B.C. (date of Sennacherib's invasion of Judah), when Merodach/Marduk-Baladan was still king of Babylon after his rebellion in 705 B.C.

Hezekiah committed two errors leading to Isaiah's ominous prophecy. He proudly boasted of his treasures to the Babylonian envoys (39:2–4). The unwise display of his riches and armory to the Babylonians functioned as a foreboding of the mistakes of his descendants that would be punished by the future plundering of Jerusalem and the deportation of the Davidic dynasty to Babylon (vv. 5–7). A postponement of the disaster was all Hezekiah could hope for, but the fate of the Davidic dynasty (and the kingdom) was left in jeopardy.

40:1—55:13

The Lord's Faithfulness to Israel, Zion, and the Nations

The Lord's plan to save and restore originated in His heavenly council, and He commissioned Isaiah to proclaim comfort (40:1–11). Chapters 40–55 answer the implied questions in 39:1–8. Would the Davidic dynasty end with the future Babylonian oppression? Would the Lord remain faithful to His covenants with Zion, Israel, and the nations? These questions are answered in the present for scattered Israel under Assyrian dominion as well as in the future for Judah during the Babylonian exile.

40:1–11. Commission to Proclaim the Restoration of Israel. The mission of hardening people's hearts by announcing judgment had been completed (6:9–13). God spoke through Isaiah as Zion's Restorer and Israel's Savior because His anger had ceased (cf. 12:1–6). He commissioned His servants to proclaim His irrevocable decision concerning Israel's comfort (40:1–2, 9–11) and announced His appearance as King (vv. 3–5, 10–11). The decision would be heralded to the cities of Judah (v. 9) and witnessed by the nations (v. 5).

The act of “comforting” (cf. vv. 9–11, 27–31) implies the conclusion of the judgment because the people had received “double” punishment for all their sins. The idiom of “double” often implies “fullness” or “completeness” (see Jer. 16:18; 17:18; Rev. 18:6), but it could also have a positive connotation (i.e., “double” grace; cf. Is. 61:7; Zech. 9:12). The speaking of comfort or tenderness to Jerusalem literally means “speak to the heart of Jerusalem,” which is the language of loving care (cf. Gen. 50:21; Ruth 2:13). The term for tsaba, “army” or “warfare,” could refer to the ending of Jerusalem's forced labor. The Hebrew verb raṣah, often translated as “pardoned,” means “to be accepted, to be pleased with, to be paid.” Since the verb is in the passive form, it is God who is pleased or who accepted or considered the debt as paid. The term ʾawon, “sin” or “iniquity,” could also be rendered “punishment for iniquity.” It may be better to understand the phrase here to mean that God had accepted and acknowledged that the punishment they received was enough and that their sin was paid for. The question of how their sins could be fully atoned for so the people could be restored to fellowship would be addressed later (Is. 53).

The command to prepare “a highway for our God” (40:3) in the desert is intended to hasten His coming and enable all humans to see His glory. The “highway” was a raised road that connected major cities. “In the wilderness” should be read together with preparing the way of/for the Lord (i.e., prepare the way...in the wilderness), which forms a parallelism with the rest of the verse. Wilderness/desert is contrasted with God's glory, symbolizing Israel's desolate and dry land in the time of judgment. Glory (v. 5) is associated with the splendor, majesty, sovereignty, light, revelation, and presence of God. Humans perish but the word of God stands/endures forever (v. 8). A voice says that all human beings (lit. “flesh”) are like grass that withers and flowers that fade when the breath of the Lord blows upon them (i.e., when He speaks His word [cf. v. 24], though the Heb. ruakh, “breath,” also means “wind”), but the word of God stands/endures forever. No one can resist God's purpose (vv. 6–8). Humans are weak and frail and completely dependent upon God's power for life (2:22). The decision of Israel's God could not be changed. His plan of salvation would be implemented.

The message to the cities of Judah from Zion and Jerusalem (or from those proclaiming the message to them as well—translations differ) was that they would see their God. The meaning of this message in 40:10–11 is connected with the coming of God in vv. 3–5, which relates the Lord to the nations (v. 5; cf. vv. 15–24). He was to come with strength and power (28:2; 42:13). In Isaiah, God’s “arm” is an image of strength that accomplishes righteousness, salvation, and justice (see 51:1–52:10). God’s reward and pe’ullah, “work” or “recompense” (cf. 62:11), speaks to the coming of the Lord to judge, save, and rule. God’s work of judgment and salvation anticipates the revelation of His personal glory. Isaiah was familiar with the designation of a king as “shepherd” (31:4; 44:28; 56:11). The king’s role as shepherd is applied here to the Lord’s care for His people (cf. Ps. 23:1–4).

40:12–31. The Lord’s Sovereignty in the World. This instruction backs up vv. 1–11 in the form of a disputation speech (i.e., an argumentation that attempts to prove a disputed point). By a set of rhetorical questions, the prophet declares the incomparable power and wisdom of the Lord (vv. 13–14). Some of the prophet’s audience considered the Lord as merely one of numerous gods and not the most powerful. This objection is refuted by the argument that the nations are worthless compared to the Lord and by an appeal to Israel’s traditional faith, which is based on God’s past acts (vv. 15–20).

Considering the history of humans and nations, no one can fail to see that the Lord of the universe brings princes and judges/rulers to nothing (vv. 21–24). The phrase about God’s reigning above “the circle of the earth” refers to God’s dominion and power over all that is encompassed by the term “earth” (Gen. 1:6; cf. Job 22:14; Prov. 8:27). This leads to the topic of the incomparability of God (Is. 40:25–26). Creator of the stars and planets in heaven, He calls each one by name (v. 26). This is an implied polemic against the view that the stars and the planets were divine and deserved worship. It would have been foolishness for Israel to conclude that their way is hidden from such a Lord. He possesses endless power, lasting strength, unsearchable understanding, and loving care for the weak (vv. 28–29). Therefore, Israel must wait for (or “trust in,” “hope for”) the Lord. This is a key exhortation in the whole book of Isaiah (8:17; 25:9; 26:8; 30:18; 33:2; 40:31; 49:23). Like Israel’s remnant, it is important for us to remember that those who wait with hope and trust will renew their strength (40:31).

41:1–29. Israel: To Reveal the Lord to the Nations. This passage has the form of a speech before the council of nations in which the Lord, in a dispute with (the gods of) the nations, proves that He is the true God. The speech in Isaiah begins with God formally calling the council to order. The reference to the renewal of the peoples’ strength favors their coming together to find the truth about the true God (cf. 40:31). The truth is His sovereignty over the events of history. The one raised or stirred up from the east who had nations given to him (41:2) has been identified with Abraham, Cyrus, or the Messiah (of whom Cyrus was a type). In any of these cases, it could be said that the Lord gave nations to him, subdued kings before him (v. 2), and helped him to pursue these kings, remaining unharmed (v. 3). The more common view is that it refers to Cyrus, king over the Medo-Persians. Then the Lord answered the question of who had done all of these things (v. 4). Thus, He proved that He is the first and the last (i.e., He is constantly in control of human history). Seeing what the Lord had done, the people reacted with fear but also encouraged each other (vv. 5–7).

Israel was God’s servant (vv. 8a, 9c; cf. 44:1–2). A “servant” (‘ebed) could be a “slave” who serves a master, usually in exchange for protection. The term may also express the relationship of the weaker to the stronger party in a “covenant” (cf. 42:6; 49:8). Israel was collectively the “servant” of the Lord in the sense that He was their God and they worshiped Him (cf. Ps. 136:22). Isaiah applies the title “servant” to both Israel as a nation and to the Messiah. Israel was a servant in the sense of being “chosen” (41:8–9) as one who belonged to the Lord (44:1–5), who was not forgotten by Him (vv. 21), whose sins were removed (vv. 22), who was redeemed by the Lord (vv. 22–23; 45:4; 48:20), and in whom the Lord revealed His glory (44:23).

God chose Jacob (41:8, 9; cf. 44:1), a reality that reminds us that Israel’s servanthood was based on the Lord’s election (cf. Ex. 19:3–6). The mention of Abraham enlarges that election to include all the families of the earth (Is. 41:8; cf. vv. 2–4, 25–26; Gen. 12:1–3). The Lord also had a plan for Israel and the nations. He would gather His servants, scattered Israel, who were deported and had become refugees. He also gave them an assurance of protection, an admonition to not fear, and a promise of strength and endurance (Is. 41:10). “I am your God” is the formula that maintains the covenant (cf. 42:8; 43:3). The promise of the removal of Israel’s enemies fits into the history of God's people under Assyrian-Babylonian dominion (41:11–13). No particular oppressor is mentioned, and the setting of the promise is Israel's condition as a "worm" among the nations (v. 14).

The derogatory "worm" is contrasted with "the Holy One of Israel," here called "your Redeemer" (go'el), which Isaiah often uses (e.g., 43:14; 49:7; 59:20). The "redeemer" or "next-of-kin" had both power and obligations, especially (1) to redeem family land that was sold by a relative due to financial difficulties (see Lev. 25:23–28); (2) to redeem a family member sold into slavery in payment of a debt (Lev. 25:47–49); (3) to provide an heir for a dead, childless brother (Deut. 25:5–10; cf. Is. 49:20–21; 54:1, 4–5); and (4) to avenge the murder of a kinsman (Num. 35:6–34; the "avenger" in this passage is from the Heb. go'el, "redeemer"). As "Redeemer" the Lord would forgive their sins (i.e., release them from their debt), restore the land to Israel, free the deported and the refugees, provide new children to Israel, and avenge the injustices against His people (cf. Is. 34:8).

Israel's commission as the Lord's servant was that God would set them as a sharp threshing sledge for the mountains and hills (41:15). A "threshing sledge" was an instrument for separating the grain from the chaff. Israel may have been a "worm," but the Lord would strengthen His people and return them to their land, and the nations would not be able to stand in their way. There would be rejoicing in Israel because of the Lord's salvation (v. 16). He would relieve their suffering and thirst (vv. 17–18). Trees of all kinds would be planted in the arid land (v. 19). God's work would be seen by Israel, and the surrounding nations would know that it had all been done by the power of the Holy One of Israel (v. 20).

The Lord had stated His case (vv. 2–20), and at this point He challenged the idols of the nations to "present your case" (vv. 21–24). They were invited to recount the past, tell the future, and prove their knowledge. This evidence would enable the council of nations to decide if the idols were gods. But the evidence was not there. The opening rhetorical question in v. 26 is worded as a quotation. It is acknowledged that no one—except the Lord—is able to predict the future. The Lord then addressed the idols and their worshipers, concluding that the idols were silent and could not predict coming events. The Lord then announced a wonderful event: good news for Jerusalem (v. 27). The Lord was referring to His promise of liberation. The idols were incapable of announcing the end from the beginning (vv. 28–29), and their worshipers had no counselor who could answer a word: they were all worthless and false. Verse 29 summarizes vv. 1–28 and prepares for the continuation in 42:1–13.

42:1–13. The Servant and Justice. Verses 1–4 constitute the first of the so-called Servant Songs in Isaiah (cf. 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12). However, there is no reason for treating these passages as independent units because they are deeply integrated into their contexts. First, the close relationship between the Servant and the Lord is established (42:1). Second, the Lord empowers the Servant for mission with the Spirit. Third, a specific mission is given to the Servant: He would bring mishpat, "judgment," or in this context, "what is right and proper, what is truth and righteousness." This could refer to a society organized around fundamental legal and moral principles. Fourth, the ministerial style of the Servant is established: He would not be ostentatiously loud, and He would be gentle with the weak (vv. 2–3). He would finally establish true or real justice in the world. Fifth, the success of the Servant is affirmed (v. 4). Sixth, as a new Moses He would give to the nations the torah, the divine law as instruction and as exemplified in His life. In fact, the islands or coastlands would wait for (or trust in) His torah, "law" or "instruction." The Servant's mission to "establish justice" alludes to the righteous messianic King in 11:1–10 and the universal reign of the Lord in 2:2–4. The identity of this Servant has been a matter of dispute. It would be difficult to identify Him with Cyrus. The NT finds in this prophetic announcement a messianic prophecy describing the work of Jesus of Nazareth (Matt. 12:18–21; see "The Servant of the Lord in Isaiah," p. 885).

In 42:5–9 the Lord seems to address the Servant, elaborating a little more on His mission. The section is introduced by a description of the exclusive creative power of God (v. 5) and concludes with His unique power to announce new things before they happen (v. 9). By giving the Servant as a covenant to/for the people and as a light to the Gentiles, God reaffirmed His call and His divine guidance (v. 6). The Servant appears as the embodiment of God's covenant relationship; as such, He is representative of God's ideal for Israel (49:8) and the nations (cf. 42:5). They would indeed walk in the light or the new revelation that the Servant would bring. This light frees humans from the darkness of an existence separated from the Lord (v. 7).

The Servant would reveal to all who the Lord truly is (cf. 29:18–19; 35:5–6; 42:16) and liberate them from idol worship. Only God could announce the coming of a new world order of such a magnitude (v. 9). The disputation initiated in 41:1 closes with an admonition to the nations to praise the Lord. He is to be praised as a great Warrior who would defeat His enemies (42:10–13).

42:14—43:21. Israel and the New Exodus.

The purpose of this section is to show the certainty of the coming deliverance by comparing God's past actions with His promises for future deliverance. The Lord would deliver faithful Israel by a new exodus (42:14–22). He had been quiet during Israel's oppression, but now He would act (v. 14) because He would not forsake them (v. 16). The negative description of the mountains and hills and the drying up of all their vegetation may figuratively describe the defeat of Israel's enemies (v. 15). The Lord would lead blind Israel by an unfamiliar way (v. 16), the way of the new exodus. The reference to turning darkness into light may allude to the pillar of fire that gave Israel light (Ex. 13:21). The display of God's power in the Egyptian Exodus miracle should have convinced Israel that He is the only true God. And yet, they abandoned Him and turned to idolatry (Is. 42:17).

The Lord's servant Israel had been deaf to His word and blind to His acts (vv. 18–20). And yet God called them to conversion (43:10). Israel had failed to walk in the Lord's ways and obey His law (42:24), and therefore they were given to robbers as His anger was poured on them (vv. 24–25). For Israel, now oppressed and in darkness (v. 22), the Lord had a plan to show the greatness and glory of the law (v. 21). They were still His people because He had created and formed them (43:1, 7). Thus, His plan for Israel was as firm as the created world order. The assurance given by the admonition to not be afraid is motivated by the Lord's past actions of the election and Exodus (v. 1) and by His future actions (vv. 2–3). Both sets of actions reveal His identity as the Holy One and Savior of Israel (v. 3). The Lord's love for Israel made them precious in His sight, and they had been honored (v. 4). Therefore, He would give again, in a new exodus, people and nations in exchange for them. The second assurance, to not be afraid, is motivated by the Lord's presence and His promise to return scattered Israel (v. 5; cf. 11:11–12; 49:12–13).

Another phase in the disputation with the nations commences in 43:8–13. The Lord said that only He could promise salvation and grant it. The supportive evidence is Israel's election through Abraham and the Exodus. In the present situation, the Lord had appointed Israel as His witnesses and had chosen Israel to be His servant (v. 10; cf. 41:8–9; 42:1), and consequently they would, through personal experience, know and believe Him and understand that He is God. They were to testify that, in contrast to idols made by humans, the Lord is eternal (43:10, 13). Only He could save (v. 11). He had declared His plan in advance and then saved His people; there was no foreign god that could do the same (v. 12). Therefore, the Lord declared that Israel had the knowledge of the true God and were His witnesses (v. 12), announced His plans to restore and bless His people to the shame of the foreign idols, and asserted that no power could prevent His plans (v. 13).

In order to show that the Lord controls the future, He announced a new future saving act: the destruction of Babylon (v. 14). It was a most daring prophecy, announcing the fall of the proud Babylonians long before they became a powerful empire. God would send a message to Babylon, a message that is not quoted because the argument lies in its fulfillment, which would benefit God's people. In vv. 16–21 the prophet describes the liberation of Israel from Babylon as a new exodus.

43:22—44:5. Pleading with Israel. Isaiah records the Lord pleading with unfaithful Israel, who are pictured as living in a spiritual desert. They had failed to truly worship Him, and they had burdened Him with their sins (43:23–24). The Lord's plan was to restore Israel by mercifully forgiving them (v. 25; cf. 44:22; 55:7). He would not remember their sins but would ask them to remember Him. The Lord's declaration of the approaching restoration of Israel is announced. The Lord repeated that He had made and formed His people (43:1, 7), and since He would help them, they should not fear (vv. 1–2; cf. 41:10; 43:1, 5). "Jeshurun" is a rare poetic name which designates Israel as "upright one," according to its ideal character. The coming deliverance is described metaphorically as water for thirsty people and for dry ground, symbolizing the pouring out of the Lord's Spirit and His blessing on the children of Israel. The Lord promised that they would spring up among the grass (cf. 40:6–8) like willows or poplars by the streams (44:4). This metaphor implies strength, prosperity, and the continuity of God's people.

44:6–23. God Is Israel's King and Redeemer.

Several subordinate themes are integrated here under the notion that Israel's King and Redeemer, the Lord, is the only God in the world and would be recognized as such by the nations. The people of Israel were reminded about their role as God's witnesses (vv. 6–8). The central declaration—that there is no God besides the Lord (v. 6d)—is reinforced by the question and answer in v. 8: His people would testify that there is no God besides Him, no other Rock (cf. 17:10; 26:4; 32:2; 33:16)—their testimony founded on their experience of His salvation. For any god to compare with the Lord, evidence must be given that he has predicted an event that came to pass (44:7).

God contrasted Himself with the gods of the nations. He described the makers of idols (vv. 9–13), the idols themselves (vv. 9, 14–18), and the idol worshipers (vv. 9, 19–20). The repeated conclusion is that the idols cannot see or understand and that the idol worshipers will be ashamed (vv. 9, 11, 18). The passage contains an appeal to Israel to return to the Lord because of the assurance of His salvation. Isaiah presents Israel as the servant of the Lord, who was formed by Him, which implies that He would not forget them and that He had blotted out their sins (vv. 21–22; cf. 43:25). This reminder is followed by a summons to the world to praise the Lord for having redeemed Jacob and revealed His glory in Israel (44:23; cf. 52:9).

44:24–28. The Lord and the Future. The phrase “I am the LORD” (v. 24) may allude to the Lord's appearance to Moses, which preceded the Exodus (cf. Ex. 3:6–7, 14–15). A new exodus was announced in Isaiah 42:14–16 and 43:3–4. A summary in hymnic style mentions the Lord's actions in the past (Creation), present (verifying the words of His servant), and future (Jerusalem and Judah rebuilt). The point is that the future events predicted by the Lord and His prophet would come to pass because as Sovereign Lord His word is reliable. Jerusalem and Judah would be rebuilt, and Cyrus would be His appointed agent. Cyrus is partially portrayed as a second Moses, and as such (Deut. 18:17–18; Acts 3:22), he is a type of the Messiah (cf. 45:1, where he is in fact called a mashiakh, a “messiah”). Cyrus would free Israel from captivity; so also would the Messiah free His people from the captivity of sin (61:1; Matt. 1:21). The reference to the drying up of the deep and rivers/streams may be an allusion to the Exodus and Moses (Is. 44:27; cf. 63:11–13), as well as to the means by which Babylon was invaded and fell—that is, the accounts of some historians that Cyrus diverted the Euphrates River and entered the city through the dry channels. Isaiah calls Moses the shepherd of His flock (v. 11) and Cyrus His shepherd (44:28). The Lord would hold the right hand of Cyrus to lead His people out of Babylonia (45:1), just as He led Israel out of Egypt by the right hand of Moses (63:12). In 45:1–13 Cyrus is depicted as a conqueror of the nations. By destroying the power of the nations through Cyrus's predicted victories, the Lord would turn Israel and the nations to Himself (vv. 3–7).

The Lord first promised that through Cyrus Jerusalem would be inhabited and the destroyed cities of Judah would be rebuilt (44:26). The reference to Cyrus performing everything that God had desired (vv. 28b) does not mean that under Cyrus Jerusalem and the cities of Judah would be actually rebuilt but that he would initiate the process that would ultimately bring this about. Since the Lord Himself was Israel's Shepherd (40:11), Cyrus was His vassal. The Hebrew term hekal that is used in 44:28 can mean “temple” or “palace.” But contextually the palaces are included in the rebuilding of the city. According to Ezra 1:2–4, the decree issued by Cyrus authorized only the rebuilding of the temple.

45:1–8. God's Appointment of Cyrus. The divine appointment of Cyrus (vv. 1–3) was turned into an argument (vv. 3c–8) that proves that the God of Israel is the only true God. Thus, by His appointment of Cyrus—announced long before he appeared in history and even though he did not know the Lord (vv. 4–5)—God proved that only He is God, and therefore all nations would acknowledge that only He rules over light and darkness, peace and calamity (vv. 7–8). An extended messenger formula in v. 1 indicates that the Lord's commission appointment speech to Cyrus follows; it is found in vv. 2–8. It has the character of a covenant stipulated by the Overlord, “the God of Israel” (v. 3), and obediently accepted by the vassal, “Cyrus.” Cyrus would be His anointed (v. 1), which is used figuratively, as in 61:1 (there used in regard to the Messiah), and signifies his consecration to the Lord's plan (cf. Ps. 105:15; Jer. 1:5). The Lord would subdue the nations before him (Is. 45:1) and give him the treasures of the vanquished nations (v. 3). The Lord calling him by name (vv. 3–4) indicates that He knows Cyrus in advance and has titles of honor for him—His shepherd (44:28) and His anointed (45:1).

That Cyrus was a type of Christ is supported by the fact that both of these titles (in addition to being used for priests and kings in general—who were also types of Christ) are used for Christ in both the OT and NT (Shepherd: Ezek. 34:23–24; Mic. 5:2–5; Zech. 13:7; John 10; Heb. 13:20; 1 Pet. 2:25; Anointed/Messiah/Christ: Ps. 2:2; Is. 61:1; Dan. 9:25; Matt. 1:16; 16:16; Mark 14:61–62; Luke 9:20; 24:26; John 1:41; 20:31; Acts 10:38; Rev. 12:10).

Cyrus is promised victory over nations and kings, but this will be the Lord's work (45:1–3). The purpose of his victories involves not only liberating the Israelites and rebuilding Jerusalem and the temple but converting the nations (vv. 3, 5–7). The covenant with Cyrus was to have the purpose of bringing to him and to all nations the knowledge that the God of Israel is the only true God and that He would bring to the earth righteousness and salvation (vv. 3–8; cf. 2:2–4).

The naming of Cyrus is a sign of the Lord's divine power and foreknowledge (45:4–5). As He emerges in the book of Isaiah, the Lord certainly has the predictive power to reveal such a name in advance. The Lord is sovereign over all nations; He gives dominion to whomever He chooses and accomplishes His mission through any He deems fit.

45:9–25. Doubt and Assurance. This passage begins with a disputation against doubting the Lord's word (vv. 9–10) and turns into an assurance regarding His prediction of future events concerning Israel and His sovereignty over human history as based on His power as Creator (vv. 11–12). These points confirm the Lord's appointment of Cyrus in righteousness (i.e., in accordance with God's plan of salvation) and that He would direct all his ways or make them straight (v. 13). The reference to the idea that Cyrus would not receive a price or reward for freeing Israel is rooted in the concept that a slave could be redeemed by the payment of a ransom to his master. But, by the law of the covenant, a slave in Israel could be set free without payment on the seventh year (cf. 50:1; 58:6; Deut. 15:12–18).

The concluding statement that Cyrus would build God's city and let His exiles go free (Is. 45:13) summarizes the outcome of his victory over nations and kings (vv. 1–3). His actions meant that Jerusalem could be rebuilt and Israel would worship the Lord at Zion. Besides, the nations would submit to Israel (cf. 14:1–2) when they realized that God was with Israel and there was no other God (45:14–15; cf. 1 Cor.

14:25). The idol makers would be ashamed and disgraced, but Israel would be saved by the Lord with an everlasting salvation (45:16–17, 24–25).

Firstly, God is the only God because He created heaven and earth for a purpose (i.e., not in vain, to be empty, but to be inhabited; v. 18; Gen. 1:2ff.). Secondly, He had demonstrated that He alone is God by declaring true things for the purpose of saving the descendants of Jacob, His covenant people (45:19). But God would convince the surviving refugees from the nations that He is a just, righteous God and a Savior and that there is no other (vv. 20–21). God invited all the ends of the earth to find salvation in Him (v. 22). Many would recognize that only in the Lord could they have righteousness, deliverance, and strength, that those who were angry with God would be disgraced, and that every knee would bow before Him (vv. 23–24; cf. 2:2–4).

46:1–13. The God of Israel and the Gods of Babylon. Isaiah compares the Lord with Babylon's two main gods. The gods of Babylon were unable to save their worshipers, but the Lord had demonstrated that He could indeed save Israel. Bel (v. 1) is Bel Marduk, the chief god of the Babylonian pantheon, who was also manifested as the god Ashur. Bel was the supreme god of the nations, the head of the gods, and the creator of the world. Nebo was the son of Marduk/Ashur and was worshiped both in Babylon and Assyria. He was the god of destiny. Keeping the Tablets of Destiny, which were thought to predict and govern the fate of humans, he was seen as the (scribal) god of history.

One way to understand the metaphor of vv. 1–2 is that Bel and Nebo are compared to beasts of burden (cf. the Lord in vv. 3–4), carrying their burdens, in other words, the people worshipping them (cf. Israel as a burden of the Lord in vv. 3–4). The two gods could not deliver the burden. Instead, they had themselves gone into captivity (i.e., when their images were taken by conquerors; v. 2). Another way to understand this is that the images of Bel and Nebo were placed onto beasts of burden (v. 1) because they couldn't move about on their own. These supposed gods could not even rescue their own images that supposedly represented them—the gods (as it were) and their images would be carried into captivity. The Lord, however, had successfully carried His people from the womb and would continue to do so in their old age (vv. 3–4). He declared (lit. "I am He," i.e., Israel's God) that He had made them, and He would carry and save them (v. 4). Some of the same vocabulary is used here as in the description of Bel and Nebo—God was able to carry his people, but the false gods had to have people carry their idols. The comparison in vv. 1–4 between Bel/Nebo and the Lord leads to a general comparison between the idols and the Lord in vv. 5–7 (cf. 40:18–26). The Lord is incomparable (v. 5). The Lord is the Giver of life, but the idols were lifeless, made of gold and silver by a hired goldsmith and then worshiped as gods. It is only the God of Israel, the Creator-God, who deserves worship, not human-made idols.

Israel is encouraged to remember that the Lord had fulfilled His word and that He would do so again in the future. The Lord says, “I am God, and there is no other” (Is. 46:9). He had predicted actions in the past, such as those related to Abraham, the Exodus, and the conquest of Canaan, which He then fulfilled (v. 9), knowing and revealing the end from the beginning (v. 10). He predicted that He would call a bird of prey from a distant land in the east—the man to execute His plan. He had spoken it and would cause it to happen. He had planned it and would accomplish it (v. 11). Contextually, this is the prophecy concerning Cyrus. The point is that God’s prediction of future events would surely come to pass because He is the Lord of history. In conclusion, the Lord admonished obstinate Israel to listen to Him (v. 12). Being scattered among the nations, Israel would still be blind to the real identity of the Lord (cf. 40:27; 42:16–25; 43:22–28). God’s righteousness in 46:13 is closely related to His salvation or deliverance—they are placed in a parallel relationship. The contrast between “far” and “near” indicates that here “righteousness” has the same meaning as in v. 12b. The only way for sinful people who are far from God’s righteousness to be saved is for God to give them His own righteousness as a gift. The ultimate display of God’s righteousness for salvation is in the life, death, resurrection, and intercession of Christ (chap. 53). His salvation would be placed on Zion for Israel, who would be a display of His glory (i.e., the gathering of Israel on Zion would mean that the Lord would redeem and restore a wretched Israel so that they would reflect and be witness to His own splendor; cf. chaps. 60–62).

47:1–15. Humiliation of Babylon. Babylon is addressed as a queen (notice the mention of “virgin daughter” and “throne” in v. 1) who would be humiliated by the Lord’s vengeance (v. 3). This is followed by Israel’s collective acknowledgment of the Lord as “Redeemer” and the “Holy One of Israel” (v. 4). The silence referred to in v. 5 is the silence of grief or humiliation (cf. Lam. 2:10; Amos 8:3), and darkness is often used as a symbol for sorrow (Is. 9:2; 42:7; 50:10). The Lord explains that, being angry with His people, He had profaned or desecrated His inheritance (i.e., Israel) by giving them into the hands of Babylon (47:6). Punished and humiliated, Babylon would no longer be called the lady or queen of kingdoms (vv. 5, 7). The accusations against Babylon are of different kinds. Firstly, she had oppressed Israel without mercy while caring only about her own power and glory (vv. 6d–7; cf. 10:5–15). Secondly, she did not think of the One who had authorized her to punish His people and who would call her to account for her actions (47:7).

Babylon’s crime was especially her pride: she was addicted to pleasure (i.e., the Babylonians were prosperous and ignored their duties toward the Creator), she lived in security (i.e., they trusted in their power to maintain their own security), she thought that she was the “I am” and there was no one else like her (i.e., they were self-centered and claimed to be divine [cf. God’s words about Himself in 45:6; 46:9], amounting to blasphemy against the only God), and she thought that she would never know any loss or defeat (i.e., ignoring the Lord’s justice and control of history). The punishment would include widowhood and loss of children, and this would take place in a moment, in one day, and in fullness (47:9). These predictions were particularly fulfilled in the destruction of the city by the Medo-Persians.

Babylon was also guilty of sorcery (v. 9) and of being deluded by the misuse of their knowledge and wisdom, which resulted in blasphemous pride. Believing that misfortune came from demons or the anger of the gods, Babylon still felt secure because she was able to thwart the demons by sorcery, spells, and enchantments, and she did not know of any god who would punish her for her crimes. The result was that she trusted in her wickedness (v. 10). In the announcement of judgment (v. 11), Babylon is firmly placed under the jurisdiction of the Lord. Her enchanters and astrologers are summoned to demonstrate whether they can save her from what would come against her (vv. 12–13). The term usually translated as “astrologers” means literally in Hebrew “dividers of the heavens,” who seek to predict the future by studying the changing constellations of the stars. Those who look at the stars (sometimes translated as “stargazers”) may refer to some kind of astrological occupation or simply to worshipers of the stars.

There were also those who made monthly predictions, which involved lists of lucky and unlucky days and important events that ruled the lives of their followers. The astrologers would perish like stubble in the flames (v. 14). The fire may symbolize the anger of God on the day of judgment, but it could also refer to the destruction of conquered cities, which was usually by fire. The word sakhar in its participial form in v. 15 means literally “those who go around.” It has been translated as “merchants” or as those “who have trafficked,” “traded,” or “dealt with.” Some have understood the “merchants” to be representative of the practitioners of magic arts described in the previous verses. In Babylon, each astrologer-counselor offered a different prediction of the future (cf. v. 9), and each of them was in error. This is completely reversed when the Lord’s plan of salvation for Israel is offered in chapter 48.

48:1–11. God’s Plan for Israel. The prophet resumes the theme found in chapters 1–33 that Israel’s King would redeem Israel as an act of purification, enabling them to assume the task of a servant and to reveal Him as the true God to the nations (chaps. 49–54). Israel’s apostasy is described as a superficial, formal ritual faith or even hypocrisy. Isaiah says they claim to rely upon (lit. “lean upon”) the God of Israel (48:2), while in reality trusting in other gods. “The holy city” alludes to the Lord as “the Holy One of Israel”—the purified Jerusalem is ideally called the righteous and faithful city (1:25–26), and the purged remnant would be called “holy” (4:2–3).

Israel’s chastisement came as foretold because the Lord’s word accomplishes what He sends it to do (48:3–5; cf. 55:10–11). The point is to convince Israel of the certainty of the prophetic word and to confirm that the Lord gave them an opportunity to avoid their punishment. The Lord conceded (48:4) that He knew that Israel was obstinate, a state symbolized by an iron neck and a bronze forehead. His predictions were made to prove that He, as the Lord of history, and not the idols, brought the judgment.

The Lord would make them hear new, previously unknown things regarding the future (vv. 5–6). Israel had not heard or understood, for they were unable or unwilling to know their Lord (v. 8; cf. 6:9–10; 29:9–13; 43:8–13, 22–28). But through the vision of Isaiah, Israel was being admonished to notice what God was telling them (48:6) and to recognize that God would delay or defer His anger and not completely destroy them (v. 9). The chastisement of apostate Israel had been going on long enough (cf. 40:1–2). The Lord’s plan was to discipline them so that they would repent. His plan was not to annihilate them because He remained faithful to His covenant with them. Therefore, although Israel was not yet fully converted, He had forgiven them and would restore them by His love and mercy and not because of their merit (cf. 43:25; 44:21–22).

God had refined them, though not like silver. He had tested them in the “furnace of affliction,” the Exile (v. 10). The implementation of the Lord’s plan had so far resulted in the purification of Israel—the term translated “refine” has the literal sense of “smelt” (48:10; cf. 1:25). In the refining process, the “affliction” that had fallen upon Israel served as a smelting “furnace,” which alludes to the deliverance from Egypt (as in 48:20–21). As the Lord took Israel out of the iron-smelting furnace (i.e., Egypt) to be His people (Deut. 4:20), He had chosen Israel “in the furnace of affliction” (Is. 48:10; i.e., under Babylonian oppression) to restore them as His people (cf. 41:8–9; 44:1–2; 48:9–11; 49:7).

48:12–22. The Lord Predicts Redemption for Israel. The disputation here serves to establish that the redemption of Israel was part of the divine plan. At the passage’s beginning, Isaiah relates that the Speaker confirmed Himself as the only God, the First and the Last (vv. 12–13); then He called all nations together (v. 14).

A prophecy is announced concerning the future prosperity of Israel (vv. 14–15), which ties in with vv. 9–11, 20–21. The one whom the Lord had loved (some translations have “chosen”; v. 14) has been understood to refer to either Israel (who is referred to elsewhere in Isaiah as beloved of the Lord—43:4) or most probably to Cyrus, who would be instrumental in accomplishing God’s purposes against Babylon. The climax of the prophecy in 48:15 is the Lord’s words “I have called Him.”

The Lord urged the nations, including Israel, to come near to Him and listen (v. 16). It is a little difficult to identify the speaker in this verse. In the first part of v. 16, the speaker is clearly God, but it is not clear who is speaking in the last part of the verse as having been sent by Yahweh (lit. “and now the Lord Yahweh has sent me and His Spirit”). It could be Israel responding to God’s call. It could be the Messiah, representing His people, who would be sent and empowered by the Spirit (11:2; 42:1; 61:1), or it could be the prophet who would then proceed to deliver the message the Lord gave him (48:17–19). This last possibility is most likely. As Israel's Redeemer, God lamented their disobedience to His commandments (i.e., the core of the covenant), reminding them of all the benefits that would have come to them—instead of the furnace of affliction (v. 10)—if they had heeded His instructions.

The section ends with a prediction of the future salvation of Israel (vv. 20-21) and a caveat concerning the lack of peace for the wicked (v. 22). The command to Israel to flee from the Chaldeans in Babylon is in v. 20. The parallel "Babylon"/"Chaldeans" represents the home of the supreme idols among the nations (46:1-13) and the enemy that the Lord would humiliate by destruction and desolation (47:1-15). The command to leave or flee (i.e., to leave in haste; v. 20) is a reminder of the Exodus from Egypt (cf. Ex. 12:11, 31-34, 39; 14:5). Other allusions to the Exodus are Israel's song of praises to the Lord their Redeemer (Is. 48:20; cf. Ex. 14:31-15:21) and the Lord's sustenance of His people as illustrated by the provision of water (Is. 48:21; cf. Ex. 15:22-25; Num. 20:11; Ps. 78:15-16). The act of going forth from Babylon would enable Israel to proclaim to the ends of the earth that the Lord had redeemed His servant Jacob (Is. 48:20).

49:1-13. The Lord's Servant: A Light to the Nations. This passage is considered by some to be one of the so-called Servant Songs that supposedly originated independently of the present context, but since it is so well integrated in the context it is to be considered as originating in Isaiah for this specific context. The passage focuses on how the Lord commissioned His Servant to bring the knowledge of God to the nations. Scholars have debated the identity of this Servant without reaching a consensus. We will suggest that since the Servant's mission is to Israel, He cannot be Israel (see commentary on 42:4). In this passage Israel is embodied in this figure called the Servant, and the name functions as a messianic designation fulfilled in Jesus Christ (see "The Servant of the Lord in Isaiah," p. 885). The passage focuses on how the Lord commissioned His Servant to bring the knowledge of God to the nations. The Servant first acknowledged that the Lord had appointed and equipped Him as His Servant: the Lord's plan would be glorified in Him (49:3). But in the realization of His mission, He faced disappointment. However, the Servant anticipated success (v. 4).

Verse 5 begins with "and now," which indicates the arrival of a new situation that would result in the ultimate success of the work of the Servant of the Lord. His mission, which began with disappointment, would consist in bringing Jacob back to Him to gather Israel. However, His mission would also embrace the nations to whom the Servant would be given as a light (cf. 42:6-7). Through the Servant, the Lord's salvation would be given to "the ends of the earth" (49:6; cf. v. 8; 42:1-9; 44:5; 45:6-8, 14-25). This aim reveals the Lord's faithfulness to His covenant with Abraham and Israel (Gen. 22:18; cf. 12:3) and to the everlasting covenant with humanity (Is. 24:5; Gen. 9:12-17).

In Isaiah 49:7, Isaiah relates the Lord's announcement to the Servant that even though He would be despised and abhorred by His people, kings would see and stand (as a sign of homage) and princes would also worship (lit. "prostrate oneself"). This would be possible because of the faithfulness of the Lord to His commitment to save sinners. In v. 8, we find a description of the close connection between the Lord and the Servant. The references to the acceptable or favorable time are rooted in the genre of the individual lament. The troubled speaker waits for and hopes in the Lord (e.g., Ps. 69:3) and prays for salvation in a situation of unjust suffering, while the acceptable/favorable time (Ps. 69:13) would occur later when the prayer met with the Lord's favor. Isaiah 49 reveals a temporal structure that follows this pattern: (1) the Servant suffering unjustly while praying and waiting for the Lord (vv. 4, 7, 9); (2) the Lord hearing and helping Him (v. 8); (3) the Lord preserving Him and appointing Him as a covenant to restore the nations (v. 8d-g); and (4) the nations restored (vv. 9-12).

The meaning of the covenantal Servant (49:8; cf. 42:6) emerges in chapters 49-54: somehow the Servant reestablished the covenant in Himself after it was violated by the people. The people mentioned are primarily the people of Israel, though the context mentions the Gentiles as well. Through the Servant, the Lord would establish peace on earth (49:8; cf. 2:2-4; 54:1-17). Specifically, He would restore the earth/land and cause its inhabitants to live in the previously desolate areas (49:8), and the prisoners and those in darkness would emerge and see the light (v. 9; cf. 9:2; 42:7; 61:1). The proclamation of the prisoners' release is associated with the Jubilee (Lev. 25:8-17; see 2 Cor. 6:2). Under the leadership of the Servant Messiah, God would provide for the needs of His people as they gathered from the four corners of the world (Is. 49:10-12). The whole cosmos is called to rejoice in the Lord's comforting of His people and His merciful compassion to the afflicted.

49:14–23. God Remembers Zion. In spite of the rebellion of Zion, the Lord had not forgotten her. In fact, Zion reproached the Lord because she felt forsaken and forgotten by Him, implying that He did not have the will to save His people (v. 14). The Lord responded with words of assurance (vv. 15–16) and a promise (vv. 17–23). Surely, He had the will to restore His people. He had formed and created Israel (cf. 43:1; 44:1–2), and therefore He declared, “I will not forget you” (49:15; cf. 44:21). He had inscribed or engraved her name on the palms of His hands; His attention was continually directed toward her walls (49:16). Zion would be the Lord’s standard or banner for the peoples (v. 22).

The reference to the children (lit. “sons”) hastening (v. 17) reminds us of the Exodus from Egypt that took place hurriedly (see commentary on 48:12–22). In the second part of the verse, the rare Hebrew word haras is used. It has been translated as “destroyers” or “those who have laid you waste,” but it can also mean “those who have overthrown or overtaken you.” The Hebrew word kharab in the parallel expression that follows normally means “those who made you desolate,” a term referring to the removal of inhabitants from the cities and the land (37:18; 42:15; Judg. 16:24; Ezra 19:7; Zeph. 3:6; cf. the reference to those who had swallowed or devoured them in Is. 49:19). The survivors in Zion were admonished to look around and see the sons gathering together and coming to mother Zion (v. 18; cf. 60:4). “As I live” is the Lord’s oath (49:18; cf. 45:23) that Zion would ornament herself as a bride with the returning children of Israel (cf. Rev. 21:2). Zion, which had been desolated, would be rendered too small for all the many people returning to it (Is. 49:19–20). Zion would only wonder and marvel at what had happened (v. 21).

The gathering of scattered Israel is based on two actions communicating to Zion the reality of Yahweh and that those who wait obediently for the Lord would not be ashamed (v. 23). First, God would lift His beckoning hand to the nations (v. 22). The Servant of the Lord would be given as a light and a covenant to the nations (vv. 6, 8), and Isaiah presents the Lord affirming a covenant with them through His oath (v. 22). Second, the Lord would lift up a standard, or banner, for the peoples (v. 22). This “standard” or “banner” figuratively functions as the rallying point of scattered Israel and the peoples (cf. the figure of a light to the nations in v. 6), and this role would be fulfilled by Zion, the dwelling place of the Lord.

The kings, who would see and arise, and the princes (or “officials”), who would bow down in homage (v. 7), would come to Zion, bringing Israel’s sons and daughters. The scenes of the past deportations would be reversed.

49:24—50:3. The Lord’s Power to Save Israel.

This passage complements 49:14–23, answering the question raised in v. 24 and presenting the Lord as indeed able to save Zion-Israel from the mighty. The Lord’s answer is that scattered Israel would be saved even from mighty armies and terrible nations. He was committed to contend with those contending with Zion in order to save her children. He would punish Israel’s oppressors with internal strife or extreme situations of famine. The salvation of Zion-Israel is linked to a defeat of powerful nations. Therefore, all people would come to know of the Lord as the Savior, Redeemer, and Mighty One of Jacob (v. 26; cf. 60:16).

Isaiah presents Israel’s doubts about the Lord’s willingness and power to save them, which are finally summarized by the Lord (50:1–3) with answers to a series of questions. The first set of questions concerns the Lord’s willingness to save (cf. 49:14–23). Asking where the certificate of divorce was involved a metaphor of marriage for the relationship between the Lord and His people (50:1; cf. 54:6–8; 61:10). The covenant law stipulated that a permanent divorce was not valid unless the husband had issued a document of divorce and that, if his former wife remarried, the first husband could never take her back again (Deut. 24:1–4; Jer. 3:1, 8). However, in Israel’s case, there was no letter of divorce, which indicates that the Lord’s plan was to take her back again after a time of separation and chastisement (cf. Is. 54:6–8).

The second question applies the metaphor of selling children as slaves in payment of a debt (50:1). The rhetorical question in this verse is ironic, for the Lord had no creditors and would restore His children without money and without price (45:13; 52:3); namely, He would take back what rightfully belonged to Him. The nature of the metaphorical questions confirms the Lord’s certain willingness to save His people. The Israelites themselves must carry the blame for their disgrace (50:1).

The Lord’s power to save is raised in the second set of questions (vv. 2–3; cf. 49:24–26). First, He questioned Israel’s reluctance to trust His promises. In the second pair of questions, the Lord raised questions regarding His power (50:2). His answer invited the people to consider His power over both the earth and the heavens.

50:4–11. The Servant and Hope. This passage probes further into the work of the Servant (vv. 4–9). Verses 4–9 are usually considered another Servant Song with a call to listen to the Servant (50:10–51:8). The speaker in the text is not defined until the mention of His Servant in 50:10. The Lord had empowered the Servant to be an efficient teacher. His patient endurance under opposition and suffering illustrates His humble trust in God (cf. 54:6–10). This may be taken as a literal description of opposition to His instruction by fellow Israelites. The giving of the Servant's back to those striking it speaks of humility and willing submission (50:6). Plucking out the beard was an extreme form of insult (cf. 2 Sam. 10:5; Ezra 9:3; Neh. 13:25), and spitting was a sign of contempt (cf. Job 30:10). The Servant passed through a humiliating experience in the hands of fellow humans (Is. 50:6). This was fulfilled in the experience of Jesus.

The Lord God's help is mentioned in both vv. 7 and 9. Setting one's face like flint (v. 7) is a figure of resolute endurance in the face of opposition (cf. Jer. 1:18; 20:11; Ezek. 3:8–9). In Isaiah 50:8–9, the Servant's confidence in God is illustrated by the dual image of the Lord as a fair judge, who would pronounce judgment in His favor, and the Lord as His advocate, who would invalidate the charges against Him. Verses 10–11 present addresses to a wide group ("you" is in the plural), probably Israel as a whole, with different counsels to two opposite groups. First is a call for the attention of those who "fear the Lord" but who are despondent, reminding them to keep trusting in God. Second is an address to disobedient Israel. The metaphor of fire may be understood as a reference to the wicked and their actions (cf. 9:18; Job 31:11–12; Prov. 26:18). Isaiah records the mocking advice for them to walk in the light of their fire and among the torches or sparks that they had ignited (Is. 50:11; i.e., they were sarcastically told to continue living in their wickedness, which would be their own ruin).

51:1–16. Comforting the Faithful. The Lord would comfort and restore Zion by making it like the garden of the Lord (v. 3). As a reason for believing this promise, He admonished His people to remember where they had come from and the covenant with Abraham. The Lord announced that His law, or instruction (Heb. torah), and justice would be set as a light for the nations (cf. 42:6; 49:6, 8) and that Israel would soon experience His salvation through the defeat of their oppressors. God's righteousness is His faithfulness to the covenant, manifesting itself in acts of salvation (51:5–6). In metaphorical poetry, the "arm" of God is summoned to "awake" (v. 9). The Lord is asked to intervene as of old when He delivered His people from Egypt (vv. 9–10). The sorrow and sighing of the Lord's redeemed people would be replaced by everlasting joy (cf. 35:10; Rev. 21:1–4). God Himself comforts His people and reminds us not to be afraid of other human beings (cf. Ps. 27; Rom. 8:31–39).

The Lord's plan was to expose the oppressor's lack of power. He contrasted the (powerless) fury of the oppressor with His own promise to relieve and sustain the oppressed. Thus, the verbal expressions in v. 14 are in the future tense. The Hebrew verb tsa'ah (sometimes translated here in its participial form as "exile") can convey the idea of being bowed down (under a burden; cf. 51:14; Jer. 2:20). Accordingly, it is also translated as "the oppressed" or "cowering prisoners." The foundation of the assurance of deliverance (Is. 51:12–14) is expressed in vv. 15–16: Israel's God is the powerful Creator and loving Savior of His people. The mention of being covered in the shadow of God's hand is a repetition of the promise to the Lord's Servant (49:2). In 51:16, the Lord reaffirmed the promise to deliver His people and return them to the promised land.

51:17–23. Jerusalem Is Summoned. The Lord calls on Jerusalem to awake and rise up from the state of hopelessness in which it finds itself (vv. 17–20). Drinking from the cup of God's wrath (v. 17) means to experience God's judgment. The ensuing intoxication is a figure of fear, desperation, shame, and suffering (cf. Jer. 25:15–29; Lam. 4:21–22). Jerusalem is pictured in Isaiah 51:18–20 as a mother staggering under the effects of the drink, suffering especially by a decimation of her population. The Lord addressed the afflicted staggering under the weight of their affliction (vv. 21–23). He was contending for His people in a court of justice where the sins of Jerusalem had been condemned and the length of the punishment discussed (cf. Job 1:6–2:10). The Lord announced that He had removed His cup of wrath from Jerusalem and that she would no longer drink from it (cf. Is. 40:1–2). Instead, He would give the cup to those who had afflicted His people.

52:1–12. Zion-Jerusalem Is Summoned. In this case Zion-Jerusalem is summoned to dress herself for celebration. Jerusalem would again be called the holy city—the time of disgrace is now over, and the city is restored (cf. 1:21–26). The people of Zion-Jerusalem were told to remove their bonds themselves by believing in the Lord’s plan of deliverance. In 50:1 the Lord told His people that they had sold themselves into slavery because of their sins and, in 52:3, that they had sold themselves for nothing (cf. 45:13); therefore, they would be redeemed without money (i.e., the Lord would take back what he rightfully possessed).

The motif of redemption without price is further explored in 52:4–6, in the context of Israel’s slavery in Egypt (in the past) and in the Assyrian Empire (at present). The Lord delivered Israel from Egypt although they had willingly moved there. In the case of Assyria, however, the certainty of Israel’s deliverance by the Lord is even greater because Assyria oppresses them for no reason (i.e., Assyria did not pay a price for them—it took them by force—and, therefore, has no right to Israel now that the Lord is reclaiming His people). At the moment the Lord would take action, Israel would learn that He has both the power and the will to fulfill His promises, for His people would know His Name (i.e., they would witness His boundless power; v. 6).

The future deliverance of Zion and Israel is announced with absolute certainty (vv. 7–12). The feet of the heralds were already treading the mountains of Judah with the good news for Zion that there would be peace (i.e., deliverance, well-being, security, and harmony; cf. 54:10, 13) and salvation from God who reigns (52:7). The watchmen on the walls of Jerusalem (cf. 21:6–9; 40:9; 62:6–7) would sing and praise the Lord when they saw Him bringing back Zion

(i.e., scattered Israel; 52:8)—or, according to some renderings, when the Lord would return to Zion. Their hymn of praise is recorded in vv. 9–10. The promise was that God would bare His holy arm (i.e., He would throw back the folds of His garment in order to use His sword; cf. Ps. 74:11), a metaphorical description of a display of His power, deliverance, judgment, and care (cf. Is. 30:30; 33:2; 40:10–11; 51:9). Then all the earth would see God’s salvation (52:10). These clauses are vital for the understanding of 52:13–53:12.

Isaiah 52:11–12 describes the deliverance of the priestly servants of the temple as a new exodus. They were holy because their God was the Holy One of Israel. The return would be a new exodus under the Lord’s command: just as He had done then, He would go in front of and behind them (cf. Ex. 13:21–22; 14:19–20). But while the first Exodus was carried out with haste and flight, the new one would be peaceful and orderly because the oppressor’s power had already been broken (52:12).

52:13—53:12. The Suffering Servant of the Lord. This passage brings the mission of the Servant of the Lord to a climax (cf. 42:1–9; 49:1–9; 50:4–11). It is followed by the everlasting covenant of peace (chaps. 54–55) and the acknowledgment of the nations that the Lord is the only God (chaps. 56, 60, 66). As previously indicated, a number of attempts have been made to identify the Servant, but it is better to identify Him, as the NT does, with the Messiah, Jesus Christ (see below, “The Servant of the Lord in Isaiah”). The passage provides a glorious prophecy concerning the experience, ministry, and results of the Servant’s work.

The Servant of the Lord in Isaiah

The identity of the Servant of the Lord in Isaiah has been explored by scholars throughout history. In the NT, the Ethiopian, while reading Isaiah 53, raised the question but was unable to answer it and asked Phillip about the identity of the person described in the passage (Acts 8:34). Scholars have struggled with the question, but there is no consensus among them. As we look at the question, we will begin with what appears to be clearly stated in the text and try to draw some conclusions from that information.

1. Israel Is the Servant. No one would question that in some passages Isaiah indisputably identifies Israel as the servant of God. While announcing His work of gathering Israel from among the nations, the Lord states this clearly (41:8). Israel was the servant by divine election, and therefore God would not reject them (v. 9). Some of these ideas are repeated in 44:1–5. The promise of restoration is introduced with a message of encouragement (v. 1). The Lord had bound Israel to Him through election and creation, and in faithfulness to that commitment He would restore them (vv. 2–5), be with them, and become their Redeemer (vv. 6, 22; 48:20). It is even stated that the Lord would raise Cyrus as His anointed for the sake of His servant Jacob and His chosen Israel (45:4).

2. The Failure of Israel as Servant. It is also clear that, according to Isaiah, Israel often failed in their task as servant of God. In a disputation between God and His people, evidence is presented against them. Israel, the servant of God, is described as deaf and blind (42:18–19) because even though they saw many things, they did not obey the Lord (v. 20). They went into exile but were unwilling to learn from that experience and to understand that it happened because of their sins and their lack of obedience to the law of God (v. 24). But Israel as a servant was also a messenger (v. 19). The servant had a mission to the nations but was often unable to fulfill it because they were deaf and blind. God's plan to display His great and glorious law could not always be fulfilled through His people (vv. 21–22). Because of their spiritual corruption, they should not have even claimed to be Israel (48:1). Their actions did not correspond to their claim of being Israel. Of course, God did not give up on them, as the next two chapters indicate. Some have suggested that the faithful Israelites (the remnant) are the Servant in Isaiah 53. However, according to Isaiah, the faithful ones—the remnant—should obey God's Servant (50:10), and it is the Servant who causes Jacob to return to God and gathers Israel to the Lord (49:5). He is the One who will restore those of Israel that the Lord has preserved—the remnant—v. 6. Clearly, the remnant (52:8–12) is distinguished from the Servant of the Lord (52:13–53:12).

3. The Mission of the Anonymous Servant. There are some similarities between the anonymous Servant of the Lord and Israel as servant of the Lord. Both were chosen by the Lord (41:8; 42:1; 44:1–2; 49:1), called by Him (41:9; 42:6), and entrusted with a mission (42:1, 6–7; 43:10). But there are major differences indicating that the prophet is describing two different servants although both are closely related. The mission of the Servant of the Lord was different in that He had a mission to Israel. It consisted of the restoration of Israel and Jacob through the preservation of a remnant (49:5–6). Besides, the Lord gave the Servant as a covenant to the people, to restore the earth and set free the prisoners and those in darkness (vv. 8–9). This mission assigned to the Servant could not have been fulfilled by the nation of Israel.

The mission of the Servant is also universal (v. 6). The Servant would not simply proclaim salvation to the nations but would be their light and salvation, a task that would be impossible to assign to Israel or even to the prophet himself (cf. 56:1). He would also provide justice and truth to the nations (42:1–3) and would not stop until His justice and the law were established throughout the world (v. 4). The Lord gave the Servant as a covenant to the people and as a light to the Gentiles (v. 6). The new covenant mediated to Israel by the Servant who embodies it (49:8) would also include the Gentiles. He was called by the Lord to heal the blind and to free the prisoners and those in darkness (42:7). The blindness is universal, but it particularly applies to Israel (vv. 18–20). The means by which this most powerful act of salvation would be accomplished is not stated until 52:13–53:12.

4. The Experience of the Servant of the Lord. In the fulfillment of His mission, Isaiah presents the Servant as going through two main stages: humiliation and victory. From the very beginning, it is stated that the Servant would not lose strength or be discouraged (42:4), a description which implies that He would face serious challenges. In the so-called second Servant Song (49:1–9) we find a sequence of the trials and victories of the Servant. He testified that His work seemed to be in vain (v. 4). In the first stage of His experience, the work of the Servant appears unsuccessful, but He is not discouraged because His reward would be with the Lord (v. 4). By using the word “now,” the Lord announced a new task for His Servant (v. 5), namely, to bring salvation to Israel and to the nations (v. 6). Then we are taken back to the humiliating experience of the Servant being despised by the people and abhorred by the nation (v. 7). This is followed by the announcement of His victory: kings and princes would worship Him. He would be acknowledged as King of kings. This would be possible because at the proper moment the Lord would hear the prayer of His Servant, preserve Him, and give Him as a covenant to the people (v. 8).

The third so-called Servant Song (50:4–11) is more explicit concerning the humiliating experience of the Servant. He is described as struck and spat upon, and His beard is plucked (v. 6). In this passage He is willing to go through this physical assault, knowing that the Lord would help Him. He accordingly set His face “like a flint” (v. 7), persuaded that the Lord would vindicate Him (v. 8). The depth of the humiliation of the Servant of the Lord is more fully described in the fourth Servant Song (52:13–53:12).

5. The Identity of the Servant. The Servant is described as a person to whom the Lord had spoken (42:6–7) and who spoke about Himself (50:4–9). He is not a personification or a metaphor for Israel because His description in 49:1–9 is strongly individualistic, describing the Servant as a historical figure with a particular biography. Perhaps what is surprising is that the anonymous Servant in vv. 1–9 is specifically called Israel (v. 3). This is important in that although He could be differentiated from Israel, He still carried the name, thus indicating a deep connection between both. Here we should recall that behind the people of Israel lies an individual, namely, Jacob/Israel. What Isaiah seems to be saying is that now, in front of the people of Israel and related to their future, lies a single person, namely, Israel/the Servant of the Lord. Embodying Israel, He would accomplish for the people what they could not accomplish for themselves and much less for the nations of the earth. While not making the people of Israel irrelevant, He to the contrary appears in Isaiah bringing salvation to them and gathering them back as the people of God. He would accomplish what no human being could—God’s personal work of salvation for humanity. Isaiah only announces His future coming in humility (suffering) and glory. His identity is fully disclosed in the NT in the person of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

6. The Suffering Servant. It is in Isaiah 52:13–53:12 that the work of the Servant of the Lord is finally unveiled with penetrating detail. The passage begins and ends with a summary of the humiliation of the Servant (52:14; 53:12) as well as an announcement of His exaltation (52:13, 15; 53:11–12), and in between there is a vivid description of the attitude of the people, the humiliating experience of the Servant, and the Lord’s interpretation of the work of the Servant (vv. 1–10).

(a) The Experience of the Servant. First, we read about the appearance of the Servant. Isaiah presents Him as coming from humble beginnings like a plant growing in dry ground, hardly surviving the absence of water (53:2). The prophet says that people are not naturally attracted to Him. Second, He is described as sorrowful and familiar with kholi, literally “sickness,” which is sometimes translated as “pain” or “grief” (v. 3), and his appearance at some point would be disfigured or marred beyond recognition (52:14). In fact, He would be oppressed, afflicted (53:7), placed in confinement, and condemned as a wicked person (v. 8). He would finally die (v. 8), having been treated like a criminal, but would be with the rich in His death (v. 9). Third, the people would reject Him and argue that He had no beauty to make Him desirable (v. 2). They would despise and abandon Him and would not value Him (v. 3). They would see in the Servant a person under a divine curse who was struck by God and afflicted (v. 4), a person abandoned by God.

(b) Repentance of the People. There is a moment when the people finally understand the significance of the experience of the Suffering Servant. First, they acknowledge their sins and confess that all of them had been like straying, lost sheep who followed their own ways (v. 6). Second, they realize that the Servant did not deserve what He went through because He had done no violence and had not been deceitful (v. 9). Although innocent, He did not open His mouth but was led like a lamb to the slaughter (v. 7). Third, they give deep theological significance to the sufferings of the Servant: He was bearing their sins and taking on what they deserved. He died as their substitute. They would recognize that He had borne their sicknesses and sorrows (v. 4), that He was wounded for their transgressions and crushed for their iniquities (v. 5), and that He was chastised in order for them to have peace with and healing from God. This was possible because the Lord would lay upon Him the iniquity of all (v. 6).

(c) God and the Servant. The biblical text also provides for us the divine perspective of the experience of the Suffering Servant. First, the Lord provides through Isaiah a theological interpretation that coincides with that of the people and goes deeper. The Lord states that the Servant would be struck for the transgression of His people (v. 8), but this is part of the divine plan for their salvation. It was God's will that the Servant be bruised and experience grief. This is interpreted as a sacrificial act (v. 10) by which the Servant would bear the iniquities of the people (v. 11). God had provided the Sacrifice that would finally resolve the problem of sin. As a sacrifice, the Suffering Servant poured out His life, was numbered with the transgressors, and bore the sin of many (v. 12). As a result of His substitutionary death, the Servant would now function as their intercessor (v. 12) and would justify many (v. 11). Second, the Lord announces the exaltation of the Servant, which is firmly grounded on His sacrificial death as a substitute for sinners. His death would be followed by His return to life to see the satisfying result of His sacrifice (v. 11). He would come out victorious over His enemies and would get the spoils of victory (v. 12). Kings would submit to Him, and He would be highly exalted (v. 13).

(d) The Servant and the Nations. The atoning work of the Suffering Servant that emerges in 52:13—53:12 becomes the foundation for the establishment of peace on earth in 54:1–17. He would restore the earth and cause the people to dwell in previously desolate areas (49:8). The prisoners and those in darkness would be freed (v. 9; cf. 42:7). The exaltation of the Servant (52:13; 53:10–12) would include the restoration of His people and Zion's Davidic glory, which would bring the nations together to worship the Lord (49:5–6; 55:3–5; 56:6–8; 60:1–22; 66:18–24). The Lord's covenant with Israel would be embraced by the nations, and worldwide peace would follow (2:2–4; 51:4–5; 54:1–56:8). The establishment of God's worldwide rule through the Servant would not be through violent means but in humility (42:1–4; 50:4–9), in righteousness (45:22–25; 51:4–5), and by His Spirit (42:1; 61:1–3). The Servant's atoning suffering would make it possible for the nations to participate in Israel's glorification and victory (53:12; 60:1–62:12). Thus, Israel's descendants would inherit the nations (54:3; cf. Gen. 12:1–3).

7. The Suffering Servant and Jesus. The description of the experience and work of the Suffering Servant places Him in a unique category incomparable to that of any other human being or that of Israel. Here the Israelite sacrificial system reaches and transcends its deepest significance. Its symbolic or typological function is implicitly recognized as the Servant of the Lord is identified as the ultimate substitutionary sacrifice for sin, provided by the Lord Himself. The NT announces that the Suffering Servant of the Lord had come in the person and ministry of Jesus Christ and bears ample witness to it. He is the true Servant of the Lord who fulfilled in every detail the prophetic word of Isaiah (e.g., Matt. 8:14–17; Mark 10:45; 15:28; Luke 22:35–38; John 12:37–41; Acts 8:32–35; Phil. 2:5–9; 1 Pet. 2:19–25). When the Ethiopian asked Philip about the identity of this anonymous Servant, Philip took the opportunity to show him all the places in the Hebrew Bible where the coming of this messianic figure was predicted. He then presented to the eunuch the fulfillment of these prophecies in the life, ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus the Christ/Messiah (Acts 8:35).

Isaiah 52:13—53:12 is quoted or alluded to in the NT more than any other OT passage (e.g., Matt. 8:14–17; Mark 10:45; 15:28; Luke 22:35–38; John 12:37–41; Acts 8:32–35; Phil. 2:5–9; 1 Pet. 2:19–25). The earliest Christians regarded Isaiah 52:13—53:12 as a prophecy of the expiating suffering, death, and exaltation of Jesus (e.g., Acts 8:32–35; cf. Is. 42:1–4 and Matt. 12:18–21; Is. 61:1–2a and Luke 4:16–21). It is clear that Jesus thought of His sufferings as having been written about in certain passages of the Scriptures (Matt. 26:24, 54, 56; Mark 9:12; Luke 18:31; 24:25–27, 46) and that Isaiah 52:13—53:12 belonged to them. He must have had Isaiah 53 in mind when He spoke of coming to be a Servant who would give His life as a ransom for many (Mark 10:45).

The identification of Jesus as the Suffering Servant of Isaiah is established on several grounds. First, a messianic understanding of the Servant in 52:13—53:12 is facilitated by the pronounced individual character of the Suffering Servant as the agent of peace in an everlasting covenant (53:5; 54:10; 55:4). The recurring features associated with David in the passage (see 52:13–14; 53:2, 6, 10–12), and Isaiah’s prophecies in 9:2–7 and 11:1–10, further invite the reader to a messianic understanding. Second, as indicated by historical facts, Jesus’s suffering, death, and resurrection match several striking details in Isaiah 52:13–53:12, like His humble beginnings (53:2), His rejection (52:14; 53:2–3, 7–9), His expiation of the human burden of sin laid upon Him by God (vv. 4–6, 10–12), His intercession for transgressors (v. 12), His being assigned a grave with the wicked and the rich at His death (v. 9), and His glorification (52:13; 53:11, 12). According to the NT, the prophecy of the Suffering Servant unquestionably found its fulfillment in Christ.

52:13–15. The Nations Are Astonished. The nations would be greatly perplexed at the Servant’s success and exaltation. Notice that future events are stated as if they have already taken place. The Servant’s exaltation (52:13 summarizes 53:10–12) is contrasted with His suffering and dishonor (52:14 summarizes 53:2–3). The shift from humiliation/suffering to exaltation/glory was to elicit the amazement and respect of kings (52:15–53:1). The interjection hinneh (“behold” or “see” in 52:13) calls attention to the Servant’s future exaltation, which would be seen with amazement by the nations. The Hebrew verb sakal has been translated as “act wisely/insightfully,” “deal prudently,” or “succeed.” The idea in vv. 14–15 is that just as many were astonished at the Servant’s suffering, so also would many be astonished at His exaltation. The Hebrew rabbim (“many”), used several times in Isaiah 52:13–53:12, generally has an inclusive meaning (“a multitude” or “whole assembly”), but here it may mean “all.” In 52:15 “many nations” refers to all the nations that would see the Lord’s power and salvation (v. 10). The “many” in 53:11 designates all, the great multitude, or the whole assembly, and includes the “we” (i.e., people of God who speak in vv. 1–6) and “they” (i.e., many nations and kings in 52:15). Finally, the rabbim in the first part of 53:12 seems to refer to a host of prominent and powerful nations, namely, an elite body of nations among “all nations.” The second reference to rabbim in that same verse refers to the same group as the “many” in 53:11 (i.e., all, or the great multitude, or the whole assembly).

His disfigurement or marred appearance is probably a way of speaking about His suffering and humiliation (cf. v. 2; Pss. 22:6–8, 12–18; 38:3–14). Through His actions, the Servant would purify the nations of their guilt (Is. 52:15) and enable them to approach the Holy One of Israel. The kings would shut their mouths in amazement and wonder (cf. Job 29:9) because they would see the Lord’s mighty acts that were predicted in Isaiah 52:10.

53:1–3. Humiliation and Rejection. In the previous passage, the speaker was the Lord, but now the speaker is “we,” the people of God. They speak about their shemu’ah, literally “something heard,” in other words, their “report” or “message” and what the Lord’s “arm” has revealed that has amazed them. The amazement is expressed in two rhetorical questions concerning those who had believed these things (v. 1). The “we” in vv. 1–6 first see the Servant’s suffering and despise Him (vv. 1–3) but later consider that He actually suffered innocently and atoned for “our” sins (vv. 4–6). They finally hear the Lord’s words identifying all this as a fulfillment of the Lord’s purpose (vv. 7–10). The Lord would exalt the Servant among the nations (vv. 10–12).

The reference to the Servant growing up (v. 2) covers His birth and earthly ministry, leading to the preparation of His tomb (vv. 2–9) and, finally, His exaltation (52:13; 53:12). The phrase “before Him” denotes being in the presence, and under the watch, of the Lord. The metaphors of the tender plant or shoot and the root from the dry ground are the opposite of the tree planted by the water (Ps. 1:3), which refers to one who enjoys the divine blessing (cf. Is. 41:17–20). The Servant would have no hadar, “glory” or “honor,” and His appearance would not be desirable—He would not stand out by virtue of outward splendor. The people would despise and reject (or forsake) the Servant; they would think that He was under the curse of God, based on a connection between suffering and sin (53:4–5; cf. Ps. 38:11). The Hebrew words in Isaiah 53:3 are sometimes translated as “sorrows,” and “grief” can also be rendered as “pain” and “sickness.” The hiding of faces refers to the Servant’s lack of support. He who took the sins of the world upon Himself would be rejected by the sinners for whom He came to die.

53:4-9. A Radical Change. The “we” finally recognize the reason for the Servant’s suffering, that He was a righteous person and was not smitten and afflicted by God for His own sin (vv. 4-5). His suffering was caused by their griefs (sickness) and sorrows (pains), by their transgressions and iniquities. They see that the penalty that grants them peace was placed on Him and resulted in healing for them (v. 5). The Servant was God’s instrument for their salvation and redemption. The reason for the people’s insight is not explicitly stated but seems to be the result of the Lord’s exaltation of the Servant (vv. 10-12), which brought peace and healing to them and resulted in their being declared righteous.

The Hebrew word ’aken, “surely,” in this case emphasizes a contrast: “but indeed,” “but in fact.” Verses 4-6 are contrasted with vv. 2-3, underlining the realization that the Servant’s grief (or sickness) and sorrows (or pain) in v. 3 are in reality our grief, sickness, sorrows, or pain that would be borne by Him (v. 4). The Servant would suffer for our transgressions and iniquities, and this undeserved punishment would bring us peace—and we would be healed by His wounds (v. 5). The people realized that they were wrong to think that the Servant deserved to be chastised by God (vv. 4-5). They saw that their own transgressions and iniquities had caused His sufferings and had even brought them peace and healing. Their confession that they had lost their way appears in v. 6, along with their confirmation that the Lord had atoned for their iniquity through His Servant. Indeed, it is only through confession and faith—that the Lord Jesus is our Savior—that one can receive the gift of salvation made available through His suffering and death.

The confession that all of us have gone astray (cf. Ps. 119:176; Jer. 50:6; 1 Pet. 2:25) and have turned to our own ways (cf. Is. 56:11; 1 Sam. 8:3) is answered by an act of forgiveness from the Lord: the Lord would lay all of our iniquities upon the Suffering Servant. Through Isaiah, the Lord had repeatedly made assurances of forgiveness, but this generally had referred to Israel (Is. 33:24; 43:25; 44:21-22). In 53:6 forgiveness is extended to all people. From being mere witnesses of the Lord’s salvation of Israel (52:10), the nations would be drawn into a closer relationship with the Lord through the ministry and atoning death of the Servant.

Acting as the Shepherd of His sheep (53:6), the Lord would restore the people by letting His Servant become an atoning and substitutionary sacrifice. Thus, in 52:13-53:12, the Lord is presented with a twofold purpose: to save Israel and the nations by opening their eyes to who He is and to vindicate His Suffering Servant. By exalting Him, the Lord confirms both His pleasure with the work of the Servant and that His purpose has been achieved successfully through the Servant. In the divine speech in 53:7-9, the Servant’s innocence, silence, and humility are described. His undeserved sufferings are therefore presented as sufficient for the expiation of the sins of all people. The verb ’anah is usually translated as “afflicted” here, but it could also be rendered as “He humbled himself.” The clause would then mean “He was oppressed, but He humbled Himself and did not open His mouth.” The Servant’s silence is underlined through repetition. The Servant’s silence (vv. 7-9) anticipates the Lord’s intervention (vv. 10-12).

It is also stated that the Servant would be taken away by coercion or restraint (some translations have “prison”; v. 8). The Hebrew word dor, usually translated as “generation,” could also convey here the idea of “fate” or “plight,” and the word siakh, sometimes translated as “declare,” essentially means to “consider.” The translation would then be “And who [i.e., no one] will consider His plight?” (cf. 53:3). In a positive context, “the land of the living” refers to the sphere of life and shows that the Servant died—He was “cut off” for the transgressions of God’s people. The innocent suffered for the guilty (cf. 1 Pet. 3:18). Assigning the Servant’s grave with the wicked means that He was considered a criminal. Being buried among criminals was deeply shameful in Israel, but being buried with a rich person after a violent death would reveal innocence (Is. 53:9).

53:10-12. Exaltation of the Servant. In Isaiah’s account, accomplishing the Lord’s purpose through sacrificial suffering results in the Servant’s exaltation. It was the purpose (lit. “be willing”) of the Lord Himself to cause the suffering of the Servant (v. 10). This indicates that what the Lord was doing through the Servant was not done reluctantly but out of love. The Lord was pleased that humanity would be brought back to Himself through the Servant’s suffering, and He was personally involved in the Servant’s experience, reconciling the world through His death (cf. 2 Cor. 5:19). This happened when God made the Servant’s soul or life an offering for sin. The Hebrew speaks about a trespass/reparation offering brought for the misappropriation of what belonged to the Lord, a very serious sin (see Lev. 5:1-13). The Servant atoned for the sin of the many.

The Servant would be raised from death and see the wonderful results of His immense sacrifice (Is. 53:10). In some manuscripts and the Greek version (LXX), the text reads: “He shall see light from the labor of His soul/life,” in contrast to the Hebrew text, which refers to the Servant seeing the labor of His life (or “soul”) and being satisfied (v. 11). The Lord confirms the expiating effect of the Servant’s sacrifice: the Servant’s knowledge (v. 11) could be the object of the preceding clause (being satisfied by His knowledge). Various suggestions have been made concerning what kind of knowledge is meant here. In Isaiah, the central knowledge is to know God, understand who He is, and consider His plan (1:3; 37:20; 43:10; 49:23, 26; 52:6; 60:16). But knowledge is also experiential, so it could here refer to the experiences leading to the Servant’s death. If “by His knowledge” is a continuation of “and be satisfied,” then the idea is that the Servant shall be satisfied by what He shall see after His suffering. However, if “knowledge” is the experience of suffering, then the point is that the Servant would justify many by His suffering. By stating that the Servant is “righteous,” the Lord underlines the Servant’s innocence (53:6, 9–11; Deut. 32:4; Ps. 145:17; on bear iniquity/sin, see Lev. 16:22).

The Servant’s reward and exaltation are closely related to His justification of the people by expiating their iniquities (Is. 53:11–12), and in doing this He would accomplish the Lord’s purpose (v. 10). The military expression regarding the division of plunder with the strong or mighty is associated with victory, power, and rejoicing, used figuratively here for the victory of the Servant over His enemies. The Servant would pour out His life and die (v. 12; cf. v. 8c). His life is figuratively seen as being “poured out,” like the blood/life of a sacrificial victim. The term paga’ means “entreat passionately” on behalf of someone, or “intercede for someone” (cf. 59:16). The Servant is here assigned a priestly and prophetic role of intercession.

54:1–17. Citizens of Zion. The restoration of Zion is based on the Lord’s everlasting covenants with Israel (vv. 1–17), David (55:3–4), and the nations (24:5; 54:5; 55:5). Zion would expand and spread out in all directions because of the increase in population. Her people would receive the nations, and the desolate cities would become inhabited. The period of disgrace was over. The Lord declared that Zion’s husband is her Maker (cf. 43:1), who is also the God of all the earth, a concept that underlines the Servant’s atonement for all the earth (52:13–53:12) and the gathering of the nations in Zion (56:3–8). The Lord’s abandonment of Zion only lasted for a short while because He loved her and would reclaim her with abundant compassion, mercy, and everlasting khesed—a rich word with many connotations such as “love,” “kindness,” “covenant faithfulness,” “mercy” and so forth (vv. 7–8; cf. 49:10). He had determined not to be angry again with Israel (54:9–10). The mountains and the hills might be removed (i.e., symbols of stability and permanence), but neither His khesed (love, mercy, and kindness) nor His covenant of peace were to be removed (v. 10; cf. Ps. 125:1). Since all their children would be taught by the Lord, Zion’s inhabitants would know the Lord’s torah (“law,” “instruction”; cf. Is. 48:18–19) and do what He desires.

As is common in Isaiah, righteousness is associated with salvation or redemption (v. 14; cf. 1:26–27; 56:1). Being far from tyranny and oppression meant that they were to consider themselves free from oppression. Internal injustices (cf. e.g., 1:10–31; 3:1–4:1; 5:1–23) and foreign oppression (cf. 52:4–5) would be absent. When enemies would assemble, they would fall and surrender to them because the Lord would protect His people (v. 15). Zion would be immune to enemy attacks because weapons would fail against her, as would false accusations in court. The Lord declared that this heritage of peace belonged to the servants of the Lord (i.e., the faithful Israelites) and that their righteousness (or salvation/vindication) comes from the Lord. God’s grace forgives and cleanses; the righteousness of the Servant translates into the salvation of His faithful servants because it is accounted as theirs.

55:1–13. Embracing Life. Isaiah here conveys the Lord’s invitation to embrace His offer of life, which is offered without money and cost and is satisfying because it is good (v. 2). The life offered by the foreign gods requires the spending of money but yields what is not bread, what does not satisfy (v. 2). There is an appeal to listen and come to God for life made on the basis of the promised khesed, “mercy,” “love,” “kindness,” “faithful love,” for David. This refers to the promises that the Davidic dynasty would endure forever (2 Sam. 7:8–16) and that Israel would dwell securely and have rest from their enemies (vv. 9–11). These promises were an everlasting covenant (Is. 55:3; cf. 2 Sam. 22:51; 23:5; Pss. 18:49–50; 21:7; 89:28–49).

According to Isaiah 55:3–5, the Lord would appoint the new David as a witness to the peoples and a leader/ruler/commander for them.

David was commissioned to incorporate the nations into his kingdom (cf. 11:10–16; 14:1–3). The new David would witness to the nations about the Lord's glorious acts (cf. Ps. 18:49; Is. 11:9–10). The words in 55:3–5 allude to the promise to give the Davidic King (ultimately, the Messiah) the nations as an inheritance and the whole earth as a possession (Ps. 2:8; cf. Is. 54:3). Worshipers in the temple may have been familiar with Ps. 18:43–44, which also refers to a Davidic dominion over the nations, including a people that he had previously not known. The fact that God glorified Israel makes it possible for them to attract unknown people groups, who will come streaming to Israel (Is. 55:5); like David, they will have dominion over the nations (cf. 9:2–7; 11:1–10). The message to Israel, therefore, was that the Lord's covenant with and promises to David are everlasting. The invitation to repentance was an act of grace from God, whose love and righteousness, so deep and unsearchable, are above human imagination (55:6–9) and whose word is powerful and effects salvation (cf. 40:6–8). Repentant receivers of forgiveness would have joy and peace and would glorify the Lord's name (55:12).

56:1—66:24

The Restored Covenant Community at Zion

The invitation and call for repentance in chapter 55 is followed by an instruction concerning the restored covenant community gathering for worship at Zion. It is formed as a chiasm:

- A Requirements for Becoming Citizens of Restored Zion (chaps. 56–59)
- B The Glory of the Restored Covenant Community (chaps. 60–62)
- A' Selection of Citizens for Restored Zion (chaps. 63–66)

56:1–12. Sabbath Obedience and Leaders.

Justice and righteousness—shown to God and one's fellow beings (vv. 1–2)—are defined as the central principles for belonging to restored Zion. A brief instruction outlines the principle of keeping justice and doing righteousness in order to enjoy blessings. Two specific laws are mentioned in v. 2. First, to avoid profaning the Sabbath is to remember it as a sign of the covenant with the Lord (Ex. 31:12–17; Ezek. 20:12, 20). Acknowledging that a seventh of all time belongs to God symbolizes the Creator's complete lordship in the believer's life. Its blessing consists in a deep communion with God as the Savior and is symbolized by resting from human labor. Isaiah develops his teaching on the Sabbath in 56:6–7 and 58:13–14. Second, to keep one's hand from doing any evil is to actively do acts of kindness to one's fellow humans (see vv. 6–7, 9–10). Foreigners and eunuchs represent people from “all nations” (v. 7). The restrictions against their participation in the assembly of the Lord (vv. 6–7; Deut. 23:1–8; cf. Lev. 21:16–20) would not impede them as long as they would keep the covenant and serve the Lord (Is. 56:4–6; cf. Josh. 2; Ruth).

The Lord ordained that eunuchs—who by accident or intent had lost their ability to procreate—fulfilling the covenant requirements would be given a yad (lit. “hand”; translated as “place” or “memorial”) and a name in the temple. A eunuch was unable to have children, and his name was therefore not carried on in the community. This inability would be compensated by the better gift of having an eternal name with the Lord—spiritual blessings far outweigh material blessings. The Lord ordained that foreign proselytes be brought to His holy mountain to rejoice in His house of prayer. It was His plan that His house would be called a house of prayer for all nations (cf. 52:13–53:12; Matt. 21:13; Mark 11:17; Luke 19:46). The Lord God, gatherer of the dispersed exiles and outcasts of Israel (cf. Is. 11:12), would gather others together with them (56:8). It was necessary for Israel's failing leaders to repent in order to belong to restored Zion (vv. 9–12). Their negligence had made the flock an easy prey for wild beasts. They disregarded the Lord, became drunk, and saw no danger coming.

57:1–13. Israel and Idolatry. Something awful was happening in Israel; the righteous people were perishing, and consequently the whole nation was becoming corrupt. Those who were upright would find peace and rest in death (lit. “lying down” or “in their beds,” that is to say, in their graves). The idolaters are addressed as the offspring of sorceresses, adulterers, and prostitutes. Unfaithful Zion-Jerusalem had raised unfaithful children. They seem to have been scoffing and ridiculing the prophet (57:4). The Hebrew term khamam can mean “warm yourself” or may refer to being sexually “heated up” or “inflamed” (cf. Gen. 30:38–39). The mention of “every green [or spreading/luxuriant] tree” (Is. 57:5) is a formulaic reference to Canaanite fertility cults and shows that Israel was involved in idolatry. Child sacrifices were condemned by the prophets (cf. Jer. 7:31; Ezek. 20:31; Mic. 6:7).

The audience in Isaiah 57:6–13 is addressed in the feminine singular as one acting like a prostitute (i.e., Zion-Jerusalem). The mention of “smooth” (most translations supply “stones” as the referent) is referring to some kind of pagan rite. “Portion” and “lot” combine the idea of choice and its consequences: as the Israelites had chosen, so would be their fate. Those to whom they had given offerings may refer to the ’ayil, which can be rendered as the “oak,” “terebinth,” or “pillar” (some translations accordingly have “gods”) mentioned in v. 5 or the “smooth stones” mentioned in v. 6. It seems that the Lord was among the deities worshiped by the people. This syncretism or polytheism was an abomination against the Lord. Drink offerings and grain offerings were legitimately offered to the Lord, but He was not to receive comfort in their having been given to other gods. The Lord then turned to the fertility cults, whose rituals were performed on the mountains (v. 7). The reference to a bed suggests a cult with sexual practices, as was common in Canaanite cults (cf. Ezek. 23:17).

The mention of activities behind doors and posts may refer to private homes or shrines (Is. 57:8). In view of the context, the term zikkaron, literally “remembrance” or “sign,” may refer to a pagan cult symbol, perhaps an image of the male sexual organ, which would not have been unusual in the ANE. This term zikkaron may be related to a word meaning “male” (cf. Ezek. 16:17). The use of sexual imagery in Isaiah 57:8 indicates idol worship as spiritual whoredom. The last part of v. 8 literally means “you saw [or looked with satisfaction at] a hand”—the word for “hand” can be used as a euphemism for the male sexual organ. Zion the prostitute had tried to attract foreign lovers to herself (v. 9). The mention of going to the king could refer to Jerusalem’s approach to a foreign king or, if the Hebrew word for king—melek—is pointed differently as molek, to a foreign false god. In either case, this resulted in idolatry and apostasy (cf. 2 Kin. 16; cf. Is. 7). The statement that unfaithful Jerusalem even descended to Sheol (the realm of the dead) may refer to the “covenant with death” mentioned in 28:14–22.

Israel’s stiff-necked idolatry continued at length. The phrase “life of your hand,” in the latter part of 57:10, has been understood as referring to Israel’s continued commitment to their stubborn idolatry or alternatively as referring to the fruits of the soil that resulted from human work but for which Israel failed to be thankful to the Lord, as demonstrated in their idolatry (vv. 11, 19; cf. Hos. 2:8). The last view is preferable. God reproached His people’s deceit and predicted their fate. Israel had lied (57:11) by disgracing the covenant through syncretistic fertility-cult practices (v. 5) and by claiming a righteousness with requirements they failed to meet (v. 12). The Lord proceeded to address the apostates with irony (vv. 12–13), proclaiming them as doomed to rely on their useless idols for salvation. But only those trusting in the Lord would find salvation by inheriting the land and possessing God’s holy mountain (v. 13).

57:14—58:14. The Need for Humility. The speaker in v. 14 is not identified. The Hebrew verb indicates “He will say” or “it will be said.” Here the Lord indicated that for Israel to return/repent, the stumbling block or obstacle had to be removed. The stumbling block was the people’s lack of a contrite and humble, lowly spirit. This spirit characterizes the faithful worshiper for whom the Lord particularly cares (cf. 66:2; Pss. 34:18; 51:17). Coming to the Lord in the spirit of true worship was the implied purpose of the restoration of Zion. The Lord assured His people that His anger would not last (Is. 57:16–21; cf. 40:1–2) because He did not want them to despair. He therefore promised comfort, healing, and peace to all Israel, far and near. The Lord would heal the righteous (cf. 57:1–2), but God said there is no peace for the wicked (cf. 56:9–12; 57:3–13).

Desirous for His people to humble themselves, He instructed them on what humility really looks like (58:1–14). Although the people acknowledged the Lord as their God, worshiped Him, and daily sought Him, they failed to understand why He did not answer their prayers. The reason was that they fasted with the wrong attitude and for the wrong purpose and they transgressed against God and other human beings (vv. 2–3; cf. 56:2). The last part of 58:4 has been understood either as a command (to discontinue their contentious fasting) or more likely as a warning that they would not be heard “on high” if they continued in their error. The Lord’s chosen or required fast is described as doing acts of kindness to the needy (vv. 6–7), for only then would they receive divine blessings (vv. 8–9).

The teaching on the true fast continues with an application of the two principles mentioned in 56:2: human relations (58:9–12) and the Sabbath (vv. 13–14). If the Lord’s people would practice compassion, such as feeding the hungry and helping the afflicted (vv. 9–10; cf. vv. 6–7), then darkness and gloom would disappear, and God would constantly guide His people. He would provide for them, like a shepherd, and give the flock food, drink, and protection (v. 11; cf. 40:11). He would strengthen their bones (or frame; v. 11c; cf. 66:14)—the bones were considered the seat of health and strength (cf. Job 20:11; 21:24). The comparison to water, springs, and gardens symbolizes the blessings of well-being and bliss.

The instruction concerning the Sabbath (58:13–14) is warranted because the Sabbath is a fundamental law in the covenant (56:2–7). In vv. 1–2, it expresses justice and righteousness. Here the Lord refers to the Sabbath as His holy day (cf. Ex. 20:8; Deut. 5:12), which humans should consider to be an honor and a delight. Two rewards are promised for Sabbath observance: (1) joy, restoration, and revitalization from the Lord; and (2) a triumphant ride on the high hills with abundant sustenance from the heritage of Jacob (cf. Deut. 32:13–14; Ps. 18:33; Hab. 3:19). The emphasis on Sabbath keeping as a requirement for becoming citizens of a restored Zion is central, recognizing that Judah's captivity is elsewhere blamed on their defilement of the Sabbath regulation (2 Chr. 36:21; Jer. 17:21–27). This seems to indicate that the Sabbath indeed encapsulates the moral law (cf. Ex. 20).

59:1–21. Separation, Confession, and Redemption. Isaiah acknowledges the Lord's will and power to intervene for His people (vv. 1–8), but their iniquities and sins had separated them from Him (v. 2; cf. 1:15; 50:1–3). The law of retribution is illustrated in 59:5–8: evil acts would bring evil on the perpetrators, and this was Israel's predicament. The people of Israel, who were mourning in the dark and departing from the truth, were to acknowledge their sins as the cause of their misery (59:9–15), and then the Lord would intervene on behalf of the penitent (vv. 15–21). He was displeased over the lack of justice among the leaders (vv. 15–16), for it was contrary to His own character (v. 17). The law of retribution is again stated in v. 18 as the basis for the Lord's anger and vengeance against His adversaries and enemies among the nations. The references to the Spirit of the Lord in v. 19 may indicate that the Lord will act through the righteous King foretold in 11:1–10. The Lord's intervention would result in His retributive punishment of the nations (59:18), but His coming to Zion means the redemption of the penitent in Israel (v. 20), to whom He would grant His Spirit and words forever (v. 21).

60:1–22. The Glory of God. The vision of the restored Zion-Jerusalem is a climactic point in the book of Isaiah. This passage, together with chapters 61–62, develops three themes: (1) when the glory of the Lord rises upon His temple in Zion-Jerusalem, the nations would come to her light, scattered Israel would return to her, and the nations would pay tribute to the Lord as their Ruler (60:1–20); (2) an everlasting covenant with the people of Zion-Jerusalem would bring restoration, righteousness, and praises before the eyes of the nations (60:21–61:9); and (3) the Lord would glorify Zion-Jerusalem before the witnessing nations and kings (61:10—62:12).

The passage begins with the command to Zion-Jerusalem to arise, shine (i.e. “shake yourself from the dust”), and reflect their light, the glory of the Lord, which had now come to them. Nations and kings, in darkness, were to come to Zion's light, to their glorious Lord (60:3). The passage continues with a further command to mother Zion-Jerusalem to look at her sons and daughters approaching with the nations from afar (v. 4; cf. 49:14—50:3; 54:1–17). The nations would come to pay homage and bring tribute. Peoples from afar would not only come with gold and incense but would come to proclaim the praises of the Lord (60:6; cf. Deut. 26:19) in the holy temple. In restored Zion-Jerusalem, the nations would have access to the temple, to worship the God of Israel. The phrase “the Lord's blessing of Zion with glory and splendor” is a fulfillment of God's covenant promises (Is. 60:9; cf. Deut. 26:18–19, where similar a Hebrew word is used). Zion's ornamental splendor and glory would consist of the Lord's shining glory—as expressed in the references to the Lord's glory rising upon them (60:1–2) and God being their glory (v. 19). Zion's ornamental glory, no longer determined by her ornamental jewelry (see 3:16–23), would be the beautiful garments that the Lord had commanded her to put on (52:1). They are defined in 61:10 as the “garments of salvation” and the “robe of righteousness,” which are compared to the jewels with which the bride and bridegroom were adorned (61:10). The Lord would rename Zion, signifying forgiveness and restoration.

The nations and their kings would submit like vassals to their overlord (60:10–12). They were to build up the walls of “the City of the Lord” (v. 14) and serve Zion (v. 10). Zion would be ornamented by “the glory of Lebanon” (v. 13). Its fertile ground and the various trees and their shade would ornament the temple. God would make the place for His feet glorious, which means that Zion, as God's dwelling place, would be glorified through the worship of the nations who formerly afflicted Zion (vv. 13–14; cf. v. 7d). The nations would call Zion by a new name: "The City of the LORD, Zion of the Holy One of Israel" (vv. 14d–e). Then Zion-Jerusalem would know that the Lord, the Mighty One of Jacob, was her Savior and Redeemer (v. 16) and would enjoy peace and well-being. All violence and destruction would be gone, and Zion's walls would be called "Salvation" and her gates "Praise."

The Lord would be Zion's everlasting light (vv. 19–20; cf. Rev. 21:23). Zion would no longer live in darkness because the time of her mourning would end. The symbol of the Lord as a light may be associated with His creative and reconciling power (cf. Pss. 18:28; 36:9; 104 [esp. v. 2]; John 8:12). Although the earth and all the nations were covered with darkness (i.e., lacked justice and righteousness), Zion's light (the Lord) had come, and the nations and their kings would come to Him (Is. 60:1–3). The inhabitants of Zion would be righteous and would experience the Lord's blessings (vv. 21–22). He would be glorified by the redeemed people being the work of His hand. The Lord's plan was to hasten the fulfillment (v. 22).

61:1–11. News of Restoration. Verses 1–3 summarize the mission of the righteous Servant of the Lord. Jesus applied the first part of these words to Himself in the synagogue of Nazareth (Luke 4:16–22). Isaiah presents the Servant acknowledging that He had been anointed by the Lord with His Spirit (Is. 61:1). This passage thus alludes to another messianic promise in 11:2 and to the association of the Servant with the Spirit in 42:1 and 48:16. The tasks of the Servant consist in comforting the oppressed and announcing that the Lord had heard their prayers and would grant them glory, joy, and praises. The "trees [or oaks] of righteousness" (61:3) may refer to people who had been restored by the Lord's righteousness. In this context, righteousness or vindication is connected with salvation (cf. 41:10; 45:8; 51:5; 62:1) and glory (cf. 58:8; 62:2).

The prophet proceeds to describe the future restoration of the cities of Israel that had been ruined by the enemy (61:4). Strangers would become servants of Israel as shepherds, farm laborers, and vinedressers (v. 5). The people of Israel would be called the "priests of the LORD" and the servants/ministers of God (v. 6; cf. 66:21). This probably alludes to Exodus 19:6, where Israel is referred to as "a kingdom of priests" and "a holy nation." The everlasting covenant would bring joy to the people of Israel. God would clothe His people in garments of salvation and the robe of righteousness (Is. 61:10; cf. Zech. 3; Matt. 22:1–14; Rom. 13:14; 1 Cor. 1:30; 2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:27; Phil. 3:8–9; Rev. 7:14; 19:8; 21:2). These are wedding dress metaphors contrasted with a bridegroom who decks himself with ornaments or a bride who adorns herself with jewels (Is. 61:10). The wedding image points to the new covenant between God and Israel (v. 8; cf. 24:5; 54:10; 55:3; 2 Sam. 7:13, 16, 25, 29; 23:5). The blessings of the everlasting covenant would be witnessed by the nations (cf. Is. 61:9).

62:1–12. Zion Glorified. The Lord's silence (v. 1) is a recurring motif in Isaiah (42:14; 57:11; 64:12). The Lord would not be silent until He had accomplished salvation for His people. For the symbol of "light" and related images as references to the Lord when He glorifies and saves Israel, see 2:5; 9:2; 60:1–3. All nations and kings would see Zion's righteousness (or vindication and salvation; see commentary on 61:3) and glory (i.e., honor and dignity), and she would be called by a new name given to her by the Lord. His delight in His bride is expressed in her new names: Hephzibah means "my delight is in her" (62:4; cf. 2 Kin. 21:1), and Beulah means "married" (Is. 62:4). The new names indicate Zion's new status and destiny, which is further developed in 62:3, 5. The beautiful crown of splendor and glory and the royal diadem (v. 3) indicate the honor and dignity that the Lord would bestow on His people, reflecting the practices of a royal wedding. The wording in v. 3 is remarkable in that Zion, the glorious crown, would be in God's hand. The wedding and marriage metaphors hinted at in 61:10 and 62:4 highlight the honor and dignity that the husband bestows on His wife and their mutual delight. The Lord would delight in His people as the groom delights in his bride.

If in 62:6–7 the speaker is the prophet, the verses express his longing for the Lord to make Jerusalem praised throughout the earth (v. 7). The watchmen of v. 6 would be prophets invoking the Lord's saving actions for Jerusalem. But if the speaker is the Lord in v. 6a–b, and the prophet adds his comments in vv. 6c–7, the watchmen would probably be heavenly beings keeping watch over the city. As the Lord's heralds, they would keep watch in and around Jerusalem and report to the Lord. They were to continue until the Lord established Jerusalem

(v. 7). Verses 8–9 are directly connected with vv. 4–5 and assume that the future restoration had already been accomplished. The powerful image in vv. 8c–9 describes the Lord’s solemn promise that Zion would never again suffer the terrors of a foreign invasion. The commanded procession into the holy city and the temple marks the end of the symbolic wedding ceremony between the Lord and His people (v. 10). The Lord’s proclamation to Zion had reached to the end of the world, to scattered Israel among all the nations: Zion’s Savior was coming, and His reward and recompense would be with Him (v. 11; cf. Rev. 22:12).

63:1–6. The Lord at War. The prophet describes the Messiah’s victory over all His enemies (vv. 1–6; see chaps. 13–23 and 34–39). The text refers to the Lord coming from Edom and Bozrah, a possible allusion to 34:5–15. However, the central point is the defeat of the nations (59:15b–20) during the day of vengeance when God would restore His redeemed people (61:2; cf. 34:8). The passage has the form of a dramatic dialogue. A bloodstained warrior is seen returning from Edom and Bozrah. Someone—perhaps a watchman on the walls of Jerusalem—asks Him to disclose His identity, and the answer is that He is the One mighty to save (63:1). The watchman seeks an explanation of the red stains on His garments (v. 2), and the answer is that He has intervened on behalf of His people without human assistance and has annihilated the oppressive nations. The bloodstain on the Messiah Warrior signifies His victory over the enemy (symbolized here as Edom) and the redemption of His people.

63:7–14. Prayer of Remembrance. This prayer expresses the attitude which the Lord favors (see 57:14–20). A herald, on behalf of the people, recalls the Lord’s khesed, “mercy,” “love,” “covenant faithfulness,” and rakhamim, “tender mercy” or “compassion” (63:7). He made a covenant with Israel as their Savior (v. 8; cf. Lev. 26:12; Deut. 29:13; Jer. 7:23; Ezek. 11:20) because He had compassion on them. Because of the similarity of certain Hebrew words, there is some variation in regard to the Hebrew manuscripts, the LXX, and commentators with respect to Is. 63:9. Most translations have opted for the reading that God was afflicted in all of their afflictions. God carried His people as an eagle carries its young on its wings (Deut. 32:11). But the people rebelled and grieved His Holy Spirit, and consequently the Lord turned against them as an enemy (Is. 63:10). Israel remembered the days of old, when they sought the Lord who had saved them during the Exodus (vv. 11–14). They remembered Moses as the shepherd of His flock and how they sought the One who put His Holy Spirit within (or among) them (lit. “within him”)—the Lord put His Spirit upon Moses (Num. 11:16–25). They remembered how the Lord led them in the wilderness. The simile of a horse in the open desert describes how the Lord led Israel with ease through the Red Sea (Is. 63:13; cf. Ps. 106:9). A second image depicts livestock given rest by the Spirit of the Lord, an image that alludes to the Lord’s promise: “My Presence will go with you, and I will give you rest” (Ex. 33:14). In Isaiah 63:9–10, interesting references are made to the Lord, the Angel of His presence, and the Holy Spirit, probably pointing to the three persons of the Godhead. The three are fully involved in the work of redemption.

63:15–19. Prayer of Penitence. Based on vv. 11–14, an appeal is next made to the Lord to show His zeal, power, and compassion (v. 15). There is a phrase in the Hebrew which literally means “the sound of your inward parts,” the “inward parts” being a metaphor for the seat of emotions. The Hebrew term me’eh, “inward parts,” may be used in the context of a sense of pity (cf. 16:11) or compassion (cf. Jer. 31:20). The petitioners are confident that the Lord wants and has the power to save them (cf. Is. 64:1–4) because He is their Father and He has proven Himself to be their Eternal (Heb. ’olam) Redeemer (or “Redeemer from old/ancient times”; 63:16). The concept of the Lord as Israel’s Father, which corresponds to Israel being His son, is defined in Deuteronomy 32:6 in the context of the Lord creating Israel as His elected people.

Isaiah, on behalf of his fellow Israelites, asks difficult and perplexing questions of God, such as “Why have You caused us to wander? Why have You hardened our hearts?” (Is. 63:17). This kind of language is similar to other passages that attribute divine involvement (in some sense) in regard to human sin and hardness of heart (e.g., 6:10; Ex. 4:21; Deut. 2:30; Rom. 9:18; 11:7–9; 2 Thess. 2:11). In the Bible God is at times described as doing that which He allows. He respects human freedom and makes humans responsible for their actions. Those who harden themselves against the Lord cannot prosper because the Lord’s wisdom and strength will prevail over them (Job 9:4; Prov. 19:21). The Lord allows for the sinners’ actions, but He is also ready to save them from their wrongdoings. This is what the petitioners are asking for in this passage. The appeal for the Lord to return for the sake of His servants (i.e., Israel; cf. e.g., Is. 41:8–20) and the tribes of His heritage (cf. e.g., 54:17; 58:14) is motivated by His covenant with Israel (cf. 63:15–17).

In the Hebrew, the assumed referent of what God's holy people possessed is not clear. However, an analogy may exist between the list in 64:9–11 and the content of 63:17c–19: (1) Israel as Your people (v. 17; 64:9); (2) the desolation of (lit.) “the cities of Your holiness,” namely, Judah (63:18a; 64:10a); and (3) Zion-Jerusalem desolate and the temple exposed to burning (63:18b; 64:10b–11c). This analogy suggests that the implied “it” refers not to the temple but to the cities of Judah (i.e., the land). The trampling of the sanctuary may be referring either to the destruction of the temple or, figuratively, to “treating it with disdain.”

64:1–12. May the Lord Come. This section is a continuation of the prayer of penitence. It begins with an appeal to the Lord to “rend the heavens” in order to show Himself (cf. 63:15). His powerful appearance is described as fire that burns brushwood and twigs and causes water to boil (64:2). The purpose of His revelation before the nations (cf. 40:3–5) was to make His power known to His adversaries (cf. 63:18b) so that the nations would tremble before Him, that is to say, in His presence. The petitioners remembered the Lord's past actions during the Exodus, the wilderness wanderings, and the conquest of Canaan. From the earliest times (Heb. 'olam), the Lord had been known as the One who helps those who wait for Him (64:3–4). They had complete confidence in the Lord because He paga ‘, “helps” or “welcomes” (lit. “meets” or “encounters”) those who rejoice in doing what is right (v. 5). But then the sad reality dawned on them: God had been angry on account of their sin. Sin causes grief in the heart of the repentant soul. Recognition and confession of one's sin result in forgiveness.

All righteous deeds are like “filthy rags.” This is probably a reference to the cloths used by a woman during her menstruation or after childbirth (cf. Lev. 12), which were fit only for destruction. The people's situation was hopeless—all their acts of righteousness were so polluted that they could not be cleansed but only destroyed. Therefore, they confessed that they were withering like a leaf and being blown away by the wind (cf. Ps. 90:5–6). The hopelessness of the petitioners in Isaiah 64:6 is underlined by the reference to the lack of response to the Lord, His punishment, and the removal of His sustaining presence from them (v. 7).

After a marked shift in the text with the Hebrew we'attah, “but now” or “yet,” the petitioners expressed renewed confidence in the Lord as their Father (cf. 63:16) and Creator (64:8; cf. 57:16). The image of the potter and the clay is used here (as in Job 10:9) to remind the Lord that He made humans out of clay, and therefore they are weak and fragile beings who are fully dependent on His mercy (cf. Jer. 18:1–12). The next two requests of the Lord, namely, not to remain angry with them and not to always remember their sins, were combined with the plea to notice that they were still His people (cf. Is. 63:16–19).

The suffering and shame of the petitioners is related to the fact that the nations afflicted Judah and Jerusalem (64:10–11). The phrase “Your holy/sacred cities” is unique in the OT. That the cities belonged to the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, and therefore were holy, contains an appeal for the Lord's intervention for His name's sake. The lamentation continues: the temple referred to in v. 11 is clearly Solomon's temple, for it was where the ancestors praised the Lord. In the Hebrew it is referred to as a “house,” not a “sanctuary” (see 63:18). The reference in v. 11 is most probably written from the perspective of the future Babylonian destruction of the city in 586 B.C. The reference to the makhmad, “pleasant,” “desirable,” or “treasured” things, may refer to valuables in, and ornaments of, the temple (cf. 2 Chr. 36:19; Lam. 1:10–11; Ezek. 24:21; Hos. 9:6). The lamentation ends with an appeal for the Lord's intervention. The question regarding whether God would continue to hold back (Is. 64:12) alludes to 63:15–16, where the Lord's intervention is expected because Israel is His covenant people. The question of whether He would remain silent is essentially the question of whether He would refuse to intervene on behalf of His covenant people. The final question of 63:12 is in regard to whether the Lord would continue to punish His people. The questions are an expression of hope and anticipate a positive response from the Lord.

65:1–16. First Answer: God Is Righteous. The Lord's answer to Israel's lamentation in 63:7–64:12 begins with this passage. It predicts that the Lord, in His righteousness, would punish the rebellious and reward the faithful in Israel. Paul applies 65:1 in Romans 10:20 to the gospel going to the Gentiles (see 66:12, 18–20). Isaiah places the emphasis on the fact that the Lord made Himself available to His people, but apostate Israel behaved as a nation that was not called by His name (i.e., that did not belong to Him; v. 1). A list of offenses is given (vv. 3–5) involving practices of fertility cults, divination by consulting the dead, and defilement by breaking dietary laws. The concluding offense (v. 5) is the blasphemous claim by those who had broken the covenant law and defiled themselves that they were as holy as the priests (cf. Lev. 21:6–8). Their offense lay in the blasphemy of treating defilement as holiness.

Concerning the offenders, the Lord states that they are like smoke in His nostrils and a continual fire (Is. 65:5). They had made Him angry, and their punishment is expressed in the characteristic references to the Lord's active intervention—He would not keep silent, and He would take vengeance upon them (cf. 34:8; 63:4). The image of repaying in their “bosom” or “lap” (65:7) refers to a fold of garment where money was carried, but here it is used to refer to a payment according to the law of retribution. However, God would save the faithful remnant and let them dwell in restored Zion (v. 8). The good fruit is a gift of God. As repeatedly stated by Isaiah, the righteous remnant needed to be separated from the wicked. God's chosen remnant were the people who sought Him (vv. 9–10). They affirmed the invitation to seek the Lord while He could be found (55:6) and had honestly sought the Lord (cf. 65:1). Consequently, they would inherit and possess the land (cf. 54:3; 57:13; 60:21).

Those indifferent to the peace of Zion and the worship of the Lord would be left to perish by the sword. They were preparing a table for gad, which refers to the worship of a Syrian god named “Fortune,” and they were bringing drink offerings for meni, a god of fate (both Gad and Meni may have been star deities; 65:11–12). The Lord's servants would prosper in the sense that they would have food, drink, and joy. The wicked would experience only shame, pain, and a crushed spirit (vv. 13–14). The name of the wicked would function as a curse (cf. Jer. 29:22), while the name of the Lord's servants would bring blessings from the only true God who speaks truth. For those who would inherit the land, previous troubles would be forgotten and hidden from the Lord's eyes (Is. 65:16).

65:17–25. Second Answer: New Heavens and New Earth. The Lord promised to create new heavens and a new earth (cf. 66:22) and affirmed that the former things would not be remembered or come to mind. In Isaiah's setting, this verse is a reference to the new conditions that the Lord would create for Zion-Jerusalem and His people. The prophet has just indicated that the former troubles would be forgotten (v. 16) and continues to describe the joy of salvation (vv. 18–19) and the long life of all the people except sinners (vv. 20–22; see below, “The New Heavens and Earth and the Presence of Death”). Isaiah is the first prophet who explicitly announces God's future creation of an everlasting new world without sin and suffering (v. 23; cf. Rev. 21:1–4). In the new world that God would create for His faithful ones, children would be born for blessing, not for trouble, because they would be children of those blessed by the Lord. The Lord would answer before they called and hear while they were still speaking (Is. 65:24). In all of His holy mountain, the Lord says, there would be a new order of things, a state of peace and not of destruction (v. 25; cf. 11:9–10).

The New Heavens and Earth and the Presence of Death

Isaiah 65:20 has perplexed some Christian readers because it is connected to the new creation. This promise of longevity, that presupposes the presence of sin and death, is found in the context of a divine announcement of the new heavens and new earth (v. 17). The context (vv. 17–25) describes the transformation of society (vv. 18–19, 22–24), nature (v. 25), and humanity's relationship with God (vv. 19, 24). In the interpretation of the passage, we should probably examine first the concept of the “new” in Isaiah.

1. New Heavens and New Earth. The phrase “new heavens and a new earth” obviously designates a new creation (vv. 17–25; 66:22; cf. Gen. 1:1). According to Isaiah, this new creation would totally displace and bring to an end the former things. The “new” work of God would be so radical that the former would not be remembered (Is. 65:17b); absolute joy would prevail (v. 18), weeping and crying would disappear forever (v. 19), and the nature of wild animals would be transformed (v. 25). Elsewhere, the prophet even announces that God “will swallow up death forever” (25:8) by bringing it to an end when He resurrects His people (26:19). This would be the ultimate defeat of death. For the prophet, this is an end-time expectation, a return to God’s paradise.

2. Israel and the “New” in Isaiah. In Isaiah God announced to His people new things before they would come into being (42:9). In fact, He was already doing a “new thing” (43:19), namely, His work of redemption for Israel, the deliverance from exile, and the return to Jerusalem. The new thing was His work of salvation within their history. This event would have an impact on nature (vv. 19–20) and would bring healing to His people (42:16). What was particularly new was that in the deliverance of Israel, the nation itself would not play any role at all (God would use the Persian king; 44:24–45:7) because it would be based on God’s forgiving grace (43:25) and even the nations would benefit from it (45:22–24).

The context of this new, radical, unique work of salvation is the history of Israel, and it did not immediately bring the history of the nations to an end. The Medo-Persian kingdom would still be in power, but God was using it to bring something totally new into existence. The old oppressive powers coexisted with the new things, that is to say, the new creation that God was already bringing into existence. We could say that what the NT calls the present age and the future age (Matt. 12:32) are described in Isaiah as simultaneously present in the arena of human history.

Therefore, in Isaiah the new creation is not something totally in the future. It was to irrupt into the present of Israel through God’s glorious work of redemption and forgiveness. It is within this conceptual framework that Isaiah 65:20 is to be placed. It announces that soon, in the present existence of Israel, God would begin to defeat death. This idea is expressed through the promise of longevity and the elimination of infant mortality. This promise points to a restriction imposed on the power of death, and consequently it was a prelude to the future extermination of death from the world. These promises were to be literally fulfilled in Israel had it remained faithful to God, but this was not the case. The coming of the Messiah enriched the prophecy and enlarged its fulfillment.

3. The New in the New Testament. Similarly to Isaiah and in fulfillment of his prophecy, in the NT the age of salvation was inaugurated by Christ. For now, the evil age of sin and death coexist (cf. Gal. 1:4; Heb. 6:5). The defeat of death is already a reality through the redemptive work of Christ (Heb. 2:14; Rev. 1:18). Through Him the new creation is a present reality and believers are part of it (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 1:4). It is already here as a promise, as a gift, as a process by which sinners are being transformed into the likeness of Christ (2 Cor. 4:16). We now wait for the consummation of that salvation (Rom. 8:19–23; Rev. 21:1).

66:1–4. Third Answer: True Worship. The true worshiper is humble, contrite, and trembles at God’s word (v. 2; cf. 57:15–21). God will reject those who believe that He, the Creator of heaven and earth, could reside only in a temple built by humans (66:1–2), formally worshiped by covenant breakers (v. 3). God declared that heaven is His throne and the earth His footstool (v. 1). This alludes to Israel’s ancient conviction that the Lord’s favor does not depend on building a wooden building (2 Sam. 7:7) and that the highest heavens could not contain God, let alone an earthly temple (1 Kin. 8:27; cf. vv. 23, 57–61; Ps. 11:4). The Lord’s footstool (see e.g., Ps. 132:7) normally represents the ark, Zion, or apparently the earthly temple (cf. Is. 60:13), but when Isaiah identifies the earth as the Lord’s footstool (66:1), he is describing the Lord as the Sovereign King of the world.

Considering that the Lord’s throne is heaven and earth is His footstool, these rhetorical questions belittle the presumptuous thought that humans can build a house to worship the Lord while being disloyal to Him. The Sovereign King of the universe cannot be caged in a house and manipulated through ritual formalism. The prophet describes the false worshipers as those who offer sacrifices to the Lord while committing abominable offenses (v. 3; cf. 1:10–17). The dog was a sacrificial animal in some countries but considered unclean in Israel. As the apostates—who feared their threatening enemies—had chosen what was displeasing to God, God would choose their punishment (ta'alulim, which could designate a severe treatment or delusion) and would bring upon them what they had feared (66:4).

66:5–13. Fourth Answer: I Will Vindicate Zion.

Verses 5–13 are addressed to the poor and contrite people of the Lord. They are clearly distinguished from their own people (lit. “brothers”) who hated them and from those who excluded them because of God’s name (v. 5). The latter were the apostates (vv. 3–4) who were oppressing the faithful (cf. 50:4–11; 51:7), taunting their faithful brothers and scoffing at the predictions of the Lord’s intervention against the oppressors. But these would not have a part in the restored Zion: they would be ashamed (66:5), and the voice of the Lord would be heard as He took vengeance upon His enemies (v. 6). The prophet already hears the noise from the city and the voice of the Lord from the temple (v. 6).

The scoffers continued their taunt, speaking of the predicted sudden change of Israel’s situation as just too miraculous to be believed (v. 8). “Zion” is treated here as a metonymy for the land of Israel and Judah, and the taunt builds on earlier passages (e.g., 49:17–26; 52:1–12; 54:1–17; 60:1–22). The Lord replied to the taunt with two rhetorical questions relating to His power and control of history and to His plan to restore Zion and return scattered Israel (66:9).

The Lord invited the faithful citizens of new Zion to rejoice and take part in the celebration of her glory (vv. 10–11; cf. chaps. 60–62). He refers to them as those who love her and mourn for her (cf. 57:18; 61:2–3). The apostates, however, were those who forsook the Lord and forgot His holy mountain (65:11). In 66:11 the restored community is depicted through the image of a child being nourished (comforted) by its mother’s milk (cf. 60:16). The metaphor of glorified Zion as a mother feeding, carrying, and dandling her child (i.e., her people) continues. The Lord would extend peace to her like a river and give her the glory or wealth of the nations (or Gentiles) like an overflowing stream (66:12). Then they (the faithful citizens) would be nursed and fed (i.e., their needs would be satisfied; cf. 60:16). This portion of the passage emphatically resumes the Lord’s decision in 40:1–2 to comfort Jerusalem (66:13).

66:14–24. Fifth Answer: Final Judgment. The citizens of restored Zion were told that their hearts would rejoice and that they (or their “bones,” the Heb. word ’etsem can mean “self” or “bone”) would flourish like grass when they would see God’s salvation and glory (v. 14; cf. 58:11; 60:5a). This prediction rejects the taunt of the apostates in 66:5. God would demonstrate His power and righteousness in two ways. His hand (i.e., power) would be known to His servants when they saw His plan being implemented and their oppressors being defeated (v. 14c). By contrast, His enemies would be exposed to His anger (vv. 14d–15). The apostates in Israel were among the Lord’s enemies. The first clause of v. 18 does not contain a verb in the Hebrew text, and thus translators have usually supplied one. Some supply “know,” in other words, “I know their works”; others have “because of their actions and thoughts” or “I can see what they are doing.” These enemies are those who go to gardens to worship idols and who eat swine and mice (v. 17; cf. 65:3–4 and the prohibitions against unclean food in Lev. 7:21; 11:10–23, 29).

The Lord would rule as the King of the world: He would gather all nations and languages (lit. “tongues”; Is. 66:18). This would be the result of the atonement and intercession of the Lord’s Suffering Servant on behalf of the nations (52:13–53:12). The Lord’s acceptance of their sacrifices in His temple, which He had declared to be “a house of prayer for all nations” (56:6–7), implies that the nations would be citizens of the Lord’s future kingdom (cf. 2:2–4). He would set a sign among the nations—probably “the banner” that is repeatedly mentioned in the book (cf. 11:10b). The survivors who would escape, that is to say, the Lord’s faithful remnant that included the faithful among scattered Israel, would be saved from the fate of the apostates (cf. 66:14–17). These would be sent to the nations in order to announce God’s glory among the Gentiles (or the nations; v. 19; see 11:11; Ezek. 27:10–13). They would go to Tarshish, a distant Phoenician colony; to Pul, which was probably Somaliland or Libya in Africa; to Lud, which may be Lydia in Asia Minor; to Tubal, which may refer to the people living south of the Black Sea; to Javan, which refers to the Greeks; and to the islands or coastlands, which refer to distant peoples.

The Lord told His faithful ones that those of the remnant of Israel whom He would send to distant nations (Is. 66:19) would bring their fellow Israelites to the Lord’s holy mountain in Jerusalem as an offering (minkhah, “offering,” “tribute,” “gift”). The metaphor of the people being offered to the Lord in a ceremonially clean vessel describes their return as a tribute to the Lord (v.

20; cf. 52:11–12). The means of transportation are reminiscent of 60:4–9 and lend force to the multitude of people coming from distant places. Some of them would be chosen as priests and Levites (66:21). Priests and Levites were among the apostates and those who lost their lives during the Assyrian and Babylonian invasions. Consequently, faithful Israel would replace the unfaithful, and the needed numbers of temple servants would be filled (cf. 61:5–6). Thus, the Lord’s plan would be accomplished—purified Israel would worship Him properly in His holy temple.

The new heavens and the new earth that the Lord would make (66:22) were to remain before Him (see commentary on 65:17–25). The new heavens and new earth would display the glory of the Lord. Israel and his descendants were to remain before Him, never to be separated. Humanity’s worship of the Lord would continue eternally, from one new moon to another (i.e., monthly) and from one Sabbath to another (i.e., weekly; 66:23). The Lord’s world sovereignty was to be confirmed by worship. The corpses of the apostates would be an abhorrent reminder of their permanent state of death and defilement. The going out referred to at the beginning of v. 24 alludes to the custom of ending the regular worship at Jerusalem with a procession from the temple. On this occasion, the worshipers would see the bodies of the dead apostates in the Valley of Hinnom (from which is derived the expression Gehennah, “hell” in the NT) at the foot of Mount Zion. Its disgrace and defilement derived from its association with human sacrifice (2 Kin. 23:10; Jer. 7:31; 32:35) and from its use as the city’s rubbish dump. Unclean corpses that were denied proper burial were also deposited there to be burned or left to decompose. The worm that would not die and the fire that would not be quenched refer to what would happen to their bodies and does not refer to the concept of an immortal soul. The verb tenses denote actions that are not yet complete and convey the sense that the worm had not yet died and the fire had not yet been quenched. The clauses simply say that no one would act to extinguish the worms or quench the fire before the consumption of their bodies, which agrees with 1:31. The fate of the corpses confirms that the apostates would permanently perish (cf. 26:14) and would be excluded from participation in the new life that the Lord would create for His people. The reference to these dead people who had rebelled or transgressed (Heb. pasha) against the Lord in 66:24 echoes 1:2, where the same verb is used. The problem with God’s children, announced in 1:2–3, was at last to be addressed. The many verbal and thematic connections between chapters 1 and 66 serve to mark an inclusio of the whole book (see commentary on 1:2–31). The nations would see the Lord’s glory in Zion and the glorification of faithful Israel (61:4–11; 62:1–4, 10–12) and would choose to join the worshipping community in Zion-Jerusalem (60:1–18).

The book of Isaiah closes with a description of the final fate of the wicked, which implies the conclusion of the conflict and the transformation of hope into a visible reality through the power of God. Isaiah announces the extinction of the wicked in order to accentuate the final victory of the righteous. This hope anticipates the moment when God’s people will eternally dwell in the presence of Him who is the Creator, Redeemer, and Sovereign of the universe.

JEREMIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. This major prophetic work is introduced as “the words of Jeremiah” (Jer. 1:1). Considering the technical sense of a prophet’s “word” (dabar; 18:18; cf. 37:6–17), the plural “words [of Jeremiah]” signifies a collection of prophetic messages (cf. Amos 1:1). Jeremiah was the son of Hilkiah, one of the priests in the land of Benjamin (Jer. 1:1). The composition of the book of Jeremiah is best understood as a process. Firstly, the “word” of the Lord became the “word” of the prophet. God was the author-originator and Jeremiah the author-messenger. God placed His words in Jeremiah’s mouth (v. 9; 5:14; 15:19; cf. 19:2) or commanded him to write (30:1–2; 36:2, 28), and they became “the words of Jeremiah” (1:1; 51:63). Secondly, as mediator of God’s word, Jeremiah expressed the divine insight in his own words under the guidance of the Spirit. In this sense, Jeremiah is the author of his book, the content of which he received through divine revelation and inspiration (1:1–2). Thirdly, in some cases, Jeremiah used material that is nearly identical to that found in other books to convey his message (e.g., 2 Kin. 24:18–25:26 in Jer. 52:1–34). Arguably, this was because he either authored the other material or borrowed it because it expressed God’s message to him in a particularly useful way. Finally, Jeremiah wrote some of his “words” with his own hand (29:1; 30:2; 51:60) but also used a scribe to whom he dictated his message (32:13,

The Two Editions of Jeremiah

There are two different editions of the book of Jeremiah. The Hebrew text, from which the Septuagint (LXX) was translated, is about 13 percent or 2,700 words shorter than the Masoretic Text (MT) of the Hebrew Bible. Certain sections in the MT are missing from the LXX, and some material is in a different order. The Dead Sea Scrolls include six fragments of Jeremiah in Hebrew, four following the MT and two following the Hebrew text used by the translators of the LXX. Since the shorter edition of Jeremiah existed in Hebrew during the second century B.C., the major differences were not introduced by the LXX translator.

However, the overall message of Jeremiah does not significantly differ. Many differences result from repetitive material found in the MT that is missing from the LXX. While two versions of Jeremiah appear to have been in circulation at least from the second century B.C., the fact remains that the canonical edition in our Bibles was endorsed by Palestinian Judaism, associated with the Jerusalem temple, and continued in Rabbinic Judaism. These important questions remain: Which edition goes back to Jeremiah, and why do we have two editions? Various answers have been suggested, and there is no conclusive verdict.

For readers who accept the repeated claim of the book as the word of God, the same God also has the power and means to protect His word from distortions (cf. Jer. 23:28; 26:2; Ps. 119:160; Matt. 5:17–18; 1 Pet. 1:22–25). Although both editions contain, in slightly different forms, the word of God, the fact remains that the longer version in the MT was recognized as authoritative by both Judaism and Christianity as part of the biblical canon. In this we see God’s providential work.

16; 36:2–4, 32; 45:1). Although the composition of the book was a process (see 36:32), the final work bears the clear imprint of Jeremiah's individual and sensitive personality, and a masterful poetical and rhetorical style.

Date. The title in 1:1–3 dates Jeremiah's ministry from King Josiah's thirteenth year (627 B.C.) until the Babylonian Exile (586 B.C.). Prophetic "words"/"messages" were dictated and/or written over a period of time (30:1–24; 36:1–32; cf. 29:1–32; 45:1–5; 51:59–64). The epilogue in chapter 52 mentions events dated to the thirty-seventh year of the exile of King Jehoiachin of Judah (vv. 31–34; cf. 2 Kin. 25:27–30), that is, the year that Evil-Merodach of Babylon succeeded Nebuchadnezzar (562 B.C.). Chapter 52 was not written by Jeremiah (see 51:64), but it demonstrates how his prophecies were fulfilled. It also indicates that the book of Jeremiah as we now have it was in existence around 562 B.C. The earliest known manuscripts of the book are among the Dead Sea Scrolls, which date to about 200 B.C., approximately when the LXX translation was initiated in Egypt. The importance of the book is attested in Daniel (9:2; cf. 2 Chr. 36:21–22), in Ezra (1:1), and in the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus (chaps. 44–49).

